repairs, for which the advances were made, were ordinary, necessary, and proper. If there be more than one exercitor, they are all liable, singuli in solidum, for the master's contractions, without regard to their respective shares in the vessel—the exercitor who pays being entitled to relief, pro rata, from the others. Where the exercitors manage the ship themselves, without appointing a master, and without devolving the ostensible and exclusive management on any one of their own number, each is accounted master, quoad his own share; and his contract binds himself alone. The shipmaster's contracts concerning the cargo do not bind the exercitor, unless the master's commission contain an express authority to that effect—the management of the cargo, and of the contracts therewith connected, being usually intrusted to a supercargo. The exercitors, as well as the master, are included under the edict, Nautæ, cauponæ, stabularii—not, however, in solidum, but pro rata, according to their interests in the vessel; and that whether the exercitors be owners or mere freighters. And, by the statutes 7 Geo. II., c. 15, and 26 Geo. III., c. 86, the owners of ships (provided they had no knowledge of, or participation in, the fraud or negligence), are declared to be no further liable for embezzlement, negligence, or fraud, on the part of the master or crew, than to the amount of the value of the ship, and the freight due on the voyage in the course of which the embezzlement took place; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 29; Bank. B. i. tit. 18, § 30. Exercitory obligations, as they are termed, being properly maritime, were formerly cognisable, judicially, in the Admiralty Court, in the first instance; Stair, B. i. tit. 12, § 18. Exhibition. This term is applied to an action for compelling production or delivery of writings, and may be resorted to either for the recovery of writings which belong to the pursuer, or it may be raised at the instance of an apparent heir, to force production of writings and title-deeds relative to his predecessor's estate, in order to enable the heir to deliberate as to the propriety of entering heir, and thereby incurring a responsibility for his predecessor's debts and obligations.

1. Exhibition and delivery by a proprietor of the writs called for.—This is an ordinary petitory and principal action, whereby the owner of a writing requires the defender to produce it, and to deliver it to him. Being a real action, it may be insisted in against any holder of the document required—the pursuer being bound to specify the manner in which the defender became possessed of the document; and also to prove (which he may do by witnesses) that the defender had the writ in his possession at the date of the citation, or since. After that has been established, it is incumbent on the defender either to produce the writing, or to prove that he warrantably parted with it, or fairly lost possession of it; and, if the pursuer be not satisfied with the defender's statement, he may compel him to answer, upon oath, all pertinent interrogatories in relation to his having the writing, or putting it away, or as to his knowledge or suspicion concerning the person or persons who may have got possession of it; A. S. 22d Feb. 1688. Stair, B. iv. tit. 33, § 1, and B. i. tit. 7, § 14; More's Notes, p. li.; Bank, B. i. tit. 8, § 41, et seq.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 52; Tail on Evidence, p. 315; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. iii. p. 45, 656; Bell's Com. ii. 72.

2. Exhibition ad deliberandum by an apparent heir.—This action has mere the character of an accessory action than the preceding has, and may be pursued against third parties as well as relations, by every heir who may competently be charged to enter heir to a deceased person. The right to insist in the action is one of the privileges of an apparent heir; and he may raise it either within the tempus deliberandi, or after its expiration, and at any time before his entry as heir. In the action the apparent heir is entitled to call for exhibition of all deeds granted to or by his predecessor, whether the deeds have been perfected by sasine or not, to the effect that he may thereby be enabled to deliberate whether or not it will be prudent for him to take up the succession which has opened to him. Any deed of the predecessor, by which the heir is excluded from the succession, will afford a good defence against the action. Hence an irredeemable disposition, or a deed of entail, by which the ancestor has been divested and the heir excluded, will be a sufficient defence to the donee against exhibiting the writings relative to such disposition or deed of entail; and that whether sasine has followed on the deed or not. In like manner, if the apparent heir have been charged to enter heir by a creditor of the defunct, and have renounced, the heir cannot legally insist in an exhibition ad deliberandum against the creditor on whose charge he has renounced; but that renunciation will be no bar to an action of exhibition ad deliberandum against any other creditor of the defunct. Although the heir, before his entry, may require exhibition of writings ad deliberandum, he cannot, until his actual entry as heir, compel delivery of the title-deeds or other documents belonging to his ancestor, in the hands of third parties; neither can he enforce payment of the debts proved by such documents to be due to the ancestor. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 56, et seq.; Stair, B. iv. tit. 33; Bank, B. iii. tit. 4, § 66, and tit. 5, § 7; Bell's Princ. § 1688; Illust. ib.; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. iii. p. 266. See also Apparent Heir.

3. An exhibition ad probandum, was another accessory action formerly in use. This was an action competent to the party to a suit, when he wished to prove a fact pertinent to the cause; by the production of writings belonging to, or in the custody of, third parties—technically called Havers. But, in practice, this action has been long superseded by incident diligences, granted in the course of the principal action against the haver of the writing. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 52; Stair, B. iv. tit. 33, § 2, and tit. 41, § 5, et seq.; More's Notes, p. cccxv.; Dickson on Evidence, 669. See Diligence. Haver. Incident Diligence.

Exhibition: the benefactions settled for the maintenance of scholars in the English Universities, not depending on the foundation, are called Exhibitions. In this sense, the term is analogous with the Scotch term bursary. An exhibition was the name formerly given to an allowance of meat and drink, such as was customary among the religious appropriators of churches, who usually made it to the depending vicar. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Bursary. Alarages.

Exhumation. This term is sometimes applied to the offence of disinterring a dead body. See Dead Body.

Exile. See Transportation.

Exitus; the issues or profits of anything. Exitus terræ, the rents, fruits, and profits of the land. Exitus justitiaræ, the profit of the justice aïre. Exitus curiæ, the issues and commodity of a court, as americiaments, and the like. Skene, h. t.; Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 64.

Exoneration; a discharge; or it signifies the act of being legally disburdened of, or liberated from, the performance of a duty or obligation. Conclusions for exoneration are generally inserted in actions of multiplepoinding at the instance of trustees, executors, and others. See 3 Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. p. 313, et seq. Petitions for exoneration and discharge of purchasers and factors in rankings and sales are also, in certain circumstances, competent; 3 Jurid. Styles, 861–864. Petitions for the discharge of judicial factors, tutors, and others, under the Pupil's Protection Act, are regulated by 12 and 13 Vict., c. 51, § 34; and 20 and 21 Vict., c. 56, § 4. See Discharge. Multiplepoinding. Shand's Prac. pp. 582–583, 595.

Expediting Letters. This expression is said to be derived from the French verb expedier, which signifies to make out the principal copies of letters, judgments, and other juridical writs. In the phraseology of the Scotch law, to expede letters, means to write out the principal writ, and get it signeted, sealed, or otherwise completed. Thus, after a bill of suspension or of advocacy had been passed by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, the act of writing out the letters of suspension or of advocacy, and of obtaining them signeted, was termed expediting the letters—the passed bill being the warrant for so doing. In like manner, the act of passing a royal charter through the seals was formerly termed expediting a charter, although now the technical expression is, passing a charter. See Ross's Lect. vol. i. p. 236. See Suspension. Advocacion.

Expenses, or Costs of Suit. In judicial procedure, this term is applied to the charges exigible from a party to a process, as court-dues, fees to counsel and agents, and other expenses incurred in the prosecution of the action. It is almost the invariable practice for the pursuer, or, generally speaking, for the party making any claim judicially, not only to demand payment or performance of the obligation, or declarator or reduction of the right which is in question, but also to conclude for the expenses of the process which he has found it necessary to institute. Expenses may be given, however, without being specially concluded for. They are not, properly speaking, part of the subject-matter of an action; Hopkirk, 21 Dec. 1855, 18 D. 300. In like manner, it is the practice for the defender or respondent to demand the expense attending his defence; and the Court (except where special statute or rules of court regulate the matter otherwise) are in use to exercise a discretionary power on this point. Regularly, the question of expenses ought to be determined in the decree which settles the point of law; for the expenses are not demandable in a new action. By 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 17, it is directed, "that in pronouncing judgment on the merits of a cause, the Lord Ordinary shall also determine the matter of expenses, so far as not already settled, either giving or refusing the same in whole or in part; and every interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary shall be final in the Outer-House." It frequently happens, however, that decrees are allowed to be extracted, which contain a reservation of the question of expenses, the process to that extent remaining in dependence. In the case of decrees in absence, the stat. 1 and 2 Geo. IV., c. 38, § 33, provides, that it shall not be lawful to extract any decree for the random sum of expenses concluded for in the summons; but that, in all cases of decrees in absence, an account of expenses shall be lodged in process, and taxed by the Auditor; and that a report thereon by the Auditor shall be a sufficient warrant to the extractor to fill up the amount of the expenses to be awarded against the defender, without the necessity of bringing the Auditor's report before the Lord Ordinary, unless by his own direction or that of the Auditor, or on the motion of any party interested. See Decree. Where, in a litigated cause, expenses have been found due to either party by the Court of Session or by a Lord Ordinary, the practice is, for the Court or Lord Ordinary to make a remit to the Auditor of Court to tax the account of expenses. The account, together with a copy of the interlocutor finding expenses due, prefixed thereto, is lodged with the Auditor, who thereafter fixes a time for the taxation, and a copy of the account, together with the Auditor's warrant for taxing, is served on the agent for the party or parties found liable in expenses, that he may attend at the time so fixed. The agent for the party found entitled to expenses attends at the same time, and produces the process, or such part of it as may be necessary for the taxation of the account, together with the drafts or copies of papers, and other vouchers of his account, to the Auditor. After the account is taxed, the agent is entitled to get back the process, in order to return the same to the clerk, except in those cases where it may be necessary for the Auditor to retain it for further examination, in which case, a receipt is given by the Auditor or his clerk, for the process; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 69. The Auditor is empowered to hear the agents for the parties, but not in writing, on their objections. The Auditor returns a short report on the account, specifying the taxed amount; and, if no objection be made, the Court or Lord Ordinary before whom the process depends, approves of the report and discerns for the amount. In case either party means to object to the Auditor's report, he must immediately lodge with the clerk of the process a short note of his objections without argument, a copy of which must be transmitted to the agent on the other side, and the Court or Lord Ordinary may either direct the objections to be answered viva voce, or in writing; the expense of the discussion being laid on the objector if he fail in making good his objection, and the interlocutor thereon being final; A. S., 6th Feb. 1806. The expense of the judicial discussion is always laid on the party objecting, where his objections are repelled; but not necessarily, if the objection has been stated by him to the Auditor, and reported by the Auditor to the Court, for determination. An intimation of an appeal to the House of Lords, is not enough to stop decree being pronounced for expenses; but where the appeal has been actually presented, and service of an order thereon has taken place, a motion for expenses is incompetent. On petition to the Court, however, interim execution pending appeal, is granted as to expenses, the party finding caution to repeat, if the judgment be reversed; Cochrane, 12 D. 302. If the agent who has conducted the cause wish it, the decree for the expenses will be allowed to issue and be extracted in his name. Expenses belong to the agent, and the party found liable in them, cannot prevent his getting such decree, by pleading a counter claim against his client; Miller, 22d June 1848, 10 D. 1384. The taxation of the expenses, where either party is found liable to pay them, is, of course, a taxation as between party and party, not as between agent and client; for, although a party who is found liable in his adversary's expenses, is, under such an award, bound to pay the regulated expenses of a judicial discussion, conducted in the ordinary manner, he lies under no obligation to pay all the expenses which an anxious or capricious litigant may have incurred in the conduct of his cause; A. S. 19th Dec. 1835. But, although such expenses are not included under an award of the expenses of process, it is equally clear that the litigant is bound to pay his own agent for all the unnecessary, and, very often, useless expense bona fide occasioned by the litigant's own over-anxiety, and at his express desire. Hence arises the distinction which has been recognised between a taxation of costs as between party and party, and as between agent and client. Independently, however, of such capricious and extraordinary costs, it necessarily happens, that, in almost every case, the agent for one or other of the parties (and, where no expenses are found due to either party, the agent for each party) has an account to claim from his own employer. The Act of Sederunt accordingly provides in like manner for the taxation of accounts as between agent and client, by authorising a summary application to be made by the party to the Lord Ordinary before whom the cause depends, or has formerly depended, to get the account claimed by his agent remitted to the Auditor to be taxed according to the existing regulations; the report, in that case also, being returned to the Lord Ordinary, and disposed of as above, and the sum so ascertained forming the proper charge by the agent against his client. So also, when an agent or his representative raises an action against his employer for payment of a professional account, the Lord Ordinary may, and usually does in the first place, remit the account claimed to the Auditor to be taxed; and no decree, either in absence or after hearing parties, can be pronounced in such a case until a report has been made by the Auditor; A. S.

6th Feb. 1806. Expenses awarded in jury causes are also appointed to be taxed and reported upon by the Auditor of the Court of Session; 59 Geo. III., c. 35, § 33. By A. S. 29th Nov. 1825, § 39, it was necessary to lodge two accounts, the one containing the expenses incurred in the Court of Session, and the other the expenses incurred in the Jury Court. But since the incorporation of the two Courts, one account only is lodged. The auditing in jury causes is regulated on the same principles as in other Court of Session cases. There are necessarily, however, certain things peculiar to jury causes. Where the country agent is competent to take precognitions, and has been all along engaged in the case, an Edinburgh agent undertaking that duty will only be allowed to charge the opposite party at the rate at which the country agent would have charged. But, in general, the Court is disposed to allow the Edinburgh agent's charges for going personally to the country. A charge for two precognitions, one by an Edinburgh, and another by a country agent, is not good against the opposite party. The agent has the option of charging for a precognition, either according to the actual time occupied, or the usual drawing fees of a memorial or pleading, according to the length of the precognition. As to expenses of printing documents for jury trials, see A. S. 8th July 1850. The amount of fees paid to counsel is never interfered with, if bona fide paid and within reasonable bounds. In all cases where memorials are laid before counsel, the fee paid therewith, together with the date of payments, must be marked on the back in large legible characters (in words), and the paper must afterwards be got back from counsel, indorsed with his signature or initials, and produced to the Auditor. Where fees are paid to counsel without a memorial, a certificate under the hand of the counsel or his clerk, must, if required, be produced, that such fees were paid of the dates stated in the account. A party, after he has been found entitled to expenses, is not allowed to pay or state higher or additional fees to counsel, not actually paid at the time. But this rule does not apply either to cases on the poor's roll, or to such as have been conducted gratuitously by the agent and counsel, on account of the poverty of the party; A. S. 19th Dec. 1835. In general, the fees of two counsel only can be allowed against the losing party. The magnitude, however, of the case, or other special circumstances, may relax this rule. The personal charges of an unprofessional party are not allowed. The expression, expenses of the trial, in the interlocutor, includes the whole expenses of the process preparatory to, as well as at the trial. Where it is necessary or proper to employ a country agent in conducting a cause in the Court of Session, reasonable charges may be allowed for his trouble, &c., provided that double charges are not thereby incurred for doing the same business; A. S. 19th Dec. 1835. After a case has been decided in the Inner-House without mention of expenses, it is thought incompetent to claim expenses from the Lord Ordinary; Campbell and Company, 21st May 1803, Mor. App. Expenses, No. 3; Wyllie, 5th Feb. 1820, Fac. Coll. But see also, as to claiming them in the Inner-House subsequently, Gillies, 1843, 5. D. 1086; Mathew, 1844, 6 D. 1135; Kerr, 1835, 14 Sh. 180, Affd. 15 July 1837, 2 Sh. & M'L. 895. Where an interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary not mentioning expenses has been reclaimed against by the defender, and the interlocutor has been adhered to, without mention of expenses, and the interlocutor allowed to become final, no expenses can be awarded to the pursuer; Fleishers of Canongate, 7th July 1809, Fac. Coll. A Lord Ordinary can in no case give the expense of any part of a process finally decided in the Inner-House, without an express remit for that purpose; Falconer, 4th March 1815, Fac. Coll. See also, Wilson, 12th Nov. 1814. But it is competent to apply to the Lord Ordinary for the expenses incurred in the proceedings in a cause before him, although the Court, in adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, have awarded to the respondent the expense of supporting it; Goldie, 23d Jan. 1816, Fac. Coll. And where an interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary, finding expenses due generally, has been adhered to in the Inner-House, without any mention being made of expenses, it carries the expenses incurred in the Inner-House; Hill, 21st May 1824, S. & D. Where, however, the Lord Ordinary has said nothing about expenses, and his interlocutor is adhered to, the Court cannot give the respondent more than the expense of supporting the interlocutor; Bowie, 5th Dec. 1816, Fac. Coll. In an action on a mutual contract, stamped during the dependence of the action at the pursuer's expense, if the pursuer prevail and is found entitled to expenses, the expense of stamping, including penalty and solicitor's fee, must be borne by the parties equally; Stewart, 12th Feb. 1817, Fac. Coll. A decree for expenses in favour of a party who has been admitted to the benefit of the poor's roll, in order to prosecute the action, includes the expense of getting upon the roll; Cameron, 25th June 1814, Fac. Coll.; Rankine, 31st May 1821, S. & D. Where a judicial remit was made by the Court of Session, to an accountant or other professional person to report, it was formerly understood in practice, that the agents who conducted the remit, as well as the parties, were personally liable to the accountant for his fee; Milne v. Maclean, 31st May 1825, 4 S. & D. 45. But, by A. S. 19th Dec. 1835, it is declared that no agent is, without special agreement, to be held personally responsible to an accountant, engineer, or other reporter, to whom a remit is made, where the agent has authority to bind the party. The Lord Ordinary in the Outer-House, or the Court, in the event of bills of suspension of decrees of inferior Courts being passed, may find the suspender entitled to the expenses he has incurred in the inferior Court, as well as in the Court of Session; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 46; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 8. These expenses cannot be given in the Bill-Chamber, but only after the letters have been expedite, or after authority has been obtained to discuss the reasons on the bill. A general finding of expenses in favour of the suspender does not carry his expenses in the inferior Court. In a suspension, the Court cannot remit to the inferior Court to decide the question as to the expenses in the Court of Session. As to the respondent's expenses, see Advocation. When the Court remits a case to the Sheriff, with instructions to repel the dilatory defences, it is competent to give power to the Sheriff to decide all questions of expenses relative to said defences. Where expenses have been found due and modified, the agent who has conducted the process for the party who has been found entitled to expenses, may require the Court or the Lord Ordinary to pronounce decree for the expenses in his name against the adverse party. And where an interlocutor has been pronounced finding expenses due, or which, by necessary implication, carries expenses, the right of the agent to claim those expenses, and to have decree in his own name for them, cannot be defeated by a compromise of the law-suit; Hamilton, 17th June 1813, Fac. Coll.; Bell's Com. ii. 39, and cases there cited. As to the agent's preference for his expenses over the fund recovered, or in competition with the creditors of the party, see Hypothec. Lien. As to the liability of attorneys or mandatories for expenses, see Defender. In jury causes, it is competent to award the expenses of discussing questions of law and relevancy at the time they are disposed of; but this is not usual. When a party prevails on any incidental point, he ought always to get the expenses connected with it at once. When a new trial has been granted, the previous expenses are either awarded as a condition, or simpliciter refused, or reserved till the issue of the second trial. Cases illustrative of these different points will be found analysed in Macfarlane's Jury Prac. p. 283. The general rule is, that a new trial will be granted without payment of previous expenses, where the first verdict is set aside, through an error in law on the part of the presiding judge as to the admission or rejection of evidence, or in his charge to the jury; or in respect of the jury having disregarded the law given to them by the judge. But where the new trial is granted on any ground, except an error in law on the judge's part, that renders it essential to the justice of the case that it should be tried again, the expenses of the first trial are sometimes allowed, but there is no absolute rule on the subject; Dargie, 19 D. 878. At the termination of the cause, the question of expenses can only be taken up in the Division of the Court to which the case belongs, on a motion duly lodged and intimated, which is usually done when application is made to have the verdict applied. In general, the party obtaining the verdict is entitled to his expenses; but this rule is, in special circumstances, subject to exceptions. To get expenses, it is not necessary that a party should succeed to the full extent of his claims. It is enough that he has substantially succeeded in the point at issue. Questions of expenses are for the discretion of the Court in consideration of the circumstances of each case, and no absolute rules can be laid down on the subject. It may be observed, however, that a losing party, although he may have been successful on one point, will not get expenses on that point unless it involved a question of character, and was attended with additional expense. Johnston, 18 D. 1234. When the action has been brought for defamation, or violation of personal liberty, and no retractation or apology has been offered, the pursuer, if he obtain a verdict, though only for nominal damages, is entitled to expenses; Arrol v. King, 18 D. 98. But see also, Mason v. Tait, 13 D. 1282; and Ewing, 14 D. 314, 3050. But where the loss alleged is definite and specific, a verdict for a party with nominal damages does not carry expenses. Expenses may be modified in consideration of circumstances. Where a party is successful only on some of several issues, but upon the whole gets damages, he is entitled to his expenses, under deduction of the portion applicable to the issues which he has lost, and that portion he must sometimes pay to the other party; A. S. 19th Dec. 1835. Where the loss has been definite, and where the defender has tendered a sum by way of reparation, along with the expenses of process, up to the date of the tender, he will be liable in expenses, if the jury award more than that sum, but he will be entitled to expenses if they give less. Although this rule does not apply to actions for defamation, and others of that description, where a public investigation is necessary, yet, in one case, the defender got expenses, in respect of a tender of L.50, the jury finding for the pursuer only one shilling of damages. See Tender. With regard to the expense of appeals to the House of Lords, from judgments of the Court of Session, the following points seem to be fixed:—1st, Where expenses have been awarded by the House of Lords, upon a final discussion of the appeal, the Court of Session is in use to grant decrees for those expenses in a summary manner. But the Court will not do so where the appeal has been withdrawn with permission of the House, on payment of costs. In that case, the remedy against the party who attempts to re-sile, is to repudiate the arrangement, and apply to the House of Lords for a discussion of the appeal; for, until the condition of the withdrawal is complied with, the appeal is still in dependence; Brown, 20th July 1784; Mor. p. 4042. 2d, Where a judgment of the Court of Session is reversed on appeal, and the case remitted to the Court of Session to apply the judgment, without an instruction to give the appellant the expenses of the previous litigation, they cannot afterwards be awarded; Pringle, 6th March 1799, Mor. App. Expenses, No. I; Geddes, 16th Feb. 1816, Fac. Coll.; Wilson, 18th June 1818, Fac. Coll.; Colquhoun, 17 D. 245.

By sundry statutes and acts of sederunt regulating procedure before the Court of Session, the Court, or the Lord Ordinary, is empowered to repon parties on payment of the whole, or of a portion of the expenses previously incurred. Generally speaking, a party may be reponed against any proceeding to his prejudice, which has taken place in his absence, or even against judgments in foro, where, by accident or inadvertence, he has allowed an interlocutor against him (not otherwise final) to become final. See Reponing. Other statutes and rules of Court have rendered it imperative on the Court, in certain cases, to award the expenses against the unsuccessful party. Thus, the bankrupt statute, 54 Geo. III., c. 137, § 28, provided, that the unsuccessful competitor for a trusteeship should pay the expense of the competition; and, although there is now no express enactment on that subject, the principle applies to competitions for the office of common agent, and to unsuccessful objections to the Auditor's reports. See A. S. 11th July 1794, § 4; 6th Feb. 1806; and 19th Dec. 1835. Common Agent. In several British statutes, some of which extend to Scotland, the successful party is entitled to double or treble costs. In such cases the rule is, that the costs given by the Court de incremento, as it is termed, are to be doubled or trebled, as well as those given by the jury. But double or treble costs do not mean, according to their literal import, twice or thrice the amount of single costs. For where a statute gives double costs, they are to be calculated thus: first, the common costs, and then half the common costs. If treble costs, first the common costs; secondly, half of these; and then half of the latter. See Tomlins' Dict. voce Costs.

Trustees on bankrupt estates, litigating unsuccessfully, and also other trustees, if they litigate unnecessarily and improperly, will be found personally liable in expenses. Torbet, 1849, 11 D. 694; Hill, 1852, 1 Stuart, 494; Morrison, 1848, 11 D. 297; Clyne's Trustees, 1840, 2 D. 554; Smith, 1838, 16 Sh. 1223.

As to the expenses in which an unsuccessful pursuer is to be held liable where there are several defenders, see the cases of Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, 1858, 20 D. 677; Leslie, 1858, ib. p. 787. In jury causes, there is no absolute rule requiring payment of expenses as a condition of a new trial; Dargie, 1857, 19 D. 878. In some cases an action may proceed as to the matter of expenses when no practical question as to the merits remains; but where he pendente lite settles the dispute in such a way as to divest him of all title to sue, he cannot in general be allowed to go on in order to get decree for expenses; Dobie, 1856, 18 D. 1043. As to joint and several liability of defenders for expenses, see cases of Mackenzie and Logan, 1852, 15 D. 61, 94. As to certain items of expense in jury causes, see A. S., 16th Feb. 1841, § 45; 10th July 1844; 18th July 1850. As to expenses prior to litigation, which are not carried by a decree for expenses, see Prison Board, 1852, 14 D. 737.

Under recent acts costs may now be given both for and against the Crown; 18 and 19 Vict., c. 90; 19 and 20 Vict., c. 56, § 24. An arbiter has power to award expenses though no mention of them be made in the submission; Ferrier, 5 D. 456, App.; 4 Bell, 161. As to expenses in advocations and suspensions, see these articles. In advocations decree for expenses in the Supreme Court carries those in the Inferior Court as well; Sinclair, 1855, 17 D. 784; but see also, Boswell, 1848, 10 D. 808. In actions by a husband against a wife for divorce or separation, the former is generally bound to furnish the latter with the means of defending herself; and in actions by the wife against the husband, she will also get from the Court, if she has established a prima facie case, decree against the husband for such sums as may be necessary to carry on the action. Fraser's Rel. i. 380; Shand's Prac. 429.

The principles above explained apply to the expenses in inferior courts, as well as in the Court of Session. In actions which are brought in an incompetent court, or in an incompetent form, or in which parties are called who ought not to have been cited as defenders, expenses will be awarded against the pursuer. And, in inferior courts, the rate of charges is fixed by the regulations of the court before which the action depends; Sinclair, 16th June 1825. In one case, the question was raised, but not decided, whether such charges could be sustained, where the inferior court rate of charges was higher than that fixed in the Court of Session; Cunninghame, 9th March 1822, 1 S. & D. 395. In some counties, it is the practice for the Auditor (in conformity with the rule in the Supreme Court, introduced by A. S. 19th Dec. 1835), in taxing accounts as between party and party, to disallow, of his own accord, all charges for pleadings, &c., in which the claimant of the account has been unsuccessful; although he may have ultimately obtained decree in his favour on the whole subject-matter of the process. In other counties, the sheriff, in finding expenses due, finds that they are subject to modification in respect of such unsuccessful pleadings. The auditor thereupon taxes the whole item of the accounts, agreeably to the scale of regulations, and the sheriff thereafter applies the modification, upon the Auditor's report being laid before him. The parties, on being heard before the Auditor, usually get the portions of his report, to which they respectively object, marked as appealed from. The case is then put to the roll, and parties' agents are heard viva voce before the sheriff upon their appeals. Avizandum is thereupon made, and the sheriff, on considering the Auditor's report, and the viva voce objections and answers of parties, modifies the account to the amount which he may consider right, and pronounces decree for the sum so modified. See MacLaurin's Sheriff-Court Prac. ii. 398, et seq.

In criminal prosecutions, if statutory, no costs can be given unless sanctioned by the statute. By 9 Geo. IV., c. 29, § 23, no fees or expenses of any description are exigible by the clerks or other officers of a criminal court from any person on whom a criminal libel shall have been served, "unless the same shall form part of the sentence of the Court." This seems to imply that expenses may form part of a sentence, and expenses have been awarded against procurators-fiscal where the charge was dismissed as irrelevant, and as not amounting to a crime; Prentice, 1 Broun, 561. As to awarding expenses against a panel pursued only by the public prosecutor, see 2 Hume 493, Note 1; and on the subject of expenses in criminal cases generally, 2 Hume, 69, 128, 134, Note 1., 376, 382; 2 Alison, 39, 113, 355, 676. Exposing Children. The offence of exposing and deserting an infant child, if accompanied with circumstances proving an intention to destroy, and followed by death in consequence of the exposure, amounts to the crime of murder. Whether this be the case where there is no evidence of an intention to destroy, but the child dies by an accident connected with the exposure, may be more questionable; but on principle, the reckless exposure of an infant child to the risk of death, followed by death, seems to be nothing less. Even although the child does not perish, its desertion and exposure to any considerable risk is a crime punishable arbitrarily, according to the circumstances of the case, and which has been punished with whipping, imprisonment, or banishment. A charge of "wickedly, wilfully, and feloniously, exposing an infant child, in a situation of danger to its life, by the mother of such child," has been sustained as relevant. Gibson, 1845; 2 Brown, 366; Hume, i. 295; Alison's Princ. 162. See Child-Murder.

Expiry of the Legal; is the expiration of the period within which the subject of an adjudication may be redeemed, on payment of the debt adjudged for. Before the debtor can be foreclosed, and his right of redemption cut off, there must be either,—(1.) decree in an action of declarator of expiry of the legal, at the instance of the adjudger or adjudgers, against the debtor; or, (2.) possession on charter and sasine for forty years. Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. iii. p. 407; Shand's Prac. p. 715. See Adjudication. Legal.

Expromissor. According to the distinction of the Roman law, an expromissor was one who undertook the debt of another, by substituting himself as principal debtor, in room of the former obligant; who, in so far as concerned the creditor, was liberated from his obligation. An adpromissor or fidejussor, on the other hand, was more properly a cautioner, inasmuch as he merely acceded to, or bound himself in terms of the obligation of, the principal debtor, who also remained bound to the creditor. Stair, B. i. tit. 17, § 3; Bank, B. i. tit. 23, § 25; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 22. See Cautionary.

Extent; is the name given to the ancient census or general valuation put upon all the lands in Scotland, for the purpose of regulating the proportion of public subsidies or taxes exigible from them, as well as for ascertaining the amount of the casualties due to the superior. The precise period at which a valuation of this kind was first made, has not been clearly ascertained, although it has long been the subject of inquiry and controversy amongst lawyers and antiquaries. It appears, however, that, so early as the year 1474, the old extent or valuation had been deemed inadequate; and, accordingly, the statute 1474, c. 56, ordains that, in the retours made to Chancery, the inquest shall state "what the land was of avail of the auld, and the very avail it was worth, and gives the day of the serving of the said brieve." Under that statute, according to the generally received theory, the practice for some time prevailed of adducing evidence before the inquest, of the real rent or value of the lands at the time, which, as well as the old extent, or more ancient valuation, was accordingly stated in the retour. But after lands had been once so valued, it is said that, on the occasion of future retours, a new valuation was not made, but that the amount of the new, as well as of the old extent, was taken from the former retour; and that, even where no evidence of the present value had been adduced, a practice was introduced of stating in the retour the present value at a quadruple, quintuple, or sextuple of the old extent, according to the custom of retouring lands in the particular shire; Hope's Minor Practicks, p. 194, edit. 1734. In this manner, the new and the old extent are supposed to have been ascertained—the new extent being the valuation thus fixed, and the old extent consisting, as has been generally understood, of a valuation made in the reign of Alexander III., or, at any rate, at some time prior to 1474; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, § 33; Skene, voce Extent; Kames' Law Tracts, Tract XIV. Neither of these valuations extended to church lands, the share of the subsidies applicable to them being levied from the beneficiaries, according to the value of their benefices, as settled by Bagimont's Roll; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 5, § 34. See Bagimont's Roll. During the Usurpation a more equitable rule of assessment was introduced, and the rates laid upon each county precisely fixed. After the Restoration, very nearly the same system was continued—statutory commissioners being appointed to apportion the general sum laid upon each county, upon the different lands in the county, according to their respective real rents. See the Act of Convention, 23d Jan. 1667. The rent fixed by those valuations is commonly called the valued rent; according to which, the land-tax, and most of the other public and parochial assessments, have been since imposed. It was likewise the rule, under the old election law, for regulating freehold qualifications where the old extent did not appear; 1681, c. 21. See article Election Laws. Erskine's account of old and new extent is abridged from Lord Kames' Historical Law Tracts, Tract XIV.; and the same authority has been followed by more recent writers, Lord Kames having been indebted for the materials of his theory to Mr John Davidson, a very learned member of the society of writers to the signet. But see the subject of extents largely and learnedly treated, and Lord Kames' views modified and corrected, in the case, Cranston v. Gibson, 18th May 1818, Fac. Coll.—one of the papers in which case, written by Mr Thomson, deputy-clerk register, and extending to 280 quarto pages, was stated from the Bench to contain a very learned treatise on the old extent. Extent, Crown's. An extent, in the acceptance of the English law, is a writ of execution or commission to the Sheriff for the valuing of lands and tenements; and sometimes the act of the Sheriff or other commissioner upon this writ; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. By the treaty of Union between Scotland and England, the revenue laws of the two countries were assimilated; and the Crown's preference and the English execution by extent (so far at least as concerns moveable property), was introduced in revenue matters, under the exception, and in the manner explained under the articles Crown Debts and Exchequer. The process of extent, thus introduced, was a speedy remedy given to the Crown for recovering money due to the public. Originally, in England, this execution was confined to land; but by statute 33 Henry VIII., c. 39, it is authorized to be given to the Crown for attaching the body, lands, goods, and debts of the Crown debtor, for the recovery of all sorts of debts due to the Crown. Where the Crown debt is due by bond, either in the English or Scotch form, a writ of extent may issue on production of the bond with an affidavit, and without any preliminary step. If the debt be by simple contract, it must be made, what is termed in the law of England, matter of record, before a writ of extent can issue. In the case of a partnership debt, the extent may issue against the several copartners; but for the debt of an individual partner, the Crown can take no more than his interest in the company goods, after payment of the company debts. The application in Exchequer, for a writ of extent, is accompanied by an affidavit stating the amount of the debt, and that there is danger of its being lost to the Crown unless the extent be issued. The fiat or warrant for a writ of extent may be obtained at any time, either during term or vacation, on application to the Judge in Exchequer, by whom the fiat is signed—the date of the fiat being the date of the testing of the writ. The writ is tested by the Judge, and sealed with the Exchequer seal. The writ of extent directs the Sheriff to take the person of the Crown debtor, and to take and appraise his effects and debts. In Scotland, the moveable estate only of the debtor could be taken; and the general rules were,—1st, That all goods and effects, the absolute property of the Crown debtor at the teste of the writ, might be taken, into whose hands soever they might have come since that time; and, 2d, That money might be seized, and all debts due to the Crown debtor, or assigned by him since the teste of the writ. But bona fide cash payments made since the teste were not affected. The Sheriff, in execution of the writ, was not authorized to sell or convert the effects into money, until the venditioni exponas had issued; and after the goods had been sold, under that authority, to the amount of the Crown debt, the proceeds were returned to Exchequer for the use of the Crown, under deduction of poundage and extra allowance, which the Sheriff was entitled to claim on a motion in Exchequer. An extent in the second degree, as it was termed, was the process by which, on the insolvency of a Crown debtor, the debts due to him by his debtors were made effectual to the Crown. This process was issued from Exchequer on an affidavit of the Crown debtor's insolvency, on which affidavit a fiat was granted for a writ of extent against the debtor of the Crown debtor; and the same process might be repeated in the third, and even in the fourth degree. Such an extent was called an extent in chief in the second, third, or fourth degree; and it differed from an extent in aid, inasmuch as it was sued out by the Crown as the real plaintiff, for the direct recovery of the Crown debt, whereas an extent in aid was sued out only nominally by the Crown, but really by a Crown debtor, for the recovery of a debt due to himself, and for his own benefit. An EXTENT IN AID proceeded on the fact, or fiction, that the Crown debtor was less able to pay under the Crown's extent against himself, than he would have been if he could have recovered the debts due by another to him. Hence, this extent was said to be obtained in aid of a previous extent, at the Crown's instance, against the applicant for an extent in aid; and the writ accordingly issued, not against the Crown debtor, but against the debtor to the Crown debtor. For a history of the abuses of extents in aid, see Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 47, 5th edit. These abuses were at last attempted to be remedied by the statute 57 Geo. III., c. 117, proceeding on the preamble,—“That extents in aid have, in many cases, been issued for the levying and recovery of larger sums of money than were due to his Majesty by the debtors, on whose behalf such extents were issued.” And also, “That extents in aid have been issued at the instance and for the benefit of persons indebted to his Majesty by simple contract only.” To remedy which evils, it was enacted,—1st, That the amount of the debt due, or claimed to be due, by the principal debtor to the Crown, should be stated in the fiat. 2d, That, where the sum found due to the Crown debtor should be equal to, or exceed the Crown debt, as stated in the fiat, the amount of the debt in the fiat should be indorsed on the writ of extent in aid, and should be deemed the authority as to the amount to be levied. 3d, That, where the debt due to the Crown debtor should be less than the debt due to the Crown, as stated in the fiat, the amount of the debt due to the Crown should be indorsed on the writ, as the authority for the amount to be levied, the money so levied being paid over to the Crown, in satisfaction pro tanto of the Crown debt. 4th, That where, in consequence of the necessity otherwise of splitting the debt, more than the sum indorsed was necessarily levied, the overplus should be paid into the Court of Exchequer, together with the amount of the sum indorsed; and that the Court, on summary application, might make an order for the return, or for the proper disposal of such surplus. 5th, That the Crown debtor should not, by the extent in aid, be prejudiced of other means of recovering his debt. As to the second evil, the statute declared that no extents in aid should be given to debtors by simple contract, for debts arising to the Crown in the course of trade, saving, however, the rights of debtors who had become so by simple contract in the collection or receipt of money arising from his Majesty's revenue for his use. Any Crown debtor, against whom an extent in chief might issue, was entitled to have an extent in aid. So also cautioners or sureties to the Crown for debts due by accountants or receivers for the Crown—collectors of taxes who have actually received money belonging to the Crown—bankers, or other depositaries of money arising from duties or taxes, or deposited officially by the receiver-general—persons bound as distributors of stamps, who have forfeited their bonds—traders dealing in exciseable commodities, and liable to account at stated periods for the accruing duties—farmers of duties, and the like Crown debtors—were entitled to the benefit of this writ. But it was not enough that one should be indebted to the Crown for duties as an individual; otherwise any one might have obtained an extent in aid. The principle on which an extent in aid was issued was, that, without it, the Crown debtor would be insolvent towards the Crown,—i. e., unable to discharge the debt he owed the Crown. But the fact, whether or not the Crown debtor were actually insolvent, was not very scrupulously inquired into, both on account of the difficulties attending such an investigation, and also on grounds of expediency—the public interest requiring that facilities should be given for the recovery of Crown debts. The affidavit for an extent in aid stated,—1st, The debt due to the Crown by the Crown debtor. 2d, The debt due to the Crown debtor by the person against whom the writ was to issue; and that it was bona fide due, and not in trust. 3d, That the debt due to the Crown debtor was in danger of being lost by the defendant's insolvency; and, 4th, That the Crown debtor was thereby less able to pay the Crown the debt due by him. On this affidavit, an extent pro forma was issued against the Crown debtor, which, with the affidavit and relative grounds of debt, were the warrant for a fiat, authorising an extent in aid to issue against the debtor to the Crown debtor; on which extent execution followed in the manner above explained. The foregoing account of extents in chief and in aid is abridged from Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 41, et seq., 5th edit.; which work may be consulted for a fuller account of those writs, accompanied by references to authorities. Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. h. t.; Bell's Princ. § 2374, et seq., and authorities there cited; Swint. Abridg. voce Exchequer.

By the recent Court of Exchequer Act (19 and 20 Vict., cap. 56) the forms of procedure against Crown debtors have been remodelled, and to a considerable extent assimilated, to the procedure in other cases. Reference is made to the act for its provisions. By these, the Crown's writ of extent, although not expressly abolished, appears to be superseded. See particularly the provisions as to procedure on affidavit of danger (§ 16) and the form and execution of extract decrees (§ 28, et seq.).

Extortion. Extortion, in its most general acceptation, is any oppression under colour of right. Hence, in the law of England, the term is usually applied to the abuse of public justice which consists in the unlawful taking, by a public officer, under colour of his office, of any money or valuable thing from a person where none is legally due; or were less than the sum demanded is due; or where the sum demand has not yet become due. The distinction between bribery and extortion is said to be, that the former consists of the offering or accepting of a present, unduly to influence the conduct of the party to whom it is offered, or by whom it is accepted; whereas, the latter consists in demanding a fee or present, by colour of office; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See also Exaction. Bribery. But, in the phraseology of the law of Scotland, the term extortion is also applied to the offence or delict of compelling one by force or fear to execute a deed, or to perform an act, or to contract an obligation, which, of his own inclination, he would not have done. Such force or fear excludes that liberty of action which is requisite to constitute legal consent; for, according to the expression of the Roman law, Quamvis si liber esset, noluisse, tamen coactus voluit. Acts and deeds thus extorted may, by the law of Scotland, be set aside by an action of reduction before the Court of Session; in which action, if the party alleging extortion prove his allegation, he will be relieved from the consequences of the act or deed, even against third parties; Wightman, 1787; Mor. 1521; and the offender, besides, may be subjected in damages. Extortion, as well as fraud, when stated as the ground for reducing a deed, may be proved by evidence prout de jure. Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 8, and B. iv. tit. 40, § 25; More's Notes, p. lviii.; Bank. B. i. tit. 10, § 50, et seq.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 26; Bell's Com. i. 295, and ii. 450. See also Delict. Evidence. As to the amount of force or fear requisite to constitute extortion, see Force and Fear; Dict. Vis et Metus; Priestnell v. Hutchison, 19 D. 495.

Extract. The term extract, in the law of Scotland, signifies either the proper written evidence, or warrant on which diligence or execution on a judicial decree may issue; or it signifies a copy, authenticated by the proper officer, of a deed, writing, or other entry, the principal of which, either is in a public record, or a transcript of which, taken from the principal, has been preserved in a public record. I. The extract of a decree is a written instrument signed by the proper officer, containing a recital of the claim and procedure in an action, and concluding with the judicial sentence or award, and a warrant for diligence in execution, the form of which is regulated by 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114; or, in the case of Exchequer decrees, by 19 and 20 Vict., cap. 56. See Execution of Decrees. The extract must be signed on every page by the extractor or other officer whose duty it is to give extracts; nor can it be validly attested by any other person, not even by the judge who pronounced it. The officer who makes the extract being a public functionary, the extract will be sufficiently authenticated by his subscription (without witnesses) to every page, the number of pages of which it consists being mentioned on the last page. But it is not necessary that the extract should be written by the extractor, nor indeed the writer be named or designed. If the extractor gives out an erroneous extract, he may rectify the mistake by a second extract; Tait on Evidence, p. 182, et seq. The long extracts of decrees of the Court of Session, and of some of the inferior courts formerly in use, in which the whole record of the case was transcribed verbatim, were abolished, and abridged forms of extracts directed to be substituted. See 50 Geo. III., c. 112; 1 and 2 Geo. IV., c. 39, § 7; 4 Geo. IV., c. 97. And, by 1 and 2 Geo. IV., c. 38, § 17, the signature of the extractor by whom the decree in the Court of Session is extracted, is declared a sufficient authentication, without requiring the subscription of a principal clerk of Session, as was formerly the practice. See Decree. II. Extracts of deeds or writings, or entries, registered in judicial or public records, are certified copies of the deeds or entries, whether they be deeds by public officers, as notarial instruments, or executions by messengers, or the deeds, obligations, or contracts of private parties, or the entries in registers of births, deaths, or the like. Such extracts are in like manner authenticated by the subscription of the keeper of the record, or other officer duly authorised. Where the deed has been recorded, in virtue of a clause of registration, consenting to execution, an extract or decree of registration which is a mere transcript of the deed, with a decree of the Court interposed fictione juris, in terms of the consent, is issued, on the demand of the party ordaining implement of the obligation, which extract is, like the extract of a judicial decree, signed by the extractor, and may be the warrant for diligence to enforce payment or performance in terms of the obligation contained in the deed. See Decree of Registration. As to the evidence afforded by extracts, whether from judicial or other records, see Evidence, supra, p. 367; Dickson on Evidence, pp. 625-635. On the subject of the present article generally, see Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 24, and B. iv. tit. 1, § 45; More's Notes, p. v. and cccclxxxi.; Bank. B. iv. tit. 36, § 1; and B. ii. tit. 3, § 44; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 6; Shand's Prac. p. 381; MacLaurin's Sheriff-Court Prac. 428, et seq.; M'Glashan's do., 358, et seq.; Ross's Lect. ii. 208; *Alexander's Abridg. of A. Extractor. is the official person by whom the extract of a decree or other judicial proceeding is prepared and authenticated. This, generally speaking, is the duty of the clerk of court. The stat. 50 Geo. III., c. 92, by which the abridged forms of extracts of the decrees of the Court of Session were introduced, directs that the extracts shall be prepared by the six assistants of the principal clerks of Session, each extract being authenticated, as formerly, by the signature of one of the principal clerks. But, by the statute 1 and 2 Geo. IV., c. 38, § 17, extracts of the decrees of the Court of Session from and after the 20th June 1821, were directed to be prepared by one or other of four extractors to be nominated by the principal clerks of Session, who were responsible for the due discharge of the official duty of the extractors. The extractors thus appointed were under the superintendence and control of the principal clerks, and removable at their pleasure. The salary of each extractor was £250 per annum, and he was entitled to no other fee or emolument, except the ordinary charge for copying. By this statute it was also provided, that the signature of a principal clerk of Session should be no longer necessary to authenticate an extract, but that each extract should be legally authenticated by the signature of the extractor by whom it was prepared. Duplicates of decrees for the record, and abbreviates of decrees of adjudication, were in like manner to be authenticated by the signature of the extractors respectively, by whom the decrees should be prepared and signed—the signature of the Lord Ordinary to an abbreviate of adjudication, required under the Act of Regulations, June 1696, and the signature of a principal clerk required by the Act of Sederunt, 26th Nov. 1793, to authenticate the abbreviate of an adjudication under the bankrupt statute, being no longer necessary.

By 1 & 2 Vict., c. 118, §§ 18, 19, the office of extractor was placed upon a new footing; and under that act there is now one principal extractor, with an assistant nominated by him, and such engrossing clerks as may be necessary. The principal and assistant extractors are paid entirely by salary, the principal £500, and the assistant £300 per annum. The clerks are paid by their writings. The junior principal clerk of Session has a superintendence of the office, and reports each Session to the Court on the subject.

The Act of Sederunt, 6th July 1748, ordains extractors to take the oaths to Government; 4th Jan. 1751, prohibits them from acting as agents in processes; and 23d Feb. 1687, extends the privileges of the College of Justice “to four extractors in each of the three clerk’s offices of the Session.”

Extrajudicial; not judicial, or not transacted under judicial cognisance or superintendence. The term is usually applied in contradistinction to judicial, to something said or done in the course of a process, or before an action has been brought into court, but which is not intended to form any part of the record, or of the judicial pleadings or admissions of the parties, such as communications or correspondence, having in view a private settlement of the matter in dispute, or the like. Extrajudicial concessions or admissions made by a party in the course of communications for a compromise, or in order to avoid a lawsuit, cannot be competently founded upon, or proved against him judicially, where the object of the negotiation has failed; Smythe, 20th May 1809, Fac. Coll. It was formerly incompetent to prove an extrajudicial statement by a witness, different from his judicial statement, in order to discredit him; but this rule is now abolished 15 Vict., c. 17, § 3. The witness himself, however, must be first interrogated on the point. Dickson on Evid., pp. 66, 900; Stair, B. iv. tit. 44, § 7. See also Evidence.

Extraordinary Actions. The Act of Sederunt, 11th July 1828, § 103, under the head Extraordinary Actions, enumerates processes of adjudication, count and reckoning, ranking and sale, sale of a pupil’s heritage, division of commonry, division of runrig lands, division among heirs-portioners, choosing of curators, pointing of the ground, and the like; and declares, with regard to them, that it shall be in the power of the Court, or the Lord Ordinary, to require of parties to proceed according to the forms applicable in ordinary actions, in so far as in each particular instance it shall appear fit and expedient to apply these; but, excepting in so far as compliance with these shall be specially required, such actions shall proceed according to the forms in use in such actions before the passing of the Judicature Act, 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, except in regard to the power and mode of review of any interlocutor pronounced therein. Shand’s Prac. p. 345.

The procedure in the Court of Session is now regulated by the 13 & 14 Vict., c. 36; which applies to all actions before that Court. For the peculiarities of the enumerated actions, reference is made to those articles respectively.

Extraordinary Lords of Session. After the original institution of the College of Justice in 1537, it continued to be the practice of the Scottish Kings, in addition to the fifteen ordinary Lords of Session, or Senators of the College of Justice, to nominate other Lords of the King’s Council, as extraordinary Lords of Session. The number of those extraordinary Lords was limited, by the stat. 1537, c. 40, to “three or four;” but the Kings, greatly to the prejudice of the administration of justice, frequently nominated seven or eight. This abuse, together with the power of appointing extraordinary Lords of Session, was put an end to by the stat. 10 Geo. I., whereby it is enacted, that whenever the places of the four extraordinary Lords of Session, or any of them, shall become vacant, the same shall not be supplied; and if any presentation or nomination shall at any time be made, the same is declared void and null; 10 Geo. I., c. 18; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. h. t.; Prof. More's Notes on Stair, p. cccxvi.; Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 16. See College of Justice.

Extrinsic. This term when applied to evidence generally signifies evidence beyond that afforded by the deed or document under consideration, and many questions arise as to the admissibility of such evidence to contradict, modify, or explain writings. See Dickson on Evidence, pp. 93, 109, 114, 130, 545, 551. The general rule is, that it is incompetent to contradict or modify the terms of formal writings, unless fraud be alleged and proposed in competent form; but, in certain circumstances, as where there is ambiguity in the writing, such evidence is admitted in explanation. The expression is also applied to qualifications of judicial statements, or admissions by parties, particularly in oaths of reference. Questions as to extrinsic and intrinsic qualities, in oaths on reference, are frequently attended with great nicety, and must be always, to a certain extent, questions of construction. See the article Evidence, supra, p. 342. See also Dickson on Evid. pp. 818, 752; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, §§ 11-14; Stair, B. iv. tit. 44, § 14; Bank, B. iv. tit. 32, § 16; Tait on Evidence, pp. 244-264; Bell's Com. i. p. 333; Thomson on Bills, 652.

Facility. A person is said to be of a facile disposition, when, although not a fit subject for cognition as an idiot, he is easily imposed upon, and liable to be induced to do deeds to his own prejudice. And the Court of Session, either ex officio, when in the course of an action they discover a party to be of that disposition, or on the application of his heir or next of kin, will interdict him; thereby preventing him from granting deeds, unless with the consent of the interdictors whom they appoint. A person, who is conscious of such an infirmity, may also voluntarily place himself under interdiction. See Interdiction. A facile disposition, though it may authorise the interference of the Court, is not of itself a ground of reduction of any transaction into which a facile person may have entered; nor has interdiction any retrospect. As a ground of reduction, facility is quite distinct from incapacity. The issue applicable to the latter ground is simply, whether the deed is not the deed of the granter? where the former is alleged, the issue is, whether the granter at the date of the deed was facile and easily imposed upon, and whether the deed was impetrated by fraud and circumvention to his lesion; and the names of the alleged impetrators must be condoned on; Baird, 1858, 20 D. 1220. In order, therefore, to support a reduction of the deed of a facile person, there must be evidence of circumvention and of imposition in the transaction, as well as of facility in the party, and lesion. But, "where lesion in the deed, and facility in the granter concur, the most slender circumstances of fraud or circumvention are sufficient to set it aside." *Ersk. Facto. See De Facto.

Factor; a person employed to do business for another for hire. Factory, which, in modern times, has almost entirely superseded the Mandate of the Roman law, differs from that contract in not being gratuitous. Factory is either express or implied; special or general. The factor, unless he can plead the excuse of illness or some inevitable accident, is liable in damages for not performing his engagement. He must account to his principal for his administration, and pay over to him all that he may have received in his name. In remitting money the factor must follow his principal's directions, or take the risk. In absence of express directions he must remit through a chartered bank, or a banker in good credit, or follow the mercantile or local usage. If he pay the money into a bank on his own account, it perishes to him on the banker's failure; and he becomes liable for the money if he put his own name as drawer or indorser on the bill by which it is sent. An agent or factor is not entitled to delegate his powers; although he may employ a third party in any ministerial capacity which he cannot fulfil himself. If, therefore, without permission, he delegate his power, he is liable for the competency and solvency of the delegate. But if he has received permission to delegate, he is only liable by his own fault or fraud in the choice. A factor binds his employer to any engagement which he contracts, within his powers. Where these powers are expressly limited, the limits are absolute, both as regards the right which the factor has to demand from the principal relief of his obligations, and as regards the right of third parties to call upon the principal for implement. But, in the latter case, the limits will have no effect, if they are expressed in a private stipulation between the principal and agent, or if the commission is of such a nature that it is not usual for parties dealing with the factor to examine the extent of his powers. The powers, too, of the factor in relation both to his employer and the public, are frequently extended or restricted by the usage of trade. Power is implied to perform any act necessary for the accomplishment of the engagement; and a factor at a distance, and in difficult circumstances, is entitled to exercise a sound discretion. Third parties are entitled to deal with the factor as with a principal. But they can claim no lien or right of retention for a general balance against the principal. The risk of the goods, &c., in the factor's possession, is, by the general rule with the employer, unless fault (culpa levis) be established against the factor. Factory is recalled by revocation if done tempestive, though that may not be sufficient to reach third parties, unless accompanied by notice. It also falls by the death of the principal; but transactions already begun may go on, and those done in ignorance of the death are effectual. A factor may renounce, provided things are entire. Revocation is implied by the employer's appointing a new agent to do the same act. The mandate subsists notwithstanding the mandant's supervening insanity. Where goods are consigned generally for sale, a mandate is implied, empowering the consignee to sell them at his discretion, as to price and time; and if the consignee have made, or got, advances on the goods, his mandate to sell is held to subsist, and to be assignable, till he is reimbursed. A mandate is implied by the principal's acquiescence in the factor's acts. Factors, duly empowered, may grant leases, which bind the constituents in the same manner as if granted by the constituents themselves. But factors with common powers cannot grant rental rights; nor can they pursue removing without express powers; Bell's Com. i. 476; Princ. § 216; Illust. ib.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, i. 167; ii. 19, 428; Menzies, § 457; Story on Agency, p. 35, et seq.; Smith's Merc. Law, p. 121, et seq.; Russell on Factors and Brokers. See Mandate. Principal and Agent, and authorities there cited. Agent. As to Judicial Factors, see that article.

Factories. From views of humanity, the acts 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 103, amended by 4 Will. IV., c. 1; 7 Vict., c. 15, 1844; 13 and 14 Vict., c. 54, 1850; 16 and 17 Vict., c. 104; and 19 and 20 Vict., c. 38, were passed to regulate the hours of labour of children,

Factum Præstandum. An obligation ad factum præstandum, is an obligation to perform an act. The rule of the civil law is, that on the debtor's refusing to implement his bargain, the creditor is only entitled to sue for damages, on the maxim, Nemo cogi potest præcise ad factum, sed in id tantum quod interest. The law of Scotland is not quite fixed upon this point, some authorities adhering to the Roman law doctrine; while Stair, B. i. tit. 17, § 16, holds, that in equity, the creditor should have the alternative of compelling performance; and Mr Bell (Com. i. 335) says, that the specific implement of bonds ad facta præstanda, may be enforced by the personal diligence of imprisonment. There are several decisions establishing the principle, that servants refusing to work, may be imprisoned on a summary warrant. But now, the grounds of expediency on which this rule is founded, are sufficiently answered by 4 Geo. IV., c. 34, § 3, which visits such refusal with penal consequences. In certain circumstances, where a party fails or refuses to perform an act to which he is bound, the want of his voluntary act may be judicially supplied. Thus, when a party under an obligation to convey land, refuses to grant a voluntary title, the want of it may be supplied by adjudication in implement. See Adjudication in Implement. When performance becomes impossible, damages are substituted, on the maxim, Locum facti impræstabilis subit damnum et interesse; with this modification, that, in some cases, if performance has been delayed with the fraudulent intent of making it impossible, personal execution by caption will proceed. Joint obligants for the performance of a fact are bound singuli in solidum; but pro rata only, when damages are substituted for an imprestable fact. See Solidum et pro rata. Cautioners ad factum præstandum can in no instance be sued till the principal debtor has been discussed. A debtor ad factum præstandum is denied the benefit of the act of grace, the privilege of sanctuary, and the cessio bonorum; Stair, B. i. tit. 17, § 16; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 62; Bell's Com. i. 335; ii. 555, 572; Bell's Princ. §§ 29, 58, 190, 569, and authorities there cited; Illust. ib.; Ross's Lect., i. 236, 294; Kames' Equity, 214.

Faculty. In the language of the law, a faculty means a power which a person is at liberty to exercise; hence it follows that a faculty does not fall under the negative prescription, since it is of the very essence of the right that it may be exercised at any time. Faculties may be adjudged: thus, an heir's right to reduce his ancestor's deed on the head of deathbed,—a minor's right to reduce a deed on the head of minority and lesion,—a faculty to burden lands,—a power to recall an annuity,—may all be adjudged. But it has been held that the right to pursue a declarator of irritancy against the heir of entail in possession cannot. Shand's Prac. 664, and authorities there cited; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 6; iii. tit. 7, § 10; Stair, B. ii. tit. 6, § 10; More's Notes, p. cxciii.; Kames' Equity, 451; S. D. xii. 413.

Faculty; in the law of England, is used for a privilege, or special dispensation, granted to a man by favour and indulgence, to do that which, by law, he ought not to do. For the granting of these, there is an especial court under the Archbishop of Canterbury, called the Court of the Faculties, the chief officer of which is called the Master of the Faculties. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Faculty of Advocates. See Advocate.

Faculty to Burden. A faculty to burden is a power reserved in the disposition of an heritable subject, to burden the disponee with a certain sum of money. This refers either to a real or to a personal burden. Where it is personal, the disponee only is burdened; and the lands can be burdened with the debt only by diligence against the disponee as proprietor. Where the faculty is that of constituting a real burden, it is only by an heritable bond and infestment that the faculty can be exercised. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 54; More's Notes, p. cxciii.; Bell's Com. vol. i. pp. 40–42; ii. 190, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 924; Illust. ib.; Bank. vol. i. pp. 579, 127, et seq.; vol. ii. 213, 20, et seq.; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. ii. p. 417; Ross' L. C. vol. iii. p. 38. See Burdens.

Fairs and Markets. The right of fairs and markets is vested in the Crown. No person or burgh, therefore, can claim a fair or market without a grant from the Crown or prescription equivalent to a grant. The toll or custom leviable by the owner is regulated by act of Parliament, or usage, without which no power to levy can exist. Dues cannot be levied upon goods until they have been sold, unless by immemorial custom. The monopolies of burghs are occasionally relaxed in favour of fairs and markets; and it was at one time the rule, that while attending them, neither person nor property could be arrested for previous debt, although cattle may be distrained in a pasture on the way. Forestalling, i.e.,—buying merchandise while on the way,—and regrating, or reselling victuals in the same market, or within four miles thereof, are forbidden by special statute. Bell's Princ. § 664; Illust. ib.; Tomlins, h. t.; Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 29; Bank, B. i. tit. 19, §§ 12 and 15; Kames' Stat. Law, h. t. See Market. Forestalling. Regrating.

Falcidia portio; in the Roman Law, was a fourth part of the free goods of the testator, secured to all heirs, whether sui or extranei, against legacies. The testator could effectually prohibit the heir from taking the benefit of the falcidia, in which respect it differed from the natural portion of children. Stair, B. iii. tit. 8, §§ 12, 13; Bank, B. iii. tit. 8, § 30.

Fallow. Where an outgoing tenant has left fallow which he was not bound by his lease to leave, and as to which the lease contains no other stipulation, it has been said that he has a claim against the landlord for its value. Bell's Princ. § 1263; Illust. ib.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, ii. 473; Bell on Leases, i. 341.

The only case which is referred to in support of this doctrine (Purves, Dec. 3, 1822, 2 S. 59) is very imperfectly reported, and appears from the Session papers to have contained specialities. The doctrine, in its full extent, seems contrary to principle, as it would entitle an outgoing tenant to leave his whole farm in fallow, and to claim an allowance for so doing. The more consistent rule is thought to be that where the lease contains no stipulations on the subject, the tenant must regulate his conduct by the provisions, if any, as to cropping and labouring; and where there are no such provisions, by the rules of good husbandry, without depending on any such claim. Where there is a stipulation in the lease as to fallow being left without any stipulation as to remuneration, the presumption seems to be that the tenant was to have no claim for it. Obligations cannot be introduced into a lease by implication or extrinsic evidence. Alexander v. Gillon, 22d Jan. 1847, 9 D. 524.

Falsa demonstratio; is an erroneous description of a subject or person in a writing. Its effect depends almost entirely upon the specialities of the case; but, generally, if the description is taxative, i.e.,—if it is to be looked on as a condition—its falsity vitiates the conveyance; if, however, it is only exegetical or expository, falsa demonstratio non obest nec vitiat cum constat de corpore. See Brown's Synop. h. t. Scottish Missionary Society, 1858, 20 D. 634.

Falsehood; is defined to be a fraudulent imitation, or suppression of truth, to the prejudice of another; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 66. Of this crime, forgery, which is the adhibiting a false name to a writing, is the most important branch. Bank. vol. i. p. 296, et seq.; Shand's Prac. pp. 257, 289, 318; Hume, i. 137, et seq.; Bell's Sup. p. 49. See Forgery. Swindling. Falsehood cannot be proposed against messengers' executions, and the like writs, without a reduction improbation. See Execution. Fraud.

False Imprisonment; in English law, a trespass committed against a person, by arresting and imprisoning or detaining him without just cause, and contrary to law. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. The corresponding Scotch law term is Wrongous Imprisonment, which see.

False Personation. Falsely assuming the name or character of an officer, soldier, seaman, &c., in order to receive his wages, is, by 5 Geo. IV., c. 107, § 5, declared felony, punishable with transportation for life or for years, or by imprisonment with or without hard labour. By 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV., c. 66, § 7, a similar punishment is provided for the offence of falsely personating a shareholder in some fund, for the purpose of drawing the dividends, &c. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. These acts do not extend to Scotland.

False Swearing. In proceedings under the Bankruptcy Act (19 and 20 Vict., c. 79) any person guilty of wilful falsehood in any oath is, by sec. 178, liable to a prosecution, either at the instance of the Lord Advocate, or at the instance of the trustee, with his concurrence; provided, that in the latter case the prosecution shall be authorized by a majority of creditors, at a meeting called for the purpose; and such person, upon conviction, besides the awarded punishment, forfeits to the trustee for behoof of the creditors, his whole right, claim, and interest in or upon the sequestration. As to the former law on the subject of false swearing in sequestrations, see Shand's Prac. p. 1039; 2 Bell's Com. 343, 389. As to falsehood on oath generally, see Perjury.

False Weights. By the act 1607, c. 2, the users of false weights are declared to be punishable by the confiscation of moveables. Bank. vol. i. pp. 295, 213. See Weights and Measures.

Falsing of Dooms; reduction of decreets. Skene, h. t. See Doom. Sok.

Fama Clamosa; in the ecclesiastical law of Scotland, is a prevailing report, imputing immoral deportment to a clergyman, probationer, or elder of the church. No process is commenced by the presbytery against a minister, unless a complaint has been given in, or unless the fama clamosa against him is so great, that the presbytery, for their own vindication, see themselves necessitated to begin the process without any particular accuser. When there is such a fama clamosa, the presbytery first inquires into the rise, occasion, broachers, and grounds thereof, and if it appear, after this inquiry, that there ought to be a process against a minister, and if no private party come forward to institute it, they resolve to serve him with a libel. A libel cannot be sustained which rests only on hearsay. Hill's Church. Prac. 49, and authorities there cited; Cook's Styles; Wood on Libels, p. 2. See also Minister. Deposition.

Familia; in English law, signifies all the servants belonging to one master; also a portion of land sufficient to maintain one family. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Familie Eriscundæ Actio; in the Roman law, was an action competent to any one of co-heirs for the division of what fell to them by succession. It has no place in heritable succession by the Scotch law. Stair, B. i. tit. 7, § 15; Bank. B. i. tit. 8, § 36; Brown's Synop. p. 2334.

Fang. A thief taken with the fang (or in the manner), is one apprehended while carrying off, "in hand having, or upon back bearing," the stolen goods. Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 4; Bank. B. i. tit. 16, § 4; Hume, i. 102.

Farandman; a stranger or pilgrim. Skene, h. t.

Farding-Deal, or farundel of land; is, in England, the fourth part of an acre. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Fare; the money paid for being carried by land or water; formerly, the passage itself. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Farm Servants. The wages of farm servants are a privileged debt. Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, ii. 393; Fraser's Pers. Rel. ii. 436, 385; Baird on M. and S.; Bell on Leases, i. 411; Bell's Princ. §§ 1241, 1407; Illust. § 1407. See Privileged Debt. Wages.

Father. A father is the administrator-in-law to his children, and, as such, the manager, and, as it were, the tutor of his children while in pupilarity, and their curator during minority. This power of management extends over the whole property and estate of the child, whether flowing from the father or from a stranger, with the following exceptions:—1. Where the property descending from a stranger has been put under other management; 2. Where the child has a claim against the father, a curator ad litem will be given to him by the judge; and, 3. The father's right of administration is at an end, by the marriage of his daughter during her minority. The father, as administrator, is not bound to make up tutorial inventories. Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 54, et seq.; Stair, B. i. tit. 5, § 12, et seq.; B. iv. tit. 39, § 14; More's Notes, p. xxxi.; Bell's Princ. §§ 1980, 2122, 2068, et seq., Fraser's P. and D. R. ii. 26; Sandford on Heritable Succession, i. 5, 240. See Curatory.

Fatuous. A fatuous person, or an idiot, is one who, from a total defect of judgment, is incapable of managing his affairs. He is described as having an uniform stupidity and inattention in his manner, and childishness in his speech. An idiot cannot act in the affairs of life; and he is by the law put under the protection of a curator. Where an idiot discovers any marks of judgment, he is said to be capable, without curators, to execute a testament, which is revocable; but he cannot competently bind himself irrevocably, nor can he enter into a marriage. With regard to the title to sue and defend, fatuous and furious persons when cognosed, seem situated like pupils or minors. If a tutor has been appointed by gift from the Exchequer, the action proceeds in the joint names of the idiot and tutor. If the fatuous person has not been cognosed, or if the action is against his tutor or curator, it may be raised in name of the fatuous person, and a tutor ad litem will be appointed when the case comes into Court. Where one has been put under curatory by the Court of Session, the action proceeds in his own name, with consent of the factor or curator; and an action against such a factor or curator is incompetent, unless the fatuous person is called as a principal defender. Shand's Prac. 151, 993, and authorities there cited; McGlashan's Sheriff Process, 98; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 48; Bell's Com. i. 136. See also Brieve. Curatory. Idiot. Fraser's Rel. ii. 263.

Fault; in quality of a commodity agreed for, may be the ground of rejection, if the commodity have been sold unseen, and turn out inferior to what was represented. Even if the buyer saw the goods, a latent fault may entitle him to reject them, and should they perish in consequence of it, he will be relieved from payment, or entitled to repetition of the price. But if the fault or deficiency of a commodity seen by the buyer is manifest, the rule is, Caveat emptor, and the buyer's eye is his merchant. The challenge of a fault must be made immediately, or without unnecessary delay. Bell's Com. 5th edit. i. 439; Bell's Princ. § 95, et seq.

Feal and Divot; a rural servitude, importing a right in the proprietor of the dominant tenement to cut and remove turf for fences, or for thatching or covering houses, or the like purposes, within the dominant lands. And of the same description is the servitude of fuel, which is a similar right to cut, winnow, and carry away peats from the servient moss or peat land, for fuel to the inhabitants of the dominant lands. These servitudes will not be extended further than to the usos of the actual occupants of the dominant tenement, and will not extend even to extraordinary uses, such as to burn limestone for sale, or to carry on the trade of brewing or distilling for sale. The servitudes of feal, divot, and fuel, are distinct from the servitude of pasturage, and are not included under it. They may be constituted either by express grant, or by use or possession following on the usual clause of parts and pertinents. Stair, B. ii. tit. 7, §

13; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 17; Bank. B. ii. tit. 7, § 31; Bell's Princ. § 1014; Illust. ib.

Fealty; in English law, an oath taken on the admittance of any tenant, to be true to the lord of whom he holds his land. By this oath the tenant holds in the freest manner, since all who have fee hold by fealty at the least. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Fear. See Force and Fear.

Feciales; an order of priests among the Romans, consisting of twenty persons, appointed to proclaim war, to negotiate peace, &c. The jus feciale was all that the Romans had corresponding to the modern international law. Ency. Brit.

Fee. 1. This term is used to express an estate of succession, in contradistinction to liferent, as "fee and liferent." See next article.

2. The interest held by the feuar is termed the fee. According to Erskine, this term sometimes denotes "the subject itself granted to the vassal. Thus, it is said that a vassal falls from his fee, or that a fee opens to the superior. But it is more properly used to express the right resulting from the feudal contract; and in this acceptance it may be defined a gratuitous right to the property of lands, made under the conditions of fealty and military service, to be performed to the granter by the grantee, the radical rights of the lands still remaining in the granter." Thus the right acquired by a feu-vassal under his charter is denominated his fee. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 7.

3. The honorary due to a physician for his attendance is also termed a fee, and is presumed to be paid from time to time, unless this be contrary to the practice of the place (Flint, June 17, 1795; Mor. 11422), or unless the contrary can be proved, and the attendance while the patient is on deathbed, that is, for sixty days preceding his death, is not presumed to have been paid. The honorary due to a lawyer may be pursued for, though not in the name of hire, but as the reward of services which can receive no proper estimation. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 32, and B. iii. tit. 7, § 17.

4. Fee or wages.—A servant who is hired for a term is entitled to wages, though unable to work during part of that term. Should he die during the currency of that term, his representatives are entitled to his wages down to the day of his death. If the master die, or, without good reason, turn off a servant before the term, the servant is entitled to full wages and to maintenance to the term; and should the servant desert his service, he not only forfeits his claim to wages and maintenance, but is liable also in damages to his master. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 16. See also Privileged Debt. Executor. Wages.

Fee and Liferent. A conveyance to a parent in liferent, and to his children unborn or unnamed in fee, imports a right of fee in the parent, and a spes successionis merely in the children. Frog's Creditors v. his Children, 25th Nov. 1735, M. 4262; Lindsay v. Dott, 9th Dec. 1807, M. App., Fiar, No. 1; Dewar v. M'Kinnon, 5th May 1825, 1 W. & S. 161; Gordon v. M'Intosh, 17th April 1845; 4 Bell's App. 105. A conveyance to a parent in liferent, for his liferent use allanarly, or under restrictive words of similar signification, and to his children nascituri in fee, imports a right of liferent in the parent, and also an interim fiduciary fee in him for behoof of the children; Newlands v. Newlands' Creditors, 26th April 1798, M. 4289; Allardice v. Allardice, 5th March 1795; Bell's Cases, 156. Where a father being infest, conveys to himself in liferent, for his liferent use allanarly, and to his children in fee, and upon this conveyance takes infestment in liferent only, and in the instrument of sasine no mention is made of the children in fee, the lands remain attachable by the father's creditors; Falconer v. Wright, 22d Jan. 1824, 2 S. 433; Houlditch v. Spalding, 9th June 1847, 9 D. 1204. A conveyance to trustees for behoof of a parent in liferent, and his children nascituri in fee, imports a fee in the children, and a liferent merely in the parent; Seton v. Seton's Creditors, 6th March 1793, M. 4219; Ross v. King, 22d June 1847, 9 D. 1327. A conveyance by a parent to himself in liferent, and to his child nominatim in fee, imports a fee in the child; M'Intosh v. M'Intosh, 28th Jan. 1812, Fac. Coll. When a parent conveys to himself in liferent, and to his child nominatim in fee, or takes a conveyance from another in these terms, but reserves to himself power to alienate and burden, the substantial fee is in the father, and that in the child is nominal merely; but if the reserved power to alienate is not exercised, the child takes as disponee, and does not require to be served heir to his father; Cumming v. His Majesty's Advocate, 10th Feb. 1756, M. 4268 and 15854; Baillie v. Clark, 23d Feb. 1809, Fac. Coll. A conveyance to a husband and wife, in conjunct fee and liferent, for the wife's liferent use allanarly, and to the child nominatim in fee, imports a right of fee in the father, and on his decease the child must serve to him as heir of provision; Wilson v. Glen, 14th Dec. 1819, Fac. Coll. A conveyance to a husband and wife, and the longest liver, in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the heirs of the marriage in fee, imports a right of fee in the husband; Madden v. Currie's Trustees, 22d Feb. 1842. A conveyance to a husband and wife in conjunct liferent, during all the days of their liferent, and to the survivor, and their heirs and assignees in fee, imports a right of fee in the survivor; M'Gregor v. Forrester, 13th April 1835; Shaw Maclean, 441; Ferguson v. M'George, 22d July 1739, M. 4202; Burrowes v. M'Farquhar's Trustees, 6th July 1842, 4 D. 1484. A conveyance by a husband or wife to both the spouses, and the longest liver in liferent, and to the children of the marriage in fee, does not import a right of fee in the survivor of the spouses, but leaves the fee untransferred; Mackellar v. Marquis, 4th Dec. 1840, 3 D. 172. A conveyance by a husband or wife to both the spouses, in conjunct fee and liferent, for their liferent use allanarly, and to the heirs of the marriage in fee, whom failing, to the heirs whatsoever of either or both of the spouses, leaves the fee untransferred in the event of there being no heirs of the marriage, and gives a spes successionis merely to the heirs whatsoever of the spouses; Wilson v. Reid, 4th Dec. 1827, 6 S. 198. In the case of Myles v. Colman, 12th Feb. 1857, a conveyance of property by a wife was "in favour of herself and her husband, and the longest liver of them two in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the child or children procreate, or to be procreate betwixt them, which failing, to the said longest liver of them two, and the said longest liver, her, or his heirs and assignees whomsoever in fee, heritably and irredeemably." There were children of the marriage, and the husband, after surviving the wife, was sequestrated. In a competition between the children and the trustee, in the sequestration it was held that the fee of the wife's estate did not vest in the husband but in the wife herself, and was therefore not carried by the sequestration. The proper construction of the destination was held to be merely a liferent in the surviving husband, and to leave the right of fee in the wife. This, it was thought, was the fair construction of the destination, considering that the property belonged to the wife herself. The wife being the granter of the deed, the legal presumption was held to be, that she did not intend, by the destination in the deed, to divest herself of her right of ownership, and that the contrary could not be held, unless the words of the destination would not admit of any other construction. The judgment in this case is in accordance with the judgment in the case of Mackellar v. Marquis, supra; although that case does not appear to have been founded on.

See, on the subject of this article, Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 34, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 1712; Conjunct Rights; Ross's L. C. vol. iii. p. 602, et seq.

Fee-Fund; the name applied to the dues of Court payable on the tabling of summonses, the extracting of decrees, &c., out of which the clerks and other officers of the Court are paid. In 50 Geo. III., c. 112, and schedules thereto annexed, will be found a table of the fees exigible in the various proceedings. The same act authorises the Lord President to appoint a collector of the fees, holding his office ad vitam aut culpam. He is entitled to a commission of 4 per cent. on his receipts, until they amount to L.11,000, and of 2 per cent. on all sums beyond that amount; but should his commission fall short of L.600, he may retain that sum for his salary, including the expense of a clerk; 1 and 2 Geo. IV., c. 38, § 29. The salaries of certain of the officers of Court are paid quarterly out of the fee-fund; and it is directed, that if the fund shall at any time be insufficient for their payment, the deficiency shall be supplied out of the moneys provided by the acts 7 and 10 of Anne, for keeping up the Courts of Session, Justiciary, and Exchequer. No fee-fund is exigible in Admiralty or Consistorial cases, or in any of the proceedings in cessio, or in causes in what is called the Jury Roll. Shand's Prac., 269, 424, 825, 118; Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 17. By 1 and 2 Vict., c. 118, § 23, certain alterations and modifications have been made upon the fee-fund and the dues leviable. The collector is now appointed by the Crown, at a salary not exceeding L.400 per annum.

Fee-Simple. In English law, a tenant in fee-simple, is he who has lands or tenements to hold to him and his heirs for ever. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Felo de se; in English law, one who becomes a felon by committing suicide, in his sound mind. Tomlins, h. t. See Suicide.

Felonia; signifies not only the falsehood or the contumacy of the vassal toward his overlord, or of the overlord toward his vassal, but also all and whatsoever capital crime, or any other fault or trespass. Skene, h. t.

Felony; in English law, a term applied to all crimes punished by forfeiture either of the fee or of the goods and chattels of the criminal. To this punishment that of death may or may not be superadded, according to the degree of guilt. But the idea of felony has long been closely connected with that of capital punishment, and the term has been applied to all capital crimes below treason; although, originally, treason itself was considered felony, and although there may both be felony not capital, and capital crimes not felonies. Until of late, when a new offence was made felony by statute, the law implied the punishment of death by hanging; and in like manner, an offence declared capital became felony, though the express term was not employed. But, since the recent restrictions of capital punishment, it would appear that the connexion between felony and the punishment of death is severed, a great many felonies, formerly capital, being now punished with transportation. The word felony occurs in Scotch law but very rarely. A man attainted of treason or felony, is rendered ineligible as a member of Parliament, and loses his elective franchise. Tomlins, h. t.; Bank. B. i. tit. 10, § 18; Kames' Stat. Law, h. t.; Swint. Abridg. h. t.; Chambers' Election Law, h. t.; Hume, ii. 239, note 3.

Fences. On the entry of the tenant, the landlord, independently of any stipulation in the lease, is bound to put the fences on the farm in due repair; and the tenant on his part must maintain them, and leave them in the state in which he received them. The landlord is not, however, entitled to increase the burden on the tenant, by erecting new fences not stipulated for, unless they be march fences, which, under the statute, contiguous proprietors may compel him to erect—a liability which the tenant is presumed to be aware of when he enters. With regard to fences erected spontaneously by the tenant, it has been held that if, being entitled to remove them, he allows them to remain, he must put them in repair; but if he is not entitled to remove them, neither is he bound to repair them; Bell's Princ., § 1253; Illust. ib.; Bell on Leases, i. 243; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant. In England, by 7 and 8 Geo. IV., c. 29, §§ 23, 40, 44, the destruction of fences is declared to be punishable summarily with a fine of not more than L.5, and in the case of a deer-park fence, with a fine of not more than L.20.

Feodum; commonly signifies the heritable fee and property of any thing; also the fee, wages, or stipend, given to a servant for his service. Skene, h. t.

Feoffment; in English law, is the gift or grant, with livery and seisin, of any corporeal hereditament to another in fee, to him and his heirs for ever; the grantor being termed the feoffor, the receiver the feoffee. Littleton says, that the difference between a feoffor and a donor is, that the former gives in fee-simple, the latter in fee-tail. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Bank. i. 598, et seq.

Ferdingmanus; a Dutch word, a treasurer, penni-maister, or thesaurar. Skene, h. t.

Ferise; in Roman law, were holidays. In the Scotch law, feriat-times are those seasons in which it is not lawful for courts to be held, execution to proceed, or any judicial step to be taken. Bank. B. iv. tit. 42, § 2. See Sunday.

Ferial Days; an English law term, signifying working days—i.e., all the days of the week except Sunday. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Ferries; are inter regalia, and belong to the Crown, for the public benefit, unless where they have been given out by a royal gift, in which case the grant lays the grantee under an obligation to keep sufficient boats on the ferry for the use of travellers. Public ferries are under the management of the trustees of the roads connected with them, or are regulated by the justices of peace, or by special acts of Parliament. The donatary of a private ferry is empowered to levy fair and reasonable rates; the amount of which, unless when fixed in the grant, is regulated by the justices of peace. Although the grant does not exclude neighbouring heritors from having a boat to transport themselves and their families, and servants, yet no rival ferry will be allowed to interfere with the right. The right of ferry is not permitted to interfere with the general navigation; or to supersede the right of any subject of Great Britain to navigate, in the course of the passage, as a part of the sea, provided it be not done for the sake of avoiding the regular ferry. It is said that the ferry is in respect of the landing place, and not of the water, and that in every ferry the land on both sides ought originally to have been in the same person, otherwise he could not have granted the ferry; but this is now mere matter of antiquity. In leases of ferries there is no hypothec; but where there is a sublease, the lessor has a preference over the sub-rents. For the form of a lease of ferries, see Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, App. No. 16. See also Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 17; Bell's Princ. § 651, et seq.; Illust. ib.; Hutch. Justice of Peace, ii. 379, 448, 483; Tait's do. vocibus Highways, Soldiers; Blair's do. voce Highways; Hunter's L. & T. i. 331, 441; Blackstone, iii. 228. By 8 and 9 Vict., c. 45, certain rules are laid down for the regulation of ferries. It has been recently decided by the whole court that a charter of barony, with a clause of parts and pertinents, is a sufficient title, when followed by the requisite position, to constitute by prescription a right of ferry on a navigable river without special grants. Duke of Montrose v. Macintyre, March 10, 1848, 10 D. 896.

Feu; in Latin feudum, was used to denote the feudal-holding, where the service was purely military; but the term has been used in Scotland in contradistinction to ward-holding, the military tenure of this country, to signify that holding where the vassal, in place of military service, makes a return in grain or in money—a species of holding which is coeval with feudality; for, even in the purest ages of the military system, innumerable instances are to be found of grants of land in the feudal form, where the vassal annually delivered victual, or performed agricultural services to his superior. Hence, this species of right was scarcely to be distinguished from the lease; and, in this country, the rental-right and the feu-right, before writing was common in the constitution of such rights, must have been undistinguishable, farther than by the period of their endurance. See Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 7; Jurid. Styles. See also Charter. Holding. Superior and Vassal. Entry.

Feu-Contract. The contract of feu regulates the giving out of land in feu, between the superior and vassal. It contains a narrative; a dispositive clause; an obligation on the superior to invest, expressing the terms of the holding; a clause of warrandice; an obligation on the superior to make the title-deeds forthcoming to the vassal; and an assignation to the rents. These clauses bind the superior. Then there is a reddendo or obligation on the vassal to pay the feu-duties, and an obligation to relieve the superior of the public burdens after the vassal's entry. Whatever other obligations the vassal may come under are inserted in this part of the deed; and there is also a clause obliging the parties to perform mutually. This is followed by a clause of registration, precept of sasine, and a testing clause. The difference between the feu-contract and the feu-charter is that, by the contract, the vassal obliges himself personally, and, in virtue of the clause of registration, may be compelled by direct diligence to implement his obligation; whereas, in the feu-charter, although the vassal is equally liable, the means of compelling performance is not so direct: it is through the medium of an action and decree that diligence can be obtained. Hence, the feu-contract is the preferable form in all transactions where machinery is to be erected or manufactures established, in which the interest of the superior requires to be guarded by personal obligations, admitting of prompt enforcement. Jurid. Styles. See Charter.

The Feu-Contract, like other titles to land, is simplified by the act 21 and 22 Vict., c. 76, 1858. See Titles to Land.

Feudal System. In the conveyancing of Scotland, the forms of the feudal law have been preserved; and our titles to heritable property are framed in accordance with strict feudal principles. Hence, our lawyers and antiquaries have indulged in much historical speculation as to the origin of what has been called the feudal system. Such disquisitions would be out of place in a practical work such as the present; but the subject is interesting, and will be found fully treated in the following works:—Hallam's Middle Ages, vol. i. p. 200, et seq.; Encyc. Brit. voce Feudal

Law, and writers there cited; Robertson's Charles V. vol. i.; Kames' British Antiquities; Craig de Feudis; Ross's Lect. vol. ii. p. 23, et seq.

Feudum ex Camera aut Cavena; in feudal law, was an annual sum of money or supply of corn, wine, and oil, paid out of the lord's possessions to a soldier or other well-deserving person. It resembled a pension. Stair, B. ii. tit. 5, § 16; Craig, lib. i. dieg. 10, § 11.

Feu-Duty; the reddendo or annual return from the vassal to the superior in feu-holding. The feu-duty is truly a rent in cattle, grain, money, or services, generally agricultural; varying in amount from an adequate to a merely elusory rent. If payable in kind, the feu-duty may be demanded in kind, unless otherwise stipulated; and the vassal is bound to bring it to the superior if within the barony. The superior cannot compel the feuar to grow the stipulated grain, but he may demand in kind whatever other grain is grown, although more valuable. If the feu-duty be payable in produce no longer to be found on the land, the obligation is not thereby at an end, unless "such as is produced in the land" be expressly stipulated. In alternative payments, the vassal has the election, unless it be otherwise expressed. Interest is not due upon arrears of feu-duty, unless expressly stipulated in the contract; Napier, 31st May 1831, 9 S. & D. 655. Feu-duties are heritable, although the arrears are moveable. Feu-duties are debita fundi; and, in addition to his personal action, an action for pointing the ground lies at the superior's instance. He has also, as his means of compelling payment of the feu-duties, a real right in the lands, and a consequent preference over purchasers and creditors; a hypothec over the crop for the last or current feu-duty; and an action of declarator of irritancy of the feu, ob non solutum canonem. More's Notes on Stair, cxxxix.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, § 2; Bell's Com. i. 23-7, 683; Bell's Princ. § 694, 1479-84; Illust. ib. See Hypothec. Heritable and Moveable. Irritancy of the Feu. Superior. Vassal. Pointing of Ground.

Where a vassal conveys his feu to another party, who is entered by the superior as vassal in his place, he ceases to be liable for the feu-duty, but he remains liable so long as his disponee is not entered. Where, however, a separate obligation for payment of the feu-duty is granted by a vassal, he and his heirs continue liable for the feu-duty in all time coming, notwithstanding the feu may have been conveyed to another, and the disponee entered with the superior. This continuing liability by the original vassal arises from a separate obligation having been granted, and it is construed, and has effect given to it, like any other obligation. The obligation, therefore, remains in force until discharged by the superior or creditor in the obligation. See the case of King's College of Aberdeen v. Lady James Hay, March 11, 1852. 14 D. 675; but reversed in the House of Lords, Aug. 11, 1854; 1 Macqueen, 526.

Fiar; as contrasted with liferenter, is the person in whom the property of an estate is vested, burdened with the right of liferent. The fiar cannot interfere with the liferenter's possession, unless for the necessary preservation of his own right, as to prevent waste, on cause shown. He may work coal, lime, minerals, &c., which are excepted from the liferent. But he must reserve enough for the liferenter's use, and he must not hurt the amenity of the liferenter's possession; yet, if there be a going coal-pit, however disagreeable the effects may be, the liferenter is not entitled to stop it. The fiar is liable for surface damage. He cannot cut the ornamental timber, though he may make the necessary thinnings, not hurting the amenity. (See Timber.) Under the Reform Act, the liferenter, and not the fiar, has the right to vote on those subjects to which the right of voting is for the first time attached by the Act. In rights reserved by that Act, the fiar must concur with the liferenter in applying to poll; and his vote is taken apart, and not reckoned where the liferenter has voted. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 39; Stair, B. iii. tit. 5, § 51, et seq.; More's Notes, p. ccxiii. et seq.; Bell's Princ. 3d edit. § 1061, et seq., 2198, and authorities there cited; Bank. vol. i. p. 575; Bell's Com. 5th edit. i. 63; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. iii. p. 620; Ross's Lect. ii. 249; Chambers' Elect. Law, h. t. See Liferent. Conjunct Rights. Fee and Liferent.

Fiars; are the prices of grain in the different counties, fixed by the sheriffs respectively, in the month of February, with the assistance of juries. The form of striking the fiars is prescribed by the acts of sederunt, Dec. 21, 1723, and Feb. 29, 1728. A jury must be called, and evidence laid before them of the prices of the different grains raised in the county; and the prices fixed by the opinion of the jury, and sanctioned by the judge, are termed the fiars of that year in which they are struck, and regulate the prices of all grain stipulated to be sold at the fiar prices; nor will an error in striking them afford a ground of suspension; Town of Aberdeen, August 5, 1760, Mor. 4415. The fiar prices also regulate the price in contracts concerning grain to be delivered, the produce of the county, and where no price has been otherwise agreed upon between the parties.

By 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 63, § 16, it is enacted, that the fiar prices of all grain in every county shall be struck by the imperial quarter, and that any sheriff-clerk, clerk of a market, or other person, offending against this provision, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding L.5. See Weights and Measures. In cases of necessity the Lords of Council and Session still interpose their authority to regulate the striking of the fiars by act of sederunt. See A. S. 9th March 1850. But the Court will not interfere unnecessarily. Howden, 1851, 13 D. 522; Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 6, and B. iii. tit. 3, § 4; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, ii. 282; Bell on Leases, ii. 187; Connell on Tithes, i. 431; Paterson's Account of the Fiars.

Fictio Juris; is a legal assumption that a thing is true, which is either not true, or which is as probably false as true. Thus, an heir is held to be the same person with the ancestor, to the effect of making the heir liable for the debts of the ancestor. But the Scotch law has seldom recourse to fictions. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 38; Stair, B. ii. tit. 45, § 15; Bank. vol. iii. p. 669, § 9.

Fideicommissa; or trusts, in the Roman law, were either universal or singular. A universal fideicommiss (called also hereditas fideicommissaria, or trust inheritance) consisted in the appointment of an heir, with directions verbis precativis, that he should restore the inheritance to a third person mentioned, the heir being called fiduciarius, and the third person fideicommissarius. As the fideicommissarius was sometimes directed to pass the inheritance to a second, he to a third, and so on, some authors have traced a resemblance between fideicommissa universalia and entails in the Scotch law. The singular fideicommiss was simply a trust-legacy, differing from the common legacy in nothing but the form and the words employed. See Trust. Bank. B. ii. tit. 3, § 135; Stair, B. iii. tit. 8, § 12; Kames' Equity, 322. In German civil law, the fideicommiss is intimately connected with the law of inheritance among the nobility, being the regulation according to which the whole, or part of a family property, is enjoyed by a certain member of the family, on the condition of leaving it unimpaired to the person pointed out by the particular family arrangement; either to the first-born male, when it is called majorat, or to the last-born male, when it is called minorat, or to the oldest member of the family, without regard to direct descent, when it is called seniorat. The family property is by this means rendered inalienable, but it may nevertheless be mortgaged.

Fidejussor. See Expromissor. Cautionary.

Fidelity; homage made to superiors and overlords. Stene, h. t. See Homagium.

Fieri Facias; in English law, a writ that lies where a person has recovered judgment for debt or damages, by which the sheriff is commanded to levy the debt and damages on the defendant's goods and chattels. Tomlins, h. t.; 3 Sup. Com. 657.

Filiation; the filiation of a child means the determination of his paternity. The general rule as to children born in wedlock is, Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant; but this presumption may be defeated by proving the husband's impotency, or his continued absence from his wife during the period between the eleventh solar and the sixth lunar month preceding the birth. With regard to natural children, a copula at the distance of more than ten months does not filiate, affording only a semiplena probatio, which may, however, be completed by the oath of the mother. Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 50; Stair, B. iv. tit. 45, § 20; More's Notes, p. xxxiv.; Bank. B. i. tit. 2, § 3; B. ii. tit. 5, § 105. See Marriage. Bastard. Parent and Child. Semiplena Probatio.

Actions of filiation, and for aliment of natural children, are generally raised in the sheriff court, but it is competent to bring them in the Court of Session. Shand's Prac. p. 782.

Final Judgment. The term final judgment is applied in its most extensive signification to a judgment which exhausts the merits of a cause, and is not subject to any review whatever. But it is more frequently used in contradistinction to the expression, interlocutory judgment. Thus, in an inferior court, in reference to the competency of advocacy, a "final judgment" is a judgment whereby the whole merits of the cause are exhausted, although no finding or decerniture has been pronounced as to expenses; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 1; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 86, § 1. In order to warrant an appeal to the Circuit Court in a civil cause (where that mode of review is otherwise competent), the final judgment must not only dispose of the merits, but the expenses, when found due, must also have been modified and decerned for; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825; MacLaurin's Form of Process, 559. And to warrant an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Session to the House of Lords, as against a final judgment, the judgment must be one which exhausts the whole merits of the cause, also disposing of the question of expenses; and which, if not appealed against, would put an end to the difference between the parties; 48 Geo. III., c. 157, § 15; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 21; Smith on Appeals, 17; Paton's App. Pr. pp. 2, 9.

By 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 22, appeals to the Circuit Court are almost entirely done away, and all Sheriff-court judgments in causes the value of which does not exceed L.25, are final, and are not subject to review. Under the same statute, § 24, it is competent in any cause exceeding L.25 in value, to bring under review of the Court of Session any interlocutor of a sheriff sisting process, or giving interim decree, or disposing of the whole merits of the cause, but no other; and when any such interlocutor is brought under review, it is competent for the Court also to review all the previous interlocutors pronounced in the cause. See Advocation. Appeal. Appeal to Circuit Court. Interlocutory Judgment.

Fine; is the pecuniary penalty for an offence, usually imposed by statute, and awarded against the offender by the judge who tries him. Generally speaking, there is a certain latitude left to the Court to regulate the amount of the fine, according to the circumstances of the case. The payment of a fine may be enforced by imprisonment. See Tait's Justice of Peace, p. 313; Blair's do., p. 272; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. As to the form and requisites of sentences of this nature, see Paley on Convictions, 287; and as to the disposition of fines, p. 266. See also Hume v. Meek, 1846; Arkley's Rep. p. 88.

Fine of Lands; in English law, was an amicable composition of a suit, either actual, or fictitious, enrolled in the records of the court where the suit was commenced, which transferred, settled, and limited the lands in question, by declaring them the property of one of the parties. It was frequently employed to assure a right in lands, as it barred the claims of strangers, who, having a present interest in the estate, and lying under no legal impediment to interposing their claim, neglected to do so during five years after the proclamation of the fine. This was one of the modes of transference which required no livery or sasine, the acknowledgment in a court of record being considered sufficient. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. This mode of conveyance has been abolished by 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 74.

Finis; finance, or composition made with thieves, called also theft-bote. Finis curiæ, composition given in court to the King. Skene, h. t. See Theft-bote. Fine.

Finium Regundorum Actio; in the Roman law, was an action for the distinction and clearing of the marches of contiguous grounds. It was almost precisely analogous to the action of molestation in the Scotch law. Stair, B. i. tit. 7, § 15; B. iv. tit. 27, § 2.

Fire, Loss by. Agricultural subjects damaged or destroyed by fire through the negligence of the lessee, must be restored by him. But if the fire be accidental, neither the landlord nor the tenant is bound, independently of stipulation, to repair the loss, even although, under his lease, the tenant should be taken bound to keep the houses "in tenantable and habitable repair." Fire is, in our law, considered an inevitable accident; and the persons contemplated in the edict, Nautæ, caupones, are not held responsible for loss occasioned by it. It is different in the English law. The insurance of agricultural subjects against fire is, by statute, exempted from the payment of the stamp-duties; 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 23. Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Bell on Leases, i. 240, et seq.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 29, Ivory's note; Bell's Com. i. 470, 562, et seq.; Bayne, Dow's Appeal Cases, iii. 233. See Innkeepers. Nautæ, Caupones. Insurance.

Fire and Sword. Letters of fire and sword were the means anciently resorted to when tenants retained their possession, contrary to the order of the judge and the diligence of the law. Those letters issued from the Scotch Privy Council, and were directed to the sheriff of the county, authorising him to call the assistance of the county to dispossess the tenant. By the present practice, in case of forcible resistance to legal execution, it may, if necessary, be enforced manu militari. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, § 17; Stair, B. iv. tit. 38, § 27; also iv. tit. 47, 40; Ross's Lect. i. 274.

Fire-Arms. The wilful, malicious, and unlawful use of fire-arms is punishable under 10 Geo. IV., c. 38, extending what is called the Ellenborough Act to Scotland. Bell's Sup. p. 66. See also 7 Will. IV., and 1 Vict., c. 88; and case of Duncan, 1845; 2 Brown, 455.

Fire-Raising. To constitute the crime of fire-raising, there must have been actual burning, but it matters not how small the portion of the subject consumed has been. Ignition of furniture alone, not considered fixtures of the building, makes the culprit liable to the charge of an attempt at fire-raising; Fleming, 1848; Arkley, 519. It is immaterial whether the incendiary had the intent to consume the subject destroyed, or merely another subject which communicated the fire, or whether the burning was his ultimate aim, or only the means of furthering another crime. Fire-raising is capital, where the property burned is houses, corn, coal-heughs, or woods and underwoods; the word houses comprehending all classes of buildings, except mere hovels or temporary places of shelter. The burning of a man's own house, not so situated as to endanger the property of others, is not indictable, unless it has been done to defraud the insurers, of which crime it is doubted whether the punishment be capital. See the case of Beck, 1845; 2 Brown, 469. But fire communicated from a person's own to a neighbouring proprietor's to nement, will make the offence capital. The burning of ships to defraud insurers is capital. The destruction of other property by fire may be punished with anything short of death; and the attempt at fire-raising, as also threats and solicitations, are punishable arbitrarily. The sudden breaking out of fire in an uninhabited house, or the finding of combustibles strewed about in such a way as to excite or accelerate combustion, form strong presumptions of wilful fire-raising; but the latter should be received with caution. Having ill-will at, or having been heard to utter threats against, the sufferer; preparing combustibles, and carrying them in the direction of the house; insuring the premises or their furniture at a high value; insuring in several offices at the same time, and claiming from more than one, will all form presumptions against the prisoner; 1525, c. 10; 1526, c. 10; 1540, c. 33; 1592, c. 148; 1 Geo. I., c. 48; 29 Geo. III., c. 46; 43 Geo. III., c. 113; Hume, i. 126, et seq.; Alison's Princ. 429; Burnett, 568; Steele, 124. As to wicked, culpable, and reckless fire-raising, as distinguished from wilful fire-raising, see Macbean, 1847, Arkley, 262. The statutes 7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict., c. 89, and 7 and 8 Vict., c. 62, do not extend to Scotland. See Arson.

Firmarius; a mail-payer, a mailer, or mill-man. Firma signifies the duty which a tenant pays to the landlord, whether it be silver-mail, victual, or other duty. Skene, h. t.

Firm of a Company; is the social name applied to an avowed partnership. It is either proper or descriptive. A proper or personal firm is a firm designated by the names of one or more of the partners, as Hare & Co., Bell, Rannie, & Co. A descriptive firm has reference to some such circumstance as the place where the company is established, or the transactions in which it is engaged, as the Portsoy Distillery Co., the Muirkirk Iron Co.

A mercantile company, carrying on business under a proper firm, by which they grant obligations, may sue and be sued under the company name without the name of any individual partner. See Forsyth v. Hare and Co., 18th Nov. 1834, 13 S. 42. The same rule applies to the case of such a company doing diligence; Wilson v. Ewing, 20th Jan. 1836, 14 S. 262. A different rule applies to the case of a company with a descriptive firm. See Culcreuch Cotton Co. v. Mathie, 27th Nov. 1822, 2 S. 47; Kerr v. Clyde Shipping Co., 8th June 1839, 1 D. 901. Neither can the manager of such a company sue in name of the company; Robertson v. Anderson, 4th June 1841, 3 D. 986. In the case of the London and Glasgow Shipping Co. v. M'Corkle, 19th June 1841, 3 D. 1045, the company sued in name of the company, and of a party nominatim "agent therefor, and one of the partners thereof," but the instance was held to be insufficient. The Court, however, intimated an opinion that the company might sue and be sued under its descriptive firm, along with three individual partners named. In the previous case of the Sea Insurance Co. of Scotland v. Gavin, 17th Feb. 1827, 5 S. 375, the summons was directed against the company, and against the manager, who was a partner, and against three other partners, by whom the policy, which was the subject of the action, had been subscribed, and the summons was sustained. A similar judgment was pronounced in the House of Lords in the case of Pollock's Trustees v. The Commercial Banking Co. of Scotland, where the summons was directed against the company, and several of the individual partners nominatim, 28th July 1828, 3 W. & S. 365. A decree obtained against a company warrants diligence proceeding against all the partners of the company although not named in the decree; Thomson v. Little and Co., 2d July 1812, F. C.; and Knox v. Martin, 12th November 1847, 10 D. 50. The same rule was applied to diligence on a bond signed by the individual partners of a descriptive company, by which they obliged not only themselves, but also the company, and all other persons who might become partners thereof; Maclean v. Rose, 9th Dec. 1836, 15 Sh. 236.

A mercantile company cannot prosecute criminally in name of its firm. By 7 Geo. IV., c. 67, joint stock banking companies may, on fulfilling certain conditions, sue and be sued in name of their manager or other principal officer. See Bank. On the subject of this article, see More's Notes to Stair, ci.; Bell's Com. ii. 627, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 357; Illust. ib.; Shand's Prac.; Thomson on Bills, 234, 554. See Society. Joint Stock Companies.

Fisheries. For the regulations as to British white herring fisheries, see 14 and 15 Vict., c. 26.

Fishes; become the property of him who catches them, with the exception of those which belong to the Crown, jure coronæ, and which seems to be confined to whales of a large size. Salmon-fishing is inter regalia; but although it requires a royal grant to entitle a man to fish for salmon, yet the salmon, when taken by one who has no such grant, do not belong to his Majesty, but to the person who takes them. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 10. See Whales.

Fishings. The most important is salmon-fishing, which belongs to the Crown, and may or may not be given out with the lands. Where it is given in express words, the right is constituted from the first; but even the general expression of fishings, when joined with forty years' possession of a salmon-fishing, constitutes a right to that species of fishing. Where the right has not been given out expressly, nor acquired by prescription, it may, notwithstanding that the lands on each side of the river have been given out, be conveyed to a third party; and as the right of salmon-fishing implies a power of drawing the nets on the banks, that power will, under the grant, be conferred on the donee from the Crown. See Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 15; Bell's Princ. §§ 671, 754, 1112; Illust. ib.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, i. 269; Hutch. Just. of Peace, vol. ii. p. 561, et seq.; Tait's Just. of Peace, h. t. As to rules for preservation of salmon, see 7 and 8 Vict., c. 95 (in the Tweed, 20 and 21 Vict., c. 148); and of trout, 8 and 9 Vict., c. 26. See Cruives; and for a more detailed account of the law as to Salmon-fishing, see that article, and Stake-Nets. Other fishings, as white-fishings in the sea, or trout-fishings in rivers, may be conferred by a grant from the Crown, though a charter of the lands on the bank of a river, followed by the possession of a trout-fishing for the years of prescription, will secure the proprietor against the effect of a special grant; Carmichael, 20th Nov. 1787. See Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 6; Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 69, et seq.; More's Notes, cci.; Bank. vol. i. p. 574, 111; Ross's Lect. ii. 172, 196.

As to trout-fishing, see that article; as to mussel and oyster fishings, see the Act 3 and 4 Vict., c. 74, 10 and 11 Vict., c. 22, and these articles; and as to limpets and shell-fish, see the case of Hall, 14th Jan. 1852, 14 D. 324.

Fisk; is the Crown's revenue. This term is usually applied by Scotch law-writers to the moveable estate of a person denounced rebel, which was, by our older practice, forfeited to the Crown. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 2, § 10; Bank. vol. i. pp. 263, 83; vol. ii. pp. 305, 46. See Escheat.

Fixtures; are articles of a personal nature attached to land or other heritable subjects, and acceding thereto on the principle, Inædificatum (vel plantatum) solo solocedit. Whatever is requisite to render the premises entire and complete, or whatever appears intended for perpetual use in connection with them, is a fixture, but whatever is separable, and intended to be separated, is not a fixture. The determination of this point in reference to any moveable connected with any heritable subject leads to the decision of the two questions,—1. Whether the moveable subject may be removed by the lessee, who voluntarily constructed it; and, 2. Whether or not, by its connection with the heritable subject, the moveable also becomes heritable. With reference to the first of these, the doctrine of accession has been very much relaxed in favour of the lessee's claim to have certain articles considered moveable; with reference to the second, the strictness with which the rule is enforced, varies according as the question arises between the heir and the executors; the heritable and the personal creditors; or the heir and the liferenter's executors—the law inclining much more readily to consider a subject as heritable in the first of these cases than in the other two. But, in the whole of them, it seems to hold as a general rule, that whatever it is impossible to remove without injuring the heritable subject, or impairing the use for which it was intended, is a fixture, and becomes heritable by accession. The most important subjects of this class are constructions for agricultural purposes, and fixed machinery of all sorts. With regard to fences, see the article Fences. Houses erected by the lessee, which are in general classed with fences, differ in this, that he may not remove them. The built part of a thrashing-mill is considered heritable, the machinery moveable; but when the lessee receives a sum of money to build a thrashing-mill, the machinery becomes the property of the lessor. Trevises, racks, and mangers, put up in a building not used as a stable, may be removed; but it appears that this would not be the case were they put up in a stable. In questions between the heir and the executor, the buckets, chains, and other accessory instruments for working coal, are considered heritable; but in questions between lessor and lessee it is held that they may be removed. A brewer's copper cauldron is a moveable, and may be removed. There has been some doubt as to whether the machinery of a cotton-mill is to be included in an heritable security over the mill; but it is certain that it may be removed. Large vessels in a manufactory, which require to be taken to pieces before removal, are included in an heritable security, but may be removed by the lessee. In an action of count and reckoning arising out of the dissolution of a copartnership of cotton-spinners, the bell of a spinning manufactory was found to be a fixture; it is probable, however, that, in a question between landlord and tenant, it would be considered removable. The doctrine of fixtures has been much more frequently discussed in England than in Scotland, perhaps from greater attention being bestowed in the former country in arranging contracts of temporary occupation. The same interests, however, are concerned, and the law has the same inclination; relaxing the rule of accession much more readily in questions between lessor and lessee than between heritable and personal claimants. Whatever has been constructed by the tenant for trade or manufacture, may be removed by him, if it can be done without material injury to the subject to which it is attached,—as vessels, utensils, furnaces, vats, machinery, steam-engines, &c. It is not, however, so clearly established that the tenant may remove more substantial and permanent additions, as lime-kilns, windmills, and other buildings actually let down into the earth; but he may in general prevent the accession of buildings, by erecting them on rollers, pillars, stilts, or plates of wood laid on brick-work. An urban tenant may remove whatever articles he has fixed up for ornament or domestic use, as hangings, wainscot, stoves, &c. Things affixed for purposes purely agricultural are not removable. But such as are of a mixed nature—i. e., such as have some relation to trade—are removable, although they may be the means of obtaining the profits of the land, as cider-mills, machinery in mines, &c. A gardener cannot take down hot-houses or other horticultural erections. Tenants must remove their fixtures before the expiration of their tenancy, for they cannot insist on their claim after the term, unless they have continued in possession. Of course, all these rules may be varied by special covenant. Bell's Princ., §§ 743, 1473; Illust., ib.; Bell's Com., i. 752, et seq.; ii. 2; Tomlins, h. t.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, i. 288, et seq., and authorities there cited; *Arkwright v. See Heritable and Moveable. Fences.

Flotsam; in English law, is where a ship is sunk or cast away, and the goods are floating upon the sea. Where the owners are not known, flotsam goes to the Crown; where they are known, they have a year and day to claim their goods. Tomlins, h. t.

Flumen; in the Roman law, signifies running water of any sort; but, in the servitude of stillicide, the term is specially applied to water gathered in a spout. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 9; Stair, B. ii. tit. 7, § 7. See Stillicide.

Fodder and Straw. A tenant must consume upon the farm the straw produced by it, and he is not entitled, even in the absence of prohibitory stipulation, to sell any part of the straw or fodder grown upon his lands, except the hay and straw of his outgoing crop; a rule applicable to assignees and sub-lessees as well as to the principal lessee. The tenant of two neighbouring farms, belonging to different proprietors, must not consume the green crop or fodder of the one upon the other. Yet in a case where, by special agreement, a lessee was entitled to manage two farms by means of the steading of one of them, this rule was held to apply only where there are proper means of manufacturing the grain, and consuming the fodder upon the farm. In absence of special stipulation, the outgoing tenant, who cedes possession of the houses and grass at the term of Whitsunday, retains the arable land, until he has cut down and carried off the corn, straw, and fodder, of that year's crop, which is called his away-going crop; although, in some counties, fodder used for making dung is considered steel-bow, and given to the incoming tenant. These matters, however, are generally settled by stipulation in the lease. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 39, and Notes by Mr Ivory; Bell's Princ. § 1261; Illust. ib.; Bell on Leases, i. 327; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant. See Steelbow. Dung.

Fœnus Naticum; that rate of interest, proportioned to the risk, which a person lending money on a ship, or on bottomry, as it is termed, is entitled to demand. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 76; Stair, B. i. tit. 15, § 6.

Fœtus. The destruction of an unborn infant, though an indictable offence, is not homicide. Hume, i. 186; Steele, 70, note.

Fœtus of Cattle. The young of cattle, as foals, calves, &c., are an accessory of the mother, and belong to the owner of the mother by natural accession. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 14. See Accession.

Force and Fear. Force and fear are grounds for the reduction of a contract; but it is not every degree of fear that will be sustained as sufficient. It is a fear which may shake a mind of ordinary firmness and resolution which constitutes a sufficient ground of reduction. But the degree is in every case relative to the situation and disposition of the contracting party; since comparatively little violence is required to force the consent of a person of weaker age, sex, or condition. Among the instruments of force and fear which have been held to annul engagement, are threats and terror of death; or pain to one's self or child. The reverential fear arising from the authority of parents, of husbands, or of magistrates; or that proceeding from the execution of lawful diligence, is not admitted as a ground of reduction; unless where legal diligence is held out as the means of extorting a deed from the debtor, unconnected with the debt on which the diligence proceeds. But even where the obligation relates to the debt on which the diligence proceeds, if the diligence be erroneous, the obligation is reducible; Henderson, 20th Feb. 1782, Mor. 14349. Mere vexation and inconvenience, as the threat of a lawsuit, is not sufficient to vitiate the consent thereby obtained. It has been doubted whether a deed obtained by force is null ab initio, or only reducible. Stair (B. i. tit. 9, § 8) says, that the plea of force and fear is competent, "either by way of action, or sometimes by exception." But it may be questioned whether it can be pleaded by way of exception to the action of a bona fide onerous assignee. In Wightman v. Graham, 6th Dec. 1887, Mor. 1521, it was held, that the exception of violence, arising from legal concussion, in extorting a bill of exchange, would be available even against a bona fide onerous indorsee; but it has been said of this case that it requires reconsideration. Indeed, upon this point, text writers seem in danger of falling into a controversy. By one, the effect of compulsion is declared to be equally subversive of consent with error in essentialibus, and to be a "good objection against third parties" (Bell's Com. i. 297); and, in another part of the same work, it is said, "Restitution will therefore be given, not only against the buyer, but even against purchasers from him, where the seller is incapable of full and legal consent; or where the sale has proceeded from such fear and compulsion as in law annuls and makes it void;" Id. 241. Another author takes a distinction between the act of taking goods by violence, and the act of compelling a party to sell his goods. In the former case, he holds that the violence inurrit labem realem, so as to entitle the owner to recover the goods even from a bona fide purchaser. In the latter case he holds, upon the maxim Voluntas coacta est voluntas, that although the contract is clearly voidable, it is not ipso jure void, and that the property is, in the first instance, transferred so as to enable the wrong-doer to give a good title to a bona fide purchaser. See Brown on Sale, 397, and the authorities there cited, in support of the doctrine. For the form of the summons of reduction on the head of force, see Jurid. Styles, iii. 214; and on the subject of this article generally, see Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 26; Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 8, and tit. 17, § 14; More's Notes, lviii.; Bank. i. 311; Bell's Com. i. 295, 241; Brown on Sale, 395, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 12; Illust. ib.; Thomson on Bills. See Extortion.

Forcible Entry; in English law, an offence against the public peace, committed by violently taking or keeping possession of lands and tenements without the authority of law, so that the legal proprietor is excluded. Tomlins, h. t. The corresponding Scotch law terms are Ejection and Intrusion, which see.

Forcibly Defending. See Defending forcibly.

Forehand Rent. Rent is said to be forehand when it is made payable before the crop of which it is the rent has been reaped. After the period when it is due and exigible, forehand rent is in bonis of the lessor, and passes to his executor, not his heirs. Bell's Princ. §§ 1230, 1499; Illust. § 1499; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, ii. 308, 424; i. 433. See Terms, Legal and Conventional.

Foreign. Persons resident out of Scotland may be cited to the courts of this country in civil actions where they have an estate, either heritable or moveable, in Scotland. 1. Where the foreigner has an heritable estate, he may be cited edictally as a native (see Edictal Citation), because it is presumed that he employs an attorney in this country to attend to his interest, and appear in all actions that may affect that estate. Where he has only a personal estate in Scotland, his effects must first be attached by an arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causæ, and then an action must be raised on which he may be cited edictally. See Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causæ. Abroad. The Court of Session is the commune forum of all foreigners; and hence, although an inferior court has sufficient jurisdiction to attach the funds of a foreigner within the territory or jurisdiction of the inferior judge, jurisdictionis fundandæ causæ, yet the action itself must be pursued before the Supreme Court. A Scotchman forth of Scotland, animo remanendi, is, in this question, in the same situation as a foreigner, for it is now settled that the forum originis gives no jurisdiction per se. Proceedings in Scotland cannot be stopped because analogous proceedings could not be carried on in another country. Thus, an English creditor, who has imprisoned his debtor in England, may attach his property in Scotland, although, by the law of England, a creditor cannot both incarcerate his debtor and attach his effects. But wherever a debt is discharged by the law of one country, it must be discharged in every other. Foreign or English law is in this country matter of evidence, and the only competent mode of proving such law, is to adduce a barrister or other person skilled in the law of the particular country, or to produce his written opinion on an adjusted case. See Dickson on Evidence, p. 989. It has frequently been a question with regard to debts contracted in a foreign country, and sued for in Scotland, whether the lex loci contractus, or the lex fori, is to determine the rules of evidence, obligation, and dissolution. The principle of decision in all such cases has been very clearly announced and illustrated by LORD BROUGHAM, in moving the judgment, in the House of Lords, in Don v. Lipman, 26th May 1837; 2 Sh. and M'L. 682. A distinction is taken between the contract and the remedy. Whatever relates to the nature of the obligation, ad valorem contractus, is governed by the lex loci contractus: whatever relates to the remedy, by suits, to compel performance, or by action for a breach, ad decisionem litis, is governed by the law of the country to whose courts the application is made for performance, or for damages.

Thus, in an action before a Scotch court, the pursuer can claim higher interest than 5 per cent. upon a debt contracted in a country where higher interest is exigible. In Campbell, 16th Feb. 1809, Fac. Coll., 8 per cent. interest was found due upon a bond granted in India, without any distinction being made between the time before the parties came to be resident in Scotland and after. In Graham, 19th Feb. 1820, 2 Dow, 17, and 2 Bligh, 127, the House of Lords found the same principle to apply; but held, in addition, that after the debtors were found liable for the principal sum in the bond, by a decree in this country, the debt became a British debt, and could thenceforward carry only British interest at 5 per cent., to be calculated on the aggregate sums. See also, Wilkinson, 28th June 1821; Palmer and Co's Assignees, 24th Jan. 1835; Bell's Illust. § 32, Nos. 6, 7, 8, and 17. Under the second head of questions arising upon the remedy, are ranked the rules of evidence, and law of prescription and limitation. When an action is brought in Scotland upon an obligation contracted in a foreign country, the law of Scotland and the right of action fall under the Scotch prescription, however entire the obligation might be, were it founded on in the courts of the country where it was entered into. Such is the principle as established in the case of Don. It may be mentioned, however, that previous to the reversal in that case, there had been many conflicting decisions of the Court of Session, on the question, whether the doctrine of limitation relates to the contract or the remedy. These will be found cited and commented upon in the speech of LORD BROUGHAM above referred to. (See Dickson on Evidence, pp. 293, 526, 218, &c.) See, in addition, Thomson, 16th July 1708, Mor. 4504; Randal, 13th July 1768, Mor. 4520; Brown's Sup. v. 541; Kerr, 20th Feb. 1771, Mor. 4522; Barett, 4th Feb. 1772, Mor. 4524; York Buildings Co., 14th Feb. 1792, Mor. 4528; *Bell's Svo. By 1 Vict., c. 29, it is enacted, that foreigners bearing Her Majesty's commission, may be promoted to the rank of general officers, and that foreigners may enlist in Her Majesty's service, provided that in any regiment, battalion, or corps, their number shall not exceed the proportion of one to fifty of natural-born subjects. For compelling the attendance of witnesses in England and Ireland, see the acts 6 and 7 Vict., c. 82 (1843), and 17 and 18 Vict., c. 84 (1854). A recent statute (19 and 20 Vict., c. 113) provides for taking evidence in this country in relation to matters pending before foreign tribunals. As to foreign and international copyright, see 15 Vict., c. 12, and statutes there referred to. Forensais; an unfree man who dwells not within burgh; an out-dwelling man, called therefore rure manens, who, dwelling alandward, has no privilege or immunity within burgh. Skene, h. t.

Forestalling, or Regrating; is the crime of purchasing goods coming to market, with a view to sell them again, and so to raise the price on the consumer. A person purchasing articles on the way to market, for his own use, is guilty of no crime. The essence of the crime seems formerly to have been thought to consist in interposing between the raiser of the article and the consumer. Thus, the Act 1592, c. 148, declares it criminal for a person to get into his possession the growing corn on the field, by sale, contract, or promise. Prosecutions for this offence are now unknown. Hume, i. 510; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 38; Bank, vol. i. pp. 412, 414; Tait's Justice of Peace, h. t.; *Kames' Stat. Forestarius; a forester or keeper of woods, to whom, by reason of his office, pertains the bark and the hewn branches. Foresta is a large wood, without dyke or closure, which has no water, wherein are included wild beasts, and where some have liberty of hunting. Skene, h. t.

Forestry. Lands granted by the Crown with a right of forestry carried all the privileges of a royal forest, which were very oppressive to the country, and, accordingly, the practice of making such grants was reprobated by the Court of Session in 1680; since which time, grants of forestry have fallen into disuse. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 14; Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 67, et seq.; Bank, vol. i. p. 573, 100; Bell's Princ. §§ 670, 753; Illust. § 670; Brown's Synop. h. t.; Watson's Stat. Law, h. t. See Deer.

Forethought Felony; is murder committed in consequence of a previous design, which anciently was distinguished from murder committed on a sudden. But the Act 1661, c. 22, takes away all distinction, and punishes both equally; at the same time it declares that casual homicide, or homicide in self-defence, shall not be punished capitally. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 40; Hume, ii. 239, Note 3, 241. See Chaud Melle.

Forfeiture; is the loss of property consequent either upon the contravention of some condition on which the property is held, or upon the commission of a crime to which forfeiture has been annexed by law as the penalty. Thus, forfeiture is either civil or criminal.

1. Civil forfeiture.—Forfeiture may arise in civil cases either from statutory regulation—from the rules of common law—or by private agreement. Thus, the Act 1597, c. 246, provides, that all feu-vassals failing to pay their feu-duties for two years “haill and together,” shall lose their right, in the same manner as if an irritant clause had been inserted in the right. This irritancy must be declared by an action; and in that action the vassal, by paying up the feu-duty, will escape the forfeiture. The forfeitures at common law arise from the relation of superior and vassal. A vassal who disclaims his superior forfeits his feu, though, as this rule is now received, a very slender excuse will save the vassal from the penalty. In the same way, purpresture is another feudal delinquency, which draws after it a forfeiture of the feu. The offence consists in encroaching on the streets, highways, or other commonities belonging to the Sovereign or to the superior. But this, like the preceding forfeiture, will be purged on very slender grounds; and, in truth, neither of them is known in modern practice. The conventional forfeitures are, for example, where a vassal becomes bound in his original right to certain conditions, as that he shall not sell without first offering the feu to the superior, under the condition of forfeiture. If this be guarded by an irritant and resolute clause, it will be effectual even against third parties; or a forfeiture may arise from neglecting the conditions of an entail guarded by irritant and resolute clauses. But by some lawyers it has been thought that the conditions under which property is conveyed, will not affect a purchaser, unless they be guarded in the original right by irritant and resolute clauses, and unless the condition has entered the register of sasines. See Irritant and Resolute. Conditions. Destination. Clause of Pre-emption. Clause de non alienando.

In the case of Corporation of Tailors of Aberdeen v. Coutts, it was held that conditions in a feudal grant, if they entered the investiture of the vassal, may be enforced against a singular successor, although neither declared a real burden nor protected by an irritancy. In the opinion returned by the Court to the House of Lords the law was thus stated:—“To constitute a real burden, or condition, either in feudal or burgage rights, which is effectual against singular successors, words must be used in the conveyance which clearly express, or plainly imply, that the subject itself is to be affected, and not the granter and his heirs alone; and those words must be inserted in the sasine which follows on the conveyance, and of consequence appears upon the record. In the next place, the burden or condition must not be contrary to law, or inconsistent with the nature of this species of property; it must not be useless or vexatious; it must not be contrary to public policy, for example, by tending to impede the commerce of land, or create a monopoly. The superior, or the party in whose favour it is concerned, must have an interest to enforce it. Lastly, if it consists in the payment of a sum of money, the amount of the sum must be distinctly specified. If these requisites concur, it is not essential that any voces signatæ or technical form of words should be employed. There is no need of a declaration that the obligation is real, that it is debitum fundi, that it shall be inserted in all the future infeftments, or that it shall attach to singular successors. It is sufficient if the intention of the parties be clear, reference being had to the nature of the grant, which is often of great importance in ascertaining its import. Neither is it necessary that the obligation should be fenced with an irritant clause, and far less with irritant and resolute clauses, which last are peculiar to a strict entail; a settlement depending upon a different principle altogether. On strict feudal principles obligations in feudal grants are effectual as conditions of the grant, without a compliance with which the superior is not bound to give an entry to the vassal.” This case was decided 20th Dec. 1834, 13 S. 226. On appeal it was remitted 23d May 1837, 2 S. and M’L. 609; and the judgment thereafter affirmed 13th Aug. 1840, 1 Rob. 296. See also 3 Ross’s L. C. 269.

2. Forfeiture for Crimes.—A forfeiture of moveables follows upon the sentence of death being pronounced. It follows also on conviction of perjury, of bigamy, of deforcement, of breach of arrestment, and of usury. Formerly, too, a forfeiture of moveables, or the falling of the single escheat, as it was called, took place where a debtor was denounced rebel, on letters of horning, for not payment of a debt, and remained unrelaxed for the period of a year; but this last species of forfeiture was abrogated by the act abolishing wardholding. The forfeiture of heritage, following on a conviction for high treason, according to the laws of England, now takes place in Scotland also, in consequence of the extension of the Treason Laws of England to this country. See Escheat. Denunciation. By the law of England, a person convicted of treason forfeits to the Crown his whole property, heritable and moveable, as well as his honours and dignities; and the consequent corruption of blood deprives him of all right of succession, and prevents his descendants from taking any succession through him. See Corruption of Blood. The Court will not give judgment on a pleading lodged under a forfeited title; Shand's Prac. i. 170. This forfeiture may affect,—1. Claimants under a title, preferable to that of the attainted person; 2. His heirs-at-law; his creditors and singular successors; and, 4. Heirs of entail. 1. Claimants under a preferable title.—By the act 1584, c. 2, it was enacted, that all heritage, which had been possessed by the attainted person for the space of five years before the attainder, should be held to be the absolute property of the attainted person; but the severity of this short prescription was mitigated by the act 1690, c. 33, whereby forfeited estates were subjected to all real actions and claims, though not raised within the five years. 2. The heir-at-law of the attainted person.—The heirs-at-law are not only deprived, by the attainder, of all that their ancestor possessed, but they are deprived even of the privilege of taking other successions, which they can claim only through him. There seems to be an exception in the case of dignities and honours. See the case of the Duke of Athole, noticed by Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 26. 3. The creditors and singular successors of the attainted person.—Creditors originally had no security in Scotland; and, on the attainder, the whole estate fell to the Crown. This was thought so unjust as to require the interposition of the Legislature; and, by the act 1690, c. 33, the rights of creditors were preserved entire; but, after the Union, it became a question, whether this statute, or the articles of Union, by which the law of England was made the rule, should be held to regulate those rights; when it was at last determined that the matter was to be regulated by the law of England. By that law, debts, heritably secured on the estate, are not affected by the attainder; but personal debts cannot be made the grounds of attaching the estate; in consequence of which, special statutes were passed after the Rebellions 1715 and 1745, extending the rule, as to heritable debts, to all the lawful creditors of the forfeited person. 4. Heirs of Entail.—In the case of an heir of entail, the forfeiture, on conviction of high treason, extends to the descendants of the forfeited person, and deprives them of the right of succession, so as to give possession to the substitute, not a descendant of the body of the forfeited person; *Fac. Forgery; is the crime of imitating the subscription of another, abducting it to a deed, and putting that deed to use, by acting under it, or receiving property in virtue of it, by founding on it in judgment as a title to sue, or to defend, or by making it over to another. The proof of forgery is either direct or indirect. 1. The direct proof of forgery consists in the examination of the writer of the deed, and of the instrumentary witnesses—that is, the witnesses who sign the deed and attest the subscription. The subscription of witnesses is an attestation to which the law gives effect, so as on their death to hold their subscriptions as evidence of the regularity of the deed. Even where a witness does not recollect, weight is given to his subscription; so that, to cut down the effect of a deed regularly attested, the instrumentary witnesses must be brought to swear to circumstances sufficient to invalidate the evidence afforded by their subscriptions—a proof which the law does not reject. 2. The indirect mode of proof is by an investigation of all those circumstances, which may infer that the person, by whom a deed is said to have been subscribed, actually did not subscribe it—e.g., an error in the date, an alibi, the stamp, the contexture, or date even of the paper, a comparatio litterarum, or comparison of the handwriting. The comparison of the handwriting is made with genuine subscriptions of the same date with the one alleged to be a forgery; and, where the real subscriptions differ from the one founded on, the forgery may be pronounced upon with a considerable degree of certainty. See Comparatio Litterarum. Handwriting. The indirect mode of proof is not resorted to where the direct mode is practicable. Formerly, though the punishment was not expressly laid down by statute, all gross cases of forgery were capital at common law; and, in cases of less moment, an arbitrary punishment was inflicted. But the punishment of death was first much restricted by 1 Will. IV., c. 66, and 2 and 3 Will. IV., c. 123; and at length, by 1 Vict., c. 84, totally abolished in cases of forgery,—transportation for life, or for a term of years, being substituted. By 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 73, it is enacted, that persons committed to trial for any forgery, the punishment of which was before capital, but had been changed by preceding statutes to transportation for life, shall not be entitled to bail, unless the High Court, or Circuit Court of Justiciary shall, on the application of the accused, consider it consistent with the ends of justice to grant him the privilege of bail. Forgery is one of the crimes in which the Court of Session has a criminal jurisdiction. Such a criminal prosecution for forgery may originate by a petition and complaint at a private party's instance, with concurrence of the Lord Advocate, or with the Lord Advocate alone. The complaint is in substance an indictment, and must have attached to it a list of witnesses, and be served on the panel like an indictment, on an induciae of fifteen days. As the party cannot be punished unless he appear, the Court, on the pursuer's application, grants warrant to incarcerate the defender. If, however, forgery is not directly charged, but merely facts stated, from which the inference is drawn, warrant is given to bring the defender before the Court for examination. After the process is in Court, but before going to proof, the defender has usually been examined in presence of the Court. Parties are then heard, and judgment pronounced on the relevancy of the libel and defences, and the proof is taken. The Court hears any relevant defence, at however late a stage it be brought forward. If the panel is found guilty, the writs are reduced, and generally torn in the presence of the Court. The offender may also be punished to any extent short of death; but formerly, when the Court found the forgery deserving of capital punishment, they merely reduced the deeds, found the panel guilty, and remitted him to the Court of Justiciary. The criminal jurisdiction of the Court of Session in cases of forgery is now, however, more a matter of historical curiosity than of practical utility; since, for upwards of fifty years, the trial in all cases of forgery, whether the evidence be direct or circumstantial, has taken place before the Court of Justiciary. Some interesting information on the subject will be found in Alison's Princ. 423, et seq. According to the same authority, it rather seems to be competent to the sheriff to try for this offence; Ibid. 425. In the action of reduction-improbation in the Court of Session, where fraud, forgery, and falsehood are usually libelled on, the concurrence of the Lord Advocate is necessary, even although the question is tried merely ad civilem effectum. FORIS FACTUM; an unlaw, otherwise called an amerciamentum. Skene, h. t.

FORIS FAMILIARI, foris familiat; put forth of his father's house, or made free, and delivered forth of the fatherly power. The son is said to be foris familiat by the father, when, with his own consent and good will, he receives from his father any lands, and is put in possession thereof before his father's decease, and is content and satisfied therewith; so that he nor his heirs may not claim or crave any more of his father's heritage. Skene, h. t.

FORISFAMILIATION; is the separation of a child from the family of his father. Where a child receives a separate stock from the father, the profits of which become his own, he is said to be forisfamiated, even although he should remain in family with the father. The same is the case where the child marries, or lives in a separate family with the consent of the father. Forisfamiation is also used to signify either an onerous or gratuitous renunciation of the legitim by a child. While children remain in family with their father, he has the entire management of them, and is entitled to all the profits of their labour or industry. Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 53; and B. iii. tit. 9, § 23; Stair, B. i. tit. 5, § 13, and B. iii. tit. 8, § 45; Bank. vol. i. p. 154, 8, et seq.; Bell's Princ. §§ 1585, 1630; Brown's Synop. h. t. Dunlop on the Poor Law. See Legitim.

FORMS OF COURT. See Process.

FORNICATION; is the act of incontinency in unmarried persons. The stat. 1567, c. 13, provides for the punishment of this indecency; but the statute is in desuetude. Hume, i. 464; Bank. vol. i. p. 121, 54. See Disorderly House.

FORTALICE. A fortalice, as a place of strength, was formerly considered as belonging to the King, or, in other words, it was accounted public property, from its connection with the public safety; and therefore, anciently, a fortalice was not carried by a charter, without an express grant of the fortalice; now it goes as part and pertinent of the ground. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 17; Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 66; Bank. vol. i. p. 567, 91; Bell's Princ. §§ 743, 752, and authorities there cited; Ross's Lect. ii. 166, 196.

Fortalitium; a fortalice or castle which has a battlement or barmekin, or a fowls about it. Skene, h. t.

Forthcoming; is the action by which an arrestment is made available to the arrester. The arrestment secures the goods or debts in the hands of the creditor or holder: the forthcoming is an action in which the arrestee and common debtor are called before the judge to hear sentence given, ordering the debt to be paid, or effects delivered up to the arresting creditor. This is the form when the arrester proceeds to make his claim effectual. Where the arrestee is desirous of ascertaining to whom he ought to pay, or where second arresters wish to ascertain their rights, this is accomplished by a process of multiplepoinding. The summons in an action of forthcoming is privileged, and (before bills for summonses were abolished by 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 18) they passed on a bill, the induciae being in that case six days, against defenders within Scotland. If the defenders were in Orkney, Shetland, or forth of Scotland, no bill was required; and in the former case, the induciae were forty, in the latter, sixty days. Even where the defenders were within Scotland, the summons might pass without a bill, the induciae being then the ordinary induciae of twenty-seven days.

In the action of forthcoming, in which the arrestee and the common debtor must be called, it is necessary to prove both the debt arrested, and the debt on which the arrestment proceeds: the former is a question between the arrester and the arrestee. Where the debt has been constituted by writing, the written obligation may be recovered from the common debtor by a diligence; or, where there is no proof, it may be referred to the oath of the arrestee. The debt, again, due by the common debtor to the arrester must be proved; but that is a point in which the arrestee has no interest, and which is competent to the common debtor alone, who is therefore always made a party to the action. Where the arrestment has been loosed on caution, the cautioner, as well as the arrestee and common debtor, must be made parties to the action. Where the funds have been paid away by the arrestee after the loosing, it is sufficient that he be called for his interest, without directing any petitory conclusions against him. A forthcoming may be raised, notwithstanding the death of the arrester, arrestee, or common debtor. The representative of the arrester must, of course, make up a proper title to the debt; and if the arrestee also be dead, the forthcoming will be raised against his representative. Where the arrestee dies during the dependence of the forthcoming, the action must be transferred against his representative before decree can be obtained. Where the common debtor dies before the claim is constituted by decree, or otherwise, it must be constituted against his representatives before the forthcoming is raised. But if decree be recovered against the common debtor himself, there is no necessity for transferring against his representatives. Where the common debtor dies during the dependence of the action of forthcoming, the process cannot proceed till the representative is called as common debtor; but, in such a case, it is not necessary to charge the apparent heir to enter. Another creditor, obtaining confirmation as executor-creditor before decree of forthcoming is pronounced, will be preferred. Even after decree of forthcoming has been obtained, the arrester may proceed with other diligence for the recovery of his debt. In the forthcoming may be recovered, both the principal sum arrested, and the interest due from the date of arrestment, provided arrestment was used both for principal and interest. Arrestment on a depending action entitles the arrester in the forthcoming to claim all expenses laid out in the action, on the dependence of which the arrestment was used. The expenses of the process of forthcoming are not covered by the arrestment. But where the ground of debt on which arrestment proceeded contains a penalty, the sum recovered under the forthcoming will only extinguish as much of the principal and annualrents as comes to the arrester, after deduction of his expense. And if the arrester have a separate security over property of the common debtor, and have been paid his principal and interest, in virtue of his arrestment, he will not be compelled to assign that separate security to another creditor of the common debtor until he be paid his expenses. The cautioner in the loosing cannot object to the expense of raising and executing the arrestment being comprehended in the forthcoming. The decree of forthcoming is held to be a legal assignation in favour of the arrestee; and where the subject arrested consists in goods or effects, the decree ordering them to be sold for behoof of the arrester gives him a complete legal title, which cannot be defeated by the pouncing of co-creditors. Forthocht Felony; felony committed wittingly and willingly, after deliberation and set purpose. Skene, h. t. See Forethought Felony.

Fortune-Teller. Vagabonds may, by the act 1579, c. 74, be imprisoned and brought to trial; and under the description of vagabonds in this act, are comprehended all who go about pretending to foretell fortunes. The statutory punishment is scourging and burning on the ear. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 39; Hume, i. 170 and 474; 9 Geo. II., c. 5.

Forum Competens; means a court, to the jurisdiction of which a party is amenable. Under this head, in digests and dictionaries, such as Morison's and Lord Kames', are usually classed questions as to the competency of a Court's jurisdiction over parties furth of the kingdom, who have never had a domicile in this country, or who have lost it; questions as to arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causæ,—the jurisdiction over executors, factors, &c., appointed by the Court,—the district within which a testament must be confirmed,—the Court competent to discuss the validity of presentations, &c. For these questions, reference is made to the following articles in this Dictionary:—Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causæ. Domicile. Confirmation. Jurisdiction. Foreign. Abroad. Absent. Citation. Fossa; a pit or fowsie, as furca is a gallows. King Malcolm gave power to the barons to have a pit wherein women condemned for theft should be drowned, and a gallows whereon men should be hanged. Skene, h. t. See Furca.

Foxes; may be pursued and destroyed as vermin even upon the property of others; with no other liability than for the damage actually done in the pursuit. But fox-hunting for sport, without leave, is punishable as a trespass. Blair's Justice Manual, p. 87; Colquhoun v. Buchanan and others, 6th August 1785, M. 4997; *Marquis of Tweeddale v. Franchise; in English law is used as synonymous with liberty, and is defined to be a royal privilege, or branch of the prerogative of the Crown, subsisting in the hands of a subject. It must be held by a grant from the Crown, or by prescription, which presupposes a grant. The kinds of franchise are almost infinite. It may mean an exemption from ordinary jurisdiction, an immunity from tribute or toll, the privilege of being incorporated, and subsisting as a body-politic, the elective franchise, and the like. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Frank, or livre; a French coin, worth 10½d. English money. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Franking; the privilege of dispatching and receiving letters through the General Post-Office, possessed by members of both Houses of Parliament, and by certain government functionaries; but this privilege is now abolished.

Fraud. Where fraud enters into a contract, it destroys that consent which is requisite to render an agreement binding in law. Where, through the fraud of the one party, there is an error in essentialibus of the contract, consent cannot be said to have been given, and the contract is void ab initio, even in questions with the fraudulent party's bona fide onerous singular successors. See Error in essentialibus. But, even where such error does not exist, fraud giving rise to the engagement—dolus dans causam contractui—may be pleaded as a ground of reduction, or as a personal exception to an action for implemment; though it will have no effect in questions with bona fide onerous assignees. Fraud incident to a contract—dolus incidens—only gives a claim for damages. Where the fraud is not that of the party contracting, but of a third party, the remedy can only be sought at the hands of that third party. Fraud may be either by false representation; concealment of material circumstances; underhand dealing; or by taking advantage of intoxication or imbecility. In mercantile dealings there is some allowance for those petty frauds, or rather misrepresentations, which the parties make use of to overreach one another; and there has been a distinction taken between dolus malus, or that gross fraud for which there is no excuse, and dolus bonus, or those artifices which it is well understood that merchants practise in order to enhance the value of what they sell. Neither is concealment of circumstances known to one of the parties necessarily a ground for reduction, or even for an action of damages. Merchants are often at great expense and trouble in acquiring early information, and it is just that they should be allowed to turn it to account. But if the obliger relies on the obligee for his information, as in insurance contracts, there is no excuse for concealment or fraud, however trifling, and the contract will be void if such fraud has been practised.

In the case of the Earl of Chestorfield v. Janssen, 2 Vesey senior, 154, LORD HARDWICKE enumerated four species of fraud, and observed,—“This Court has an undoubted jurisdiction to relieve against every species of fraud. 1. Fraud, which is dolus malus, may be actual, arising from facts and circumstances of imposition, which is the plainest case. 2. It may be apparent, from the intrinsic nature and subject of the bargain itself, such as no man in his senses and not under delusion would make on the one hand, and as no honest and fair man would accept on the other, which are unequitable and unconscientious bargains, and of such even the common law has taken notice. 3. A kind of fraud is which may be presumed from the circumstance and condition of the parties contracting. This goes farther than the rule of law, which is, that it must be proved, not presumed; but it is wisely established in this Court to prevent taking surreptitious advantage of the weakness or necessity of another, which knowingly to do, is equally against conscience, as to take advantage of his ignorance. A person equally unable to judge for himself in one as the other. 4. A fourth kind of fraud may be collected or inferred in the consideration of this Court, from the nature and circumstances of the transaction as being an imposition and deceit on the other persons not parties to the fraudulent agreement. It may sound odd, that an agreement may be infected by being a deceit on others not parties; but such there are; against such there has been relief. Of this kind have been marriage-brochage contracts. Neither of the parties herein being deceived, but they tend necessarily to the deceit on one party to the marriage, or of the parent, or of the friend. So in a clandestine private agreement to return part of the portion of the wife, or provision stipulated for the husband, to the parent or guardian. In most of these cases it is done with their eyes open, and knowing what they do, but if there is fraud therein, the Court holds it infected thereby, and relieves."

A Court of Equity will give relief in cases of fraud where a Court of Law will not. In Fullagar v. Clarke, 18 Vesey, 481, LORD ELDON observed: "This Court will, as it ought in many cases, order an instrument to be delivered up, as unduly obtained, that a jury would not be justified in impeaching by the ordinary rules of law, which require fraud to be proved; and are not satisfied, though it may be strongly presumed, as Lord Hardwicke said in the case of Lord Chesterfield v. Janssen, and Lord Kenyon intimated in other cases. This jurisdiction may be exercised upon such a point where a Court of Law could not enter into the question, as a Court of Equity is bound to do."

It is not every concealment, even of facts material to the interest of a party, which will entitle him to redress. In Fox v. Mackreth, 2 Bro. Ch. R. 420, LORD THURLOW, C., observed: "I do not agree with those who say that where an advantage has been taken in a contract, which a man of delicacy would not have taken, it must be set aside. Suppose, for instance, that A knowing there to be a mine on the estate of B, of which he knew B was ignorant, should enter into a contract to purchase the estate of B for the price of the estate, without considering the mine, could the Court set it aside? Why not, since B was not apprised of the mine, and A was? Because A., as the buyer, was not obliged, from the nature of the contract, to make the discovery. It is therefore essentially necessary, in order to set aside the transaction, not only that a great advantage should be taken, but it must arise from some obligation in the party to work the discovery. The Court will not correct a contract merely, because a man of nice honour would not have entered into it; it must fall within some definition of fraud. The rule must be drawn so as not to affect the general transactions of mankind."

A general rule is, that he who bargains in a matter of advantage with a person placing confidence in him, is bound to show that a reasonable use has been made of that confidence; and this rule applies equally to all persons standing in confidential relations to each other. If no such proof is established, Courts of Equity treat the case as one of constructive fraud. There are many cases of persons standing in regard to each other in confidential relations, in which the above rule applies. Among these may be enumerated the cases which arise from the relation of landlord and tenant, of partner and partner, of principal and surety, and various others, where mutual agencies, rights and duties, are created between the parties by their own voluntary acts, or by operation of law. The doctrine may be generally stated to be, that wherever confidence is reposed, and one party has it in his power, in a secret manner, for his own advantage, to sacrifice those interests which he is bound to protect, he will not be permitted to hold any such advantage. In all cases where there exists some peculiar relation of a fiduciary character between parties, the law, in order to prevent undue advantage from the confidence which the relation naturally creates, requires the utmost degree of good faith (uberrima fides) in all transactions between the parties. If there is any misrepresentation, or any concealment of a material fact, or any just suspicion of artifice or undue influence, Courts of Equity will interpose, and pronounce the transaction void, and, as far as possible, restore the parties to their original rights. Story's Equity Jurisprudence, §§ 218, 311, and 323.

This principal of law was applied to the case of the managing partner of a firm in Maddesford v. Austwick, 1 Sim. R. 89, where an agreement was set aside by which a partner who superintended exclusively the accounts of the concern, agreed to purchase his copartner's share of the business, for a sum which he knew from accounts in his possession, but which he concealed from his copartner, was an inadequate consideration. SIR JOHN LEACH, V. C., observed,—"That the public books of account belonging to the company, to which all parties had access, were of an intricate nature, and required considerable experience and attention to understand and make them out, is proved by the book-keeper Chase. That the plaintiff is not conversant with accounts is proved by the same Mr Chase, and also by Mr Wright. The precise nature of all these public books has not been explained to the Court, but it is clear that they did not contain any statement of an account between the plaintiff and the defendant. At the time the agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant, the defendant had in his possession a private book, which did contain a statement of the accounts between the plaintiff and the defendant, made out by the defendant, whereby it appears that the L.1000, which the defendant agreed to pay to the plaintiff, in addition to the monies which he had drawn from the concern, would have been nearly, but not quite, a fair consideration, if no profits had been made from the concern of the mint; but that, taking the mint profits into the account, which the defendant was unquestionably bound to divide with the plaintiff, it would be many hundred pounds less than the plaintiff would be entitled to receive. The defendant being the partner, whose business it was to keep the accounts of the concern, could not, in fairness, deal with the plaintiff, for his share of the profits of the concern, without putting him into possession of all the information which he himself had with respect to the state of the accounts between them. The defendant knew, from the account in his possession, that the L.1000 was not an adequate consideration for the plaintiff's share of the profits, and he cannot be permitted in a Court of Equity to maintain advantage which he has gained over the plaintiff's ignorance; and the plaintiff for that reason appears to me to be entitled to avoid the agreement of 1817. The supposed account of the profits of the concern formed the basis of the plaintiff's calculation of profits for the ensuing three years; and being misled in that respect, he is entitled to avoid the whole agreement, and to have an account of the profits of the concern up to the dissolution in 1821."

Fraud, Criminal. Fraud, considered as a crime, is punishable arbitrarily at common law. It is usually, but not always, charged as "falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition," which, in popular language, is termed swindling. See Swindling, and case of Murray, 2 Feb. 1852; *J. Fraudulent Bankruptcy; is the wilful cheating of creditors by an insolvent person, or one who conducts himself as such. The acts 1631, c. 18, and 1696, c. 5, denounce certain punishments against fraudulent bankrupts; and the Sequestration Act, 54 Geo. III., c. 137, § 38, declared, with respect to any bankrupt sequestered under it—"That if he shall wilfully fail to exhibit a fair state of his affairs, or to make oath, as appointed by the act, to the fairness or fulness of his disclosure of his means and funds, or to make a complete surrender of his effects and estate, or if he shall take the above oath falsely, he shall be considered as a fraudulent bankrupt, and punished accordingly, with infamy and other pains." This act, and the subsequent act 2 and 3 Vict., c. 41, are now repealed by the "Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856" (19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, § 2); the provisions of which, on the subject of fraudulent conduct and falsehood, are contained in sections 97, 162, and 178. Under the first of these clauses, "If it shall appear to a majority of the creditors in number and value assembled, at any meeting after the examination of the bankrupt, that he has not made a full and fair surrender of his estate, or that he has disposed of or concealed any part of his funds, to the prejudice of his creditors, or that his bankruptcy has been fraudulent, they may authorise the trustee to proceed against him, in terms of law, at the expense of the estate." By section 162, the accountant in bankruptcy is authorised to give information to the Lord Advocate in the event of his having grounds to suspect fraudulent conduct by the bankrupt, or malversation on the part of the trustee, &c.; and the Lord Advocate is directed, on such information, to take such proceedings as he may think proper. Section 178 provides for falsehood in any oath. See False Swearing. The point upon which the proof of fraudulent bankruptcy generally turns, is, that the accused was accessory to the diminution, by alienation, abstraction, or concealment, of the funds divisible among his creditors, with a fraudulent intent, and in the knowledge that the legal rights of the creditors were thereby infringed. The embezzlement may have been carried into effect, either in contemplation of, or after sequestration; and, in either case, the proof of fraud depends upon the accompanying circumstances. The punishment of this offence is arbitrary, varying from imprisonment to transportation. Infamy and ineligibility for office are always added. The Court of Session has a criminal jurisdiction in cases of fraudulent bankruptcy. The prosecution in that Court commences with a petition and complaint which must have the concurrence of the Lord Advocate; which concurrence cannot be granted after the case comes into Court. As, in forgery, this complaint is in substance an indictment, and must contain a list of witnesses. The complaint prays for a warrant to incarcerate the bankrupt, or, if already in jail, to detain him there. The petition and complaint is presented to the Court, who pronounce an interlocutor ordering service thereof, and, where necessary, granting warrant for apprehending the accused. If answers are put in, a remit is made to the junior Lord Ordinary, who hears the parties, and prepares the cause, either by a remit to an accountant, or by ordering condescendence and answers, or by directing issues to be adjusted for trial. The accountant's report, or the condescendence and answers, are printed and reported, and counsel is heard, if the parties require it; after which judgment is pronounced as accords, or further proof, or a jury trial, ordered. The Court is empowered, by the act 1696, to inflict any punishment short of death. It was at one time questioned whether the Court of Justiciary was competent to try this offence; but all doubt on that point was removed by 7 and 8 Geo. IV., c. 20, whereby it is made lawful to prosecute persons accused of fraudulent bankruptcy before the High Court, or any of the Circuit Courts of Justiciary, by indictment or criminal letters; the punishment being the same with that competent to be awarded by the Court of Session. By the same statute it is made lawful for the trustee, under a sequestration, or any creditor ranked, with concurrence of the Lord Advocate, to prosecute before the High Court of Justiciary, or the Circuits; but without prejudice to the right of the public prosecutor to insist in all such prosecutions. In the Court of Justiciary the prosecution is by indictment; and there are recent instances of prosecutions for fraudulent bankruptcy both in the Court of Session and in the Court of Justiciary. Freehold; in English law, is a land, tenement, or office which a man holds in fee-simple, fee-tail, or for life. Freehold is either in deed or in law; the first is the actual possession, the second is the right before entry. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Step. Com.

Freeholder: is a person holding of the Crown or Prince, though the title is, in modern language, applied to such as, before the passing of the Reform Act, were entitled to elect or be elected members of Parliament, and who must have held lands extending to a forty shilling land of old extent, or to L.400 Scots of valued rent. See Election Laws. Anciently every freeholder was bound to attend at the Michaelmas head-court. In default of his attendance a fine was imposed by the sheriff; but that penalty was taken away by the act abolishing heritable jurisdictions; and freeholders are now bound to attendance only when summoned to attend as jurymen, or for some other lawful purpose. *Ersk. Freight of a Ship. The freight is the price paid for the use of a ship to transport goods from one port to another. It is generally settled in writing by a contract of charter-party, in which the course of the voyage and the number of days the ship is to remain at a port or ports on her voyage, are prescribed; and where the vessel is detained a greater number of days than has been provided for, the amount of the charge for each extra day is fixed. The freight is not due until the whole voyage is finished, by unloading the cargo, and discharging the ship at the last port. The goods and merchandise are under a hypothec for the freight; as the freight is to the mariners for their wages. See Charter-Party. Demurrage. Besides the freight, the shipowner has a claim for the expense of pilots, or on the loss of masts, anchors, &c., which is termed average. See *Average. Friendly Societies; have been the subject of various statutes, which were last consolidated and amended by 18 and 19 Vict., c. 63. By that act, all the previous statutes relative to friendly societies, as set forth in a schedule, are repealed, subject to a proviso that subsisting societies established under any of the previous statutes are to continue to subsist, and their rules to remain in force, but the enrolment of such rules is to be transferred from the rolls of the sessions of the peace to the registrar appointed under the act. The contracts of such subsisting societies are not to be affected by the repeal; and these subsisting societies, so long as they do not effect assurances beyond L.200, or annuities beyond L.30 per annum, are to enjoy all the exemptions and privileges conferred on societies established under the new act, §§ 1-5. For the purposes of the act registrars are to be appointed; the registrar for Scotland to be an advocate of seven years standing; §§ 6-8.

By section 9, it is declared to be lawful for any number of persons to form a friendly society, under the provisions of the act, for the purpose of raising, by voluntary subscription of the members thereof, a fund for any of the following objects:—1. For insuring a sum of money to be paid on the birth of a member's child, or on the death of a member, or for the funeral expenses of the wife or child of a member; 2. For the relief or maintenance of the members, their husbands, wives, children, brothers or sisters, nephews or nieces, in old age, sickness, or widowhood, or the endowment of members, or nominees of members, at any age; 3. For any purpose which shall be authorized by one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, or in Scotland by the Lord Advocate, as a purpose to which the powers and facilities of the act ought to be extended: Provided that no member shall subscribe or contract for an annuity exceeding L.30 per annum, or a sum payable on death, or any other contingency, exceeding L.200.

The provisions of the act as to rules are contained in §§ 25-30, and are to the following effect:—Persons intending to establish a Friendly Society are to make rules for the regulation, government, and management thereof, setting forth,—1. The name and place of meeting of the society. 2. The objects of the society, the purposes to which its funds are to be applicable, the conditions of membership, and the fines and forfeitures to be imposed. 3. The manner of making, altering, amending, and rescinding rules. 4. A provision for the appointment and removal of a committee of management, trustees, treasurer, &c. 5. A provision for the investment of funds and audit of accounts. 6. The manner in which disputes in the society are to be settled. Two copies of the rules subscribed by three members and the secretary are to be transmitted to the registrar, who, on finding that they are in conformity with law, and with the provisions of the act, is to give a certificate, in terms of a schedule, and is to return one of the copies to the society, and to keep the other as directed by one of the Secretaries of State. The rules may be altered and added to in terms of the original regulation to that effect, but the alterations must be certified in like manner by the registrar. By § 10, no money is to be paid for the funeral expenses of any child under ten years of age, except on production of a copy of the entry in the register of deaths, signed by the registrar for the district, and either containing a statement that the cause of death has been certified by a qualified medical practitioner, or accompanied by a proper certificate of the probable cause of death; and not more than L.6 is to be paid on the account of the funeral expenses of a child under five, nor more than L.10 in the case of a child between five and ten years of age. Friendly societies may be dissolved of consent in the manner provided by § 13; and they may unite or be amalgamated with other societies under § 14. An exemption from stamp-duties is conferred on societies under the act by § 37. A friendly society has a preference over all the other creditors of its office-bearer, for sums due by them (§ 23), and is entitled, in actions for balances due by the treasurer, to recover full costs, taxed as between agent and client (§ 22). The property of such societies is vested in trustees appointed under the act, in whose names, as trustees, all suits by or against the society proceed without discontinuance or abatement on death or removal of individual trustees (§§ 17-19). For the provisions of the act as to management of such societies, and for the other provisions of the act generally, reference must be made to the statute itself. See, as to previous acts and decisions thereupon, Barclay's Justice of Peace (1855), h. t. See also Ivory's Ersk. i. 7, § 64, and Notes; Shand's Prac. pp. 185, 969; Bakers of Paisley, 6th Dec. 1836, 15 S. & D. 200; Caithness Friendly Soc. 6th Dec. 1834, 13 S. & D. 135; Manson, 5th June 1840, 2 D. 1015; Boyes, 12th Nov. 1834, 13 S. & D. p. 1; Mason Lodge of Dundee, 22d May 1830, 8 S. & D. 786; Howie, 18th May 1836, 14 S. & D. 752; Robertson, 18th Jan. 1842, 4 D. 398. Frivolous and Vexatious. By the act regulating the trial of election petitions (11 and 12 Vict., c. 98, §§ 89, 90, 92), it is provided, that when an election committee reports to the House that a petition, or that opposition to a petition, or that an objection to a voter, has been frivolous and vexatious, the party presenting such petition, or making such opposition or objection, shall be liable in full costs to be ascertained under § 94. See Chambers' Election Law, h. t.

Fructus Pendentes; are fruits not yet

separated from the subject which produced them. Natural fruits pass, upon the death of the proprietor, to his heir, or upon a sale of lands to the purchaser. All fructus pendentes at the termination of bona fides, with the exception of corn sown by the bona fide possessor, go to the proprietor. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, §§ 14 and 26; Kames' Equity, 370. See Fruits.

Fructus Percepti; are fruits separated from the subject which produced them. They become the property of the bona fide perceptor. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 25; Kames' Equity, 370. See Fruits. Bona Fides.

Fruits; as part of the soil, belong to the proprietor of the soil. This is the general rule. Hence, on the death of a proprietor, the fruits go to the heir, or to a purchaser, along with the lands; but there is an exception of such fruits as are raised by annual industry. In this view, trees or planting, even natural grass or fruit not yet plucked from the tree, belong to the proprietor, that is, to the heir or to the purchaser; but wheat, barley, &c., which are reared by annual culture, belong to the person, or his executors, by whom the crop was sown, so as to exclude either an heir or a purchaser. With regard to a purchaser, however, in place of regulating his interest by abstract rules of this kind, the payment of the price, the period of the currency of the interest, or the views of the parties in the sale, will affect the question as to the property of the fruit. Stair, B. i. tit. 7, § 12; *Ersk. Fugitation. Where a person accused of a crime does not obey the citation to answer in the criminal prosecution brought against him, the Court pronounces sentence of fugitation against him, by which all his moveable property falls as escheat to the Crown. It has been held that sentence is de jure recalled by the public prosecutor arraigning the panel at the bar. Miller, 1850; J. Shaw, 288. See also the case of *Ritchie v. Funds, Public. See Stock.

Fungibles; are moveable goods and effects, which perish in the use, and which may be estimated by weight, number, or measure, as grain or coin. In this sense, jewels, or paintings, or other works of art and taste, are not fungibles, their value differing in each individual without possessing any common standard. *Ersk. Funeral Expenses. The funeral expense is a privileged debt, which must be paid, along with others of the same class, preferably to other debts. Under these expenses are included the expense necessary for the suitable performance of the funeral, and for mournings for the widow, and for such of the children of the deceased as are present at the funeral. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 43; Stair, B. iii. tit. 8, § 72; More's Notes, pp. xxv. et seq.; cccvi. et seq.; Bell's Com. ii. 156; Brown's Synop. h. t., also pp. 624, 1771; *Kames' Stat. Furca et Fossa; the pit and gallows. In ancient privileges granted by the Crown, it signified a jurisdiction over felons, to punish the men by hanging and the women by drowning. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Fossa.

Furche; a fork. Anciently, when any person was served and retoured nearest and lawful heir to any of his predecessors, the King directed precepts to the superior to infest him. If the first and second were disregarded, he directed a third, called the furche, or forked, because alternative, in which the King commanded the superior to give sasine, and certified that if he did not, he would command the sheriff to give the same. Similar to this was the third precept on the allowance of an apprising. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 25; Skene, h. t.

Furiosity; or madness, by which the judgment is prevented from being applied to the ordinary purposes of life, is one of the grounds on which a curator may be appointed to manage the affairs of the person labouring under that infirmity. The condition of the party must be ascertained by the verdict of a jury; and, where that course is followed, the legal curator is the next male agnate of twenty-five years of age. Stair, B. i. tit. 10, § 13, and B. iv. tit. 3, § 7; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 48; Bank. vol. i. p. 165, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 2106, and authorities there cited; *Jurid. Furlong; a lineal or superficial measure; the eighth part of a mile or of an acre. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Furlough. Non-commissioned officers or privates may, on the plea of sickness or other necessary cause, apply to any officer within the district not below a captain in rank, or, in the absence of such, to a justice of peace, who may grant them an extension of their furlough, certifying the same, and the cause of it, to the commanding-officer, if known, or if not, to the agent of the regiment. Such extension never to exceed a month, unless with the approval of the commanding officer of the district. Hutch. Justice of Peace, iii. 26; Tait's Justice of Peace, p. 367; Blair's Justice of Peace, p. 322.

Furniture. Household furniture is comprehended under the invecta et illata, over which the landlord's hypothec for rent extends. Even hired furniture is included, but not such as is merely deposited in the house, or lent to the tenant without a rent. The question, whether or not the household furniture of an agricultural tenant is under the hypothec, is still open, but the inclination rather seems to be that it is. A sale of furniture retenta possessione, is not available against the hypothec, but, by 19 and 20 Vict., c. 60, is good against ordinary creditors. Furniture may be liferented; and it is often provided in marriage-contracts, that the wife shall have the furniture in liferent; but as, during the subsistence of the marriage, her claim is only personal, it cannot be preferable to that of her husband's creditors. The liferent of furniture gives the full use of it, salva substantia. Giving the liferent of the furniture of a house is only demonstrative, and the furniture may be carried thence. Where, however, as in Cochran (Aug. 7, 1775, M. 8280), it is combined with a mansion-house, it is held only as an accessory to the possession of the house. In Jurid. Styles, vol. ii., at p. 224, will be found the form of a contract, restricting the provision to the wife for household furniture, in case of children of a second marriage; and at p. 465, the forms of a provision to the widow of the fee of the household furniture, and of the liferent of the furniture. Future Debt; is a debt not yet due. Neither debts depending on the event of a law-suit, nor conditional debts, are considered as future debts; for the decree ascertaining the debt in the one case, and the purifying of the condition in the other, have each of them a retrospect, and render the debt effectual from the first. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 6, § 9; Bell's Com. i. 315; ii. 67, 144, 321, 409, 427, and 6th Ed. p. 1161, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 45, et seq. 2413, and authorities there cited; Thomson on Bills, 743. G

Gable. A mutual gable, although partly built on the adjoining subject, is the property of the party who builds it; and he is entitled to prevent the owner of the adjoining subject from making use of it, until he has paid the half of the expense of building it. The right of the builder is a real right. In the case of Brown v. Wallace, June 21, 1808, Mor. App. Personal and Real, No. 4, it was observed by the Court:—"The ground on which a mutual gable stands is common, mutual, and indivisible, and therefore there is no room for the maxim inædificatum cedit solo. The gable, in fact, is the property of the builder till paid for. Until then he has a right to prevent the adjoining proprietor from using it, or adjoining to it any building. The right to a mutual gable being a real right, a singular successor, in virtue of his right to the tenement, is entitled to claim a share of the expense of erecting the mutual gable from the adjoining proprietor, without any special mention of such claim in the conveyance of the tenement. In Hunter v. Luke, June 2, 1846, 8. D. 787, the LORD PRESIDENT observed:—"The right to claim one half of the mutual gable was a right which attached heritably to the subject conveyed. It did not require to be specially conveyed, or made the subject of an assignation. He who builds the wall is entitled to get back the half of the expense when his neighbour comes to build; but if he conveys away the house with the wall, this right passes with it." LORD MACKENZIE observed:—"It is the common understanding in all houses, that where parties get a portion of ground for building, and are bound to erect a mutual gable, and one of them builds it, he is entitled to prevent the other from touching it, till he has been paid his half. The right of exclusion is real, it has nothing to do with personality. This was held in the case of Wallace. His power of exclusion is very strong—for he can exclude from the whole of the other house. The right is somewhat anomalous, but it is very substantial." LORD FULLETON observed:—"The right to a gable wall is indivisible. When a party sells it what separate right can he retain to make the subject a separate disposal? Supposing no adjoining house built, what remains in the seller? Nothing. Then, if the next house is built, who is entitled to claim the price of the mutual gable except he who can give the right of it?" LORD JEFFREY observed:—"The proprietor of the house is the sole proprietor of the common gable until the party to divide it with him comes into existence. He is sole proprietor, with a kind of conventional servitude, provided in favour of the party who comes to build on the adjoining stance, to have right to one half, on paying the party who built it, or the party to whom he may have conveyed it. His whole right to the gable was necessarily conveyed by a conveyance of the tenement as it stood. The case of Law v. Monteith, Nov. 30, 1855, 18 D. 125, was to the same effect. In that case it was also held that the right to claim half of the expense of building a mutual gable was a right inherent in the subject, and existed as a ground of liability against the adjoining feuar from the time the mutual gable was erected; but that the term of payment did not arrive till the gable was appropriated. LORD PRESIDENT observed:—"The nature of the property in a mutual gable imports an obligation to pay upon the party who uses it. The presumption is, that no payment has been made for the use, till that use is taken, and there being no contract to the contrary here, the liability follows. The understanding of law is,—that if a party takes advantage of a mutual gable, he takes it on the condition of paying for it." LORD CURRIEHILL observed:—"I think it is quite a legal view, established by the decisions, that although the owner of an unbuilt stance must pay for a mutual gable, the term of payment does not arise till use is made of it by building on the adjoining ground."

A case of some nicety, however, may arise, where an adjoining feuar has paid one half of the expense of a mutual gable to the party who built it, but never appropriated the gable by building against it, and where the party who built the gable sells the house, of which the mutual gable is a part. In such a case, would the purchaser be entitled to demand from the adjoining feuar one half of the expense of the mutual gable when he came to appropriate it, leaving him to claim repetition of the sum formerly paid from the original builder of the gable? The claim of the purchaser would be founded on this—that he bought the house as it stood, and that the house being his property, he is entitled to prevent the adjoining feuar from making use of the gable, which is part of his house, until he is paid one half of the expense of erecting the gable. It would rather appear that the purchaser's claim is well founded. In the recent case of Earl of Moray v. Aytoun, Nov. 30, 1858, 21 D. 33, this point was raised, but not determined, the case having been decided by a majority of the Court on a separate ground. LORD COWAN, however, observed:—"The conveyance of the house carried to the disponsee right to the gable as an inherent part of the erected tenement, qualified by the condition that, as a mutual wall, it could be possessed, so soon as the adjoining house was erected, only as pro indiviso property. So long as the adjoining house was not built, the sole real right in and to the wall remained with the proprietor of the erected tenement. I do not see how this can be disputed. From this it seems to me a corollary, that when the adjoining feu was built on, and the right in the wall became pro indiviso, the party who till then had the sole and undoubted right was the party entitled to receive the payment which the other party was bound to make. But it is urged that the claim of the builder of the mutual gable having been satisfied by the payment to him by the adjoining feuar, he had no right in him which he could convey to the party to whom he subsequently sold the house. In my mind the conclusive answer is, that the right to payment of half the expense of the mutual gable was inherent in the right to the gable itself, and emerged whenever the adjoining feu was built on, and the wall became pro indiviso property."

Game. Under this title are comprehended wild beasts and fowls, which are the object of the chase or of hunting. Rabbits, however, are not game; and a tenant may kill them for the protection of his crop; Moncreiff v. Arnot, Feb. 13, 1828, 6 S. 530. The property of game is acquired by occupation alone; for while it is free, and in a state of nature, it can belong to none. But game originally wild may be deprived of their natural liberty, and thus become the property of the person who has brought them under his power. The right of hunting or of killing game is regulated by various laws (see Game Laws); but, independently of those laws, the property of game belongs to the person who shall first kill or apprehend it; and those laws, even although enforced by penalties, do not deprive the person of the property of the game, unless where such deprivation is part of the penalty annexed to the offence. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 10, and B. ii. tit. 6, § 6; and Tait's Justice of Peace, p. 131; Irvine on Game Laws.

Gamekeeper. If a person grants deputation as gamekeeper to a servant of his own, or of another, and if for such servant he has already been charged with the duty payable for servants, L.1, 7s. 6d. is the sum exigible for the gamekeeper's certificate; but if the master is not charged with the servant's duty, on account of such servant, L.4, 0s. 10d. is payable. The certificate becomes void on recall of the deputation; but it may be transferred by the master making a second deputation; in which case the clerk to the commissioners for the district is required to renew the former certificate for the remainder of the year, without any duty or fee, by indorsing on such certificate the name and place of abode of the person to whom the new deputation has been granted, and declaring the same to be a renewed certificate. Irvine on Game Laws.

Game Laws. The game laws are a system of positive regulations introduced and confirmed by several statutes, the provisions of which ascertain and establish certain qualifications to kill game, and impose penalties as well on such qualified persons, for irregularities in killing game, as on unqualified persons, for hunting or killing game at all. In Pollock, 5th June 1828, S. & D. vi. 913, the Bench recognised it as the law of Scotland, that the right of killing game, considered as a real right, is an incident of landed property. A proprietor may, and generally does, possess it on his own estate, or he may possess it on the estate of another person by virtue of a servitude, his own estate being the dominant tenement; but it never appears disjoined from the ownership of land, as a separate tenement constituted by infestment or tack. It is often exercised by delegation, but in that case it is merely a personal privilege. The old qualification was, the possession of a ploughgate of land within Scotland; and this still subsists; so that, one who is not himself qualified, may not kill game beyond the estate of a qualified proprietor who gives him authority. In addition to this qualification, any one intending to use means for taking or killing game, must previously pay a certain annual tax or licence duty. This duty is L.4, 0s. 10d. The taking out the licence does not supersede the necessity for the above qualification; and the possessor of both is not entitled to pursue game upon other ground than his own, or that of one who gives him authority. The most recent statutes upon the subject of the game laws, are 13 Geo. III., c. 54; 9 Geo. IV., c. 69; 2 and 3 Will. IV., c. 68; 7 and 8 Vict., c. 29; 11 and 12 Vict., c. 30. By the first of these it is enacted, that an unqualified person having in his possession at any season, without leave of a qualified individual, any hares, heathfowl, muirfowl, partridges, pheasants, quails, snipes, or ptarmigan, shall forfeit L.1 for a first, and L.2 for any subsequent offence. Whoever takes, kills, uses, or has in his possession, game-birds during close time, forfeits L.5 for each bird; but pheasants taken in lawful time, and kept afterwards in a mew or breeding-place, are excepted. For muirfowl or ptarmigan, the close time is from

10th December to 12th August; for heath-fowl, from 10th December to 20th August; for partridges, from 1st February to 1st September; for pheasants, from 1st February to 1st October. The buying and selling of game is now lawful, to the extent, that a qualified person may buy and sell, and an unqualified may buy from, and sell to a qualified person. A tenant cannot hinder his landlord, or those having his leave, from shooting or hunting over his farm, at least if they do not go through standing corn, or where injury may be anticipated; but he has a claim against such persons for actual damage done. Foxes may be pursued as vermin, even upon the grounds of others. See Foxes. By 1707, c. 13, which appears to be still unrepealed, although new regulations have been enacted, poachers forfeit, for each offence, L.20 Scots, besides their dogs, guns, and nets, to the apprehenders; but these cannot be seized brevis manu: they must be awarded by a judge. Trespasses by persons unlawfully pursuing game by day, are the subject of 2 and 3 Will. IV., c. 68. By day is meant the period from the beginning of the last hour before sunrise to the end of the first hour after sunset. The trespasser is liable in a penalty of not more than L.2 and expenses. There is no distinction made between inclosed and uninclosed ground. Blackening the face for the purpose of poaching, or being one of a company of five, so engaged, subjects the offender to a penalty of not above L.5 and expenses. The trespasser may be required to quit the lands, and to tell his Christian name, surname, and place of abode, by the person entitled to kill game on the land, or the occupier of the land, or a gamekeeper or servant of either, or any authorized person, under a penalty of L.5 and expenses. Any of the above parties may, on the offender's refusal to quit the land, or tell his name, apprehend and carry him before a justice of peace. An offender may be tried summarily before a single justice; and the owner or occupier of the lands, or the procurator-fiscal, may prosecute. These rules do not apply to any person pursuing with hounds any deer, hare, or fox started on other land where he was entitled to hunt or course. If the trespasser have game in his possession upon any land, any of the above authorised persons may demand the game from the trespasser, and on his not immediately delivering it up, may seize it for the use of the person entitled to the game there. The trespasser committing an assault on any one acting in compliance with this statute, subjects himself to an additional penalty of not more than L.5, on conviction before two justices. The Mutiny Acts contain a penalty of L.5 on each officer, and 20s. to be paid by the commanding officer for each soldier, who, without leave of the lord of the manor, shall take or destroy any hare, coney, pheasant, partridge, or pigeon, or any other sort of fowl, poultry, or fish, or game within the kingdom of Great Britain. These fines may be recovered for the use of the poor of the parish, by complaint before the justices of the peace; and the officer who shall not pay the fines found due, within two days from the time a demand is made by the constable, shall lose his commission. The acts 9 Geo. IV., c. 69, and 7 and 8 Vict., c. 29, relate to the prevention of persons going armed by night for the destruction of game. For the punishment of trespasses committed during the night, see Night-Poaching. The prosecutor as well as the defender may appeal to the Court of Justiciary, under the Act 13 Geo. III., c. 54; Gray v. Bonnar, Jan. 23, 1816, 19 F. C. App. 1.

The act 11 and 12 Vict., c. 30, enables all persons having at present a right to kill hares in Scotland, to do so by themselves, or by persons having written authority from them, without taking out a game certificate. Deer were considered inter regalia, and could be hunted only by the king, or those having a grant of forestry; and deer-stalkers, who were at one time punishable with death and the confiscation of moveables, are, by 1587, c. 59, ratified by 1597, c. 270, declared to incur the punishment of theft. Gaming and Betting. By 1621, c. 14, playing in taverns is prohibited under a pecuniary penalty for the first offence, and a loss of licence for the second. Playing in private houses is also forbidden if the master do not play; and if any one, in the course of twenty-four hours, win more than 100 merks, the surplus goes to the poor of the parish, a provision which, in 1775, was held not to be in desuetude. By 9 Anne, c. 14, all notes, bonds, and other securities for the payment of a gaming debt (including money lent at the time to play withal), were void, and mortgages of land made upon the same consideration, reverted to the heir of the mortgager. This nullity was, by the English law, considered a vitium reale, and was effectual, not only against the winner, but even against a bona fide onerous indorsee or assignee; and in Scotland, after some fluctuation, the same rule was adopted. But an indorser discounting the bill and obtaining money for it, could not plead such a defence. In England, an injunction might be obtained in Chancery to prevent bills for gaming debts being indorsed to third parties. Now, however, by 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 41, all statutes which declare bills, notes, and other securities made, drawn, given, or executed for gaming or usurious debts, null and void, are so far repealed, and it is provided that such documents shall be deemed and taken to have been made, drawn, &c., for an illegal consideration. The previous statutes are to be read as if they had so provided; and if any person who has made, drawn, or given such a note, bill, or other document, shall pay the contents, or any part thereof, to an indorsee, holder, or assignee, such money is to be deemed to have been paid to the person to whom the document was originally granted, and is to be deemed and taken to be a debt due by such last-named person to the person who shall have so paid the money, and is to be recoverable by action at law. The effect of this statute is to render such documents effectual to a bona fide onerous indorsee or holder. See the case of Don v. Richardson, June 16, 1858, 20 D. 1138, and opinion of English counsel therein.

By 9 Anne, c. 14, any one who has lost L.10 at a sitting may, within three months, sue for it and costs from the winner. The punishment of cheating at cards is forfeiture of five times the value of what was won, to any who shall sue for it; infamy, and the corporal punishment inflicted on wilful perjury. It has been matter of question, whether or not this, and several other English statutes regarding gaming, extend to Scotland. In England, bets or wagers were once, by common law, legal contracts; and they may still be recovered in a court of justice, unless made on unlawful games. But all wagers having a dangerous or immoral tendency, as wagers between two electors, on the result of an election, or wagers on the duration of a man's life, are pacta illicita. In Scotland, bets are considered sponsiones ludicrae; and no action can be maintained for the recovery of sums won in that way; but injuries resulting from such transactions may be the foundation of an action of damages. A person suspected, on good grounds, of gaining his livelihood by gaming, may be apprehended and brought before any two justices of the peace, when, unless he can show that gambling is not the principal means of his subsistence, he may be ordained to find security for his good behaviour for twelve months, and his bond of caution will be forfeited if he is found, during the twelve months, to have played for more than L.1 at a sitting. The General Police Act, 13 and 14 Vict., c. 33, § 209, provides, with respect to the punishment of chain-droppers and swindlers, that all persons of that or any similar description, "who shall be found in possession of implements or articles for practising games of hazard, or who shall exhibit such implements or articles, in order to induce or entice, or who shall induce or entice any person to play at any game of hazard, or who, by fraudulent act and device, shall cozen and cheat, or attempt to cozen and cheat, any person," may be convicted before the sheriff or magistrate, and punished with imprisonment not exceeding thirty days; and also shall, at the same time, be sentenced to restore the money or property obtained, and failing restoration, to further imprisonment not exceeding thirty days. 9 Anne, c. 14; 18 Geo. Thomson*, 10th June 1857, 19 D. 803, where it was decided that speculative transactions in stocks did not amount to gaming or wagering, either at common law or in the sense of the act 7 and 8 Vict., c. 109, § 18; and the case of Pollock, 5th Feb. 1848, 10 D. 646, where a multiplepoinding was held competent, at the instance of the stake-holder at a coursing meeting, to try which of two parties, the one being the owner and the other the namer of a dog which had won, was entitled to the prize. Garba Sagittarum: a sheaf of arrows, containing twenty-four. Skene, h. t.

Garbales Decimæ. Garba signifies a sheaf or handful of corn; and the term decimæ garbales means the tithes of corn. They were also termed decimæ rectoriæ, from rector, a parson; or parsonage tithes. These tithes extend by the practice of this country, to the tithe of wheat, barley, oats, pease, &c., and are exigible from all the lands in Scotland. In this respect they differ from the lesser or vicarage tithes, which are due only where they have been in use to be paid. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 13. See Teinds.

Gavelkind. In Kent, and certain other counties in England, lands and tenements are, by immemorial custom, held in gavelkind; that is to say, all the male issue inherit equally. Tomlins, h. t.; Bank. vol. ii. p. 317; Stair, B. iii. tit. 4, § 22.

Gazette. Royal proclamations, and the like, printed in the Gazette, are probative, without production of the proclamations. But gazettes are not evidence of private titles or interests, such as presentations or grants to individuals. As to the question, whether publication in the Gazette is a sufficient notice of dissolution of partnership, to free the partners from debts afterwards contracted in name of the company, it has been decided that it is not alone sufficient against such as were formerly in the habit of dealing with the house. With regard to parties dealing with the company for the first time, there is a difference between the English and Scotch law. In the former, it is doubted whether notice in the Gazette is sufficient, in all cases, even against strangers. While, in the latter, it is held that persons contracting for the first time with a company are bound to inquire into its existing condition, and notice, even in a provincial newspaper, is sufficient. But all reasonable means ought to be taken to publish the dissolution. Bell's Princ. § 383; Tait on Evidence, p. 50; Thomson on Bills, 249. Under the bankrupt act and some other statutes, certain notices required by the statutes are directed to be given by publication in the Gazette. within the county liable to serve as jurors. On a notice or requisition from the clerk of the court where the trial is to take place, the sheriff makes up a list of jurors from the general jury book, taken in the order in which they stand, containing, as nearly as possible, a third of special jurors, and if not, the deficiency is supplied from the Special Jury Book. 6 *Geo. Gift; is synonymous with donation; see Donation; but the term, in Scotch law, is sometimes applied in particular to royal gifts—e. g., gifts of non-entry, escheat, bastardy, forfeiture, ultimus hæres, all of which are royal grants proceeding on signatures, and passing the Privy Seal, Quarter Seal, or Great Seal, according as they convey rights of greater or less consequence. Thus, all gifts of casualties of superiority pass under the Privy Seal; gifts of bastardy, of forfeiture, or of ultimus hæres, pass the Quarter Seal, where the lands hold of a subject superior; but where they hold of the Crown, the gift passes the Great Seal. According to the present practice, the first step taken by a party soliciting such a gift is to present an application to the Lords of the Treasury, stating the circumstances under which he applies. A remit is then made by the Lords of the Treasury to the Officers of Exchequer in Scotland; and the applicant must give notice of his application in certain newspapers appointed by those officers. At the end of a twelvemonth the application is taken into consideration, and a gift made or refused according to the report of the Exchequer officers. If the gift be made, it is chargeable with a stamp-duty of L.30 (55 Geo. III., c. 184, schedule, voce Grant); in addition to which, there are certain fees exigible by the officers of Exchequer. Brown's Synop. h. t. See Donatary. Escheat. Exchequer. Bastardy.

Gilda; a society and company of merchants. In the old British laws, "gilder signifies the order of society of religious men, or of craftsmen." Skene, h. t.

Girth and Sanctuary; was an asylum given to murderers, where the murder was committed without any previous design, and in chaud melle, or heat of passion. Girtholl; girth, sanctuary, asylum. Skene, h. t.

Gleaning. It is said that, by the law of England, the poor may enter and glean upon another's ground after harvest; but in Scotland, it has been established by repeated decisions, that the poor possess no such right, at least while the sheaves remain on the ground, and that the farmer may exclude them. Hutch. Just. of Peace, ii. 47; Dunlop's Parish Law, 223.

Glebe; a glebe given and granted to kirkmen, ministers of the Evangel. Skene, h. t.

Glebe; the portion of land to which, generally speaking, every parish minister in Scotland is entitled, in addition to his stipend. From this rule are excepted the ministers in royal burghs proper, who cannot claim a glebe, unless there be a landward district annexed; and, even in that case, where there are two ministers, it is only the first who has the claim. In the case of disjunction of a parish also, the decree sometimes provides that the minister of the portion disjoined and erected into a new parish, shall not be entitled to a manse or glebe. By 5 Geo. IV., c. 72, provision is made for payment out of the public revenue of an allowance or additional stipend, in lieu of manse and glebe, to such ministers, whose stipends do not exceed L.200, as may not be entitled thereto. Where there are arable lands, the glebe must consist of four acres; where there is no arable land, the minister is entitled to sixteen souns of grass next adjacent to the church,—a soun of land being as much as will pasture ten sheep or one cow. But this matter may be affected by local custom. It was formerly the rule, that the glebe should be designed out of church-lands; but the act 1644, c. 31, authorized the designation of temporal lands, where there were no church-lands; and by 1649, c. 45, it was enacted, that where glebes were inconveniently distant from the manses, they might be changed, and new glebes designed within a quarter of a mile of the manse, "villages and incorporate aikers" being the only lands excepted. These acts having been passed during the Usurpation, were afterwards rescinded; but the act 1663, c. 21, though it does not specially renew their provisions, has been held in a general way to revive them; and it has always been assumed, that where there are no church-lands, temporal lands should be designed. The question, however, whether temporal lands can be designed even in a parish where there are church-lands, is not settled by any recent decision; but Sir John Connell (Parishes, 370) states, that, in the designation of arable glebes, the distinction between temporal and church-lands has of late been wholly disregarded. See Kingsbarns, ut infra, and also 10th June 1794, Bell's Cases, and Mor. 5140; Laidlaw, 2d Dec. 1800, Mor. App. voce Glebe, No. III. The reviving statute, 1663, continues to exempt "incorporate acres in village or town, where the heritor hath houses and gardens, he always giving other lands nearest the kirk." It has been held that lands are liable to be designed for a glebe as church-lands, although the superiority of them only had belonged to the church for a long period before the Reformation; and when, at the time of designing a glebe, there are lands in a parish held of the Crown in right of a priory, others held by the Crown in right of a bishop, and others held by a university in right of a priory, the first are primarily liable, the bishop's lands in the second place, and the others only ultimo loco, whatever may have been the description of the lands at the Reformation, or at the date of the act 1593; Minister of Kingsbarns, 11th June 1799, Mor.

App. voce Glebe, No. 11. In this question, temple lands—i.e., lands which formerly belonged to the knights-templars—are not held to be church lands; Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, § 22. The glebe must be taken as near the manse, and as commodious for the minister as possible,—a provision intended for the benefit of the heritors as well as of the minister, so that the latter is not entitled to pick and choose remote lands merely on account of the superiority of the soil. Where there is no manse, vicinity to the church is taken as the criterion. Where a glebe has once been designed, and possessed as such, a new designation will not be allowed on the ground of inconvenience of situation, inferior quality of soil, or deficiency in extent. In this last case, however, as much may be designed as will make up the deficiency. By the rescinded statute, 1644, c. 31, it was provided, that where a glebe has become unprofitable by inundation or other extraordinary accident, a new one might be designed. This provision has not been specially revived, but it is believed that such a course would be adopted were the destruction complete. The heritor whose lands are designed as a glebe, has recourse against the other heritors of the parish. But his claim does not form a debitum fundi; it lies against the heritors for the time only, and their heirs. The presbytery possess the power of designing a glebe, and giving warrant for letters charging the heritor from whose property the glebe is designed, to carry the designation of the presbytery into execution. After designation by the presbytery, if the possessors of the lands, designed for manse or glebe, do not yield possession to the minister, he may, on producing the designation at the Bill-Chamber, obtain warrant for letters of horning to charge the possessors to remove; and disobedience to this charge may be followed by caption; 1572, c. 48; Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, § 120. By 1572, c. 48, it is enacted, that a glebe cannot be alienated by the incumbent. But as the act limits the prohibition to such alienations as may be detrimental to the incumbent's successor, it has been doubted whether the incumbent might not feu. Cases have occurred, however, in which the Court have refused to sanction feus, even where the feuduty offered was quadruple of the rent in tillage. Upon the transportation of a church to a new site, the Court have authorized a sale or excambion of the glebe. Excambions of glebes must be sanctioned by the presbytery. The minerals of a glebe are worked at sight of the heritors and presbytery, and the proceeds are placed under their management for behoof of the incumbent for the time. Trees growing on the glebe have been thought to belong to the minister; Heritors of Keith and Humble, Feb. 16, 1791. See, on the subject of this article, *Ersk. God, Offence Against. Although every crime is an offence against God, the offence to which this expression is specially applied in criminal law, is that of blasphemy. This crime is described in the act 1661, c. 21, which distinguishes between railing at and cursing God, and denying God, or any of the persons of the blessed Trinity. The former of those offences, or that of railing at and cursing God, is declared punishable with death. The latter, or the denying of God, is punishable with death, only where the criminal obstinately continues therein; and his obstinacy is, by the act 1695, c. 11, explained to be his being for the third time convicted of this crime. *Ersk. Gold Mines. By an unprinted act (1592), gold mines may be demanded in feu from the Crown, by the proprietor of the ground in which the mines are, on payment of one-tenth part of the produce, not deducting charges. And should mines be found and not wrought, by the proprietor of the ground, the Sovereign is then at liberty to work them or set them in feu to others. *Ersk. Good Friday; the Friday in holy or passion week, observed by the Christian Church (with certain exceptions, including Presbyterians) as a fast. Goods in Communion; are the moveable subjects belonging in common to husband and wife. They comprehend all the moveable property belonging to either of the parties, except such effects as have been given to the wife, expressly excluding the jus mariti, and the wife's paraphernalia, as to which there is an implied exclusion of the jus mariti. A personal bond, bearing interest, does not fall under this description of goods; 1661, c. 32. The husband, during the subsistence of the marriage, has the uncontrolled administration of the goods in communion. Formerly if the marriage was dissolved within year and day without a living child, the common stock returned to the husband and wife, or their representatives, in the proportions in which it was contributed. This is now altered by the Act 18 and 19 Vict., c. 23, § 7 (1855), and the rights of the spouses are the same as if the marriage had subsisted for year and day.

On the dissolution of the marriage by the death of the wife, the goods in communion where there was no child, formerly suffered division into two equal parts, one of which was at the wife's disposal, or failing her disposal of it, it went to her next of kin, and the other half belonged to the husband. In the case where there were children, and the marriage was dissolved by the predecease of the wife, one-third part of the goods in communion went to her children, by the last or any preceding marriage, as her next of kin, and the other two-thirds remained with the father, legitim being a claim which does not arise until his death. The children, if not under age, were entitled to their mother's share immediately on the dissolution of the marriage, but as to such of the children of the last marriage as were minors, their father, as their administrator, had the management of their proportion of their mother's share of the goods in communion. The law, however, is now altered by the Act 18 and 19 Vict., c. 23, § 6, which enacts that the representatives of a wife who predeceases her husband, shall have no right to any share of the goods in communion, and that no bequest by her shall affect these goods.

When the marriage is dissolved by the predecease of the husband, and there are no children, the goods in communion suffer a bipartite division; one division, termed the jus relictæ, going to the wife; and the other, called the dead's part, going to the legatees or the executors of the husband. When there are children, and the husband predeceases, a tripartite division takes place. One division goes to the wife, another to the children, and the third also to the children as their father's executors, or to his legatees, in the event of his leaving a settlement. See the Act 18 and 19 Vict., c. 23 (1855). See Legitim. Jus Relictæ. Marriage. Confirmation. Executor.

Goodwill; the custom of any trade or business. It may be the subject of contract. In England the specific performance of an agreement to sell the goodwill of a trade has been decreed; but it has been doubted whether, when a goodwill forms the principal part of a contract, performance will be decreed. Bell's Princ. § 91; Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Government. By this term is meant the constitution of the country, as vested in the Sovereign and Parliament. Its great powers are the legislative and the executive—the former making the laws which the people are to obey, and by which their rights and privileges are to be regulated—the latter enforcing those laws, making peace, or declaring war, and performing the other great executive functions of the state. The legislative power of the British Government is placed in the Sovereign and the three estates of Parliament—viz., the lords spiritual, the lords temporal, and the representatives of the people in the Commons House of Parliament. Grandfather. Is the second in the line of ascendants; and, where the father fails, he is bound to support his indigent grandchildren; but he is not bound to support his grandchildren by his daughter, unless the father and paternal grandfather of such children be unable; in which case the burden will fall on the maternal grandfather. Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 56; More's Notes to Stair, p. xxix. See also Ascendants. Executors. Alimant. Succession.

Grandchildren; have a claim for alimant while they are unable to maintain themselves, and where their father is unable to alimant them, against their paternal grandfather; and, where he also is unable, against their maternal grandfather, in the manner explained in the preceding article. Ersk. ibid.

Grand Jury; in England, the jury of twenty-four good and lawful men, which finds bills of indictment before justices of peace, and gaol-delivery, or of Oyer and Terminer, &c. Their duty is only to hear witnesses for the Crown; and to find a bill on probable evidence; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. There is no such institution in Scotland, the duties of the grand jury being there discharged by the Lord Advocate, except in cases of treason, when, the English and Scotch treason laws being the same, a true bill must be found precisely as in the English practice. See Oyer and Terminer. Treason. Advocate, Lord. Criminal Prosecution. Ignoramus. 4 Slip. Com. 422.

Grant. Technically speaking, the term grant is not applied to a deed by which either lands or moveables are conveyed. Our deeds of conveyance are charters, by which lands are originally conveyed—or charters by progress, by which the superior continues the right to the heirs or creditors of the vassal, or the purchasers from him—or dispositions, by which the vassal himself transfers his property to those to whom he has occasion to convey it. The term disposition is used even in the conveyance of moveables, where writing is required. But the term grant, though not employed to denote the deed of conveyance, is used in original rights of land, and in gratuitous conveyances, as a term of conveyance. Thus, in granting a feu-right, the superior uses the expressions, I GIVE, GRANT, AND DISPONE. In a settlement, the grantor employs the same words; whereas, in a sale, the expressions are, I SELL, ALIENATE, AND DISPONE. These are words of style; and the distinction between give, grant, and dispoise, and sell, alienate, and dispoise, has been thought to mark the difference between onerous and gratuitous deeds. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 22; Stair, B. ii. tit. 7, § 6; Bank. vol. ii. pp. 259, 39; Bell's Com. i. 22, et seq., also Ad-denda, No. ii. v.; Jurid. Styles, 4th edit. vol. i. p. 1. See Titles to Land.

Grant: in English law, a conveyance in writing of incorporeal things which cannot pass by word only, as of reversions, advowsons in gross, tithes, rents, services, common in gross, &c. The term is, in a wider acceptation, used for a gift of whatever kind. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Deed Poll.

Grass. Grass, whether natural or industrial, is considered a pertinent of the soil, and passes to purchasers. In questions between heir and executor, natural grass is held to be heritable, and even when it has been sown down with corn, the executor is not entitled to the crop of hay produced in the succeeding year, but merely to the first year's pasturage after cutting down the white crop. But, it would appear that, in questions as to a way-going crop, hay sown in a penult year of the lease, and yielding the first crop in the year of removal, is to be classed along with the crops of arable land; Keith, 3d Dec. 1825, 4 S. & D. 267. In grass farms, the landlord's hypothec extends over the grass-mail, if the fields are let out to pasture, but not over the cattle of others grazing there; nor over grass cut for sale. The doctrine of tacit relocation has no application to grass fields let from year to year, and the tenant is not entitled, without a new bargain, to possess for a day after the stipulated term of removal has arrived. Bell's Com. ii. pp. 29, 104; Bell's Princ. § 1233; Illust. § 1262; Bell on Leases, 4th edit. vol. i. p. 398.

Grass, of Ministers. By the act 1663, c. 21, the minister of a parish has right (over and above his glebe), to grass for a horse and two cows. This grass should be taken out of the nearest church lands; and, where there are no church-lands in the parish, it has been made a question whether the grass can be demanded. But where the church-lands are either at a distance, or not grass-lands, the minister is entitled to L.20 Scots as an equivalent; and this equivalent is paid to him by the heritor of the nearest church-lands, who has his recourse for proportional relief against the heritors of the other church-lands in the parish. Grass may be designed, although the glebe contains more than four arable acres or sixteen souns of pasture. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 62; More's Notes to Stair, p. clxxiii.; Bell's Princ. § 1172; Illust. ib.; Hill's Church Prac. 143; Dunlop's Parish Law, pp. 109, 89. See Glebe.

Grassum; an anticipation of rent in a gross or slump sum, or a fine paid in consideration of a lease for a term of years. In questions with singular successors there is no limitation of the power to take grassums, only the rent must not be thereby diminished so as to be altogether elusory. The same rule applies in the case of lands under entail, when there is no prohibition to alienate, or against diminution of the rental. When, however, there is a prohibition to alienate, the general rule seems to be, that the heir in possession must administer the estate secundum bonum et æquum, taking no more of the annually accruing rents and profits than he leaves to descend to his successors. Hence, grassums, as being, in effect, anticipations of the future rents, to the prejudice of succeeding heirs, are held to be struck at by a prohibition against alienation. If there be a prohibition to alienate, but with an express power to grant leases on condition of not diminishing the rental, the rental under the last lease is implied, and it has been thought that a grassum may be taken. But a prohibition to let leases below the just rent for the time constitutes a bar to the taking of grassums. Stair, B. iv. tit. 9, § 20; More's Notes, clxxv.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 29, note by Ivory; Bell's Princ. § 1228, 1752; Bell's Com. i. 72; Bank. vol. ii. p. 104; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant.

It may be doubted, if in any case the heir in possession is entitled to take a grassum. It is rather thought that the heir in possession is bound to act fairly in regard to the substitute heir, and not to let at the minimum rent allowed by the entail, where that rent is far below the true value of the land, and where the difference between the real value and the rent stipulated is paid in the form of a grassum. The case of Elgin v. Wellwood, 13th June 1821, 2 Shaw, App. 44, is thought to be an authority for an opposite view, but it may be questioned whether the point was properly adjudicated upon in that case as both parties to that action were interested in having the lease sustained. Bell on Leases, i. 126, 141, 229, 290; Ross's Lect. ii. 494; Queensberry Leases, Bligh App. Cases, i. 447. See Tailzie. Diminution of Rental.

Gratuitous Cause. Where a deed is granted from favour, or as a gift or donation to the receiver, it is said to be granted gratuitously. See Consideration. Donation.

Gratuitous Deed. A gratuitous deed is one which has been granted without any value being given for it; and although a person may dispose of his own property as he pleases, yet the law does not permit a person to dispose of his property to the prejudice of his creditors, or of those to whom he is under legal obligations, or, in certain cases, even to the prejudice of his own rights. In regard to donations, by which the rights of creditors may be affected, the statute 1621, c. 18, has provided, that all alienations granted after the contracting of lawful debts, in favour of conjunct or confident persons, without true, just, and necessary causes, shall be void and null. But whatever may be inferred from the words of the statute, practice has so explained them, that a donation, even to the nearest relation, is not voidable at the instance of a prior creditor, provided the grantor was solvent at the time of making the donation, though he should afterwards have failed, and been unable to pay his debts. In like manner, where a gratuitous right in favour of a conjunct and confident person, has been transferred by him, for value, to a third party, who is ignorant of the fraud, it will not be challengeable in the person of the bona fide onerous holder. See Conjunct and Confident. Collusion. Bankrupt.

Where the deed is gratuitous, and constitutes an obligation to be afterwards implemented, if the granter shall, before implement, fall into poverty, he may, at least where the deed is in favour of children or grandchildren, retain sufficient for his own subsistence. But our law does not seem in this particular to follow the Roman law, by extending the rule to cases where the donation is made to strangers. See Beneficium Competentiæ. Donation. The warrandice of gratuitous deeds extends only to future donations; and merely warrants the right as it stands to the donee, to be free of farther or greater burdens than those with which it is charged at the time of making the donation. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 25; Bell's Com. i. 92, 314; ii. 182, 185, 191, 197; Bell's Princ. §§ 64 and 2410; Illust. § 64; Shaw's Digest, p. 314, § 71; Ross's Lect. ii. 494; Jurid. Styles, 4th edit. vol. i. p. 109.

A simple substitution of an heir was always defeasible by a gratuitous deed; but formerly where a person held an estate under a deed which prohibited him from alienating the lands, or burdening them with debt, or altering the order of succession, although such deed did not amount to a strict entail under the Act 1685, yet he could not by a gratuitous deed affect the rights of the heirs who were entitled to reduce such gratuitous deed. This, however, is not now the law, for, by the act 11 and 12 Vict., c. 36, § 43 (1848), no entail is effectual which does not contain the three cardinal prohibitions against altering the order of succession, contracting debts and sales, duly fenced with irritant and resolute clauses. By the same act, § 39, irritant and resolute clauses are implied in the warrant to record the entail in the register of entails; and, by the Titles to Land Act, § 18 (1858), the three cardinal prohibitions against alienation, contracting debt, and altering the order of succession, are implied in such warrant of registration.

Grave-Stones. The heritors have the right to grant or refuse permission to place tombstones over the graves in the parish church-yard, and to determine the manner in which they shall be placed, as upright or flat; and it is thought, that if necessary, the heritors may cause such grave-stones to be removed. Dunlop's Parochial Law, p. 2. But this Great Seal not being appropriate for those private grants which had formerly passed the Great Seal of Scotland, by Article 24 of the treaty of Union, a Great Seal, for the purpose of sealing private grants in Scotland, was ordered to be made, and declared to have the same effect with the ancient Great Seal of Scotland. *Ersk. Ground-Annual; a kind of estate, intermediate between that of the superior and that of the vassal, of the nature of a perpetual annuity. It is of two kinds; the one arising out of church property, as affected by the Reformation; the other originating in the great demand in modern times for building-ground in towns. At the Reformation, the church property was parcelled out in lordships erected by the Crown; and to restrain such erections for the future, several acts of annexation were passed. See Annexation. In the beginning of the seventeenth century, the Lords of Erection resigned their superiorities to the Crown, with the exception of the feu-duties, which the Crown had power to redeem on payment of a certain consideration. The consideration never having been paid, the power of redemption was renounced, and the feu-duty thus perpetually payable to the successor of a Lord of Erection is called a ground-annual. It has been usually conveyed by resignation and infeftment only. The other kind of ground-annual has originated thus: Where sub-feus are prohibited, those who speculate in building-ground, by taking land in feu, with the intention of again disposing of small portions to builders, stipulate for an annual rent from the builder, rather than a price payable at once. This is accomplished by the creation of a ground-annual. The disposition is granted to be held public, in compliance with the condition of the feu-charter; but the subject is charged with an annual payment to the disposer, and his heirs and assignees; and either a burden or annuity is reserved, which is declared a real burden; or a bond and disposition, in security of the annuity, is granted by the purchaser, on which infeftment is taken. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 52; Bell's Com. i. 30, Addenda III.; Bell's Princ. § 884; Illust. ib.; Ross's Lect. ii. 326, 392; Shaw's Digest, 530; Skene, voce Annual. See Annual. Top-annual.

When the original disponee to the lands over which a ground-annual is constituted, conveys the lands to another, he is not released from payment of the ground-annual, but continues liable to the creditor in the ground-annual. Small v. Miller, Feb. 3, 1849, 11 D. 495; as reversed in the House of Lords, 17th March, 1853, 1 Macqueen, 345.

Grounds and Warrants. In an action of reduction, the grounds of debt on which a decree proceeds may be called for, even after the lapse of the long prescription. The warrants of a decree, whether extant or not, cannot be called for after twenty years; but within that time, it has been held that the defender must produce them, although in publica custodia. Among warrants are included the various steps of process which remain in the clerk's hands, and also letters of general and special charge. Stair, B. iv. tit. 20, § 21; More, h. t.; Brown's Synop. h. t.; Shand's Prac. 635, 719.

Growing Corn; is poindable, but the poinding is not completed till the corn is cut down and measured. The landlord, in virtue of his hypothec, has a preference over creditors poinding growing corn. A symbolical delivery of growing corn has been held good to exclude creditors. Bell's Com. i. 176; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, p. 815; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 6, § 22; Ross's Lect. i. 441, 481. See Grana crescentia.

Guarantee, Mercantile. A guarantee is an obligation, formerly in writing, but which might be proved by parole, with rei interventus, by which one engages himself for another in some particular transaction, or prospectively in a course of dealing. It is either continuous or limited. A guarantee is continuous if one engages for another to a certain amount in any dealing. It is limited when restricted to a particular transaction, person, or time. Such engagements and their limitations are strictissimi juris. There is some difficulty in distinguishing between a guarantee and a mere letter of recommendation. When a recommendation is not spontaneous, but given in reply to inquiries, the presumption is against its being a guarantee, unless the giver is aware that the person so recommended is unworthy of credit, in which case he is liable for the loss which he has fraudulently occasioned by his recommendation. A recommendation, even when spontaneously given, is not held to be a guarantee, unless it refers to a particular transaction, and contains assurance of safety in entering into it. Brodie's Supp. to Stair, 921, et seq.; *Ersk. By the "Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856," 19 and 20 Vict., c. 60, § 6, it is enacted, that from the passing of the act, "all guarantees, securities, or cautionary obligations made or granted by any person for any other person, and all representations and assurances as to the character, conduct, credit, ability, trade, or dealings, of any person made or granted to the effect, or for the purpose of enabling such person to obtain credit, &c., "shall be in writing, and shall be subscribed by the person undertaking such guarantee," &c.; "or by some person duly authorized by him or them, otherwise the same shall have no effect." By § 7, guarantees to or for a company or firm, are to cease with a change in the partners or firm. By § 5, sellers of goods, if ignorant of any defect at the time of the sale, are not to be held to have warranted their quality or sufficiency unless they shall have given an express warranty, or unless the goods shall have been sold for a specified and particular purpose. The term "goods," is held to apply to animals; Young v. Giffen, 4th Dec. 1858, 21 D. 87. See Cautionary.

H

Habeas Corpus Act. In England, the act 31 Car. II., c. 2, which generally goes under the name of the Habeas Corpus Act, and which provides a remedy for illegal imprisonment, has been considered, politically, of such importance as to be reckoned a second Magna Charta. There are various writs of habeas corpus. Thus, the habeas corpus ad respondendum, is issued when a man has a cause of action against one who is confined by the process of some inferior court, in order to remove the prisoner, and charge him with this new action in the court above; the writ ad satisfaciendum, when the plaintiff is desirous to bring up a prisoner who has had judgment pronounced against him, to some superior court, to charge him with the process of execution; the writs ad prosequendum, testificandum, deliberandum, when it is necessary to remove a prisoner in order to prosecute or bear testimony in any court, or to be tried in the proper jurisdiction in which the fact was committed; the writ ad faciendum et recipiendum, when a person is sued in some inferior jurisdiction, and is desirous to remove the action into the superior court. But the writ which proves the efficacious safeguard of the liberty of the subject, is that of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, directed to the person detaining another, and commanding him to produce the body of the prisoner, with a specification of the day and cause of his caption and detention, ad faciendum, subjiciendum, et recipiendum; to do, submit to, and receive, whatever the judge or court awarding such writs shall adjudge. By the common law, this, which is a high prerogative writ, issues out of the Court of Queen's Bench, both in term time and during the vacation, by a fiat from the Chief-Justice or any other of the judges, and runs into all parts of the British dominions except Scotland. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. The Scotch act corresponding to the English habeas corpus act, is 1701, c. 6. See Wrongous Imprisonment.

Habit and Repute. This expression is applied, in the law of Scotland, to whatever is held and reputed, or generally received as matter of fact. The legal effect of habit and repute is sometimes very serious. Thus, marriage may be constituted by habit and repute; where the parties cohabit, and are at the same time held and reputed as man and wife; 1503, c. 77; Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 6. So also, habit and repute is an aggravation of a special act of theft, which, by the law of Scotland, may have the effect of rendering the offence a capital felony, if the person committing it be habit and repute a thief—i. e., one who notoriously makes or helps his livelihood by thieving. It would appear, that in order to constitute habit and repute, in criminal law, the panel must have borne the character for at least six months. The course of time necessary to establish the character of habit and repute a thief, is not interrupted by imprisonment, where the party has previously acquired that character. Walkinshaw, 1844, 2 Br. 190; Alison's Princ. 296; Steele, 123; Hume, i. 90; Stair, B. iii. tit. 3, § 35; B. iv. tit. 45, § 4; Bank. vol. i. p. 661; vol. ii. p. 502, 327, 629; Bell's Princ. § 1519. See also Execution, Messenger.

Habitation; in the Roman law, was a personal servitude, or usufruct of a house, limited to the extent, that it could be used in no other way than as a dwelling-house. This right could be conveyed by sale, and the house might be let. Stair, B. ii. tit. 6, § 1; Bank. i. 657.

Hackney Coachmen: are not responsible under the edict Nautæ, caupones, unless when employed as carriers and paid for carriage. Hackney coachmen, in Edinburgh, cannot ply without a licence from the magistrates, who are likewise empowered to pass such regulations as they think fit for ascertaining their fares, &c.; and they are amenable to the magistrates in case of overcharges or other misconduct. Bell's Princ. § 236; Illust. ib.; Bell's Com. i. 468; Thomson's Police Acts, p. 109; 11 and 12 Vict., c. 113, § 232, et seq.; 13 and 14 Vict., c. 33, § 105, et seq.

Hæreditas Jacens. An estate is said to be in hæreditate jacente, when, after the ancestor's death, no title to it has been made up in the person of his heir. When a creditor of the ancestor desired to attach such an estate, in payment or in security of his debt, he, formerly, charged the heir to enter first in general, and then in special, in the manner explained under the article Charge. If the heir entered, of course he lay under the same obligation to pay the debt that his ancestor did. If he failed to appear and to renounce in answer to the charge, or in the relative action, the creditor was entitled to decree and execution against his person and estate, as if he had been actually served and entered heir. But, if the heir answered the general charge to enter, by renouncing the succession, he could not properly be charged to enter in special to the estate which he renounced; neither could his person nor his own estate be taken in execution for the debt of the ancestor whose succession he had so renounced. The creditor, however, was allowed to summon the heir pro forma in an action for proving the debt due by the defunct, in which action decree was obtained, not against the heir, who was assuaged in respect of his renunciation, but against the hereditas jacens of the deceased, which was thereby subjected to the creditors' diligence. The decree in this action was called a decree cognitionis causa. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 12, et seq., and § 47, et seq.; Bell's Com. i. 713, et seq. See also Charge. Adjudication. Cognitionis Causa. Beneficium Inventarii.

By 10 and 11 Vict., c. 48, § 16 (1847), general and special, and general special charges are abolished, and the citation on, and execution of, a summons of constitution is made equivalent to a general charge; and a citation on, and execution of, an action of adjudication, following on a decree of constitution, is made equivalent to a special or a general special charge, as the circumstances of the case may require. By the Titles to Land Act, 21 and 22 Vict., c. 76, § 27 (1858), it is not necessary to raise a separate summons of constitution, and a separate summons of adjudication, against an apparent heir, on account of his ancestor's debt or obligation, for the purpose of attaching the ancestor's heritable estate, but both actions may be combined in one summons, and the decree of adjudication has the legal operation and effect of a conveyance from the ancestor of the lands adjudged in favour of the adjudger. See Titles to Land.

Haimhaldare; in old law language, to repeat and seek restitution of proper goods and gear, and bring the same home again. Skene, h. t.

Haimsuken; "is when any person violently, without licence, and contrair the King's peace, enters within a man's house, or seeks him at the same, or assails his house." Skene, h. t.

Half-Blood. The connexion by half-blood is of two kinds, consanguinean and uterine. Consanguinean relations are such as are descended from the same father, but not from the same mother. Uterine relations are such as are descended from the same mother, but not from the same father. In collateral succession, the half-blood consanguinean succeeds after the full blood—e. g., if a man die, leaving a son and daughter by his first marriage, and a son by a second marriage; and if the son of the first marriage take up the succession and die without issue, being survived by his full sister and half-brother consanguinean, his sister by the full-blood will succeed as her brother's heir-at-law. Observe, however, that if the eldest son of the first marriage had predeceased his father, the son of the second marriage would have succeeded as his father's heir-at-law, to the exclusion of the daughter of the first marriage. The half-blood uterine was, formerly, excluded; neither was there any relationship recognised between the consanguinean and the uterine, or succession ab intestato of the one to the other. In English law, half-blood is no impediment to descents of fee-simple lands of the Crown, or to dignities, or to descent of estates-tail; but in other cases it is an impediment. Administration, in England, is grantable to the half-blood of the deceased, as well as to the whole blood; and half-blood comes in for a share of an intestate's personal estate, equally with the whole blood, being next of kin, in equal degree. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 8; Bell's Princ. § 1652, 1665, and authorities there cited; Illust. § 1664; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Heir. Succession. Uterine.

By the Act 18 and 19 Vict., c. 23, 1855, brothers and sisters uterine succeed to one-half of an intestate moveable estate on the failure of the father and mother, and the brothers and sisters german, and their issue.

Half-Pay. As a condition of obtaining the benefit of the process of cessio bonorum, half-pay officers who have an income more than sufficient for their bare subsistence, must assign part of their half-pay to their creditors. Shand's Prac. p. 819. See Cessio Bonorum.

Hamesucken; is the offence of feloniously beating or assaulting a person in his own house or dwelling-place. In this sense, the house must be the place where the person resides. A shop, whether adjoining to the house or not, is not reckoned a man's house. Hamesucken is not committed anywhere but within the dwelling-house; an assault, therefore, made in the precincts, or in the courtyard or offices, is not hamesucken. A hired apartment in a lodging-house will be held, quoad hoc, to constitute a man's house, even although the assault be committed by the owner of the house; but an inn, or a friend's house, at which a person occasionally resides, is not in this sense a man's house. Neither is a playhouse, to this effect, accounted the dwelling-place of an actor. See Comedian. A ship, which is the proper residence of the master or crew, is considered as a dwelling-place. Aiming a blow, or offering to strike, though no blow be actually given, has been held to infer the crime of hamesucken. The premeditated design of committing personal violence in the house, is essential to the crime; and no outrage will amount to it which a person suffers in his own house, in consequence of a quarrel taken up at the moment. In cases of inferior atrocity, hamesucken is punished arbitrarily; but when the injury is of an aggravated nature, the punishment is death. Hume, i. 312; Alison's Princ. 199; Steele, 108.

Hanaper Office; an office in the Court of Chancery of England. Writs relating to the subject were formerly kept in a hamper, those relating to the Crown in a little bag, and hence the respective offices still continue to be called the Hanaper and the Petty-bag office. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Handwriting. The strongest direct proof of a certain individual having executed a writing, is his own acknowledgment, where he is a competent witness; or, where he is disqualified, the evidence of others who saw the writing executed. The best indirect evidence is that of persons who are acquainted with the handwriting of the individual, and declare their belief that the writing is his. Proof of this kind, when the knowledge of the party's handwriting is acquired by correspondence only, though it may in certain cases be more satisfactory than when the knowledge is acquired by having seen him write, is not per se sufficient, in criminal cases. The weakest proof of all is the comparison of the writing with the acknowledged genuine writing of the party. For this purpose, the writings are sometimes submitted to those who are to judge of the evidence; sometimes to engravers and others skilled in writing; but this latter mode is now rather discountenanced, though still competent. Comparatio litterarum is not of itself sufficient even in criminal cases. Dickson on Evidence, pp. 399, 473; Macfarlane's Jury Practice, p. 225. See Evidence. Comparatio Litterarum. Holograph Writings.

Harbours. See Ports and Harbours.

Hares. By 1707, c. 13, the shooting of hares was prohibited under a penalty of L.20 Scots, toties quoties; but this penalty seems never to have been exacted of any but unqualified persons, although the act is equally levelled at qualified persons. The act was repealed by Geo. III., c. 94, and there is now no distinction between hares and other game as to the right of shooting. The act 11 and 12 Vict., c. 31, enables all persons having a right to kill hares in Scotland to do so either themselves or by persons authorized by them, without taking out a game certificate. Irvine on the Game Laws; Ness's Game Laws, 18, 96; Hutch. Justice of Peace, ii. 563. See Game Laws.

Hasp and Staple; is the form of entering an heir in a burghage subject. The same practice prevails in some burghs of regality, and appears to be connected with very ancient forms. The bailie, the town-clerk, and the claimant, appear on the premises, when the claimant alleges his title, and proves it by witnesses; on which the bailie declares him to be heir, and makes him take hold of the hasp and staple of the door as a symbol of possession, and then enter the house and bolt himself in. On his coming out, the transaction is noted and registered. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 19, and B. iii. tit. 5, § 27; Bank. vol. ii. p. 354; Bell's Princ. § 845; Sandford on Heritable Succession, vol. ii. p. 7. See Cognition and Sasine. Burghage-Holding.

A bill is now in parliament to simplify the forms of titles to lands held under burghage tenure, similar to the one passed in regard to titles to other lands. See Titles to Land.

Hat-Money; or primage; is a small sum of money paid along with the freight, to the master of a ship for his care. It is entirely regulated by usage. Bell's Com. i. 567; Bell's Princ. § 420; Brodie's Supp. to Stair, 1001.

Haver; the holder of a deed or writing, called on to produce it judicially, in modus probationis, or for inspection, in the course of a process. The form of process in use for the purpose of compelling production is an application for letters of incident diligence. See Incident Diligence. The person cited as a haver, must either exhibit, upon oath, the writing called for, or depone that he has it not, and has not had it since he was cited as a haver, and that he has not fraudulently put it away, and has no knowledge or suspicion where it is. The user of the diligence, if dissatisfied with the haver's deposition in general terms, may, under the act of Sederunt, 22d Feb. 1688, put special and pertinent interrogatories, which the haver is bound to answer. If the writing be in the haver's possession, he is bound to produce it, whether, in his opinion, it be pertinent to the cause or not; but, if he have it not, no questions can competently be put in modus probationis, under an incident diligence, as to the haver's recollection of the contents or import of the writing; far less is it competent to put any question which may bring out an answer connected with the merits of the cause. The production of the writing called for, and, failing that, the means of recovering it, or tracing it into the hands of others, are the only legitimate purposes of an incident diligence against havers. A diligence of this kind may be used not only against third parties, but also against the principal defender in the cause, who may be thus compelled to exhibit such writings as may verify the pursuer's plea—the pursuer being under a reciprocal obligation, when required, to produce all writings in his hands called for by the defender in support of his defence. In either case, however, the writing which the party requires from his adversary must be particularly specified and described; for no party is bound to make an unreserved production of all the writings in his possession, on a general requisition by the opposite party. The maxim, Nemo tenetur edere instrumenta contra se, applies to such a case, and is at the same time qualified by the general doctrine above stated. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 52; Stair, B. iv. tit. 33, § 2, and tit. 41, § 5, et seq.; More's Notes, p. cccxv.; Bank. B. iv. tit. 24, § 59; Tait on Ev., p. 175, 178-181. Shand's Prac. 370, et seq.; Dickson on Ev. 671, 680, 943; 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 25. Documents may also be recovered by parties having right thereto by an action of exhibition and delivery against the haver. See Exhibition and Exhibition ad probandum. See also Diligence. Commission. Incident Diligence.

For compelling the attendance of havers and witnesses in England and Ireland, see the acts 6 and 7 Vict., c. 82 (1843), and 17 and 18 Vict., c. 34 (1854).

Hawbert; a term, in old law language, for the tenure of ward and relief, so called, quasi "feodum hauberticum," or "feodum loriatum," because it was given upon condition that the vassal, possessor thereof, should come to the host and army with jack and arms. Skene, h. t.

Hawks. In England, the stealing of a hawk, or concealing it after proclamation made by the sheriff, was, by certain ancient statutes, declared to be felony with clergy. An action of trover and conversion lay for a hawk reclaimed. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Head-Borough. Each shire has a head-borough, where the sheriff-court is held, and jurisdiction exercised, and letters of inhibition, interdiction, &c., published and registered. Where the shire is divided into lesser districts or wards, each district has a head-borough of its own. Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 5.

Head-Courts. There were formerly three head-courts in the year, at which all the freeholders, who owed suit and presence, in default of attendance were fined. Where the freeholder owed suit only, his personal presence was dispensed with, provided he sent a proxy. Those head-courts were afterwards reduced to one, called the Michaelmas head-court; and, at last, by the act 20 Geo. II., c. 43, abolishing heritable jurisdictions, the fines on account of non-attendance at head-courts were abolished. Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 5. See Election Laws.

Health, Bill of. See Bill of Health.

Hearing in Presence. In the judicial procedure of the Court of Session, a hearing in presence is a formal hearing of counsel, before the whole thirteen Judges. This course is followed only in cases of great difficulty and importance. See 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 20, 23; Shand's Prac. 966. Where the Judges of either Division are equally divided in opinion in any cause, a hearing may take place before the Judges of the Division before which the cause depends, with the addition of three of the Judges of the other Division, and the judgment is pronounced according to the opinion of the majority of the Judges present. See 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36. See also Consultation of Judges.

Hearsay Evidence; evidence repeated at second-hand, by one who heard the actual witness relate, or admit, what he knew of the transaction or fact in question. Such evidence is, in the ordinary case, inadmissible, but may be received in the following cases: 1. When the person from whom the account was received, and who would himself have been a competent witness, is dead. In cases of assault, even when the assaulted person has not died, the account given by him to a third party, of the injury, if given shortly after receiving it, may be adduced to confirm what he has previously sworn to before the jury. 2. When what the witness heard was substantially part of the fact or transaction, or of the res gestæ which the witness himself heard and saw; but this, obviously, is not properly hearsay evidence, but evidence in chief. 3. It is sometimes competent to corroborate the testimony of a witness, by proving what he said, de recenti, in regard to a fact as to which he is called to give evidence. Thus, in cases of rape, it seems competent to invalidate the injured female's testimony in this way; but in ordinary cases the rule is different, although a witness may himself be questioned, as to previous contradictory accounts which he has given. There are several other cases in which hearsay is received: these will be found enumerated in Alison's Prac. 111. In all cases of deponing to conversations, the witness must give the whole words, if he can recollect them; if not, the substance. He is not allowed to give his own impressions of the result, unconnected with either the words or substance. Hume, ii. 406, et seq.; Burnett, 600; Alison's Princ. 225; Prac. 510; Syme, 121; Shaw, 237; Trials for Treason in Scotland, ii. 71, 226, 518; Steele, 30; Dickson on Ev. 57, et seq. See Evidence.

Heath. In England, by 7 and 8 Geo. IV., c. 30, § 17, the malicious burning of heath is made felony. Tomlin's Dict. h. t. For the period during which the burning of heath is forbidden in Scotland, see Muirburn.

Heir. The term heir does not mean merely the heir-at-law; it means also the heir by destination; neither does it mean the heir in heritage only; it is likewise applied to the person who succeeds to the moveable estate. In short, it is a flexible term, which is to be understood according to the circumstances in which it is used. By the law of Scotland, however, it is not competent, merely by nominating a party to be the testator's heir, to confer on him any right of succession. In order to displace the legal heir in any particular subject or estate, the testator must convey that estate or subject to the party, other than the heir therein, whom he wishes to favour; and he may also call to the succession a series of strangers. But, in all such cases, it is with reference to the conveyance of the property that parties other than the heirs-at-law succeed, and not as being named heirs, the brocard of the Scotch law being, that "it belongs to God and not to man to make an heir." See Destination. Disposition. Settlement. Testament. Executors.

The subject will be considered under the following arrangements:—

1. Of the heir-at-law.
2. Of the heir by destination.
3. Of the title of the heir.
4. Of the rights of an heir.
5. Of the burdens affecting the heir.

1. Of the heir-at-law.—The heir-at-law is the person who succeeds to the property of a person deceased, including moveables as well as heritage. The succession of heritage and of moveables is regulated by different rules. Heritage, which includes land, and all property connected with land, goes to males in preference to females; and, where there are more than one male in the same degree of relationship to the deceased, the succession goes to the eldest male; the others receive the moveables equally amongst them, and are termed the nearest of kin, or executors of the deceased. Where there are more than one female in the same degree of relationship to the deceased, or the descendants of such female, according to the jus representationis, the heritage does not go to the eldest female, as happens in the case of males, but it goes to all the females in the same degree of relationship, and their issue, equally, who are termed heirs-portioners. But there is a certain order in which the heirs succeed. The succession opens first in favour of descendants, that is, of sons and daughters in the above-mentioned order; failing them, it goes to collaterals, that is, to brothers and sisters; whom failing, it goes to ascendants, that is, to the father; then collaterally to his brothers and sisters; then to the grandfather, and so on as far as relationship can be traced; but no succession passes through the mother. In these questions, full-blood is always preferred to half-blood; and there is a right of representation in heritable succession by which the son succeeds to that heritable property to which his father or mother would have had right had either been alive. Thus, the son of an eldest son, in competition with his uncles, the younger brothers of his father, will be preferred to them on the estate which would have fallen to his father, the eldest son, had he been alive. See Succession. Executors. Collation. Half-blood. The heir above described is termed heir-at-law, because he succeeds according to the disposition of the law; he is also termed heir-of-line, because he succeeds according to certain recognised lines of propinquity; he is called heir-general, because he represents the deceased generally; and he is called heir-whomsoever; and whichever of those expressions is used, the person so succeeding is the person who would, by the disposition of the law itself, have succeeded. What has been stated above relates to the succession of heritage which has come to the predecessor, by descent from his predecessor; for where heritable property has been purchased by the immediate predecessor, it is termed conquest, and goes to the heir of conquest, who, in all competitions amongst brothers or uncles, or their descendants, is not the next immediate younger brother or uncle, but the immediate elder brother or uncle. See Conquest. The moveable succession goes to the relation nearest in degree of blood to the defunct; and, where there are more than one equally near, the succession goes to all those relations equally, whether male or female.

Formerly there was no right of representation in moveable succession; but this is now altered by the act 18 and 19 Vict., c. 23 (1855). Those succeeding are termed next of kin, or heirs in moveables. See Executors.

2. Of the heir by destination.—The heir by destination is the person who is called to succeed, failing the person to whom an estate is disposed. In calling a series of heirs, sometimes general terms are used, as to A. B., and the heirs-male of his body; at other times, the heirs-male or sons of A. B. are called nominatim, and in their order. The former method is more concise; and, if the conveyancer be fully acquainted with the legal import of the terms he makes use of, it is the best manner of expressing the destination; but the other will probably give more satisfaction to the grantor, if he be unacquainted with the meaning of the general terms employed. See the different forms of expressing destinations explained under the article Destination.

3. Of the title of the heir.—This has reference to the form by which an heir completes a title in his own person to the estate which has previously been vested in the person of his ancestor. This form varies according to circumstances. Thus, where the ancestor has been infertile, a special service is required; and that service must be followed by infertile in favour of the heir. Where, again, the ancestor was not infertile, a general service is sufficient; and this service, without any farther step, carries to the heir all that was in the person of the ancestor. In the case of lands held of a subject-superior, the heir may be entered without a service, on a precept of clare constat, which is a warrant for infertile the heir in the lands as heir to the ancestor. In the same way, burgage subjects may be carried to an heir by the form of hasp and staple; and there is still another method equivalent to a service, by which the heir may complete a title; he may grant a trust-bond to a confidential friend, and that friend may charge the heir to enter and adjudge the lands. (See Adjudication on Trust-bond.) On this subject see Services. Clare constat. Hasp and Staple. Entry of an Heir. Titles to Land. An heir, when he is uncertain of the situation of his ancestor's affairs, may, within a year, enter cum beneficio inventarii. See Service. Beneficium Inventarii.

By 10 and 11 Vict., c. 47, § 23 (1847), a decree of special service infers only a limited passive representation of the deceased, and the person obtaining the decree is liable for the deceased's debts and deeds only to the extent or value of the lands and other heritages comprehended by the decree, and no farther. By the same act, § 25, a general service may be obtained by the heir stating in his petition that he desires the effect of the decree of service to be limited to the lands or other heritages belonging to the deceased, which are contained in a specification annexed to the petition. A copy of the specification is embodied in the extract of the decree, and the heir so served is liable for the deceased's debts and deeds only to the extent or value of the lands or other heritages contained in the specification.

4. Of the rights of an heir.—After an heir has completed his title, every right possessed by his predecessor is vested in him. But, even before completing his title, an apparent heir (as he is called in the law of Scotland) can pursue for, receive and discharge the rents due from the estate of his ancestor; and those rents, on his death, descend to his executor. He can defend the tenant in his possession; but he cannot remove him, by prosecuting an action of removing against him, before he has completed his title. The heir-apparent has a right to reduce all death-bed deeds done by the ancestor to his prejudice. He may pursue a liferenter for an aliment; he may institute an action of sale for behoof of creditors. The apparent heir has, farther, a right of deliberating as to the propriety of taking up the succession which has opened to him; and, for this purpose, a year and day after the death of the ancestor was formerly allowed him. During that period he could not be compelled to enter; and, the better to enable him to deliberate, he might judicially enforce exhibition of his ancestor's title-deeds. See Apparent Heir. Annus deliberandi. Aliment. Death-bed. Exhibition. Executor.

By the Titles to Land Act 21 and 22 Vict., c. 76, § 27 (1858), diligence against an apparent heir may now be insisted in at any time after the lapse of six months from the date of his becoming apparent heir.

The onerous debts and deeds of an apparent heir, who has been three years in possession on his right of apparency, but who has not completed titles to his predecessor's lands, may be made effectual against the lands and estate so possessed on apparency, in the person of a succeeding heir who has made up titles to the apparent heir's predecessor, passing by the apparent heir; 1695, c. 24. See Apparent Heir.

5. Of the burdens affecting the heir.—Heirs are all liable for the debts of their ancestor; but they are liable in a certain order. Thus, the heir of line is primarily liable in the debts of the ancestor—next to him is the heir of conquest—then follows the heir-male—next to these is the heir by destination—and, last of all, the heir under a marriage-contract. It is in this order that those heirs must be discussed. See Discussion. Where a disposer burdens a disposition with the payment of his debts generally, this is held to be a provision in favour of his creditors, which does not prevent the donee from claiming relief from the heir of the disposer. In order to render the donee liable, a declaration to that effect, in very precise terms, is required. Stair, B. iii. tit. 5; More's Notes p. cccix. et seq.; Bank. vol. ii. p. 322, et seq., Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 47; Bell's Princ. § 1637, et seq. Illust. 1695; Bell's Com. i. 83, et seq., 143, 659, et seq., 709, et seq.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Shand's Prac.; Sandford on Heritable Succession, vol. ii. p. 68, et seq.; *Jurid. Heir and Executor. The heir is entitled to all the heritage, and the executor to all the moveables of the deceased, with the exception of heirship moveables. But, where the heir and executors are equally near in kin to the ancestor, it is competent to the heir to insist that the whole estate, heritable and moveable, shall be massed in cumulo, and distributed share and share alike amongst the whole next of kin. (See Collation.) In the division of the rents of land between an heir and executor, the executor has right to the rents due at the death of the ancestor, the heir to what was not at that time due; and a rule has been received in practice for regulating what part of the rents are, and what part are not held to be due. Thus, the terms of Whitsunday and Martinmas are held as the legal terms by which these interests are regulated, whatever the conventional terms of payment may be. If, therefore, the landlord has survived Whitsunday, his executor has right to one-half of that year's rent; if, again, he survive Martinmas, he has right to the whole of that year's rent. But a different rule is adopted where the lands have been in the natural possession of the proprietor; for there, whatever has been sown by the proprietor must be reaped by the executor; and where the ground has been prepared but not sown, the expense of labour is a claim competent to the executor. In the case of a tenant, the rights of his heir and executor are regulated by the same rules: but the executor pays a proportion of the rent corresponding to the part of the farm under crop. The heirs and executors of liferenters have their rights ascertained by the same rules. The interest of heritable bonds is, in like manner, divided between the heir and executors of the creditor, according to the rules observed in regard to the rents of lands. But the interest arising on a personal bond is due de die in diem. Hence, the executors of the liferenter of a personal bond draw the interest down to the day of the death of the liferenter. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 64, et seq., and Bell on Leases, vol. i. p. 475, et seq.; Bank. vol. i. p. 218; Bell's Com. i. 752; ii. 8; *Sandford on Herit. In the case of Bridges v. Fordyce, March 7, 1844, 6 D. 968, and affirmed in the House of Lords, 23d February 1847, 6 Bell, p. 1; the Apportionment Act, 4 and 5 Will. IV., c. 22, was held to apply to Scotland. The second branch of this statute proceeds on the following preamble:—"And whereas by law, rents, annuities, and other payments due at fixed or stated periods, are not apportionable, unless express provision be made for the purpose, from which it often happens that persons and their representatives whose income is wholly or principally derived from these sources, by the determination thereof before the period of payment arrives, are deprived of means to satisfy just demands; and other evils arise from such rents, annuities, and other payments not being apportionable, which evils require remedy." The remedy introduced is expressed as follows:—"Be it enacted that from and after the passing of this act, all rents, service reserved on any lease by a tenant in fee, or for any life interest, or by any lease granted under any power, and which lease shall have been granted after the passing of this Act; and all rents, charge, and other rents, annuities, &c., and all other payments of every description, &c., made payable or coming due at fixed periods, under any instrument that shall be executed after the passing of this Act, or being a will or testamentary instrument that shall come into operation after the passing of this Act, shall be apportioned so, and in such manner, that on the death of any person interested in such rents, annuities, &c., or other payments as aforesaid, or in the estate, fund, office, or benefice, from or in respect of which the same shall be issuing or derived, or on the determination, by any other means whatsoever, of the interest of any such term, he or she, and his or her executors, administrators, or assignees, shall be entitled to a proportion of such rents, annuities, &c., and other payments, according to the time which shall have elapsed from the commencement or last period of payment thereof respectively, as the case may be, including the day of the death of such person, or of the determination of his or her interest, all charges on such rents being deducted."

The statute farther declares that the entire rents shall be received and recovered by the person or persons who, if this Act had not passed, would have been entitled to such entire rents, and such portion shall be recovered from such person or persons by the parties entitled to the same under this Act, in any action or suit at law, or in equity.

The case of Campbell v. Campbell, July 18, 1849, 11 D. 1426, was the case of a grass farm, the entry to which was at Whitsunday old style, 26th May, and the first rent payable at the term of Martinmas after entry, and the second at Whitsunday following, and so on half yearly. It was held that notwithstanding the speciality that the entry was at Whitsunday old style, the rent was due at the legal terms of Whitsunday and Martinmas, 15th May and 11th November, and that the first rent, payable conventionally at Martinmas after entry, was legally due at the preceding Whitsunday, and that the second rent, conventionally payable at Whitsunday next after entry, was legally due at the preceding term of Martinmas, and so with regard to the subsequent rents. In this case the proprietor had died on 18th of May 1846, being three days posterior to the legal term, and eight days prior to the term of Whitsunday old style. In a competition between his heir and executor, it was held, first, that the executor was at common law entitled to the rent legally due at Whitsunday 1846, but conventionally payable at Martinmas thereafter, and to all the antecedent rents. It was held, second, that under the provisions of the Apportionment Act, he was entitled to a proportion of the rent legally due at Martinmas 1846, but conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1847, corresponding to the ancestor's three days' survivance of the legal term of Whitsunday 1846.

The case of Blaikie v. Farquharson, July 18, 1849, 11 D. 1456, was the case of an arable farm, the entry to which was at the term of Martinmas 1838, the rent payable half yearly; the first half year's rent at Martinmas 1839, and the second at Whitsunday following, both payments being for crop 1839, and so on thereafter. The landlord died on 14th May 1841. In a competition between his heir and executor, it was held, first, that the executor was at common law entitled to the rent payable at Whitsunday 1841, being the last half of the rent for crop 1840. It was held, second, that under the Apportionment Act he was entitled to the half year's rent payable at Martinmas 1841, minus the proportion of it effeiring to one day being the rent applicable to the period from Martinmas 1840 to 14th May 1841, when the landlord died. The estate in this case was held under a strict entail.

In both these cases the estates were entailed. In the English case of Browne v. Amyot, 3 Hare, 173, it was decided that the apportionment statute applies only to cases in which the interest of the person interested in the rents, &c., is terminated by his death, or by the death of another person; but did not apply to the case of a tenant in fee, or provide for the apportionment of rent between the real and personal representative of such, whose interest is not terminated at his death. The case Baillie v. Macdonald Lockhart (unreported), was not argued in the Court below in consequence of the judgments in the preceding cases of Campbell and Blaikie, but was appealed to the House of Lords for the purpose of having it determined whether the statute was applicable to entailed estates; and it was determined that it did apply. LORD CRANWORTH, C., observed:—"I have no doubt that the statute applies to a tenant in tail. The evil prior to the statute was that if the tenant in tail died indebted, and the rents were nearly accruing due, all these accruing rents would go to the successor. To remedy that evil the statute was passed. I cannot doubt, upon the construction of the statute, that the question here is really not a question of feudal law, but a question of the meaning of the Legislature. There is nothing determined in this case but the applicability of the statute." 2 Macqueen, 258, 27 Jur. 367. See also the cases of Beer v. Beer, 1852, 12 Scott's New Rep. 60; *Locke v. Heir-Female. See Destination.

Heirs and Bairns. The expression "heirs and bairns," or "heirs and children," of a marriage, in the destination of an heritable estate in a contract of marriage, carries the estate to the heir-at-law, and not to all the children of the marriage, share and share alike; whereas, the expression "bairns of the marriage," or "children of the marriage," omitting the word "heirs," carries the property to all the children of the marriage equally. Bell's Princ. § 1963, et seq. See Destination. Bairns of a Marriage.

Heirship Moveables; are the moveables to which the heir in heritage is entitled, in order that he may not succeed to a house and land completely dismantled. They consist of the best of certain kinds of moveable goods belonging to the heir's predecessor, such as, furniture, horses, cows, oxen, farming utensils, &c., but not including fungibles. Where articles go in pairs or dozens, it is the best pair or dozen, or best yoke. Under this are comprehended the family seal of arms, the ornaments of the seat in church. See a full list of heirship moveables given in Hope's Minor Prac. p. 538, edit. 1734. Heirship moveables are due only to the heir of a baron or of a burgess. In this sense, a person infest in lands, or even in an annual rent of lands, is held to be a baron; but he must have been infest, and the burgess must be an actual trading burgess in a royal burgh, not merely an honorary one. It is the heir of line only who has a right to claim heirship moveables, and of this right he cannot be deprived by any testamentary or death-bed deed of the ancestor's. When there are heirs-portioners, it is the eldest heir-portioner only who is entitled to heirship moveables; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, §§ 13, 17, et seq. The title to heirship moveables requires no service to complete it; possession is sufficient. But, if the heir die without attaining possession, heirship moveables, on his death, do not descend to his executors, but to the heir of the first deceased. Ersk. ib. § 77; Stair, B. iii. tit. 5, § 7, et seq.; More's Notes, p. cccxxx.; Bank. vol. ii. pp. 292, 328; Bell's Princ. § 1903; Brown's Synop. h. t. and pp. 1177, 2053; *Sandford on Herit. Heir-Portioners. Failing the male issue and their issue, the succession opens in favour of the female issue. The heritage does not go to the eldest female alone, but to all the females in the same degree of relationship, who inherit equally and pro indiviso as heirs-portioners. In this succession the jus representationis prevails. Thus, if the deceased be survived by two daughters, and by a grandson or granddaughters by a deceased daughter, the grandson, as his mother's heir-at-law, will succeed to her share of the ancestor's heritage, to the exclusion of his sisters; or if the deceased daughter has been survived by daughters only, they will succeed as heiresses-portioners to their mother's share of their grandfather's succession. The eldest heir-portioner by legal succession, but not by provision, has right to the mansion-house of an estate in the country, as a præcipuum, without compensation to her sisters. She is also entitled to such peerages, dignities, and titles of honour, as are not otherwise limited. The eldest has also right to subjects indivisible, such as superiorities, a house in town, or a small villa in the country; but for such subjects she must give compensation to her sisters. On the death of the second of three sisters, the succession of conquest does not go as on the death of a middle brother, but to the heirs of both sisters, as heirs-portioners. Stair, B. iii. tit. 5, § 11; More's Notes, cxx. cccxix.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 13; Sandford on Herit. Success. i. 3 to 33; Bell's Princ. § 1659; Illust. ib. and § 1670. See Brieve of Division. Collation. Executors.

Herald; is an officer serving under the lyon king at arms. The king at arms, with the heralds and pursuivants in their robes, proclaim peace and war, or make other royal proclamations. Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 32. See Lyon King at Arms.

Hereditament; in English law, all such immovable things, whether corporeal or incorporeal, as a man may have to him and his heirs by way of inheritance, and which, if they are not otherwise devised, descend to the next heir, and not to the executor, as chattels do. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Heresy; among Protestants, a false opinion repugnant to some point of Scriptural doctrine, and either absolutely essential to the Christian faith, or at least of high importance. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Herezeld; was the best horse, ox, or cow, belonging to a tenant, which, on his death, was due to the landlord. See Skene, h. t. This exaction has been long unknown in practice, although, in charters by progress from superiors, the word is occasionally met with; and sometimes, in striking a composition, the value of the herezeld is stated against the vassal in money at a low conversion. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 80; Bank. vol. i. p. 596; vol. ii. p. 116; Brown's Synop. h. t.; Ross's Lect. ii. 175; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant.

Heriot; the English law term corresponding to the Scotch word herezeld. It signified originally a tribute given to the lord of a manor, for his better preparation for war; and is now taken for the best beast, whether it be horse, ox, or cow, which the tenant dies possessed of, due and payable to the lord of the manor. In some manors, it is the best goods, piece of plate, &c. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Heritable and Moveable. In the Roman law, things were divided into corporeal and incorporeal; and the former class was subdivided into moveable and immovable. But this classification has, in the law of Scotland, given place to the distinction between heritable and moveable rights, a distinction resting more on the legal rights of the heir and of the executor, than on the nature of the subjects themselves. Generally all rights in, or connected with, land, are heritable. Whatever moves itself, or can be moved, without injury to itself, or the subject with which it is connected; and whatever is not united to land, is moveable. But these general rules are subject to exceptions and modifications. Things, in themselves moveable, may become heritable by succession. Whatever has been by art annexed to land, or other heritable subject, so that it cannot be removed without injury or change of nature, is heritable, by accession. See Fixtures. Mills. Machinery. Whatever is by growth connected with the soil is heritable, under certain exceptions. See Grass. Hay. Things, in their nature heritable, may become moveable by being made part of a moveable universitas. Thus, a share of heritable subjects forming part of the stock of a trading company is moveable. Things become heritable by destination, by being made to descend to the heir, or otherwise. Thus materials prepared for completing any part of a house are heritable. Books and furniture may be made heritable in succession. Des-destination, although it rules succession, operates no change on subjects, in respect to diligence. Debts secured upon land are heritable. But simple personal debts and engagements, shares of companies, public or private, bank stock, and government stock, are moveable. Arrears of heritable debts, of rents and feu-duties, of the interest of heritable bonds, &c., are moveable. Personal bonds were formerly heritable after the term of payment was past; they were made moveable by 1661, c. 32, but continue heritable as to the flask, and jus relictæ, and the other rights of husband and wife. Rights in their nature moveable, but having a tract of future time, are heritable. Titles of honour and offices continuing after the holder's death are heritable. Securities, whether by heritable bond or disposition in security, or by real burden, or by adjudication, are heritable, though infestment has not been taken. Bonds having a clause of infestment, though not completed by sasine, are heritable; but if the infestment be suspended till the arrival of a day, or the purification of a condition, the debt is moveable. Securities taken by a tutor, or by a factor loco tutoris, are never heritable. The nature of moveable rights is changed by a supervening heritable security; but heritable rights do not become moveable by supervening moveable securities; on the contrary, they communicate to those supervening securities the nature of the original or heritable right. Where lands or heritable securities are conveyed in security of personal debts, those debts become heritable. A distinction is taken between those cases in which a trust is granted for the security of creditors, and the trustee is infest, and those in which the trust has been granted for the sole and immediate purpose of paying the debts by a sale. In the former case the succession of the creditors is rendered heritable, in the latter it remains unchanged. Excluding executors in a personal bond makes the bond heritable. Sums directed to be laid out by trustees on heritable subjects, are heritable. A trust and instruction to sell heritable subjects, and convert them into money, makes an heritable debt moveable; and hence the claim against the trustees, at the instance of the parties beneficially interested in the proceeds of the trust-estate, is moveable, and may be arrested. A charge of horning on an heritable debt makes it moveable; but registration, in order to a charge, has not that effect. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, et seq., and B. iii. tit. 1, § 25; More's Notes, p. cxxxviii.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 2, § 2; Bell's Com. ii. 1, et seq.; Bank. vol. i. p. 514; vol. ii. 198, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 1470; Illust. ib. Sandford on Heritable Succession, vol. ii. p. 206, et seq.; Shaw's Digest, p. 227, et seq.; Brown's Synop. h. t.;

Heritable Bond; is a bond for a sum of money, to which is joined, for the creditor's farther security, a conveyance of land or of heritage, to be held by the creditor in security of the debt. Ross's Lect. i. 76; ii. 324; Bell's Princ. § 910; Illust. ib. See the title Bond. See also Burdens.

Heritable Securities. There are various ways in which heritable estates may be made the means of security to creditors. The creditor may either lead an adjudication against the land, or it may be secured exclusively for his benefit by inhibition, or a burden may be created entitling the creditor to appropriate the rents and uses of the land until the debts shall be paid. Real securities may be created or dissolved without touching the radical right to the estate or the progress of titles; and they are discharged by the extinction of the debt, without any feudal form of reconveyance. Heritable securities are either constituted by infestment in favour of the creditors, or they depend on the force of a condition qualifying the right of property. Of the first class are wadset; infestment of annual-rent; heritable bond; disposition in security, and absolute disposition with back-bond. Of the second class are reserved burdens and faculties to burden. Elchies' Notes on Stair, p. 136; Stair, B. iii. tit. 4, § 33; tit. 5, §§ 6 and 25. See also Ersk. B. ii. tit. 8; Stair, B. iv. tit. 25, § 24; More's Notes, ccx.; Bell's Com. i. 674; ii. 205; Bell's Princ. § 896; Illust. § 901. See Burdens.

Although heritable securities may still be constituted under the old forms, bonds and dispositions in security may now be granted in the form of schedule A, annexed to the act 10 and 11 Vict., c. 50, 1847; and the recording of securities granted in that form in the Register of Sasines is as effectual as if they had contained all the usual clauses, and as if sasine had been taken thereon and the instrument of sasine duly recorded. Such bonds and dispositions in security may be registered at any time during the lifetime of the grantee, but if not so registered, these shall be a sufficient warrant of sasine in favour of the party having right to them by service, adjudication, or otherwise; infestment being passed upon them according to the form prescribed by the act 8 and 9 Vict., c. 35, 1845. See Infestment. A sale carried through in terms of the act is as valid and effectual to the purchaser as if it had been made by the granter of the security himself, and that whether the granter shall have died before or after the sale, and without the necessity of confirmation by him or his heirs, and notwithstanding that the party who is the debtor in the security and in right of the lands, may at the time of the sale be in pupillarity or minority, or subject to any legal incapacity. The creditor or purchaser, however, is also entitled to demand from the granter of the security, and his heirs, any deeds which may at common law be necessary for rendering the same effectual, or otherwise completing in due form the purchaser's title. A creditor selling under his security is bound to count and reckon for the surplus of the price which may remain, after deducting the debt secured, with the interest due thereon and penalties incurred, and the whole expenses attending the sale; and after paying all previous incumbrances, and the expenses of discharging them, he must consign such surplus in one or other of the chartered banks, or in a branch of any such bank, in the joint names of the seller and purchaser, for behoof of the party or parties having the best right to it, and the particular bank into which the consignment is to be made must be specified in the articles of roup. Upon a sale being carried through in terms of the act, and upon consignment of the surplus of the price, the disposition by the creditor to the purchaser has the effect of completely disencumbering the lands sold of all securities and diligences posterior to the security of the creditor selling, as well as of the security and diligence of that creditor himself.

Heritable securities may be transferred by an assignation or other deed of conveyance, according to the form in the schedule No. I., annexed to the Act 8 and 9 Vict., c. 31, 1845; and on such assignation or conveyance being recorded in the Proper Register of Sasines, the security will be transferred to the assignee as effectually as if it had been disposed and assigned, and infeftment passed upon it according to the old form. Where the assignation or conveyance of the security is contained in a deed of conveyance, granted for farther purposes and objects, or conveying other properties, such as a marriage contract, deed of trust or settlement, it is not necessary to record the whole of the deed, but it is sufficient to expedite and record a notarial instrument, setting forth generally the nature of the deed of conveyance, and containing at length the part of the deed which relates to security conveyed. Upon the death of any creditor fully vested in right of an heritable security, the heir may complete his title to it by writ of acknowledgment, to be granted in his favour by the person duly infeft of whom the security is held, according to the form set forth in the schedule No. II., annexed to the said act; and on such writ being duly registered, the heir becomes vested with the full right of the creditor in the security. Creditors adjudging an heritable security from the creditor in the security, or his heir, may complete their title to it by duly recording the abbreviate of the adjudication in the Proper Register of Sasines, such recording having the same effect as if the adjudger had been entered and infeft on a charter of adjudication. The heir duly served of any creditor, also was duly vested in an heritable security; or the general disponee of such creditor may complete his title to the security without the intervention of the superior, by expediting and recording an instrument under the hands of a notary public, according to the form set forth in the schedule No. III., annexed to the said act; and on such instrument being recorded in the Proper Register of Sasines, such heir or disponee becomes vested in the full right of the creditor in the security, in the same manner and to the same effect as the creditor himself was. Assignations or conveyances of heritable securities may be recorded at any time, and in competition, are preferable according to the date of registration. An heritable security may be effectually renounced and discharged in whole or in part, by a discharge executed according to the form set forth in the schedule No. IV., annexed to the said act, and recorded in the Proper Register of Sasines. The act farther declares, that nothing declared in it shall prevent the transmission or extinction of securities in the forms in use at the passing of the act; and the subsequent statute, 10 and 11 Vict., c. 50, 1847, declares that nothing declared in it shall prevent the constitution of heritable securities in the forms in use, or which might be competently used at the passing of that act. The same act farther declares, that all the provisions and enactments contained in the previous act 8 and 9 Vict., c. 31, shall apply to the transmission and extinction of heritable securities constituted in terms of the subsequent act, with this proviso, that where reference is directed by the prior act to be made to the instrument of sasine on any bond and disposition in security, it shall be sufficient, in the case of a bond and disposition in security granted under authority of the subsequent act, to make reference to the date of recording such bond and disposition in security itself in the Register of Sasines. The constitution and transmission of heritable securities is also affected by the Titles to Land Act. See Titles to Land.

Heritable Jurisdictions; were grants of criminal jurisdiction bestowed on great families, with a view to the more easy and expeditious administration of justice. These jurisdictions, with other powers possessed by landed proprietors, were abolished after the Rebellion 1745, by the act 20 Geo. II., c. 43, and compensations given to those who suffered patrimonially by the operation of that statute. Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 11, et seq.

Heritor; in its original acceptation, signified the proprietor of an heritable subject; but, in connection with parochial law, the term is confined to such proprietors of lands or houses as are liable in payment of public burdens. In the case, Earl of Strathmore, Feb. 26, 1762, M. 13,128, in a question as to the right to vote as an heritor in the election of a schoolmaster, it was found, that those feuars only are entitled to vote who pay cess, whether separately or in a cumulo valuation. It has likewise been found that heritors, who, by their title-deeds, are liable in payment of cess and parish burdens, have a title to vote, whether their lands stand separately valued on the cess-roll or not, and although they be neither entered in the cess-roll, nor in the books of the collector of cess, as paying cess. The liferenter has the right of voting in preference to the fiar. Heritors may vote by proxy. The management of the poor is now regulated by the Poor Law Amendment Act, 8 and 9 Vict., c. 83 (1845). See Poor. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 57; Bell's Princ. § 1136; Dunlop's Parochial Law.

Hermaphrodite. In the English law, a person partaking of both sexes may give, grant, or inherit as either man or woman; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. Forbes, in his Institute, divides the sexes into male, female, and "hermaphrodite—i.e., both male and female, which is esteemed to be of that sex which is most prevailing in the person." Forbes, Inst. B. i. c. 1.

Hership; the crime (formerly prevalent in this country) of carrying off cattle by force. It is described as "the masterful driving off of cattle from a proprietor's grounds." Hume, i. 107.

Hide; an old English land measure, the extent of which is not quite certain, being, according to some, 100, according to others, 120 acres. Coke says that it contains no determinate number of acres. Eight hides made a knight's fee. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Highways; are inter regalia, being vested in the Crown for the benefit of the people. The arrangement and police of turnpike roads have been the subject of a number of statutes, local and general. At first they were, by various statutes (1669, c. 16; 1670, c. 9; 1686, c. 8; and 11 Geo. III., c. 53), placed under the direction of the commissioners of supply, and justices of the peace of the county. But afterwards, in almost every county, acts of Parliament were passed for regulating the roads, and giving power to trustees to arrange the statute labour, to levy tolls, and to borrow money on the produce of them. To remedy the abuses which prevailed in the obtaining and administering of these local acts, the General Road Acts, 4 Geo. IV., c. 49, and 1 and 2 Will. IV., c. 43 (1831), were passed. Their object is to reduce to an uniform system the management of all the highways, with a reservation of whatever may be peculiarly necessary in certain localities. There are therefore still local acts relative to almost every county in Scotland, adapted to the peculiar circumstances of the district. But the general act repeals all the old acts of the seventeenth century, and such recent acts as are of the nature of general laws; and the rules now established are declared to extend to all local acts now in force, or to be enacted, relative to roads in Scotland. The subjects which the act embraces, are the qualifications and powers of trustees; regulations for driving of vehicles; the exaction of tolls; the erection of toll-bars, &c.; the penalties for evasion of tolls; the cutting of ditches and drains; encroachments upon, or obstruction of the highway; compensation to proprietors; the making of footpaths; the pruning of hedges, and the like. A highway must be at least twenty feet broad, without including the ditch on either side; and powers are conferred on the trustees for widening all turnpike roads to that extent, and for taking ground for that purpose without paying for it, but reserving the owner's claim of damages for fences removed or injured. They are also empowered to widen roads to forty feet, on giving compensation for the ground taken above twenty feet. Each local act is to be read as if the general act were incorporated in it. This does not apply to pontage acts. All regulations in local acts, not inconsistent with the rules of the general act, are effectual. The trustees are not entitled to compel the public to use the road, by shutting up a parish road; and where any unwarranted obstruction has been occasioned de recenti by trustees or others, it may be removed brevis manu. The statutory jurisdiction under the general road act is vested in the justices of peace and quarter sessions, exclusive of the review of the Court of Session. An excellent digest of the law of the road will be found in Sheriff Barclay's work on that subject (1836). See also *Ersk. Hinc Inde; a technical expression used in Scotch legal phraseology, to signify on either side, or on this side and the other, as con-

Holdings. The holding is a term used in feudal law to signify the tenure or nature of the right given by the superior to the vassal. It expresses the services due to the superior, and ascertains, by a single word, as by the word feu, or blench, the state of the connection between the superior and vassal. When it is said that a person holds feu, it is equivalent to saying that he holds his lands for payment of a sum of money yearly, or for a yearly payment in grain; and blench means a mere elusory duty, as a penny Scots. There are, besides, certain rights incident to all holdings, which are explained under other articles. Two species of holdings formerly known are now extinct—viz., wardholding and mortification. Wardholding was the military tenure of this country. The ward and marriage of the heir, which were two of its casualties, were of the most oppressive nature. See Ward. Marriage. Avail. And recognition, by which the feu fell back to the superior on the vassal's giving out more than one-half of the feu, was an impediment in the transmission of land holding ward, which, previous to the abolition of wardholding, occasioned the most serious inconvenience. Wardholding was abolished by the 20 Geo. II., c. 50. And where the lands held in ward of the Crown or of the Prince, they were converted into blench-holdings; when they held of a subject-superior, they were converted into feu-holding, and rules were laid down for fixing the feu-duties to be paid. This statute was one of the results of the Rebellion of 1745, and was meant to lessen the influence of superiors with their vassals. Mortification, which is the other species of holding that has fallen into disuse, was the tenure by which churches or religious societies held land for charitable purposes, or for prayers and masses for the souls of the dead. This tenure fell at the Reformation; and where lands are now destined for a charitable purpose, they are given out to be held either in feu or in blench, according to circumstances. The modern holdings therefore are either feu or blench. The feu-holdings are those which hold of the Crown or of a subject-superior, in consequence of original feu-rights; or they are rights which formerly held ward of a subject, and are now converted into feu, under the Act 20 Geo. II., c. 50. The blench-holdings, again, are either originally blench, and are held either of the Crown or of a subject-superior; or they were formerly wardholdings held of the Crown or Prince, and converted into blench-holdings under the statute. It is obvious that original blench-holdings will now seldom be created by a subject-superior; because, in such a transaction, the granter of the right can have no object in interposing himself between the vassal and his own superior; and thus rendering it necessary for his heirs and disponees to complete a title without deriving any emolument from the sub-vassalage. The feu-holding has a reddendo, as it is called, or rent in money or in grain, payable yearly, at terms specified; and, besides this fixed duty, there are certain casualties, as non-entry, relief, escheat, disclaimer and purpresture. See Casualties. The blench-holding has the same casualties, and its fixed duties (as already observed) are an elusory annual duty, as a penny money, a hawk, a rose, nomine albae firmæ. When the words si petatur tantum, are added, it is held to be discharged, if not demanded within the year; and where those words are not added, still, if the duty be of yearly growth, it ought to be demanded within the year; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 4, § 1, et seq. The only other holding is burgage, which relates to property within burgh. Holograph Deed. A holograph deed is a deed written with the granter's own hand, which, on account of the difficulty with which the forgery of such a document can be accomplished, is held to be valid in law without witnesses. Where it is mentioned in the deed to have been written by the granter, the presumption is, that the deed is truly holograph, though the contrary may be proved; but where the deed does not bear to have been written by the granter, still it may be proved to have been of his handwriting, either by a comparison of the handwriting, or by the evidence of those who saw it written. A holograph deed without witnesses does not prove the date that may be given to it; where witnesses attest the deed, it will prove its date, because the evidence of witnesses may be resorted to, to check any error in the date. Holograph missive letters, and holograph bonds and subscriptions in count books, if not sued on within twenty years, prescribe, unless the pursuer offer to prove, by the defender's oath, the verity of such writings; 1669, c. 9. *Ersk. Homagium; a band of manrent, when any person promises to serve another in sik sort, that he shall be friend to all his friends, and foe to all his foes, against all deadly. The following curious style may be quoted from Skene, de Significatione Verborum:—"I become your man, my liege King, in land, lith, life, and limb, wardlie honour, homage, fealtie and lawzie, against all that live and die; your counsell conceiland that ze schaw me; the best counsell schawand, gif ye charge me; your skaith and dishonour not to hear and see, bot I sall let it all my gudlie power and warn zou theirow; swa help me God." Skene, h. i.

Homicide; is the killing of any human creature. It may be justifiable, as committed under some unavoidable necessity; or excusable, as where a person engaged in a lawful act is, without intention, the occasion of another's death; or it may be culpable; and of this there are several kinds; as where, although accidental, it has proceeded from carelessness, or where it proceeds from an unlawful act, or where it is done with an intention to do harm, though the intention does not amount to that of killing the person; or where the person intends to kill, but commits the act on a sudden, from resentment excited by real and great injuries, but without any previous malice or hatred to the deceased; and, last of all, where the homicide is committed from malice and forethought, which amounts to the crime of murder. Hume, vol. i. p. 189, et seq.; Bell's Sup.; Alison's Princ. 145; Steele, 70. Homine Reflegiando; in English law, a writ to bail a man out of prison. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Homologation; is a technical expression, signifying an act by which a person approves of a deed; the effect of such approbatory act being to render that deed, though itself defective, binding upon the person by whom it is homologated. All deeds, informal or defective, may be homologated; that is, all deeds exposed to the statutory nullities arising from the regulations established for the regular execution of deeds, or deeds granted by a person capable of consent, though the deed be defective at the time from the want of the consent of those whose concurrence the law requires, in order to give validity to the deed; as, for example, a deed by a married woman without the consent of her husband, or by a minor without the consent of his curators. And in general any irregular or informal deed may be homologated by the parties after they are capable by themselves of executing a deed; that is, by the woman after the death of her husband, or by the minor after attaining majority, or by the party entitled, but for the homologation, to found on the irregularity. Homologation is to be inferred only from an act which clearly and expressly implies a knowledge and approbation of the deed. Thus, the paying of interest, or the performing of any obligation come under in the deed, will be accounted homologation; but an act which does not infer a knowledge of the contents of the deed, even the subscribing as a witness, if there be no other proof of the person's knowledge of the contents, will not infer homologation; unless the person so signing as witness is connected in such a way with the principal parties to the deed, that his approval must be presumed. Thus, a brother was, by signing as witness, found to have homologated his sister's marriage-contract, to the effect of preventing him from reducing a bond therein assigned. The effect of homologation on the person homologating is to render the deed as effectual against him and his heirs as if it had been a formal and regular deed from the first; but against third parties, who do not represent the person homologating, the deed is exposed to all the objections originally competent against it. *Ersk. Honorarium. The word honorary, in the Roman law, was applied to a fee not paid as a remuneration for labour, for which the labourer could exact a recompense; but rather as a species of present, made as an acknowledgment for trouble gratuitously taken; and, in an acceptation nearly similar, the word has been adopted in our law. In this sense, the fee paid to a law-agent, a physician, or a surgeon, is not an honorary, since any of them may maintain action for its recovery. But the fee of a counsel or barrister is properly an honorary, because he cannot sue his client for payment. It is true that it has been decided, that where a law-agent has received money from the client to fee counsel, and has not paid the fees, the counsel may sue the agent for the money. The same rule, however, would apply to the case of any mere donation transmitted by the hands of a third party, and not duly delivered to the donee. According to one authority, the word honorary signifies a fee paid in return for the exercise of the mental faculties, in contradistinction to hire in contract of locatio operis. But this distinction is not well grounded. In the special case, where a Scotch advocate agrees, for a certain sum to go to London to attend an appeal to the House of Lords, he becomes a proper locator operis, and might maintain an action for the stipulated sum. As a general rule, the fees of physicians (except during the deathbed sickness), and of lawyers are presumed to have been paid. More's Notes on Stair, cxxiv.; Bell's Com. ii. 157; Bell's Princ. § 568; Illust. ib.; *Keay v. Horning, Letters of; are letters running in the Sovereign's name, and passing the Signet. They are directed to messengers-at-arms, as sheriffs in that part, who are ordered to charge the person against whom the letters are directed, to pay or to perform in terms of the will of the letters, which must be consistent with the warrant on which the letters proceed. The warrant on which letters of horning proceed is either a decree of the Court of Session, or the decree of the magistrates of burghs, sheriffs, stewards, admirals, commissaries, or the commission of tithes, and, in some cases, on the decrees of justices of the peace. Decrees of registration also may be the warrant of letters of horning. See Decree of Registration. But where the decree, which is the warrant of the letters, is the decree of an inferior court, a bill must be presented to the Bill-Chamber of the Court of Session, stating the nature of the decree, and the terms of the decerniture, and praying warrant for letters of horning and pointing. This warrant is obtained of course; so that, properly speaking, letters of horning and pointing pass on the warrants of the Court of Session only. By special statute, letters of horning are authorised to pass on bills of exchange, the protest on which has been recorded in any competent court. See the nature of the warrants for letters of horning more fully explained under the articles, Bills of Signet Letters. Bill-Chamber. Diligence. See also Exchequer Horning. Decree conform. The letters of horning narrate the ground of debt, and the terms of the decree by which the judge orders payment or performance; and in the Will, the officers are ordered to command and charge the debtor to pay or perform in terms of the warrant stated in the recital, within a certain number of days. Hornings on decrees proceed on a charge of fifteen days, excepting when the debtors reside in Orkney or Zetland, in which case the days of charge are forty. On obligations, where the clause of registration specifies the number of days, the number specified will regulate this matter; or, should no number be mentioned, the days of charge must be fifteen; and the days of charge on letters of horning on registered protests on bills of exchange are six; 1681, c. 20, and 1696, c. 36. See Bill of Exchange. Charge on Letters of Horning. In virtue of the will of the letters, the debtors are charged to pay or perform, under the pain of rebellion, and of being put to the horn. The letters also contain a warrant for pointing the effects of the debtor, and applying them in payment of the debt, and for arresting his funds and effects. These letters must be expedited by a writer to the Signet; and before a charge can be given on them, they must be impressed with the Signet. For the further procedure in enforcing obedience to the letters, see Pointing. Denunciation. Caption. Imprisonment. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 22, and tit. 4, § 60; B. iv. tit. 47, § 7; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, § 9; Bell's Com. i. 7; ii. 169, et seq., 543, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 2396, et seq.; Bank. vol. ii. p. 643; vol. iii. p. 2, et seq.; Thomson on Bills, p. 576, et seq.; *Jurid. Letters of horning and caption were until recently the only form of enforcing civil decrees by imprisonment, except in the case of small debt decrees. Although they may still be used, they are now superseded by the forms of enforcing decrees provided by 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114. See Execution of Decrees. McGlashan's Sheriff-Court Prac., 152.

Horses. By the law of England the warranty requires to be express; but in Scotland, where a horse was sold at a full value, there was formerly implied warrandice that he was sound. This difference in the laws of the two countries has been removed by the Mercantile Amendment Act, 19 and 20 Vict., c. 60 (1856), which enacts that a seller shall not be held to warrant goods, unless he shall have given an express warranty of the quality or sufficiency of the goods sold, or unless the goods have been expressly sold for a special and particular purpose, in which case the seller is considered without an express warranty to warrant that the goods are fit for the purpose for which they were sold. Under the term "goods" animals are comprehended; Young v. Giffen, Dec. 4, 1858, 21 D. 87.

It is often a question of difficulty what constitutes unsoundness. A warranty seems, however, to comprehend all constitutional diseases, and all accidental injuries affecting the life of the horse; all diseases and accidents inducing lameness or throwing the horse prematurely out of work; all defects or bad habits, indicating a disease amounting to unsoundness. There is much difference of opinion whether the warranty is contravened by faults of a slighter nature, or temporary in their continuance. Bad corns have been held unsoundness; also running thrush; roaring, when it proceeds from organic defect, but not when it has been occasioned by neglect in the bringing up. Under a warranty that a horse was free from fault, the Court found the buyer entitled to repetition of the price, it being proved that the horse was a crib-biter and wind-sucker; but, in an English court, it was held that crib-biting is not included in a general warranty. It has been held in England, that a seller's general warranty was not contravened, on its turning out that the horse's age was greater than that set down in the pedigree, it being shown that the seller received that pedigree when he bought the horse, and that he had no other means of ascertaining its age. Faults in temper, steadiness, courage, utility, &c., which, however important, do not amount to unsoundness, must be guarded against by express stipulation; and it is a question of evidence, whether such engagement has been undertaken, and how far it has been complied with. The express stipulation rules the decision. A horse, in which a defect, struck at by the seller's engagement, has been discovered, must be returned immediately, or as soon as the fault is discovered; but effect will be given to a stipulation limiting the time within which, if objected to, the horse must be returned. Brown on Sale, 286-90; Bell's Princ. § 129; Illust. ib. The duty on horses is regulated by the act 16 and 17 Vict., c. 90, 1853. Houses. The act 1663, c. 6, provides, that ruinous houses within burgh, which have been uninhabited for the space of three years, may be rebuilt; and, with this view, the magistrates are directed to warn the proprietors to rebuild, within a year; and if the proprietors fail to comply, the houses are to be valued and to be put up to sale, and the price which they bring, after deducting expenses, is directed to be given to the proprietors. If no purchasers appear, the magistrates may rebuild them, on consigning the appraised value for the use of the proprietors. The case of liferenters of lands within burgh, who decline to repair the houses liferented by them, is provided for by the act 1594, c. 226, which declares, that the magistrates "sall, at the instance of the heritours of the landes within the samin, upon citation of the partie, take summar cognition of the estaite of the landes, houses, or tenements within the burgh, be ane condigne inquest of the nighthoures thereof; and gif the samin be found aulde, decayed and ruinous in ruife, sclaites, dures, windowes, fluring, loftis, timmer-work and walles, or onie of them, and ane land biggit of aulde, and throw long time decayed, in sik sort that it be already unhabitable, or that within short time may become unhabitable, in that case to decerne that the conjunct fiar or liferenter sall repair the said landes and tenements in the partes thereof decayed, as sall be found be the said inquest, within the space of zeire and day nixt after they be required thereto be the heritours; and failing thereof, declaires that it sall be frie to the said heritour to enter to the possession of the same, to have the setting, raising, using, and disposing thereupon in all time cumming, as gif there war no liferent or conjunct fee standing thairof: Providing alwaies, that sufficient security in the burgh quhair the landes or tenementes lyes, be tane for termlic payment to the conjunct fiars or liferenters theirof, enduring their lifetime, of sic mail and dewtie as the samine presentlie gives the time of the said cognition, or might reasonably give on that estaite, in case it be not presentlie set, deducand alwaies the annuales and uther burding lyand their- upon, and this to be extended to all burnt and waist lands, and against all conjunct fiars present and to cum within burgh." Bell's Com. i. 750; Ross's Lect. ii. 497, 505. Housebreaking; is the worst aggravation of theft. It is committed, if the natural security of the house has been overcome, although it may not have been broken or forced open; but it is not committed when the thief enters in consequence of some of the securities being removed; as, if he should enter by an open window, so close to the ground that he did not require to climb or to receive external assistance, or by a door standing on the latch. Where the entry is effected by concert or connivance with a servant or other person within, the crime is housebreaking in all concerned. Every dwelling-house, however mean and fragile, and every shut and fast building, though not a dwelling-house, as a counting-house, a dairy, a stable, a school-house, &c., is protected by the law against housebreaking. Housebreaking, with intent to steal, is an indictable offence. Theft by housebreaking is capital; but the punishment is now often mitigated. Hume, i. 98, et seq.; Alison's Princ. 282; Burnett, 136; Steele, 120. See Theft.

Housebreaking, with intent to break into and steal from an adjoining house, is a relevant charge, apart from actual theft. Thomson, 1845, 2 Br. 389; See also Forbes, 1845, 2 Br. 461. Raising the sash of a window, left partially open for air, and thereby effecting a sufficient entrance to enable the party with a stick to move articles of dress within, has been held to amount to theft, aggravated by housebreaking; O'Neil, 1845, 2 Br. 394. Entrance by false keys, or even by the true key entrusted to the party for a special and different purpose, amounts to housebreaking. Duncan, 1849; J. Shaw, 225; Farquharson, 1854, Irv. 512. House-Rents; suffer a triennial prescription by the act 1579, c. 83. Under this act, house-rents, after three years, prescribe, and each year's rent runs a separate course of prescription. A demand, therefore, for house-rents is restricted to the three years immediately preceding the citation. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 17; Stair, B. ii. tit. 12, § 30; More's Notes, p. cclxxiv., Bank. vol. ii. p. 103. Hue and Cry; in English law, is the procedure taken by a person robbed or otherwise injured, to pursue and get possession of the culprit's person. At common law, a private person who has been robbed, or who knows that a felony has been committed, is bound to raise hue and cry under pain of fine and imprisonment. The regular mode of raising hue and cry is, for the party to go to the constable of the next town and declare the fact, and describe the offender and the way he is gone, on which the constable raises the town and searches for the offender. If he does not find him, he sends the like notice to the constables of the neighbouring towns. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Husband. The relationship formed by marriage gives to the husband certain rights. The property which forms the goods in communion, and which consists of moveables only, is under the administration of the husband. A personal bond bearing interest, is not included under the goods in communion. But the yearly interest of personal bonds, or even the interest of heritable bonds, or rents of land, form part of the goods in communion; and in virtue of this right, the husband is entitled not only to sell and dispose of the goods in communion, but they are subject to attachment for his debts; and should those goods not be recovered, or even known to have existed during the marriage, yet they may be recovered by the husband or by his heirs. This right of administration is called the jus mariti; but it may be renounced, as to a special subject, by the husband in an antenuptial contract of marriage; or it may be excluded by a stranger, in regard to an estate conveyed by him to the wife. See Contract of Marriage. Jus Mariti. From this right of administration are excluded paraphernal goods, under which are included the wife's body clothes and ornaments, and presents made before or on the marriage-day; but donations during the subsistence of the marriage may be resumed by the husband, and therefore are not excluded from his control. See Donatio inter virum et uxorem. It is a necessary consequence of this right in the estate and effects of the wife, that the husband should be liable for the debts of the wife; for all those at least which, had they been due to, instead of by, her, would have fallen to him under his jus mariti. But he is liable only as her administrator; and if the marriage be dissolved by her death, it is against her estate and her representatives that her creditors must proceed to recover their debts, excepting in so far as the estate and effects of the husband have been completely attached by legal diligence for the wife's debts during the existence of the marriage. The imprisonment of the husband for the proper debt of the wife will not be continued after her death. There is only one circumstance, besides that of an effectual legal attachment of the husband's estate, which can continue the obligation against him, and that is his being lucratus, or a gainer by the marriage; but a reasonable tocher is not, in this case, held to be a gain sufficient to subject him to this burden. The whole moveable property of the wife during the marriage is under the management and at the disposal of the husband, not only her moveable estate, as already explained, but the interest of bonds due to her and the rents of her heritable estate; and he has farther a control over her person; she acts by his consent; he becomes her curator; and no suit can be carried on at her instance, nor can she be sued without his being made a party to the action. But this curatory differs from common curatory in this, that the husband may receive donations from the wife; and a deed by a husband and wife is not reducible on the head of lesion, as a deed by a minor and his curator is. See Curatory. Husbands are, by the Reform Act, as they were by the old law, entitled to vote in the election of a member of Parliament, in respect of property belonging to their wives, or possessed after the death of their wives, by the right of courtesy; 2 Will. IV., c. 65, §§ 6 and 11; Chambers' Election Law, h. t.; Connell on Election Laws, 152, 187. See Reform Act. The husband may recover the person of his wife from all that pretend to withhold her from him. She is not liable to personal diligence, unless for enforcing the performance of acts within her power, and which she is personally bound to perform. See *Ersk. Hypothec; is a security established by law in favour of a creditor over a subject belonging to his debtor, while the subject continues in the debtor's possession. The Roman law recognised many hypothecs over moveables; but the law of Scotland, having regard to the inexpediency of such liens in a commercial and trading country, admits of but few hypothecs. Hypothec may be considered as either Hypothec for Rents, or Maritime Hypothec.

Hypothec for rents.—The landlord's hypothec over the crop and stocking of his tenant is a tacit legal hypothec, existing independently of any special agreement or stipulation between the landlord and tenant. It gives a security to the landlord over the crop of each year for the rent of that year, and over the cattle and stocking on the farm for the current year's rent; which last may be made effectual at any time within three months after the last conventional term of payment of the rent. 1. Hypothec over the crop.—The rule in regard to the crop is, that each crop, so long as extant, and the property of the tenant, is hypothecated to the landlord for the rent of that year of which it is the crop, although the landlord should delay to exercise his right for years. But the crop of the current year cannot be hypothecated for the rent of the preceding year; although all the corn on the farm at that time may be retained as a security to the landlord for the rent of the current crop. This right of hypothec is necessarily attended with a right of retention, since, without this right, it would be of little value. Previous to the term of payment of the rent, the landlord is entitled to demand from a pouncing creditor either consignment of the rent, or caution that it shall be paid. After the term of payment, he can insist for no more than that enough of the crop be left to answer his right of hypothec. He is entitled de recenti to vindicate the corn grown on the farm, even against bona fide purchasers, unless sold in bulk in public market. See the case of the Earl of Dalhousie v. Dunlop & Co., Feb. 27, 1828, 6 S. 626; Affirmed in the House of Lords, Dec. 7, 1830, 4 W & S, 420. There is no such right of vindication against the purchasers of stocking. 2. The cattle and stocking on the farm.—The cattle differ from the crop in this respect, that they stand hypothecated for the current year's rent only; and as some time after the term of the payment of the rent must be allowed for rendering this right effectual, practice has allowed three months after the last conventional term of payment for that purpose. Where the cattle have been carried off within that period, the landlord must bring his action against the poinder before the expiration of the three months, in order to preserve his right of hypothec. It is proper to observe, however, that this right of hypothec over cattle is general over the whole, and does not prevent the sale of one or more of a stock for a fair price, unless the landlord has attached the cattle by a sequestration, which has the effect of giving the landlord a lien over each of them. But although the sale of the cattle is not prohibited prior to a sequestration of the stocking, the landlord's right of hypothec over the cattle is sufficient, without sequestration, to prevent a creditor from pointing them during the currency of the period for which the hypothec remains, that is, until the expiration of the three months after the last conventional term of payment. Where lands are subset, the right of hypothec will be affected by the situation of the subtenant. If there has been a power given to subset, or if the landlord has known of the subset, a payment by the subtenant, at the proper term of payment, to the principal tenant, will free the crop from the claim of the landlord, provided the subtenant has not been legally interpellated by the landlord from making payment. Unless, however, the subtenant stand in this favourable situation, there is a great chance that he may be forced to pay over again; that is, that his crop may stand hypothecated for the rent due by the principal tenant; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 56, et seq. See also Bell on Leases, vol. i. p. 360, et seq. 3. Hypothec on the invecta et illata.—This is an hypothec competent over furniture, for house-rents, and over the goods in shops, and the instruments of manufacture necessary for the different branches of business carried on in mills, warehouses, &c. This hypothec is necessarily general, and must be made special by a sequestration. All purchases in a shop may be safely paid for by the purchaser, without any risk of a claim of restitution, or of the purchaser's being made liable to pay the price a second time; Ersk. ib. § 64; Bell on Leases, vol. i. p. 387, in note. It is still an open question, whether the landlord's hypothec extends over an agricultural tenant's furniture. A cautioner for rent may, on paying the rent to the landlord, insist for an assignation to the hypothec. But the landlord will not lose his recourse on the cautioner by neglecting to enforce his hypothec. The landlord is not entitled to a preference over the superior claiming his feu-duties, nor over farm-servants' wages, nor over funeral expenses, nor over the Crown. See Crown Debts. Privileged Debts.

2. Maritime hypothec.—The seamen have a tacit hypothec, in security of their wages, over the freight due to the owners of the ship. They have also a hypothec over the ship itself, or rather a lien or jus retinendi et insistendi in relation to it, in virtue of which, although the seaman may lose his personal action if the owners earn no freight, he will have his claim against the ship to her last plank! The shipowner has a tacit hypothec over the cargo for the freight of that cargo. And there is likewise a hypothec to freighters, which gives security over the ship to the owners of the goods, for loss by improper interruption of the voyage; or for damage done by improper stowage, &c. There is no hypothec for the price of a ship; but the repairers of a ship have an hypothec over the ship for the repairs. This, however, has latterly been confined to such repairs as have been made in a foreign port; July 29, 1788, Hamilton; Affirmed on Appeal; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 34. See also Bond of Bottomry. Bond of Respondentia.

3. Agent's Hypothec.—The right which a law-agent has to retain his employer's writs and title-deeds, in security of his professional account, is sometimes, although incorrectly, called a right of hypothec. It is more properly a mere right of retention, or general lien, depending upon the possession of the writs retained. This right does not entitle the agent to retain, in security of advances unconnected with the particular employment in which he has been engaged. But, even as so limited, the right has been carried so far as, in the opinion of some lawyers, unduly to encroach on real rights constituted in favour of parties who have trusted to the records. A country agent's right of hypothec on his employer's title-deeds, covers the account of the Edinburgh agent employed by him for his client; Walker v. Phin, 8th June 1831, 9 S. & D. 691. In another case, the creditors of an ancestor, holding heritable bonds with powers of sale, and a law-agent holding the title-deeds hypothecated, having offered to the trustee on the bankrupt estate of the heir (who had made up no title), to give him either full inspection of the title-deeds, or actual delivery of them, on payment or caution for their debts, were found not bound to deliver them up on any other condition; Dobie v. Scales, May 19, 1831, 9 S. & D. 609. This right of retention does not stop prescription of the debt in security of which it is exercised. See, on this subject, Bell's Com. ii. 35, et seq. A right more properly of the nature of hypothec, is the preference which a law-agent enjoys for the costs of suit, over the costs recovered by his client from the adverse party. This is a right which does not depend on the agent's possession of the document of debt, or of the decree. This preference does not extend over the principal debt decreed for in a decree in favour of the client, as to which the agent is in no better situation than an ordinary creditor. See, on hypothec generally, Stair, B. i. tit. 13, and B. iv. tit. 25; More's Notes, p. lxxx. et seq.; Brodie's Supp. 953; Bank. vol. i. p. 386, et seq.; Bell's Com. ii. 25, et seq.; 39, et seq.; i. 513, 525, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 1233, et seq.; 701, 1385, et seq.; Illust. § 1388, et seq.; 698, 1233, 1275; Bell on Leases, i. 360, et seq.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant. An unsuccessful party cannot plead compensation against a decree for expenses to the prejudice of the agent of the successful party, Millar v. Glass, June 22, 1848, 10 D. 1384; Bain v. Wotherspoon, Dec. 12, 1850, 13 D. 305; Ross's Lect. i. 460; ii. 420. See Expenses. Lien. Retention. Pledge.

An agent is not entitled to an hypothec over titles of an heritable property belonging to his client, for business accounts as against a prior creditor holding a bond over the property, if the titles did not come into his possession until after the agency had closed, and not in the course of his employment as agent, Renny v. Myles, Feb. 8, 1847, 9 D. 619. LORD MACKENZIE observed: "A right of hypothec is against the general principles of our law. It is a special rule of law against the general rule of law. I sustain the right as far as it has gone in practice. It has gone a great way already, and I am unable to go farther. I know of no case where delivery was made after the business was ended. It would come to a violation of another principle, if we were but to allow this. No man can be allowed to give a preference to one creditor over another, at his own will and pleasure. Retaining his titles, his agent comes and says, 'You have it in your power to give me a preference, I have it not at present, but you may give it me, and I pray you to do it.' Does our law admit a proceeding of that sort, by which a debtor can pick and choose among his creditors at his pleasure. I cannot sanction anything so unusual, without seeing it supported by clear practice indeed." LORD FULLERTON,—"It has been found that the lien or pledge is available in favour of agents, even against heritable creditors. That was going far, but it is fixed by repeated decisions. It is also fixed, that the lien is available even in regard to parts of the accounts due before the title-deeds were put into the agent's hands. But then, there was no question about the fact of the agent being agent at the time when the deposit was made." See also the case of Murdoch v. Menzies, 15th Dec. 1841, 4 D. 257, and the case of Gray v. Wardrop's Trustees, May 21, 1851, 13 D. 963.

Idiots. An idiot, or fatuous person, is one "entirely deprived of the faculty of reason, having an uniform stupidity and inattention in his manner, and a childishness in his speech, which distinguishes him from other men." This state is to be ascertained by the verdict of an inquest, on a brieve directed to the judge-ordinary of the bounds within which the person resides. There are two heads in this brieve; the first relates to the state of the person—the second to the nearest male agnate. On the first head, it is not only necessary to inquire into the state of the person at the time of the inquest, but how long he has been in that state; for the act 1475, c. 66, provides that no alienation made by the person after the time fixed on by the inquest as the commencement of the distemper shall be valid. In this inquest it is necessary to produce the person to the jury, that they may judge of his condition; the date of the commencement, as well as the endurance of the disease, will be proved by the evidence of witnesses examined before the jury. Under the second head of the brieve, the jury is required to ascertain who is the nearest male agnate, of twenty-five years of age. The powers of the curator to an idiot are the same as those of tutors to pupils; and the curatory expires either by the death of the person cognosed, or by his recovering; the latter event being ascertained by a declaratory judgment of the Court. The brieves for cognosing an idiot or a furious person are nearly similar. They differ in the description of the circumstances into which the jury are to inquire. The question for the inquest in the brieve of idiocy is thus expressed, Si sit incompus mentis, fatuus et naturaliter idiota. The brieve of furiosity is expressed in these terms: Si sit incompus mentis, prodigus, et furiosus, viz. qui nec tempus, nec modum impensarum habet, sed bona dilacerando profundit. Where there is any doubt as to the proper character of the infirmity, brieves of both kinds may be taken out, and claims given in to the jury on both, so as to enable the jury to adapt their verdict to the one or to the other, according to circumstances; and the brieve to which the verdict applies will be the only one retoured to Chancery. See Kilkerran, Idiocy and Furiosity, No. 1, and Ersk. B. 1, tit. 7, § 48, et seq. See also Mr Ludovic Colquhoun's report of the case of Yoolow, 28th Jan. 1837, for an exceedingly interesting disquisition on the different degrees of mental infirmity, in reference to that case; the report of which also illustrates the mode in which the judicial inquiry is conducted, according to the present practice of the law of Scotland. See Brieve. Curatory. As a state of idiocy unfits the person for entering into transactions, a proof, even after his death, that the granter of a deed was an idiot at the time of granting it, will be sufficient for reducing that deed; and, according to Bankton, restitution, on the ground of idiocy, is competent to idiots against their curators within four years after their convalescence, in the same way that it is to minors; Bank. B. i. tit. 7, § 106. Idiots and furious persons, who have no lucid intervals, are inadmissible as witnesses in criminal cases. But the evidence of a person who has periodical fits of insanity, with long lucid intervals, may be received cum nota, as to any matter which occurred when he was in health; provided no fit of derangement have intervened; Hume, ii. 340. Insane persons are not liable to criminal prosecution, if their insanity amount to a total alienation of reason. It is also a sufficient excuse that the panel labours under an illusion which misleads his judgment in the particular case, though he may be aware of the distinction between right and wrong in general. Where there is a mixture of guilt and derangement in the commission of the crime, the course which Hume recommends is, that the jury should convict, with a recommendation to mercy. The plea of insanity is more readily received in crimes of a violent nature, than in such as require art and perseverance. The onus probandi lies upon the panel; and the insanity must have existed at the time, but need not be proved to have existed either before or after. If, however, there is no direct evidence applicable to the period, the situation of the panel, before and after committing the act, and the general nature of his malady, will form the grounds of determination. Where insanity is found proven by the jury, the prisoner, except in cases of delirium or other temporary bodily disease, is ordered to be confined until his friends find caution to keep him safely during the remainder of his life. If the prisoner is insane when brought to trial, the trial may be delayed till he is so far restored to reason as to be able to give information for his defence; Hume, i. 37, et seq.; Steele, 67; Alison's Princ. 645. In England, an idiot is one who has had no understanding from his nativity, and is by the law presumed likely never to attain any. A lunatic is one who has had understanding, but by disease, grief or accident, has lost the use of his reason. Indeed, a lunatic is properly one who has lucid intervals. But the general term, non compos mentis, as contradistinguished from idiot, comprises lunatics, persons under phrenzies, those who lose their intellects by disease, and those who become deaf, dumb, and blind. The Sovereign is guardian both of idiots and of persons non compos; standing, however, with regard to the latter, in the relation of a mere trustee, since their recovery is never despaired of. By the common law, there is a writ de idiota inquirendo, to inquire whether a man be an idiot or not, which must be tried by a jury of twelve men. If he is found novus idiota, the profits of his lands and the custody of his person may be granted by the Crown to a subject. A person is proved non compos mentis, in a similar manner. The Lord Chancellor, upon petition or information, grants a commission to inquire into his state of mind; and if he be found non compos, commits the care of his person, with a suitable allowance for his maintenance, to one who is called his committee; Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Stair, B. i. tit. 10, § 15; More's Notes, pp. xiv., clxxxviii., cxcv.; Bank. vol. i. pp. 166, 205, 352; ii. 248; iii. 47; Bell's Com. i. 132-6-7; ii. 166, 174, 567; Bell's Princ. § 2107, et seq.; *Kames' Stat. Id Tantum Possumus quod de Jure Possumus; a maxim applied by Stair to conditions in contracts impossible, because illegal. Stair, B. i. tit. 3, § 7; Bank. i. 63. See Condition.

Ignoramus. In the criminal law of England, ignoramus was the word formerly written on a bill of indictment, by the grand jury impanelled on the inquisition of criminal causes, when they rejected the evidence for the prosecution as too weak or defective to make good the presentment against a person, so as to put him on his trial. The words now are, Not a true bill, or Not found, and such a deliverance stays proceedings, and the prisoner is liberated without further answer. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 84; Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Ignorantia Juris. No person is entitled to plead ignorance of the law, though he may plead ignorance of the fact. Thus, by law a mandate falls on the death of the mandant; but should the mandatory, ignorant of the mandant's death, continue to act under the mandate, his acts will be effectual. On the other hand, should he continue to act after coming to the knowledge of his constituent's death, his acts would be invalid, though, under an error in law, he should bona fide believe that he was still legally entitled to act under the mandate. In this sense, a person may plead ignorance of the fact, but he will not be permitted to plead ignorance of the law. The distinction between ignorance of fact and of law is of much importance in questions as to condictio indebiti. See Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 41; Stair, B. ii. tit. 1, § 24; B. iv. tit. 1, § 50; tit. 45, § 17; More's Notes, p. xlix.; Bank. vol. i. pp. 215, 469; Brown's Synop. p. 950. See Condictio indebiti.

Illegal Contracts. See Pactum illicitum.

Illegibility; in a material part of a deed has often proved fatal to it. Thus a bond, in a material part of which half a line was obliterated and unintelligible, was annulled; and another was found not to be probative, the condition of which was partly scored and partly illegible. Ross's Lect. i. 146.

Illegitimate Children. See Bastard.

Imbargo. See Embargo.

Imbecility. Under this title in the Dictionary of Decisions are classed questions as to the validity of deeds granted by persons of weak intellect, or in such a state of mind or body, from the occurrence of some accident or overwhelming event, that they cannot be considered compotes mentis. Natural imbecility approaches to fatuity, but has not necessarily the same effect, a distinction being taken between an absolute idiot and a person who has some sparks of reason. The latter, it is said, may, without the consent of curators, execute deeds of lesser moment. In some cases the Court have, on the application of the friends of the party, for the appointment of a curator, remitted to the Lord Ordinary, to ascertain the state of the fact; and have granted or refused the application accordingly. This was done in one instance where there appeared in the party a singularity of behaviour, and a total neglect of his affairs; and in another, where the interposition was craved in behalf of a gentleman who, from great age and severe indisposition, had been reduced to a state of nearly total imbecility. In a subsequent case the appointment of a curator was resisted, in the name of the party said to be imbecile; and it was argued that he could not be deprived of his right to conduct his own affairs, unless regularly cognosced by a jury. The Court, however, having remitted to the sheriff to receive evidence, and being satisfied on his report, and after hearing in presence, of the necessity of a curator, sustained their appointment. And it is now settled, that in cases of imbecility and partial incapacity, which require protection, but in which no remedy by cognition and curatory can be obtained, the power of interposing, by appointing a judicial factor or curator bonis, is vested in the Supreme Court. See, however, the case of Lockhart, 17th July 1857, 19 D. 1075, where contrary medical certificates were produced. Where the imbecility of one who grants a deed amounts to little more than a weak and facile disposition, coincident fraud in the grantee is necessary to annul the deed. (See Facility.) But where the imbecility approaches more nearly to fatuity, the obligation, if of great importance, may be dissolved without the necessity of proving fraud. A man has been found to have sufficient understanding to make a testament, because that is revocable at pleasure; but he was judged incapable of signing a deed, disabling himself from making a second testament, as such a deed would strip him of all power over his effects. And the marriage of a person, not altogether void of reason, was reduced on the head of imbecility, the tie made by marriage being indissoluble. The Court, however, has gone a great length in supporting the obligation except where there was some suspicion of fraud, and where the contract was obviously such a one as a person of sound judgment would not have entered into. With regard to imbecility, induced by accident or otherwise, very severe disease, or lectus ægritudinis, has been held a ground of reduction; it having been repeatedly found relevant to reduce a deed or discharge subscribed by a woman, that it was offered to be proved to have been presented to her in childbirth pains. Æstus amoris in a bridegroom may be "pretended" as a ground to reduce grants in favour of a wife or her friends, but not in favour of parties unconcerned in the treaty of marriage. Luctus or grief is no defence. Imbecility is not necessarily an objection propoable to a witness's testimony, except where it would be plainly indecent and unreasonable to expose such an unfortunate person to the useless test of an examination. The degree of intelligence necessary to make such a person a credible witness, depends in a great measure on the nature and circumstances respecting which he is tendered to give evidence. Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 48, notes, and 240 (Ivory); Bell's Princ. § 14, 2113; Kames' Equity, 66; Tait on Evidence, 343. See Idiots. Insanity. Facility. Interdiction.

Immemorial; beyond the memory of existing men. When a custom has been proved as far back as the memory of man, the same custom is presumed beyond memory. Thus, where the rate of the multure is not specified in the deed of thirlage, the quantity due may be established by mere possession for forty years. According to Stair,—"forty years is equivalent and always equiparate to immemorial possession." But possession for a much shorter period may be considered immemorial. Thus, in a constitution of thirlage, possession being proved for twenty-eight years backward, and nobody being found of age to prove further back, anterior possession was presumed, to complete prescription. Immemorial practice in a burgh, of levying particular duties, upon a preceding title in writing, to tolls and customs in general, was found relevant to support the exaction. So also, where there was doubt as to the comprehensiveness of the words of the grant, immemorial possession and practice were found relevant to support the exaction, as well as the mode of levying the duties. Stair, B. ii. tit. 7, § 2; B. iv. tit. 27, § 9; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 30; Brown's Synop. pp. 308, 1594-5.

Immoral Contracts. See Pactum illicitum.

Impeachment; an accusation and prosecution for treason and other high crimes and misdeameours. The House of Lords has an original jurisdiction in criminal matters, exercised over either Peers or Commons, upon impeachment by a member of the Lower House. Articles are exhibited on behalf of the Commons, who appoint managers to make good their charge. These articles are carried to the Lords; and if they find the accused guilty, no pardon under the Great Seal can be pleaded to such an impeachment. Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 8; 12 Will. III., c. 2.

Impignoration. See Pledge.

Implied Condition. See Condition. Legacy.

Implied Discharge and Renunciation. The granting of a receipt for a single year's rent or feu-duty, without any reservation of arrears, raises a presumption that no arrear is due. But the presumption rises much higher when the creditor has, for three successive years or terms, granted receipts for rents or feu-duties, without reservation of arrears; these discharges, when written, applying each to a whole term's or year's rent, and granted all by the same person, being held equivalent to a discharge of arrears. Provided they have been granted by the same person, it is of no consequence although they have been granted to different persons. The presumption may be elided by reference to the debtor's oath, or stronger presumptions that the arrears are due. With regard to the discharge of a cautioner implied by the creditor's negligence, or his granting a discharge to the debtor or a co-cautioner, see Cautioner. See also Bell's Com. i. 359. The accepting of or acquiescence in a tack, or other inferior right, has been found to imply a renunciation of any claim to a higher right. Taking a right to a second tack from a third party, does not imply a passing from the former, unless the posterior tack had a greater duty or shorter endurance; and the tacksman paid the greater duty, or declared expressly that he stood by the latter tack. But accepting a second tack from the granter of the first, bearing a different commencement and duty, was found to import a passing from the former. An irritant clause is, in the general case, held to be purged by him who seeks declarator of irritancy, having acted subsequently to the contravention, as if the irritancy had not been incurred. The granting of a bond for a sum of money, in satisfaction of all which the grantee could ask or name, was found to annul a previous bond for a smaller sum. The question, whether conventional provisions imply a discharge of legal provisions, must depend much upon the circumstances of the case, and frequently on the presumed intention of the granter to supersede or only to increase the legal provision.

Implied Warrandice. Formerly under the implied warrandice of the contract of sale, the buyer, on discovering that the commodity purchased had a latent defect of such a nature that had he been made acquainted with it, he would not have become a purchaser, might have returned the article, and brought an action against the seller for repetition of the price. This action required to be raised de recenti, as otherwise the presumption was that the purchaser was satisfied with his bargain. By the law of England the purchaser had not this remedy unless the seller had given express warrandice. And by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act (19 & 20 Vict., c. 60, § 5) the law of Scotland has been assimilated to that of England in this respect. *Brown on Sale, p. 285; Ersk. Impotency; is a ground on which a marriage may be declared void, as having been in truth no marriage at all. Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 7; Stair, B. i. tit. 4, § 6. See Marriage. Divorce.

Impressment. The Crown is, in compliance with long-established custom, empowered, by the annual Mutiny Act, to grant commission for the impressment of men for the sea service. Blair's Justice of Peace, voce Seamen. See also Tail's and Hutch. Justice of Peace; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Seamen.

Imprisonment. Imprisonment or incarceration may proceed either in virtue of a criminal or of a civil warrant. Criminal warrants are issued for the purpose of arresting the supposed offender, when a crime has been committed; and where imprisonment is part of the punishment, the sentence of the criminal court is the warrant for the convict's detention. Any sheriff, justice of peace, or other magistrate, may grant warrants for apprehension, although he has himself no jurisdiction in the trial of the crime committed. (See Criminal Prosecution.) Civil warrants are granted for the apprehension of a debtor. There are various civil warrants on which imprisonment may proceed, such as the act of warding, the medietio fugæ warrant, letters of caption, and the warrant now inserted in decrees in terms of the Personal Diligence Act, 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114. The last mentioned is now the principal civil warrant, as to which, see Execution of Decree. With regard to letters of caption, which were formerly the only form of enforcing the civil decrees by imprisonment, excepting acts of warding, see Caption. The imprisonment for a civil debt consists in different acts, to which it is necessary to pay attention, since the Bankrupt Acts attach very important effects to imprisonment, by making it one of the equivalents of legal bankruptcy. See Bankrupt. The first step regularly is, for the messenger, with his blazon displayed, to touch the shoulder of the debtor with his wand, and to tell him that he is his prisoner. It is not absolutely essential, however, to the constitution of imprisonment, in the sense of the act 1696, c. 5, that the officer should make use of his wand of peace. See the case of Scott, 18th January 1855, 17 D. 292, where much information on this subject will be found. After this, should the debtor attempt to escape, or even take refuge in the sanctuary of Holyroodhouse, the messenger may follow him there, and take him out of sanctuary, and convey him to prison. The act of incarceration is the next step to that of the debtor's apprehension; and this consists in the messenger's actually lodging the debtor in prison. On this occasion, the messenger either leaves the caption in the hands of the jailor, or makes a copy of it, and certifies it; at the same time he enters the prisoner's name in the books of the jail, either for the whole or a certain portion of the debt, for which a fee is paid to the jailor. It is for the sum entered in the books that the magistrates are liable, should the prisoner make his escape; and if the debtor pays the sum entered against him in the books, he is free. See Booking a Prisoner. Escape. It commonly happens, however, that neither of those steps is taken. In the ordinary case, the diligence is put into the hands of the messenger, with directions as to the terms of settlement which will be accepted: and, in consequence of this power, he takes the debtor to a tavern or coffee-house, or to the messenger's chambers, in order, if possible, to obtain a settlement according to his instructions. Those are the transactions which are so apt to raise doubts as to what constitutes legal imprisonment; and, until some more precise legislative provision has been made, it is the duty of persons acting for creditors to have those difficulties in view when instructing the messenger to execute personal diligence. See Apprehending a Debtor. The messenger, without a special mandate, has no right to receive payment; his duty, qua messenger, is merely to execute the diligence; therefore, if the debtor make payment to a messenger, he does it at his own risk, and may be called on by the creditor to pay a second time, should the messenger retain the money. On the other hand, if the express instructions of the messenger's employer authorise the messenger to receive payment of the debt, the messenger's receipt will be an effectual discharge to the debtor; and the cautioner for the messenger, in case of the misapplication of the money, will not be liable for what may have thus come into the hands of the messenger. Stair, B. iv. tit. 47, § 16; More's Notes, p. cccxxx.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, § 12, et seq.; Bank. vol. i. p. 64; Bell's Com. ii. 536, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 2395, et seq.; *Hutch. Improbation; is the disproving and setting aside of writs ex facie probative on the grounds of falsehood or forgery. The form of process by which this is generally done is an action of reduction-improbation; but improbation may also be proposed by way of exception. The action of reduction-improbation requires the concurrence of the Lord Advocate, whether the falsehood and forgery alleged be real or only constructive; but the Lord Advocate cannot withhold his concurrence. See, on the subject of Improbation, Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, §§ 18, 19; Stair, B. iv. tit. 20; tit. 40, § 39; Bank. vol. ii. p. 637; *Kames' Stat. Improvements. See Meliorations. And as to improvements on entailed estates under the stat. 10 Geo. III., c. 51, see Tailzie.

Improving Lease. When, from the dilapidated state of a farm, and the exhaustion of the soil, it would require much labour and outlay to prepare it for successful cultivation, it is usual, for the sake of encouraging the tenant to improvements, by the hope of reaping the benefit of them, to grant him a lease of more than ordinary duration. Such a lease is called an improving lease, and is generally double the length of an ordinary lease. A lease of ordinary endurance is a lease for nineteen or twenty-one years; and an improving lease is usually for thirty-eight or forty-two years. In improving leases, the doctrine of the landlord's delectus personæ is excluded; and in the absence of stipulation to the contrary, the tenant's assignee, or heirs, or creditors, are entitled to possess under the lease, or to demand a compensation for being deprived of it. For the form of an improving lease, see Bell on Leases, ii. 186. As the power of granting leases of more than ordinary duration is strictly limited in many deeds of entail, the act 10 Geo. III., c. 51, empowers the heir in possession to grant leases of thirty-one years, or fourteen years and a life, or two existing lives; the tenant being bound, in leases for two lives, to inclose one-third of the lands in ten, two-thirds in twenty, and the whole in thirty years. In leases of more than nineteen years, the tenant must be bound to inclose one-third of the lands before the expiration of one-third of the lease, two-thirds before the expiration of two-thirds, and the whole before the expiration of the lease. No one inclosed arable field shall exceed forty Scotch acres, and all the fences must be kept and left in good repair. By § 5 of the same act, what are called building leases may be granted, not exceeding ninety-nine years, under the following provisions:—1. That the lease be of five acres, and no more, to one person, not being within 300 yards of the mansion-house. 2. That it be void if a house to the value of L.10 shall not be built on each half acre within ten years. 3. That the houses be kept tenantable and in repair. 4. That the rent be not under the former rent, and without grassum. Bell's Princ. § 1214, 1764; Bell on Leases, i. 73, 129; ii. 186, 368; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, i. 71, 114. See Lease. Tailzie.

By 20 and 21 Vict., c. 26, leases for thirty-one years and upwards may be registered, and such recorded leases are effectual under certain regulations against singular successors without possession.

Incapacity. See Idiocy. Imbecility. Facity. Insanity. Evidence.

Incest; is defined by Erskine to be "an unnatural commixtion of the bodies of man and woman, contrary to the reverence due to blood." It applies to all who stand within the degrees of consanguinity or affinity within which marriage is by law prohibited. But it is not committed by connection with bastard relations how near soever. It is essential to the crime that the accused knew of the relationship; but the onus of proving ignorance lies upon him. Incest is a capital offence, and the attempt to commit it is punishable arbitrarily. The punishment of incest in recent cases has been transportation for life. Neilson, 1855, 2 Irv. 235; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 56; Hume, vol. i. p. 441, et seq.; Steele, 181; Alison's Princ. 562; Bank. i. 145; *Kames' Stat. Incident Diligence. Letters of incident diligence in the Court of Session, are signet letters authorised by the Court, to be issued incidentally in the course of a process, for the purpose of compelling the attendance of witnesses or havers, to bear evidence, or to exhibit and produce writings. By 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 25, it is unnecessary to obtain a formal extract of diligences; and a certified copy of the interlocutor granting the diligence is declared to have the same force and effect as an extract. Such diligences seem also, at one time, to have been used for the purpose of bringing new parties into the field; but the only example of this in modern practice, is in the process of ranking and sale, where, in the event of the death of the debtor, or of any of the creditors who have appeared, their heirs may be cited on a diligence, without waiting the expiration of the tempus deliberandi, or transferring the process passive against them. In the case of parties interested, as being liable in relief or otherwise, it was also customary, by the older practice, to intimate the dependence of the action by incidental diligence. This, however, is now done by an interlocutor ordering the cause to be intimated, without a diligence or extract; a mere certificate of intimation being sufficient evidence of the notice. And when the interest of the party is more important, a supplementary summons is required; for, according to the old rule, no decree could issue against a party called by an incident diligence. Neither (with the above exception) is this a competent mode of transferring an action against the representative of one of several defenders, or against the husband of a party who has married during the dependence of the action. In the inferior courts, incidental diligences are issued under the warrant of the inferior judge: and if the witness or haver live beyond the jurisdiction of the court, letters of supplement will be obtained in the usual manner. See Supplement. On the subject of this article, see Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 52, and Note by Mr Ivory; Bank. vol. ii. p. 626; Stair, B. iv. tit. 20, § 9; tit. 33, § 2; tit. 41, § 4; *A. Incidental Jurisdiction. Where, in order to enable him to pronounce a definitive judgment in an action brought before him, a judge finds it necessary to decide questions which do not fall under his original cognizance, he may determine them incidentally; his sentence having no further effect in that incidental question, than to support his judgment or explicate his jurisdiction in the original cause carried on before him. Thus, a sheriff need not stay process for want of jurdiction, because forgery is alleged in an action to which he is confessedly competent,' but may judge in the forgery incidenter. See Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 8.

Inclosures. The act 1661, c. 41, enables a proprietor to force a conterminous proprietor to concur with him in mutually inclosing their property. And, accordingly, the conterminous heritors must, under this statute, mutually bear the expense of making a march-dike or proper fence. But there is an exception in the case of a feuar or small proprietor, whose lands do not exceed five or six acres. Where the march is crooked, application may be made to the judge-ordinary to straighten it, and determine the compensation to which either may be entitled, by the operations necessary in straightening the march. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 75; B. iv. tit. 27; Ersk. Planting and Inclosing.

Incompetency; was formerly one of the grounds on which a cause might be brought from an inferior court, by advocacy, to the Court of Session. Under incompetency was included not only want of jurisdiction, but every ground of declining a jurisdiction, arising either from privilege in the party or suspicion of the judge. Stair, B. iv. tit. 37, § 12. The act 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 24, 1853, limits the power to advocate to interlocutors sisting process, giving interim decree for payment of money, or disposing of the whole merits of the cause. See Advocatation. Declination.

Incorporation; is an association for the purpose of trade or manufactures, established by grant from the Crown. Incorporations are perpetual, if their duration be not limited by the grant or charter. The majority of the members of the incorporation may make bye-laws. The share of the individual partner transmits to his representative on his death, and may be transferred during his life, to the effect of rendering the dispositive one of the incorporation. Incumbrances. However unexceptionable the titles to land may be, the land may be burdened with incumbrances, and these the seller is bound to discharge, the purchaser being entitled to retain the price until this is done. The burdens by real security remain as incumbrances on the land, although extending beyond the price which the purchaser has agreed to pay; and a receipt from the creditors whose debts are paid off, with a discharge of the price by the seller, will not free the land. But, in judicial sales, and in sales under the Sequestration Act, the burden is limited to the amount of the price. Payment of the price to creditors as ranked in the judicial sale disburdens the land; and, in sequestration, payment of real securities to the amount of the price, with a discharge by the trustee, completely disencumbers the land. The real burdens which are to be discharged from the price before the trustee draws any part of it, are such only as are preferable to the disposition or decree vesting the estate in the trustee. Inhibition does not fall under this description, the Bankrupt Act declaring that the adjudication or conveyance to the trustee shall not be struck at by any prior inhibition; and hence the purchaser is not entitled, before paying the price, to insist for a discharge of the inhibition. The purchaser's right of retention until incumbrances be purged, may be, by stipulation, limited to a certain number of years; or, if the years of prescription have expired, and warrandice be given, with caution to relieve, the Court will in equity interpose to order payment of the price. In the case of a voluntary sale by trustees, in terms of which the purchaser was not bound to pay the price till incumbrances were purged, the Court, when the purchaser had been in possession for six years, ordered that the annual rents of the price should be paid to the trustees, to be by them laid out at interest till the incumbrances were purged. In another case, L. Clunie, 20th July 1626, Mor. 543, the Court found that the purchaser possessing the land and retaining the price was liable in payment not only of the interest, but of the excess of the profits of the subject above the interest. Bell's Com. ii. 417-8; Bell's Princ. § 892; Illust. ib.; Brown on Sale, 200. See Burdens. It is of importance for a lender on heritable security, or a purchaser, to discover the incumbrances which affect the borrower's or the seller's estate. This is effected by a search for incumbrances, some practical directions as to which will be found under the article, Search of Incumbrances.

A sale by an heritable creditor in virtue of a power of sale in his bond and disposition, and carried through under the provisions of the act 10 and 11 Vict., c. 50 (1847), has the effect of completely disencumbering the lands of all securities and diligences posterior to the security of the creditor who sells, as well as of the security and diligence of such creditor himself. See Heritable Securities.

Indebiti Solutio. The payment of what is not due, when made from ignorance or mistake, may be recalled. See Condictio Indebiti, and authorities there cited.

Indecent Exhibition. Any gross lewdness publicly practised, or indecent exhibition, is an indictable offence. Hutch. Just. of Peace, ii. 331; Shaw's Digest.

Indecent Practices; by which the morals of female pupils are corrupted, have been repeatedly punished with scourging or transportation for seven years. Hume, i. 309; Steele, 114; Alison's Princ. 225. See Lewd.

Indefinite Payment; is where a debtor is due several debts to one creditor, and he makes a payment to the creditor, without specifying to which of the debts he means the payment to be ascribed. The rules which are adopted in this case have in view the interest of the creditor more than that of the debtor. Thus, if there be one debt secured by inhibition, and the other not, the payment is ascribed to the debt unsecured. But this does not happen where the security is an adjudication, because the rigorous nature of that diligence may carry off the estate of the debtor; and, therefore, the payment will be imputed to account of the debt covered by the adjudication. Again, where one debt bears interest, and another does not, the indefinite payment is applied in extinction of the debt which does not bear interest; and indefinite payments must always be applied in extinction of interest before being applied to principal sums. Where a cautioner is bound for one debt, and another debt is unsecured, although the interest of the creditor might lead to the application of the payment in extinction of the debt unsecured, yet the interest of the cautioner counterbalances that consideration, and equity divides the payment between the cautioner's debt and the others. It has also been decided that a creditor cannot apply the payment in such a manner as to leave the debtor exposed to penal consequences. The payment cannot be ascribed to a disputed debt, nor, on emerging circumstances, can it be applied differently from what was understood at first. A dividend from a sequestrated estate cannot be applied otherwise than to the whole debt. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 2; Stair, B. i. tit. 18, § 3; More's Notes, pp. cxxvii. cclxxv.; Brodie's Sup. p. 940; Bell's Com. ii. 535; Bell's Princ. § 562; Illust. ib.; Tait's Just. of Peace, voce Payment; Kames' Equity, 265.

Indemnity. Acts of indemnity, after rebellions, have been passed for quieting the minds of the people, and throwing former offences into oblivion; but it has been made a question whether those acts were meant only to protect against criminal prosecutions, or also against civil actions for reparation of damages suffered by individuals. Acts of indemnity are passed every session of Parliament for the relief of those who have neglected to take the necessary oaths, &c., required to qualify them for their respective offices. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 106; Kames' Stat. Law, h. t.; Hutch. Just. of Peace, i. 48.

Indenture; in the law of England, is a writing containing some contract, agreement, or conveyance between two or more persons, indented in the top (according to the older definition) to correspond with another part having the same contents. As contradistinguished from a Deed poll, an indenture is a bilateral or other deed of the nature of a contract, whereby the parties undertake reciprocal obligations, whereas a deed poll is unilateral. Tomlins, h. t. See Deed Poll.

Indentures. This term is in our practice commonly applied to the mutual contract between master and apprentice, by which the master becomes bound to teach the apprentice his trade or profession, and the apprentice to give his time and services, and to pay an apprentice fee. Where the apprentice is a pupil, his father, tutor, or some kinsman, becomes bound for him; but where the apprentice is a minor pubes, he will be bound by his indentures entered into with the consent of his curators, if he has curators, or, if he has no curators, by himself alone. At the same time, indentures may be set aside on the head of minority and lesion. Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 62; Bank. vol. i. p. 58; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. voce Writ.; *Hutch. India. The act transferring the government of India to the Crown is 21 and 22 Vict., c. 106.

Indictment; is the form of process by which a criminal is brought to trial at the instance of the Lord Advocate. It runs in the name of the Lord Advocate; and addressing the panel directly by name, charges him with being guilty of the crime for which he is to be brought to trial. Although this be the form peculiar to those criminal prosecutions raised by the Lord Advocate alone, yet, where a private party joins in the prosecution, his name may be added to that of the Lord Advocate. But where the private party is the principal prosecutor, although he has the concurrence of the Lord Advocate, it is not in the form of an indictment that he brings his action, but in the form of criminal letters, which are letters running in the name of the Sovereign, passing under the signet of the Court of Justiciary, and addressed to messengers-at-arms, stating the crime, and containing a command to the officers to whom the letters are directed, to summon the person accused, to appear and underlie the law, and also for summoning witnesses and a jury. These letters are sometimes used even in prosecutions at the instance of the Lord Advocate, where the accused party is not in custody. See Criminal Letters. Criminal Prosecution. Concourse. The indictment is prepared in a syllogistic form, in which the major proposition states the nature of the crime that is meant to be charged against the offender, and, in general, that it is severely punishable; the minor proposition states the offence actually committed, and avers that it constitutes the crime stated in the major proposition; the conclusion is, that on the panel's conviction by the jury, he ought to suffer the punishment inflicted by law on the crime. See Major. The indictment is executed by messengers-at-arms, by macers of Justiciary, or even by sheriff-officers, where the indictment is contained in what is termed the Porteous Roll, or presentment by the county; but, in this last case, there must be a precept from the sheriff. The execution is made by serving the accused with a full copy of the libel, with a notice attached, requiring him to appear and underlie the law for the crime set forth in the libel, and that within fifteen days. This notice must be subscribed by the officer who serves it, and by one person who shall witness the service; and it is not necessary for the officer to subscribe any other part of the copy of the libel; 9 Geo. IV., c. 29, § 6. There must also be served on the accused a copy of the list of names and designations of the witnesses who are to be examined against him, and of the names of the assize who are to pass on his trial; and no witness or juror whose name is omitted, can competently be examined as a witness, or can act as a juror on that libel. The style of an indictment will be found in Alison's Prac. 212. See also Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 87, et seq.; Hume, ii. 148, et seq.; Bell's Notes, p. 169; Bank. ii. 524. By the statute 11 and 12 Vict., c. 79, the record copies of indictments, instead of being in writing, according to the previous practice, may be printed, or partly printed and partly written, provided they are authenticated by the subscription of the Lord Advocate or of one of his deputes; and in the case of criminal letters, by the subscription of one of the clerks of court, according to the existing practice; § 1. Letters of diligence for the citation of parties, witnesses, and assizers, instead of requiring a bill and a deliverance thereon by one of the judges, are issued by the clerk of court, on exhibition of the indictment signed by the crown agent, and need not pass the signet; § 2. Indictments and other writs may be served and executed either by a macer or by a messenger-at-arms, "or by any sheriff-officer or steward's officer of the county or stewartry within which such service or execution shall be made; § 6." Objections to the relevancy of indictments must be stated and disposed of before the panel is called upon to plead; if it is found relevant, the panel is called upon to plead to the libel. In case he shall plead Guilty, the court is to proceed to pass sentence; and in case he shall plead Not Guilty, is to remit him, with the libel as found relevant, to the knowledge of an assize, and the case is to be otherwise proceeded with in ordinary form; § 9. See Criminal Prosecution. Execution. Diet. Circuit Court. Alibi. Locus Delicti. Production.

Indivisible. It is an exception to the action of removing, that the defender possesses the lands in question pro indiviso with other lands. But this is not relevant against removing from any subject of which there are daily profits divisible, as a coal-heugh or fishing. Neither is it relevant for a liferenter on her terce against the fiar of an indivisible tenement, for the heir may remove the relic and pay her a third part of the rent. So, if a tenement be possessed by several tenants pro indiviso, and having different houses, any of these tenants may be removed, and another put in his place, or the landlord may possess it. Indivisible rights fall to the eldest of heirs-portioners. See Heirs-Portioners. Brieve of Division. The stock of a company is held pro indiviso by all the partners in trust. Under the head "Indivisible" in the Dictionary of Decisions, are digested questions arising as to subjects legally indivisible, and part of which it is therefore incompetent to adopt without the whole. Thus, a decree-arbitral is indivisible, and when ultra vires compromissi, cannot be registered, even with respect to those parts of it which are within the submission. But this rule may be modified by circumstances. When an obligation to pay money would otherwise be null on account of informalities in the deed, such as being a deed notarially executed, but subscribed by only one notary or only three witnesses, the claim may be restricted to L.100 Scots, which is proveable by parole evidence. So also, a verbal legacy exceeding L.100 may be restricted to that sum. Other questions of a similar nature will be found in the Dictionary of Decisions and Brown's Synop. h. t. See also Stair, B. iv. tit. 26, § 8; Bank. ii. 115; Bell's Princ. § 353.

Indorsement, or Indorsation. This term was formerly used to signify the executions of messengers, which, being usually written on the back of the letters, were hence termed indorsements; but the term is now more generally applied to the transference of a bill, by the drawer or indorser putting his name on the back of the bill. See Execution. A bill, although it be not taken payable to the drawer "or order," is transferable by indorsement. The indorsation may be made by the creditor putting his name merely on the back of the bill, and this carries a right which is transferable by delivery alone, or by the creditor's filling up the indorsation, by putting above his subscription, "Pay the contents to A. B.," in which case it can be further indorsed by A. B. only. When there is no such order to pay to another, it is called a blank indorsement. Although a bill may have been stolen or fraudulently obtained by a previous holder, yet, if it has come onerously and fairly into the hands of the present holder, it will be effectual to him against the drawer, acceptor, and previous indorsees. Under the recent Mercantile Law Amendment Act, however (19 and 20 Vict., c. 60, § 15), the holder of such a bill or note suing or doing diligence thereon is bound to prove that he gave value for it, such proof being competent by parole evidence. By § 16 of the same statute, when any bill or note is indorsed after the date of payment, the indorsee is deemed to have taken it subject to all objections or exceptions to which it was subject in the hands of the indorser. It is held in England, that the creditor in a bill cannot indorse it in part, one reason for which seems to be, that it would subject the debtor to a double action for recovery of the debt. In Scotland, the precise question does not appear to have occurred. The indorser of a bill thereby gives the holder the same summary diligence and execution against himself for repetition of the amount, should the acceptor fail to retire it, as if he had accepted a new bill to the indorsee. But where a person has a bill vested in him for the mere purpose of recovering payment, and has occasion to indorse it, he may do so without rendering himself liable, by expressing the indorsement in this way: "Pay the contents to A. B. without recourse against me." A bill may also be indorsed "for my use," in which case, any one who discounts the bill must hold the contents as the money of the person interposing the restriction. A condition annexed to an indorsation is available against the acceptor, if the bill be accepted with such condition in the indorsement. Indorsation does not transfer to the indorsee prior diligence raised on the bill. Such diligence must be transferred by special assignation. The scoring of an indorsation reinstates the indorser, if intended to do so. The indorsation to a deposit receipt may be signed by a mark. Forbes's Exec. v. Western Bank, 1853, 16 D. 243, 807.

By the statute 18 and 19 Vict., c. 111, which proceeds on a preamble that, "Whereas, by the custom of merchants, a bill of lading of goods being transferable by indorsement, the property in the goods may thereby pass to the indorsee; but, nevertheless, all rights in respect of the contract contained in the bill of lading continue in the original shipper or owner, and it is expedient that such rights should pass with the property: and whereas it frequently happens that the goods in respect of which bills of lading purport to be signed have not been laden on board, and it is proper that such bills of lading in the hands of a bona fide holder for value should not be questioned by the master or other person signing the same on the ground of the goods not having been laden," it is enacted (1), that every consignee and every indorsee of such bills to whom the property shall pass by reason of such consignment or indorsement, shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit, and be subject to the same liabilities in respect of such goods, as if the contract in the bill of lading had been made with himself; (2), that no right of stoppage in transitu, or to claim freight against the original shipper or owner, and no liability of the consignee or indorsee, by reason of his being consignee or indorsee, or of his receipt of the goods, by reason of such consignment or indorsement, is to be affected by the act; and (3), that every bill of lading in the hands of a consignee or indorsee for valuable consideration representing goods to have been shipped, shall be conclusive evidence of such shipment, as against the master or other person signing the same, notwithstanding that the goods, or part thereof, may not have been so shipped, unless the holder shall have had actual notice at receiving the bill, that the goods had not been laden on board; provided that the master or other person signing may exonerate himself from such misrepresentation, by showing that it was caused without default on his part, and wholly by the fraud of the shipper or holder, or some person under whom the holder claims. *Ersk. Inducias Legales; or the legal inducias, are the days which intervene between the citation of a defender and the day of appearance in the action or process. These differ according to circumstances. In ordinary actions in the Court of Session, the days of appearance were formerly two diets of twenty-one and six days' warning, unless when the defender resided in Orkney and Shetland, in which case the induciæ were forty and six days. Where, again, the defender was out of the kingdom, he was cited on sixty and fifteen days. There are other actions which are termed privileged, which were formerly executed on shorter induciæ, as on fifteen or on six days: these required a bill. See Bills of Signet Letters. But by the statute 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 53, all summonses, after the 11th November, 1825, are directed to proceed on one diet; and by the act 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 21, all summonses before the Court of Session may proceed on fourteen days' warning where the defender is in Scotland, unless in Orkney or Shetland, and twenty-one days' warning where he is in Orkney or Shetland, or furth of Scotland, in place of the longer induciæ previously in practice; and such shorter induciæ are competent and sufficient in respect to all other letters passing the Signet bearing a citation, charge, publication, or service against persons within or furth of Scotland, and in respect to all edictal charges upon decrees and registered protests, without prejudice to shorter induciæ previously sufficient continuing to be sufficient. The same term is applied to the days which are allowed to a debtor to obey the command of letters of horning, and these vary according to circumstances. See Diligence. Charge on Letters of Horning. The induciæ of criminal letters and indictments are fifteen days. See Criminal Prosecution. Diet. As to the induciæ of general and special charges, see Charge. *Ersk. Induction of a Clergyman; was a term used in the times of Episcopacy. When the clergyman was inducted to his living, there were three acts: 1. Presentation by the patron; 2. Collation by the bishop, which signified his approbation; and, 3. Induction, which consisted in his being placed in the pulpit by a deputation of presbyters appointed by the bishop. These forms fell with the abolition of prelacy. Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 18; Bank. ii. 85. See Minister.

Industrial Accession; signifies the addition made to the value of a subject by human art or labour exercised thereon. The law of Scotland on this subject is derived from the Roman law; and in all cases of industrial accession, where one man adjoins or attaches his own property inseparably to that of another, the presumption is that he has done so bona fide. The modes of industrial accession usually enumerated are adjunction, specification and commixtion; and the general rule of law is that, where the addition is made bona fide, the gainer must indemnify the loser, on the obvious principle of equity. Nemo debet ex alieno damno lucrari. See Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 15. See Accession. Adjunction. Commixtion. Specification. Contexture.

Infamous. A person is said to be infamous who has been convicted of crimes that infer infamy, or who has been declared infamous by a sentence of the Court of Session or of Justiciary. Such a person was formerly inadmissible as a witness; but, by 1 Will. IV., c. 37, § 9, it is enacted, that where a person, who has been convicted of any crime (except perjury, or subornation of perjury), and has endured the punishment to which he has been sentenced, he shall not thereafter be deemed, by reason of such conviction or sentence, an incompetent witness in any court or proceeding, civil or criminal; and, by 15 Vict., c. 27, § 1, the objection of infamy as a ground for excluding a witness is altogether abolished. Infamy is inferred by all the crimina falsi, by theft and reset, and all capital crimes. A proof of conviction without a jury, which, though it did not, even before the passing of the above statute, disqualify a witness, yet affected his credibility, was allowed. Infamia juris, or the infamy proceeding upon conviction, was alone admitted to be proved. Infamia facti, or that proceeding from general bad character, or a crime for which the witness has not been convicted, could not be proved to the effect of excluding; but it might be elicited by questions put to the witness himself, and, in that case, affected his credibility. Hume, ii. 351, et seq., 471; Burnet, 397; Steele, 17; Alison's Princ. 482, 567; Prac. 385, 448, 451, 672; *Ersk. Infangtheft; "is a liberty or power, pertaining to him who is infest therewith, to cognosce upon theft committed by his own man taken within his own dominion and lands." Skene, h. t.

Infant. See Child-murder. Concealment of Pregnancy.

Infants. This term, in the law of England, is applied to every person under the age of majority. In Scotland, the term is not used in that sense. The periods of life distinguished by our law are three: Pupillarity, which reaches from the birth of the child to the age of fourteen in males and twelve in females; and during this period they are termed pupils:—puberty, which reaches from the termination of pupillarity to the age of twenty-one years, which is the period of majority in both sexes; and from that time forward the person is said to be of lawful age. Stair, B. i. tit. 5, § 3; tit. 10, § 13; Ersk. B. i. tit. 1, § 11; Bank. vol. i. p. 161, et seq., 200; vol. iii. p. 48; vol. ii. pp. 339, 669; Bell's Com. ii. 567; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See *Curatory. Infestment; may be said, correctly speaking, to be the act of giving symbolical possession of heritable property; the legal evidence of which is an instrument of sasine. But this distinction, in the colloquial language of the law of Scotland, is not always attended to. Anciently, infestment seems to have been synonymous with investiture; in which last sense it signified both the charter by which the superior conferred the right, and the sasine or infestment by which possession was given. There was in former times less room for any distinction, because the superior, by one and the same act, in presence of the pares curiæ, gave out lands to his vassal, and gave him sasine; and this was done without the intervention of writing, the evidence of the pares curiæ being that on which the rights of superior or vassal depended. In modern language, investiture is the term applied to the whole progress of titles, whereby the right is vested in the feudal proprietor. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 18; Stair, B. ii. tit. 3; More's Notes, p. clviii., et seq.; Bank. vol. i. p. 545, et seq.; Bell's Com. i. 681; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. h. t.; Ross's Lect. ii. 259. See Investiture. Sasine.

By the Infestment Act, 8 and 9 Vict., c. 35, 1845, infestment may be effectually obtained by producing to the notary-public the warrants of sasine and relative writs which are in use to be produced at taking infestment, and by expediting and recording in the appropriate register an instrument of sasine setting forth that sasine had been given in the lands, and subscribed by the notary-public and witnesses according to the form then in a schedule annexed to the Act. By the Titles to Land Act, 21 and 22 Vict., c. 76, 1858, instruments of sasine are no longer necessary, but the conveyances themselves may be recorded instead. See Titles to Land.

Infestment in Security. According to the modern use of the term, infestment in security is used to express an heritable bond and sasine, or a disposition in security and relative sasine, by which the creditor is infest in an annualrent out of the lands, corresponding to the principal sum, and in the lands themselves in security of the principal sum, interest, and penalty, or in the lands themselves redeemably, in security of the principal sum and interest. Stair, B. iv. tit. 35, § 24; More's Notes, p. ccx.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 8, § 35; Bell's Princ. § 901: Illust. ib. See Bond. Annualrent. Titles to Land.

Infestment of Relief. An heritable security to a cautioner or co-obligant, that he shall be relieved from the engagement he has come under, by which the cautioner is infest in lands, in security of such relief, is termed an infestment of relief. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 48; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 8, § 35; Bank. ii. 122. See Bond of Relief. Titles to Land.

Infensare curiam; “is when the judge informs the suitors in things whereof they are ignorant.” Skene, h. t.

Information. Under the old form of process in the Court of Session, an information was a written argument ordered by the Lord Ordinary, when he took a cause to report to the Inner-House. It served to explain to the Judges the circumstances of the case which the Lord Ordinary was to report, and to enable them to give their decision in the cause. The analogous pleading, according to the present practice, is called a Case. See Cases. In the Court of Justiciary, in cases of difficulty on questions of law and relevancy, the Court is in use to order Informations, on which the points raised are argued fully in writing. See Criminal Prosecution. As to Informations in the Exchequer Court, see 19 and 20 Vict., c. 56, § 7.

Information; in English law, is an accusation or complaint exhibited against a person for some criminal offence, either immediately against the Sovereign, or against some private person. It differs from an indictment in being only the allegation of the officer who exhibits it. Informations are either partly at the suit of the Crown, and partly at the suit of a subject, or only in the name of the Crown. The former are usually brought upon penal statutes, inflicting a penalty on conviction of the offender, one moiety to the Crown, and another to the informer. The latter are also of two kinds: First, Such as are properly the Crown's own suits, and are filed, ex officio, by the Attorney-General. The objects of such suits are enormous misdemeanours, tending to disturb or endanger Government. Secondly, Those in which, though the Sovereign is the nominal prosecutor, it is at the instance or promotion of some private person, or common informer. These are filed by the master of the Crown-office, under the express direction of the Court, and are directed against any gross misdemeanours, riots, &c., deserving of public animadversion. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Information and Presentment; in criminal process. See Circuit Court. Dittay.

Informers. Various statutes enact pecuniary penalties, and award part, or the whole, to the informer. In such a case it is usually provided that any person may prosecute; and then it is not necessary to qualify a peculiar interest, or to have the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal. An informer, entitled to a reward on conviction, is not inadmissible as a witness. Hunter, 1838, 2 Swinton, 1. And, in questions of defamation, a person informing against his neighbour as disorderly, or a thief, will be presumed to have done so to satisfy justice, or maintain good order. In England, by 18 Eliz., c. 5, it is enacted, that if a common informer wilfully delays his suit, or discontinues, or be nonsuited, or has a verdict or judgment against him, he must pay costs to the defendant. And 27 Eliz., c. 10, makes an informer compounding with an offender liable to be set on the pillory, to suffer fine and imprisonment, and to forfeit L.10. He is also disabled to sue popular actions for the future. The Lord Advocate and inferior public prosecutors in Scotland, may be compelled to give up their informers; and if the information was malicious, the informer will be liable in damages and expenses. *Ersk. Inhibition; is a writ passing under the Signet, whereby the debtor or party inhibited is prohibited from contracting any debt which may become a burden on his heritable property, or whereby his heritage may be attached or alienated to the prejudice of the inhibitors' debt. Like every other signet letter, the inhibition contains a narrative and a will. The narrative recites the ground of debt, and asserts that the debtor, knowing that the creditor will proceed against him with diligence, means to sell and dispose of his effects, unless a remedy be provided. On this narrative, the will of the letters inhibits the debtor from selling, annailzieing, wadsetting, dispensing, and so forth, his lands, teinds, heritages, &c.; and also from granting any deed, or contracting any debt which may affect his lands. The will farther prohibits the lieges from taking from the debtor any conveyance of his property, or any vouchers of debt; so that there is a double prohibition; one against the debtor, and the other against the public. This diligence may proceed on a liquid ground of debt, or on the decree of a court, or on a decree of registration; and it may also proceed on a depending action, or even on a conditional debt. But on whichever of these several grounds the inhibition is raised, a Bill must be presented to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, stating the nature of the debt, and craving warrant for the letters; which warrant is granted, as a matter of course, on production of the ground of debt, or of the executed summons.

In virtue of this Bill-Chamber warrant, letters of inhibition are expedite and signeted; after which they must be executed and published in the following manner: (1.) There must be a personal execution against the debtor, by a messenger-at-arms, in the usual manner, and with the formalities explained, voce Charge on Letters of Horning. (2.) The inhibition must be published at the head burgh of the shire where the debtor resides, or edictally, where the debtor is forth of the kingdom. This publication is also made by a messenger-at-arms, who, after crying three several oyesses at the cross of the burgh, reads over the letters of inhibition, and affixes there a copy of the letters and charges. (3.) The last requisite towards the completion of the diligence is registration. By the act 1581, c. 119, the letters and executions must be recorded in the books of the shire where the debtor resides, and of the county where his lands lie, which registration must take place within forty days from the day of publication of the inhibition. The act 1600, c. 13, gives the creditor an option to record the letters and executions in the General Register at Edinburgh; one advantage of which is, that when recorded in the General Register, the inhibition affects the debtor's lands wherever situated in Scotland; whereas, if the Particular Register be taken, there must be a registration in the books of every county in which the debtor has lands; otherwise the inhibition will have no effect, quoad the lands in the county, in the books of which it has not been recorded. The inhibition thus executed, published, and recorded, strikes against all the acts and deeds of the debtor falling within the words of the prohibition, done or granted posterior to the execution of the diligence. But the diligence is strictly personal to the party inhibited, and strikes against the debtor only. If he should die, his heir will not be affected by the prohibition, unless it be renewed against him.

The terms of the prohibition include moveables; but whatever may have been the intention when this style of the letters was originally introduced, the diligence has long been restricted to heritage, as above explained. This diligence, however, will affect not only the heritage belonging to the debtor at the date of its execution, but also future acquisitions, provided they be within the shire, in the books of which the inhibition has been recorded, or wherever they be, in Scotland, if the registration has been in the General Record. Inhibition strikes, however, only against the voluntary deeds of the debtor posterior to its execution, and not against debts or deeds, resulting from obligations previously contracted. Thus, if prior to the date of inhibition, the debtor has become bound, by minute of sale, to sell his lands, a disposition, in implement of that prior obligation, although executed posterior to the inhibition, will not be affected thereby. Neither will the inhibition strike at posterior judicial rights, such as an adjudication proceeding on a debt contracted prior to the date of the inhibition. It would even seem, according to some of the undernoted authorities, that it will not strike at a conveyance to trustees for behoof of creditors, or at a fair sale for an adequate price, to be distributed amongst the creditors. Another peculiarity in this diligence is, that it confers no active right on the creditor using it. It is an inert prohibition, merely negative in its operation; and although the creditor is entitled to reduce deeds to his prejudice, executed spreta inhibitione, he cannot rank on the debtor's estate in virtue of the inhibition per se. In order to give himself an active right, he must follow up his inhibition by an adjudication. Practically, no doubt, an inhibition becomes a very efficient diligence; since, so far as concerns voluntary sales, no purchaser will pay the price until the inhibitions appearing on the record are discharged. Still, if, apart from this indirect advantage, the creditor mean to take active steps, he must adjudge; and then his inhibition, followed by adjudication, will give him an available preference over all the creditors whose debts were contracted posterior to the execution of the inhibition. Prior personal creditors by bond, bill, or decree, antecedent to the date of the inhibition, may also adjudge, and will not be prejudiced by the inhibition. But if such personal creditors do not secure a pari passu ranking, by adjudging within year and day of the inhibiting and adjudging creditor, he will exclude them, in virtue, not of his inhibition, however, but of his adjudication. On the other hand, personal creditors, whose debts were contracted posterior to the inhibition, will be entirely excluded in competition with the inhibiting creditor. In the case of sequestration under the bankrupt statute, the trustee's right is not challengeable on the ground of any prior inhibition; but the effect which inhibitions may be entitled to in the ranking of creditors is saved; 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, § 102. It is thus, in strict principle, incorrect to describe inhibition as a real diligence. It is rather of the nature of a personal prohibition, which, by certain ulterior proceedings on the part of the inhibiting creditor, may secure him a preference on the debtor's heritage, in competition with posterior debts or contractions by the inhibited party. The following authorities, as to the nature, operation, and character of this diligence, about which many loose and inaccurate views prevail, may be consulted and considered: Stats. 1581, c. 119; 1597, c. 264 and 265; 1600, c. 13; 1672, c. 16, § 32; 1693, c. 14; *A. Inhibition against a Wife. This diligence is intended to notify to the public that the wife's legal præpositura over the domestic affairs has ceased; so that she may not longer have it in her power to burden her husband with the expense of domestic furnishings, usually falling within the wife's province. Like the inhibition for debt, this is a writ in the Sovereign's name passing the Signet, obtained upon a bill presented to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills; and it prohibits and discharges all and sundry from transacting with the wife, or from giving her credit. It is executed against her and against the public, and recorded like an inhibition by a creditor. The husband is not bound (how rigorous and harsh soever it may appear) to assign any reason for this step; nor will he be allowed, in the narrative of his diligence, to assign any grounds injurious to the wife. The consequence of this is, that the inhibition cannot be stopped by the wife, however little ground there may be for the measure. Its effects, though it saves the husband from liability for such furnishings as he can prove to have been otherwise made for the family, will not protect him against paying for those which are proper and necessary, and for which he has not otherwise provided. Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 26; Stair, B. i. tit. 4, §§ 15 and 17; B. iv. tit. 50, § 21; More's Notes, p. xxiii.; Bank. vol. i. p. 126; Bell's Princ. § 1566; *Jurid. Inhibition of Tithes; is a writ issuing either under the Signet or from the Commissary Court, by which the titular of teinds is enabled to interrupt the possession of a tenant of the teinds possessing by tacit relocation. In consequence of this diligence, the titular, in place of the teind-duty stipulated in the lease, is entitled to draw the full teind; and all concerned are discharged from meddling with the teinds. This founds an action at the instance of the titular, in which he will be entitled to the actual proven teind of each year, or where there is a valuation to the valued teind. *Ersk. Inhibition; in English law, a writ to forbid a judge from further proceeding in a cause depending before him. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Iniquity. This is a technical expression, usually applied to the decision of an inferior judge who has decided contrary to law; he is in that case said to have committed iniquity. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, § 41. See Advocacy.

Initialia Testimonii. It was formerly the practice before a witness was allowed to be examined in relation to the cause, to interrogate him in regard to his disposition towards the parties; whether he bore malice or ill-will to either of them; whether he had been instructed what to say, and had undertaken to give his evidence accordingly; whether he had received any bribe or reward for what he was to say, or had been promised any reward. This was called the examination of a witness in initialibus, by which the witness was said to be "purged of malice and partial counsel;" and where it was intended to oppose the examination of a witness on the ground that he was disqualified by ill-will, bribery, or the like, the evidence in support of the objection might be instantly brought forward. Where the opposing party could not bring immediate proof to disqualify the witness, it was the practice to protest for reprobaters; in consequence of which he might afterwards have brought an action of reprobator, in which he would have been allowed to bring evidence for disqualifying the witness.

Initial examinations are not now usual or necessary, but they are still competent; 3 and 4 Vict., cap. 59, § 2; and in certain circumstances are properly insisted in. Dickson on Evid. 906, 984; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 28; Tait on Evid., 424. See Evidence.

Initials. Subscription by. The initials of a party's name, adhibited to a writing, are, in some cases, held equivalent to subscription. Erskine says, it is seldom admitted as a ground sufficient by itself for supporting a subscription by initials, that the granter usually signed in that way; a proof by the instrumentary witnesses being also required that the granter did de facto sign the particular deed in question, at least if it be challenged during the life of instrumentary witnesses. A subscription by initials, however, with the attestation by one notary that the party could not write otherwise, and production of another writing by the same party subscribed in a similar way, was found good; and a cautioner's subscription by initials to a lease was sustained, it not being denied that the initials were those of the cautioner. This mode of subscription is inadmissible in the case of a witness. A bill subscribed by initials will not authorize summary diligence; but it will be a valid document of debt and a good ground of action, if, as in the case of other writings so subscribed, it be proved that the indorser de facto adhibited his initials, and that it was his usual mode of subscribing. Even when no such proof is brought, a bill signed by initials may be received as an adminicle in proof of the debt. *Ersk. Injunction; in English law, is a writ generally grounded upon an interlocutory order or decree, out of the Court of Chancery or Exchequer, sometimes to give possession to the plaintiff, in consequence of the defendant's failure to appear; sometimes to stop proceedings in a cause, upon the ground, that the rigour of the law, if it take place, will be against equity and conscience, or on similar grounds of equity. The writ of injunction is directed not only to the party himself, but to his counsellors, attorneys, and solicitors; and if any attorney, after having been served with an injunction, proceeds contrary to it, the Court of Chancery will commit him to the Fleet prison for contempt. But if an injunction be granted by the Court of Chancery in a criminal matter, the Court of Queen's Bench may dissolve it, and protect any one who proceeds in contempt of it. Bank. ii. 675; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. In Shand, Dow's App. Reports, ii. 523, and Goldie, ib. 536, the English reporter applies the word injunction to Scotch cases. See Interdict.

Injury. An injury is defined to be anything said or done with the intention of hurting, and which actually does hurt another in his person, character, or property. It is so called, as being an infringement of the natural right which every one has to safety in goods and person. It has been usual to make a division of injuries into verbal and real; the former comprehending wrongs which an individual suffers, in consequence of the words or writings of another; the latter, such as are inflicted by deeds. A verbal injury, pointed against a private person, consists in the uttering, or writing, of contumelious words which tend to vilify his character, or render it little or contemptible. For satire, though it does not blacken a man's moral character, but only places him in a ridiculous light, may be injurious. The animus injuriandi, which is of the essence of this crime, will be inferred from presumptions; and in general, it is presumed from the words themselves, especially where they are made use of to hurt one in his moral character, or to fix some particular guilt upon him, as if one should give his neighbour the name of thief, cheat, liar, &c. This presumption, however, may be either weakened or elided by special circumstances; e.g., if the expressions have been used in the heat of passion, with no previous or subsequent indication of a malicious purpose. Verbal injuries are punished by fine, according to the circumstances of the case. They also found a civil claim for damages or reparation, at the instance of the injured party, against him who has done the injury. A real injury is committed by doing anything which may hurt one's person, infringe his right of personal liberty, or affect his honour and dignity. The offender is liable both to a criminal prosecution, and to a civil action for reparation and solatium. Although, strictly speaking, no act ought to be called injurious, where there is not animus injuriandi, yet the term is frequently applied where there is reparation due on account of wrongs suffered through gross carelessness, the law holding such fault equivalent to malice. Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 1, et seq.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 13; B. iv. tit. 4, § 81; Bank. i. 248, 302; Bell's Princ. § 2028; Tait's Justice of Peace, h. t.; Blair's Justice of Peace, h. t.; Shaw's Digest, voce Reparation. Inland-Bills. An inland bill, is one drawn upon a person living in the same country with the drawer, either in favour of a third party or of the drawer himself. A bill drawn by a person in Scotland, on a person in England, or e contra, was formerly held not to be an inland bill; but by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act 1856 (19 and 20 Vict., c. 60, § 12), all bills drawn in any part of the United Kingdom, and made payable in or drawn upon any person resident in the United Kingdom are to be deemed inland bills. By § 14 of the same act, notice of dishonour is required in the case of inland bills, as in the case of foreign bills. Under § 13, notarial protest of such bills is unnecessary. Bell's Com. i. 419; Thomson, 2; Bell's Princ. § 308. See Bill of Exchange.

Inner-House; the name given to the chambers in which the First and Second Divisions of the Court of Session hold their sittings; applied also to the Courts themselves, and used in contradistinction to the Outer-House, or hall in which the Lords Ordinary sit to hear motions and causes. All causes commencing in the regular form by summons, or by notes of suspension or advocacy, arrive at the Inner-House after passing through the Outer-House. But there are some cases, which, though originating with summonses, are specially appropriated to the Inner-House, in the first instance, and in which no discussion takes place in the Outer-House, except by special remit from one or other of the Divisions of the Court. Such are actions of proving of the tenor and formerly reductions, actions of aliment, of cessio bonorum, and of cognition and sale. These causes, on appearing in the Outer-House rolls, are at once transmitted to the Inner-House; great avisandum, as it is technically called, being the first motion in such cases. The Inner-House has an original jurisdiction in all cases which commence by summary or incidental application, except notes of suspension and advocacy, which must be presented in the first instance in the Bill-Chamber. The whole Judges formerly sat together in the Inner-House; but the Court was, in 1808, divided into two Divisions; the Lord President and three ordinary Judges now forming the Inner-House of the First Division; the Lord Justice-Clerk and other three ordinary Judges forming the Inner-House of the Second Division; and the remaining Judges officiating as permanent Lords Ordinary in the Outer-House. During session, the Inner-House meets at 11 o'clock daily. There are four rolls in the Inner-House, the roll of single bills, the summary roll, the long roll, and the short roll. (See Rolls of Court.) The usual manner in which a cause comes into the Inner-House is by reclaiming note (see Reclaiming-Note); but there are several other modes. Thus, the Lord Ordinary, without himself pronouncing any decision, may report a case as it is expressed, which appears to be attended with more than usual difficulty or importance, to the Inner-House of the Division to which the cause belongs. After the record and papers are boxed (which must be done immediately after the warrant to enrol is granted), or after a reclaiming note is presented, the cause belongs to the Inner-House, where it is regularly enrolled by the keeper of the Inner-House rolls, in the Long or in the Summar roll, according to the nature of the case. The rules as to the preparation, lodging, and signing of papers, reporting of diligence, &c., are the same in the Inner as in the Outer-House. See Outer-House. The following regulations are peculiar to the Inner-House.

When causes are set down for advising in the Short roll (which is just a section of the Long roll put out daily for hearing), or in the Summar roll (which is the roll for summary cases), no delay will be granted on account of the absence of counsel or agent, except in the case of unexpected and necessary absence, and then only for such short time as may be necessary to instruct other counsel or agents; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 81. Where a party fails to lodge his paper within the time fixed, the cause may, immediately on the expiration of the time, be enrolled in the Summar roll; and judgment will be pronounced against the party so failing, in such manner, and to such extent, as may, in the form and circumstances of the process, be competently craved; unless in those cases where no prorogation has been previously granted, and where the party in default can satisfy the Court that a further time ought to be allowed him. But such prorogation can be granted only on payment of such previous expenses as the Court may judge reasonable; A. S. ib. § 80. See Default. The only other mode of obtaining a prorogation in the Inner-House is by application by Note to the Lord President of the Division. Parties or their agents cannot, in the Inner-House, as they may in the Outer-House, prorogate of consent the time for lodging papers ordered by either Division of the Inner-House; A. S. 18th Nov. 1829. See Prorogation. The most solemn mode of determining a cause in the Inner-House is after a hearing in presence. See Hearing in Presence. All interlocutors pronounced in the Inner-House are now final, no reclaiming against them being competent. In deciding the cause, the matter of expenses must also be determined; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 21. All acts pronounced in the Inner-House may be extracted immediately, without abiding the reading thereof in the Minute-book.

Under the Act 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 32, certain advocations and suspensions may be taken de plano to the Inner-House, on a motion by either party before the Lord Ordinary at the first calling of the cause. By the statute 20 and 21 Vict., c. 56, § 4, summary petitions and applications to the

Lords of Council and Session (not being incident to causes actually in dependence), which were previously in use to be disposed of exclusively by the Inner-House, are appointed to be brought before the Junior Lord Ordinary in the Outer-House. See these Statutes. See also A. S. 11th July 1828, § 116; Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 16, note by Mr Ivory; Shand's Prac. 751, 757, 963, &c. See *Consultation of Judges. Session, Court of. Innkeepers. This seems to be the appropriate head for an explanation of the extent to which the Roman law edict, Nautæ cauponæ stabularii, has been adopted in the law of Scotland. Under that edict, the masters of ships, inns, stables, &c., were held liable for the loss of luggage, goods, &c., placed under their charge by passengers, lodgers, and the like. The principle of that edict has been fully recognised in our practice; and with us the liability extends not only to losses arising from the fault, negligence, or fraud of the innkeeper himself, but also to those cases in which the loss has resulted from the fault or crime of his servants, or of the other inmates of his house. The only case in which the innkeeper is not liable, is when the loss arises from an unavoidable accident, or damnum fatale. The rule, as laid down in England, is, "that nothing is an excuse except an act of God, or of the King's enemies." (See Act of God.) What is to be considered damnum fatale is sometimes a question of considerable difficulty. Some authorities do not reckon fire such an accident; but in one case, it was decided that an accidental fire, whereby both stables and horses were destroyed, did not subject the innkeeper. Loss by robbery is also a controverted point; but it is unquestionable, that in England it is not held damnum fatale, and that even in Scotland loss by theft makes the innkeeper responsible. The edict applies to the keepers of tipping-houses, with whom travellers lodge, and even to mere vintners; but it is a question still open, whether it applies to lodging-house keepers. (See Lodging-Houses.) Where a horse has been put into a stable to bait, and money or goods have been abstracted from a valise or portmanteau on the horse's back, the stabler must make good the loss; and a stabler has been found liable for the value of a horse which died in consequence of an accident while under his care. An innkeeper neglecting to give a parcel containing money to a carrier, as he ought to have done, was held liable for its contents. But this liability does not extend to money contained in a parcel, addressed to his care, but to a person not a guest in his house. It is sometimes a question whether, in order to make the innkeeper liable for a certain article, it is necessary to give him information respecting it, or to commit it to his care. An innkeeper has been found not liable for a purse of gold alleged to have been lost, of which he was told nothing previously. But he was held liable for a pair of breeches and their alleged contents, said to have been abstracted from a traveller's room. The danger of admitting such allegations without proof is apparent; and it is now established, that although the extent of the loss may be ascertained against the innkeeper by the oath in litem of the party suffering the loss, fortified in the general case by such reasonable collateral evidence as may prevent an extravagant demand, yet it is necessary for the traveller to prove that some of his property has been carried away, or some of his securities broken open. See, however, as to the mode of proof, Crawcour, 1842, 5 D. 10; and the act 16 and 17 Vict., c. 20, § 3. An innkeeper has a lien upon a traveller's luggage and goods for the price of his lodging and entertainment, and upon his horse for its provender and stabling. This lien operates even against the true owner of the horse, though it had been stolen by him who brought it to the inn. It is strictly confined to the keep of the horse itself, and is lost without revival, if the horse has once been allowed to go away. Effects belonging to a traveller in an inn or hotel are not subject to the landlord's hypothec. In the Jurid. Styles, iii. 81, will be found the form of a summons upon the edict, Nautæ, caupones, against an innkeeper for the loss of a horse. Innovation; is a technical expression, signifying the exchange, with the creditor's consent, of one obligation for another; so as to make the second obligation come in the place of the first, and be the only subsisting obligation against the debtor, both the original obligants remaining the same. This change is not to be presumed, and must therefore be precisely expressed; e.g., where the second obligation bears to have been granted "in satisfaction" of the first. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 22; Stair, B. i. tit. 18, § 8; Bank, i. 495; Bell's Princ. § 576; Brown's Synop. h. t.; Shaw's Digest; Thomson on Bills, 136, 146, 166. Inns of Court. In England, the colleges of municipal or common law professors and students are called inns. The inns of court are governed by masters, principals, benchers, stewards, and other officers; and they have public halls for exercises, readings, and the like, which the students are obliged to attend for a certain number of years before they can be admitted to plead at the bar. Although these societies have no judicial authority over their members, there exist among themselves certain orders or regulations, which have, by consent, the force of law. The gentlemen in these societies may be divided into benchers, outer-barristers, inner-barristers, and students. The four principal inns of court are the Inner and Middle Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn. The other inns are the two Serjeants' Inns. The Inns of Chancery; were formerly preparatory colleges for younger students; and many were entered there before they were admitted into the inns of court. They are now almost entirely occupied by attorneys, solicitors, and others. They all belong to one or other of the inns of court. They are Thavie's, New, Symond's, Clement's, Clifford's, Staple, Furnival's, and Bernard's Inn. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Blackst. i. 23, 25.

Innuendo; a word frequently used in English writs, declarations, and pleadings, to ascertain a person or thing named before, but left doubtful; as "he (innuendo, the plaintiff), did so and so." Tomlins, h. t.

In the law of libel and slander, words which are not per se injurious or actionable may become so by reason of the meaning or signification with which they are uttered. The meaning conveyed by the words as used is called the innuendo, and is usually introduced into the record and issue by the words "meaning thereby," after the expressions alleged to have been used. See Borthwick's Law of Libel; Macfarlane and Cleghorn on Issues.

Inquest; is a certain number of men to whom the trial of a question, civil or criminal, is committed. They are termed the inquest, from their being appointed to inquire into the state of the facts; and jury, because they are sworn to give their verdict according to the evidence. See Jury. Jury Trial. Challenge of Jurors. Bribe. Service.

Insanity. There are various degrees of aberration of intellect recognised in the law of Scotland as calling for its special protection. But in determining the appropriate measure of protection to be afforded to persons affected in mind, they may be divided into two great classes. The first comprehends every one who is, in legal language, fatuous and naturally an idiot, or furious, mad, and a lunatic; or whose external senses are so imperfectly organised as to render him totally incapable of the independent management of himself or his affairs. The second comprehends those who, although not so devoid of reason as to be absolutely incapable of acting for themselves in the minor affairs of life, are yet, from imbecility or weakness of judgment, considered by the law fit subjects for a limited degree of restraint, in matters of importance. The remedy in the former case is to place the fatuous or furious person under permanent and unlimited curatory; and for that purpose an inquiry is made into his state of mind by a cognition and inquest, the proceedings in which will be found explained in the articles Brieve. Fatuous. Furious. Idiocy. The remedy afforded in the latter class of cases is interdiction, by which lavish and facile persons are disabled from signing any deed to their prejudice without the consent of their interdictors. (See Facility. Imbecility. Interdiction.) A very good illustration of the distinction between the two classes of persons will be found in a full and excellent report of the proceedings under a brieve of idiocy against David Yoolow (reported by Mr Ludovic Colquhoun, 1837). The insanity of a partner, when of a permanent nature, is a ground for dissolving a partnership. Notwithstanding a mandant's supervening insanity, the acts of a mandatory previously appointed, are good to the public against the mandant's estate. The curators of insane persons can grant leases of a duration only equal to that of their office. See Bell's Com. i. 489; ii. 279, 453, 635; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Tait on Evidence, 342; Blair's Justice of Peace, h. t.; Thomson on Bills, 226, 246; Brown's Synop. 209, 1744; Shaw's Digest, 155, 239; S. & D. xiii. 703. For the rules as to the admissibility of witnesses subject to insanity, and the excuse which insanity furnishes for crime, see Idiots; Imbecility; Dickson on Evid. 844; Smith, 1855, 2 Irv. p. 1; Gibson, 1844, 2 Br. 332; and for the treatment of insane persons, see Madhouses, Lunatics, and the statute 20 and 21 Vict., c. 71. Insanity, besides being pleadable as freeing from responsibility for criminal acts, may also be pleaded in bar of trial where the party is incapable of pleading to the libel.

Insolvency. When a person's debts exceed the value of his estate, he is said to be insolvent; and this has various effects in law. Insolvency is a ground for reducing or setting aside all voluntary gratuitous rights by the insolvent debtor which come in competition with the claim of a creditor; 1621, c. 18. An insolvent person has not the power of effectually disposing of his means and estate to the prejudice of his creditors. But insol-veny is a fact very difficult to be established. Nor would it be possible, in a commercial country, to fix on insolvency alone as the point at which a mercantile man must suspend his transactions, and surrender his affairs into the hands of his creditors. Our law therefore, in the ordinary case, takes bankruptcy as the legal indication of insolvency; the distinction between the two being, that a man may be actually insolvent, although not bankrupt; since he may have so managed his affairs as to have escaped the execution of those steps of real or personal diligence, which are requisite to render him notour or legally bankrupt. See Bankrupt. Conjoint and Confident. Sequestration. Ranking and Sale. Diligence.

Instalment. When parties have agreed that a sum of money due shall not be paid in the gross, but in parts, at certain stated intervals, that sum is said to be payable by instalments. In the case of a bill or note payable by instalments, effect is given to a condition inserted in the bill, that if there should be a failure to pay one instalment, the whole shall become due. In England, it has even been doubted whether the holder of a bill or note payable by instalments is not entitled to take a verdict for the whole of them at once, although not more than one has become due. But in Scotland neither action nor diligence can be raised on such a bill or note, except for the several instalments as they respectively become due. Where, however, the debtor is sequestered, the holder of a bill payable by instalments would be entitled, under the bankrupt statute, to rank immediately for the amount of each instalment, under an abatement of interest corresponding to the time that must elapse before it falls due. For the form of an inland bill payable by instalments, see Jurid. Styles, ii. 4.

Institor; in the Roman law, was a person to whom the immediate management of any manufactory, shop, or undertaking was committed. A mercantile consignee or factor is, in this sense, an institor. Those granting the deputation were termed prepositors. In the same way with exercitors, who are liable for the acts of the shipmaster (see Exercitor), prepositors are liable for the acts of the institor; only that it is more incumbent on those who transact with institors that they should know precisely the powers of the institor. Institors do not, like shipmasters, bind themselves in their transactions; they bind only their constituents. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 46; Stair, B. i. tit. 13, § 18; Bank. vol. i. p. 400; Bell's Com. i. 477, 490; Bell's Princ. § 231; Illust. ib.; Tait's Justice of Peace, voce Mandate. See Factor. Mandate.

Institute; is the person to whom the estate is first given in a destination. Thus, where a person executing a settlement disposes his lands to A., whom failing, to B., &c., A. is the institute, B., and all who follow him in the destination, are heirs, or substitutes, as they are also termed. Hence a considerable degree of nicety sometimes arises in completing the title to the estate; for the procuratories of resignation and precepts of sasine for completing the title of the disponee may be directly used by the institute, but cannot be used by any of the heirs without a service. When the institute predeceases the granter of a deed, the next in order becomes the institute, and takes without a service. In directing the conditions or prohibitions of the deed against those who are called to possess the estate, it is also requisite to distinguish between the institute and the heir, since conditions, directed against heirs only, will not affect the institute. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 44; Stair, B. iii. tit. 8, § 17; Bell's Com. i. 46; Bell's Princ. § 1745; Sandford on Herit. Succession, i. pp. 264, 380; Sandford on Entails, pp. 48, 135-6-8, 317. See Tailzie. Conditional Institute.

Instrumentary Witnesses; are such as attest the subscription of parties. The witnesses to a formal written deed or instrument must be of the male sex, and above fourteen years of age. Being of the male sex is a requisite stated by most of the institutional writers; but it is proper to mention, that, according to the older practice, women were frequently inserted as witnesses; and that a recent annotator holds, that now, when the incompetency of female testimony in a court of justice is entirely removed, it is probable women would not be objected to as instrumentary witnesses (More's Notes on Stair, cccxcix.). Where a person is so blind as to be incapable of seeing the party touch the pen of the notaries who subscribe for him, or of knowing whether a paper laid before him is written upon or not, he is an inhabile instrumentary witness. The witnesses ought to know the party, and to see him subscribe, or hear him acknowledge his subscription. In the latter case they ought, immediately after the acknowledgment, to add their subscriptions as witnesses. This is not necessary in the former case; and, indeed, two witnesses may attest all the subscriptions, however numerous, and although adhibited on different days, provided they have seen the parties subscribe. At first, the rules as to instrumentary witnesses were very lax; designation was not necessary; and it was not even required that the witnesses should subscribe, it being sufficient that their names were mentioned in the testing clause. But improvements were gradually introduced; and the law was finally placed upon its present secure footing, by 1681, c. 5, enacting, that only subscribing witnesses should be probative, and that they should be designed in the body of the writ. Where there is any error in specifying the name or designation of the witness, or where he is named by a familiar appellation instead of his true name, or where there is an error in his Christian name, the deed is null. Where such mistakes are committed inadvertently, they may be corrected before producing the deed in judgment, by inserting at the end of the testing clause a correction of the mistake. Grammatical errors are not regarded when the meaning is plain; nor is it an objection that the witnesses, though mentioned in the testing clause, are not there described as witnesses; and an execution of arrestment has been sustained, which one of the witnesses had subscribed without adding the word "witness," in regard he was designed as one of the witnesses in the body of the writ. Witnesses are necessary to authenticate the subscription of consenters (such as curators), as well as of the principal party. Where a deed is granted by two persons, and subscribed by a notary for one of them, the same witnesses may authenticate both subscriptions. It has been said, that where the parties to a deed are numerous, they are presumed to be witnesses to one another's subscriptions; but there are several more recent decisions establishing a contrary doctrine. Where a tack or other contract has been subscribed by the parties, but not by the witnesses, the witnesses cannot ex intervallo subscribe it at the desire of one of the parties. In terms of 1686, c. 17, witnesses to sasines must subscribe each leaf; and although there have been several cases decided on the assumption that the necessity for this was taken away, yet one of these decisions was reversed in the House of Lords, and it is now understood that the subscription to each page is essential to the validity of the deed. The objections of partial favour, undue influence, or immoral character, did not affect instrumentary witnesses, in so far as they attested the subscription of parties; but might formerly have been pleaded against them if they were afterwards produced in proof of extrinsic facts affecting the validity of the deed; e.g., the state of the granter's health when he signed the deed. An executor in a testament has been found a valid instrumentary witness to support the deed, in every respect, except his own nomination. Both trustees and legatees may attest the deed in which they are appointed. The creditor in a bond cannot be an instrumentary witness; but it is thought that one of the creditors concerned in a relief may be witness to a bond of warrandice or relief, his interest being only consequential. The instrumentary witnesses may be examined as to the fact of their having seen the granter subscribe, or heard him acknowledge his subscription; but it will not invalidate the deed, that they do not distinctly recollect having seen it subscribed. Yet, if it be clearly proved that one of the instrumentary witnesses neither saw the party subscribe, nor heard him acknowledge his subscription, it is a relevant ground for reducing the deed, though it should not be alleged that the deed is false or forged. But a party cannot, without averring forgery of his subscription, challenge his own deed on the ground of its not having been subscribed in the presence of the instrumentary witnesses. It is not necessary for the witnesses to a messenger's execution, or a notarial instrument, to see the messenger or notary sign; they do not attest the subscription, but the transaction narrated. For the same reason, where an execution consists of several pages, they ought, like the executor, to sign each page. Witnesses cannot sign by initials. More's Notes on Stair, clxii., cccxvii.; *Ersk. Instruments. In the phraseology of the Scottish law, the term instrument is usually applied to notarial instruments, such as instruments of sasine, instruments of resignation, instruments of intimation of an assignment, instruments of premonition, of protest, and the like. Where certain demands are by contract agreed to be made, it is generally under form of instrument that the demand is made. The evidence which these notarial acts afford varies according to circumstances. Thus, instruments of sasine or of resignation are the only legal evidence of those acts of possession and of divestment; whereas the notarial intimation of an assignment may be supplied by equipollents; and demands made, or facts attempted to be established by notarial instruments, require, if disputed, to be established by the evidence of those concerned in the act. Tait on Evidence, 5, 21-41, 54, 217, 318; Dickson on Evidence, 596, et seq. See Sasine. Resignation. Assignment. Evidence.

Insucken Multures. In the servitude of thirlage, insucken multures are the multures exigible from the suckeners, or parties astricted to the mill; and, having been originally composed in part of a premium to the proprietor of the mill, they exceed in amount what may be called the market price of grinding. They are contradistinguished from outsucken multures, which is the price or return for grinding exacted by the miller from parties who are under no obligation to come to his mill. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 20; Bell's Princ. § 1018; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 206. See Thirlage. Multures. Astricted Multures. Out-Sucken.

Insufficiency. See Fault.

Insurance; is a contract by which a person, who thence is termed the insurer, in consideration of a sum of money (technically called a premium), becomes bound to indemnify the insured against certain risks to which his property is exposed. Insurance is a consensual contract; but a written instrument, on stamped paper, is, by statute, requisite to its constitution. This instrument is called the policy, and specifies the premium, the risk, the names of the underwriters or insurers, and the name of the insured. The best known and most important kinds of insurance are,—Marine Insurance; Insurance on Lives; and Insurance against Fire.

I. MARINE INSURANCE.

1. Of the parties to the contract.—Under this head, it may be questioned whether an insurance in favour of an alien enemy would be effectual. Against such insurances there have been temporary statutes, as 21 Geo. II., c. 4, and 33 Geo. III., c. 27, § 5. But, independently of these, the intercourse which such a contract occasions seems to be contrary to the allegiance of a subject; it is inconsistent with the superior maritime power of the country, and counteracts its influence on the enemy; nor would it be possible to enforce such an agreement during war, as the alien would not be permitted to appear in court. This seems to be the only exception to the rule, that every person may insure his goods at sea. The question, who may be parties to the contract, was formerly affected by the statute 6 Geo. I., c. 18, which authorized his Majesty to grant a monopoly to two companies for the insurance of ships, goods, and merchandises at sea, or lending money on bottomry, to the exclusion of all other corporations or partnerships. Individual persons, however, were entitled to underwrite policies or lend on bottomry, if not on account of a corporation or partnership. In pursuance of that power, the two companies of the Royal Exchange Assurance and the London Assurance were established by royal charter, 22d June 1720; and under their charters they had the exclusive right of making marine insurances, as a company or partnership, on a joint capital. This privilege is now taken away by the act 5 Geo. IV., c. 114, which makes it lawful for other corporations and bodies politic, and persons acting in partnership, to grant and make policies of assurance and contracts of bottomry.

2. Of the articles insured.—The subject must be lawfully insurable. An insurance of contraband and illicit trade is void, or rather cannot be enforced by a court of justice. But where the object of the voyage is inimical to the revenue laws of another state, this rule does not necessarily apply. So also warlike stores, carried to a nation with whom Great Britain is at war, whether they belong to a native or to a foreigner, cannot lawfully be insured in Britain; and it has been found in England, that trading with an enemy without the Sovereign's license is illegal, and therefore that the insured could not recover on a policy which covered trade of that description; Marshall's Treatise on Insurance, B. i. ch. 3, § 4. Finally, seamen's wages in England are not a fit subject of insurance, though goods belonging to them on board the vessel may be insured.

3. Of the interest of the insured.—Insurance is a contract of indemnity, and it is absolutely necessary that the subject be one in which the insured has an interest, though it need not be specified. This rule is enforced by statute, prohibiting assurances by way of wagering or gaming, and assurances, "interest or no interest; or without farther proof of interest than the policy;" 19 Geo. II., c. 37; 14 Geo. III., c. 48. The insurance profit on a fishing adventure is not a mere wager policy, and has been held effectual; Addison v. Duguid, 23d May 1757. But a qualified property in the thing insured, or any reasonable expectation of profit or advantage, will constitute that sort of interest which the party may legally protect by insurance. The holder of respondentia, or bottomry bonds, may insure the interest thence arising to him from the ship over which the bonds extend. See Bond of Bottomry. Bond of Respondentia. It is held to create an insurable interest, if a person has already underwritten a policy; and he will be allowed to protect himself against his own risk, as an original insurer or underwriter, by what is termed a re-assurance. See Re-insurance. The freighter has an insurable interest in any advances made to the shipmaster, provided they be distinguished as freight, or made to depend on the earning of freight. The effect of stopping in transitu a cargo insured has, in one special case, been held to annihilate the vender's interest under the policy; but this case has not been held to settle the general point; and its

4. Of the voyage.—The voyage may be distinguished from the trade in which a vessel is engaged: Thus, the trade may be illegal, and the voyage perfectly lawful; or the voyage may be illegal, though the goods are not contraband. The general rule is, that no insurance can be legally made on a voyage prohibited by law. Hence, a voyage contrary to the British navigation laws cannot be the object of insurance; and, in the same way, insurance on a voyage undertaken contrary to the monopoly formerly granted to the East India Company would have been void. See East India Company.

5. Of the risks insured against.—All the risks incident to a sea voyage may be insured against, subject, however, to such exceptions as are founded on public policy; as, for instance, an insurance cannot be made against losses arising from the fault of the insured, nor against losses arising from an infringement of the laws; nor, before the slave trade was declared illegal, could policies on the slave trade insure the dealers in that traffic against the mortality of slaves by natural death or ill-treatment, or by throwing them over-board on any account whatever; 30 Geo. III., c. 33, § 8; 34 Geo. III., c. 80, § 10, and 39 Geo. III., c. 80, § 24. The words of the policy by which the risks are described are broad and extensive. The perils against which the underwriters become bound to insure "are of the sea, men-of-war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, jettisons, letters of mart and countermart, surprises, takings at sea, arrests, restraints and detainerments of all kings, princes and people, of what nation, condition or quality soever, barratry of master and mariners, and all other perils, losses, or misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods and merchandises, &c., or any part thereof, during this adventure." But to the policy is added a memorandum which qualifies the obligation on the underwriter. The memorandum is in these terms:—"N.B. —Corn, fish, salt, fruit, flour, and seed are warranted free from average, unless general, or the ship be stranded; sugar, tobacco, hemp, flax, hides, and skins are warranted free from average, under 5 per cent.; and all other goods, also the ship and freight, are warranted free from average under 3 per cent., unless general, or the ship be stranded." This form of the memorandum is used in the English policies, and has given rise to much dispute, whether the words "free from average, unless general, or the ship be stranded," be a condition or an exception. This is a point on which the highest authorities in England have differed, though latterly they have come to consider the stranding as a condition, which, in the event of its happening, takes off entirely the effect of the restriction created by the memorandum, and gives the same meaning to the policy as if no such memorandum had been entered in it. A case taken notice of by Marshall puts this question in a very clear light. The ship had struck on a rock off Sicily, and to save the vessel it was run on shore; the cargo was saved, and brought to the port of destination, but considerable damage was done to some fruit which had been insured, though the damage did not arise from the stranding of the vessel, but from the opening in the ship's bottom made by the rock against which it struck. The question was, whether, as the damage arose from one of the perils of the sea against which the general tenor of the policy insured, and not from the stranding, the underwriters were liable; and this raised the question, whether the memorandum created an exception or a condition: for, if it made an exception only of the damage arising from stranding, then the damage that occurred in this case was not owing to the stranding; whereas, if the memorandum created a condition, as, if it had said that no average should be due unless the ship was stranded, the condition being purified by the stranding of the ship, an average loss (in the same way as if there had been no restriction by the memorandum) was due. The Court found that the stranding of the ship rendered the underwriters liable for the loss, in precisely the same manner as if there had been no memorandum annexed to the policy. Lord Kenyon, in delivering his opinion, said, "I do not know how to construe the words of the memorandum grammatically, but by saying, that if the ship be stranded, that destroys the exception, and lets in the general words of the policy. If a general provision be made in any instrument, and it be then said that certain things shall be excepted, unless another thing happen, if that other thing do happen, it destroys the exception, and gives effect to the general operation of the deed." The Scotch policies are not all expressed in the same terms with the English private policies (those of the two English companies omit the condition in regard to the stranding). Some of the Scotch policies bind the underwriters for a particular average on the articles excepted in the memorandum, only where the damage happens "from stranding or bulging," and this leads necessarily into the cause of the damage, which it seems to have been the great object of the memorandum to avoid. The insertion of the clause, "unless the ship be stranded," in the memorandum, has given rise to a number of questions as to what amounts to stranding. These are considered under the article Stranding of Ships. There appears to be still a question undecided on the nature of a general or a partial loss, in the case where goods are put up in separate packages or in barrels, and one or two of these are completely destroyed, whether each package or barrel is to be considered as separate, and the loss to be considered as a total loss, or as a part only of the whole, and calculated at so much per cent. on the whole cargo.

The duration of the risk differs on the goods, on the ship, and on the freight. 1. Upon goods.—By the policy, the insurance on the goods is made "from the loading thereof on board the said ship, until the same be discharged and safely landed." From these terms, it would seem that the risk commences when the goods are actually put on board, and terminates when they are landed or put on board another ship. But this general rule has exceptions, as,—1st, The course of trade in the port of loading or unloading must regulate the endurance of the risk; and, therefore, where lighters are used, the risk of the goods while in these lighters is part of the risk insured against. In English practice, a distinction has been made where the insured receives the goods on board his own lighter. This has been considered as a delivery to the insured, and sufficient to put an end to the insurance. In the same way, although the goods are to be delivered as soon as convenient at the port of delivery, yet the course of trade will also regulate this matter; Noble v. Kennoway, Doug. 492. A ship in the Labrador trade arrived at her point of destination June 22, and from the time of her arrival the crew were employed in fishing till August 13, when an American privateer took the ship. Lord Mansfield, on the practice of the trade, held the insurers to be liable for the loss, and so the Court decided. 2d, In the case of the ship being disabled in a storm, so as to render it necessary to shift the cargo to another ship, the risk will continue on the new ship till she arrive at the port of destination in the common way. 2. Upon the ship.—The terms of the policy and the nature of the voyage seem to regulate this matter a good deal. Where the policy bears from one port to another, the risk commences only from the time the ship breaks ground; but if it be expressed at and from a port, then the risk commences from the date of subscribing the policy. Where the policy bears, "from the ship's arrival at a port abroad," then the risk commences from her first arrival there during her continuance at that port. The policy bears, that the risk continues until the ship be moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety; but it is not a mooring, in this sense of the expression, where she is obliged to perform quarantine; she must be moored with a power of unloading; and where a ship was destroyed by fire during the time she was lying at quarantine, the underwriters were held to be answerable for the loss; Waples v. Curses, 2 Str., 1248. The risk on the rigging, tackle, furniture, and provisions, continues no longer than while they are attached to the ship, unless when they are put on shore in order to repair the ship; Pelly v. Roy, Ex. Ass., 1 Bur. 341; Brough v. Whitmore, 4 T. R. 206. Liberty to touch at a place or places, means places in the course of the voyage; liberty to touch and stay does not authorize the ship to trade. 3. Upon freight.—The risk begins from the time the goods are put on board; but, if the ship be chartered to proceed to a port, and there to take her cargo on board, the freight may be insured, and the risk commence from the sailing of the vessel to the port where the cargo is to be shipped; and a capture before its arrival at that port will give the owner a claim for the freight against the insurers; Thomson v. Taylor, 6 T. R., 478. (See Charter Party). The nature of the risk under a policy of insurance cannot be changed, unless with the consent of the insurers, otherwise it voids the policy. For instance, letters of marque given to a trading vessel after she has been insured is such an alteration in the condition of the ship as to change the risk entirely.

6. Of the policy.—The policy is a written instrument upon stamped paper, by statute made requisite to the constitution of the contract. The stamp cannot afterwards be supplied. A policy may be distinguished as an interest or as a wager policy. It is the former only which constitutes a proper contract of insurance binding on the underwriters. The interest policy may be either an open or a valued policy. The open policy is one where the value is left to be ascertained should a loss arise. A valued policy is when a value has been set on the ship or goods insured, the sum specified being demandable without proving the amount, when there is no fraud. At first it was thought that valued policies were struck at as wager policies by the statute of Geo. II.; but the contrary is now established. Investigation is open to the insurer, to see that there is no fraud. The insurance is usually made by the interposition of an insurance-broker. Mutual accounts are kept, in which the broker states in the underwriter's account all the premiums which he is authorized by the underwriter to draw, as already received, and as articles to the underwriter's credit, against which he places all return premiums or sums received for losses (if he be authorized to recover them), and he settles the account periodically with the underwriters. On the other hand, in account with the insured, he debits him with the unpaid premiums, giving him credit for any return premiums, or for losses which he may be empowered to recover. This arrangement is accomplished by means of a receipt for the premiums signed by the underwriter, in these terms: "The assurers confess themselves paid the consideration due to us for this assurance by the assured." This receipt delivered to the broker, is a warrant to him to receive the premiums so acknowledged; but it is not effectual to discharge the insured, since it is not delivered to him as his document of discharge. When, however, the broker gives the insured credit for the premiums, the underwriter is bound by his discharge, although the broker never paid any part of them. But recall of the broker's authority while things are entire, transfers the accounting to the insurers and insured, and the former are entitled directly to claim the unpaid premiums. In this question, the broker's bankruptcy is equivalent to a recall. The receipt has the effect of laying the onus probandi on the underwriter, to show that neither actual payment has taken place, nor such a settlement of accounts between the parties as is equivalent to payment of the premiums. Bell's Com., i. 599, et seq., and authorities there cited. An agent for a merchant abroad must employ a broker and procure insurance: 1. Where the agent has effects in his hands. 2. Where the agent here has been in use to answer orders of insurance on former occasions. 3. Where the agent here receives bills of lading with an order to insure. In making the insurance, the agent must proceed regularly and actively, and will be answerable for the failure of the act he has undertaken to perform. The policy may be considered under the following heads: 1. The names of the insured.—The statute 25 Geo. III., c. 44, requires the name of the insured to be inserted in the policy, whenever the insured resides in Great Britain; where he resides abroad, that the name of his agent be inserted. This act was repealed by the act 28 Geo. III., c. 56, which, however, provides that no person shall effect any policy on "any ship or goods, without first inserting the name or names, in the usual style and form of dealing, of one or more of the persons interested, or of the consigner or consigners, consignee or consignees, of the property to be insured, or of the person or persons residing in Great Britain, who shall receive the order for and effect such policy, or of the person or persons who shall give the order to the agent or agents immediately employed to negotiate or effect such policy; and every policy made contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act shall be null and void." 2. The name of the Ship, &c.—It is necessary that the name of the ship should be mentioned, in order that the nature of the risk may be known; and no other ship can be substituted unless in the case of necessity, or with the consent of the underwriters. At the same time, where it is not known in what ship a cargo is to be sent home, it may be insured generally, as goods on board "ship or ships." The name of the master ought also to be declared; but it is generally expressed in the policy, "or whosoever else shall go as master in the said ship;" and under these terms the master may be changed; but this ought not to be done unnecessarily. The names of the ship and master are required, not as a warranty, but as identifying the risk; and an innocent mistake in those names will not defeat the insurance, provided there is clear proof of the identity of the ship. 3. The subject insured.—The policy must express whether it be goods, freight, ship, or whatever is the object of the insurance; but it is not necessary that the goods be specified, though it is sometimes done on the foot of the policy; and in that case, no other goods than those expressed will be insured. 4. Description of the voyage.—The voyage must be truly and accurately described; the time and place at which the risk is to commence; the time of the ship's departure; her destination; and the time when the risk shall end; or, when the insurance is on time, the commencement and end must be distinctly specified. 5. The perils insured against.—The perils are sufficiently expressed in the policy; but those arising from bad stowage, from wet, from theft and embezzlement of the master or mariners, do not fall on the underwriter. In the policy, the words "lost or not lost" are inserted, and they insure against losses whether they happen subsequent or prior to the date of the policy. 6. The powers of the insured in case of loss.—Under a clause in the policy, the insured, or those acting for them, may take every means to defend, preserve, or recover the goods insured, the expense of which shall be contributed proportionally by the underwriters. 7. The acknowledgment of the receipt of the premium.—This acknowledgment does not preclude the underwriter from demanding the premium, nor can it be founded on by the insured as a discharge of the premium. 8. The testing clause.—In all Scotch deeds, it is requisite that the writer

(or filler up of that part of the deed which is written) should be named and designed, and that the witnesses should be named and designed. Those are statutory requisites, without which a Scotch policy would not be effectual. The testing clause, then, may be in this form: "In witness whereof, these presents, printed on stamped paper, conform to Act of Parliament, and the written parts thereof being written by C., insurance-broker here, are subscribed by us at L., of the dates put by us respectively to our subscription, before these witnesses, the said C., and D., his clerk." A policy of insurance, however, being a writing in re mercatoria, is effectual if signed by the underwriters only, with the sum for which each is to be liable. No witnesses are required; Bell's Com., i. 606. 9. The common memorandum.—The use of this is to save the parties from adjusting trifling losses arising from causes which, properly speaking, do not fall under the nature of the contract, and which would not admit of being easily settled.

7. Of warranties.—A warranty is an absolute condition, expressed or implied, which, if not true, or not complied with, defeats the insurance, whether material to the risk or not. An express warranty is a stipulation on the part of the insured affirmative or promissory, and it is binding according to the commercial meaning put upon the words. But it must be strictly and literally performed; and therefore the falsehood of an affirmative, or the non-performance of a promissory warranty, will vacate the policy. In England, the warranty must be written on the policy; the same statement on a paper apart is not sufficient. The warranty to sail on a given day must be strictly performed; nor would the best reason, or even detention by Government, be received as an excuse for not complying with the warranty. But should the ship break ground on the day of sailing, and begin the voyage, the fact of her being afterwards brought back (however little way the vessel had made), and laid under an embargo, would not vacate the policy. The warranty to sail with convoy must also be strictly complied with. In sailing with convoy, the following things are essential. 1. The vessel must sail with a regular convoy appointed by Government. 2. It must be from the place of rendezvous appointed by Government. 3. It must be a convoy for the voyage. 4. The ship insured must have sailing instructions. 5. It must depart and continue with the convoy, unless separated by necessity. See Convoy. There are also certain implied warranties, the most important of which is sea-worthiness. See No. 10, Infra. It is of no avail, in defence against breach of warranty, that the representation was true, according to the belief of the insured. The insured is not bound to disclose what is the subject of a warranty. The truth of the warranty is presumed, especially of sea-worthiness, subject to refutation by evidence or counter presumption.

8. Of representations.—A representation means a collateral statement of such facts and circumstances as are material in forming a judgment of the risk. This statement may be untrue, either fraudulently or innocently. Where the representation is untrue, with a fraudulent design to impose on the underwriter, the policy is completely vacated; and a loss, even from a cause not depending on the untrue statement, will not be covered by the policy. But where the statement has been fairly and honestly made, and, though not true in every point, yet, if it be substantially true, it is not judged of with the same precision as a warranty, and does not necessarily vacate the policy. The warranty is invariably made part of the policy by an entry on the back or margin of the policy; but a representation is made on a separate paper, as in a letter shown to the underwriters.

9. Of Concealment.—This consists in the suppression of any circumstance material to the risk, and it vitiates completely the policy; nor does it alter the case that the concealment has been the effect of inadvertency alone. The insured ought therefore to disclose every circumstance which has come to his knowledge with the most perfect frankness. But there are certain things which the insured are not bound to communicate, because the insurer must be supposed to be equally well acquainted with them; as, general intelligence, the result of political speculations, the natural perils to which the voyage is subject. It is such facts only as vary the nature of the contract, which one party privately knows, and the other is ignorant of, and has no opportunity of knowing, which cannot be legally concealed. The question, therefore, in cases of concealment, must always be, whether, under all the circumstances at the time the policy was underwritten, there was or was not a concealment, material to the risk, or which, if known to the underwriter, would probably have altered his resolution.

10. Of the ship.—Under this head the principal obligations on the insured are, that the ship shall be sea-worthy—that it shall not be changed—and that it shall be navigated according to law. In regard to sea-worthiness, if the ship be found incapable of performing the voyage insured, from some latent defect existing before the voyage commenced, the insurer is not bound. Under sea-worthiness is understood that the ship shall be tight, staunch, and strong, properly manned, provided with all necessary stores, and in all respects fit for the intended voyage; for, otherwise, the insurer has not a fair chance of gaining the premium. He undertakes to indemnify the insured against the extraordinary and unforeseen perils of the sea, but the ship must be in a condition to encounter the ordinary perils of her voyage. See Charter-Party. If in the course of the voyage the ship be disabled, by stress of weather or any other peril of the sea, the captain ought to hire another vessel for completing the voyage; so that, although the rule certainly be, that the ship ought not to be changed on the insurer, yet, where it is an act of necessity, the change may be made without liberating the insured. It is allowable to insure goods from abroad by a ship or ships, where the insured is ignorant of the ships by which the goods are to be sent. The ship must be navigated according to law, that is, according not only to the laws of this country, but according to the treaties subsisting between this country and foreign states. In short, in the branch of trade in which the ship is employed, all the statutory regulations in regard to that trade must be observed. See Sea-worthiness.

11. Of deviation. By deviation is understood voluntary deviation; and from the moment that a voluntary deviation takes place, the insurer is discharged from all subsequent responsibility. In judging of a deviation, it is not the shortest possible way from the port of departure to the port of delivery that constitutes the voyage; it is the usual tract of the voyage that is the rule; hence stopping at such places as it has been the usual and settled practice to stop at in the course of the voyage, is no deviation. But where a deviation has been made, it will be no answer that after the deviation the ship regained her original tract. In order to discharge the insurer, the deviation must be a voluntary deviation; for where the captain, in making the deviation, acts fairly and bona fide, e. g., deviates to avoid danger, the insurers are not liberated. Thus, a deviation may be made by stress of weather, from the necessity of repairs, in order to avoid an enemy, or in consequence of a mutiny in the crew. These are all cases of imperious necessity, sufficient to authorize a deviation; but it must in its extent be commensurate to the cause, and will in no case be allowed to exceed what necessity requires. See Deviation.

12. Of loss.—A loss in this sense is damage sustained by the insured from one or other of the misfortunes against which the insurer is bound to indemnify him; and they are all very particularly enumerated in the policy.

Losses are distinguished into total or partial losses. A total loss is either where the thing insured is completely destroyed, or where, although it specifically remains, it is of no value, or not sufficient to bring the amount of the freight. A partial loss is one short of a total loss; or, where the articles insured are actually landed at the port of delivery, the injury will amount to a partial loss. A partial loss is sometimes denominated an average loss, because these partial losses are often the subject of average contributions; and they are distinguished into general and particular averages. See Average. The losses insured against may be brought under the following heads:—1. Loss by perils of the sea.—This may happen from the ship's foundering. Of this fact the insurers are not entitled to require direct and positive evidence; and the law has fixed on no time within or beyond which a legal presumption of the ship's being lost arises; the circumstance must be left to the mind of the court, or the jury. The loss may happen from the ship stranding; which is either accidental, where the vessel is driven on shore by the winds and waves; or voluntary, when it is run on shore to save it from a worse fate. Stranding may be followed by shipwreck, in which case the loss is total; or the vessel may be got off in a condition to prosecute the voyage, in which case the damage and expense incurred will be a partial loss, of the nature of an average. Another peril of the sea is the ship's striking against a rock, which may occasion a leak or absolute shipwreck. A loss consistent with the ordinary service in which a ship is engaged founds no claim against the underwriter, as where an anchor is lost by the rubbing of a cable on the rocks; but, should it happen from the violence of the winds, it becomes a loss within the policy. Where animals on board a ship are insured, their death, if occasioned by the shot of an enemy, or by a tempest, or by their being necessarily thrown overboard, founds a claim against the insurer. 2. By running foul.—The injury sustained by one ship running foul of another is a loss within the policy, unless it be imputable to the misconduct of the master or mariners; though even then it might be covered under the head of barratry, and relief would be due by those to whom the accident was imputable. See Collision. 3. Loss by fire.—This is one of the losses falling under the policy; and it will authorize a claim even where the ship is set on fire by the master to preserve her from the enemy. 4. Of loss by capture.—Capture may be either by an enemy, according to the rules of war, or contrary to those rules, or by a pirate; but in whatever way the capture may be made, and whether or not the property be thereby actually transferred, the insurers are bound to indemnify the insured to the extent of their loss, in so far as they are respectively bound. A capture may be total, as where the ship is not recovered; or partial, where the ship is recaptured; in which case the underwriter is bound to pay the salvage, and the expenses which the insured may have been put to. When a capture takes place, the insured lose all control over the property, and are entitled to abandon; but should they not declare that intention, and should the ship be retaken, they cannot then abandon, unless the object of the voyage has been lost by the capture. In all cases, therefore, between the insurers and the insured, there is no question as to the legality of the capture or the change of property, but simply whether it be a total or a partial loss, and whether it admits of an abandonment; and these depend on the circumstances which have been already taken notice of. 5. Of loss by detention.—This applies to all detentions by the ruling power of the country, and whether of any foreign country or of this, on whatever account the detention may be made, unless from the fault of the captain or mariners, by infringing rules which occasion the detention; in all other cases the detention by the ruling power of a country occasions a loss falling under the policy. 6. Of loss by barratry.—Barratry is any species of fraud, knavery, deceit, or cheating, committed by the master or mariners, whereby the owners sustain an injury, as by running away with the ship, wilfully carrying it out of the course of the voyage, sinking or deserting it, embezzling the cargo, smuggling, or any other offence whereby the ship or cargo may be subjected to arrest, detention, loss, or forfeiture; barratry, in short, comprehends every fraud which may be committed by the master or mariners against the owners. But this does not protect the insured against loss arising from the ignorance or unskilfulness of the master; the cause must be fraudulent. See Barratry. 7. Of loss by average contributions.—Average signifies a contribution made by the owners of the ship, freight, and goods on board, in proportion to their respective interests, towards any particular loss or expense sustained for the general safety of the ship and cargo, to the end that the particular loss may fall equally on all; as where goods are thrown overboard in a storm, or where the masts, cables, or anchors are cut away or destroyed for the general preservation, or money or goods given as a composition to pirates, or damage sustained in defending the ship against an enemy, or expense in curing the wounded, or the expense of defending an action for discharging the ship from an unjust capture, or detention. In those cases, and in every one where an expense is bona fide incurred to prevent a total loss, it ought to be borne rateably by all concerned; and this equitable contribution is called general or gross average. In opposition to this is particular average; but this means nothing more than a particular loss, and has no affinity to an average loss properly so called. Besides these, there are what are called petty or accustomed averages—as pilotage, towage, beaconage, anchorage, &c. &c. But, where these are incurred in the ordinary course of the voyage, they are not considered as losses, but as part of the necessary expense; it is only where charges of that kind are incurred for an extraordinary purpose, and to provide against any impending danger, that they will be deemed gross or general average, for which the insurer will be liable. The contribution, in this case, is settled by ascertaining the value of the ship and cargo as if it had arrived safe. They are then valued at the ready-money price they would bring at the port of discharge; and the nett amount, deducting all charges, is the sum subject to the contribution; and each person's share of the loss will be in the same proportion to the value of his property as the whole loss bears to the whole property. These contributions, under the general words of the policy, are a charge which the underwriter is bound to pay. 8. Of loss by the expense of salvage.—The expense of salvage, like other average contributions, is a charge for which the insurer is liable. It is understood to mean the allowance made to those by whose means the ship or goods have been saved from shipwreck, fire, pirates, enemies, or any other loss or misfortune. When the salvage is very high, the insured may abandon. See Average Contribution. Jactus Mercium.

13. Of abandonment.—By a total loss is meant not only the absolute destruction of the thing insured, or such a damage as renders it of little or no value, but also such a loss or misfortune as shall have occasioned the loss of the voyage. In such cases the insured may abandon as for a total loss. In consequence of this abandonment, the insurers come into the place of the insured, and are entitled to all that can be rescued from destruction. From the instant that a capture or detention takes place, the insured may abandon; but if advice be at the same time received that the ship has been retaken, or been allowed to resume her voyage, the insured cannot abandon, unless the object of the voyage has, by reason of the capture or detention, been disappointed, or rendered not worth pursuing; or, if farther expense be necessary, which the underwriter will not undertake, the insured may abandon. Shipwreck entitles the insured to abandon; yet the mere stranding of the vessel does not necessarily authorize an abandonment. But if the voyage be lost, from whatever cause, it is held to be a total loss, which is a ground for abandoning. In the same way, where the cargo is damaged, so as to reduce it to a less value than the freight, it is held to be a total loss. There is no time within which the insured are bound to abandon; but, whenever they receive intelligence of the loss, they must decide whether they are to abandon; and of this intention the underwriters must receive intimation within a reasonable time; nor can the insured abandon after having once treated the loss as a partial one. Where a ship is not heard of for a reasonable time, the insured may abandon. There does not seem to be any form of intimation by which the insured must intimate to the underwriters that they mean to abandon; on the contrary, it would appear that the intimation may be effectually made by letter to the underwriter, or to the agent who has subscribed for him. Where an abandonment takes place, the insured resigns his entire interest in the ship or in the goods insured, and they become the property of the underwriters, in proportion to their respective subscriptions. When there has not been a full insurance, and the insured means to abandon, he abandons in proportion. Thus, if the value of the goods was L.5000, of which only L.4000 was insured, he abandons to the extent of four-fifths of what is saved; and, to the extent of the fifth retained, he will have a right of common property along with the underwriters. In the case of shipwreck or other misfortune, the ship and goods continue the property of the insured until abandonment; but, by a clause in the policy, the master and others may do every thing to preserve the property without being understood to act for the insured, or to deprive them of the right of abandoning; and the underwriters are liable for the expense which such attempts to save the property may occasion. The captain, therefore, acts for those who may ultimately be found to have an interest in the ship or cargo. Although, in the exercise of this power, where the wreck has happened abroad, the master seems to be warranted in selling the wreck for behoof of all concerned, yet it would appear that the master has no power to sell the vessel, so long as she preserves the appearance and character of a ship, and is not what has been called a mere "congeries of planks." Hughes on Insurance, 383; *Cambridge v. 14. Of the adjustment of losses.—The first thing to be considered is how the quantity of the damage for which the underwriters are liable shall be ascertained; the next point is by what rule this shall be appreciated. 1. How the amount of damage shall be ascertained.

—The insured ought to be well informed of the circumstances; and if it appear to be a total loss, and he decide to abandon, he must intimate his intention, or he will be held to have waived his right, and to be entitled to claim only as for a partial loss. When the loss is total, and the policy valued, the insured is entitled to receive the sum insured, subject to the deductions pointed out by the policy, on his proving that the goods insured were actually on board. Where the policy is not valued, but an open policy, the insured must prove not only that the goods were on board, but he must also prove their value, which value, not exceeding the sum insured, is the amount of his claim. In the case of a partial loss, the same inquiry as to the value of the loss must be made, whether the policy be a valued or an open one. Where the loss is that of ten barrels out of an hundred, the English practice seems to render this a loss which the underwriter must pay. When the part of the goods saved exceeds the amount of the freight, the practice is to deduct the freight from the salvage, and to make up the difference. But when the freight exceeds the salvage, it is held to be a total loss. Where goods have been damaged, their present value is taken from the prime cost, and the difference is the damage. Where articles are insured for one entire sum, but each article separately valued, the insured will recover the amount of any one of the articles which may have been lost. When the underwriters are to be freed from average under so much per cent., any loss that may arise must be estimated on the cargo as it stood at the time of the loss; and whether the proportion renders it a claim on the underwriters or not will depend on the proportion between the loss and cargo as it then stood. 2. How the loss is to be appreciated.—In England, the practice, in case of a loss, is to value the goods at the prime cost, and the duties, expenses of shipping, and premium of insurance. The ship is valued at the price she is worth at the time of her sailing, including the expense of her repairs, the value of her furniture, provisions, and stores, the money advanced to the sailors, and, in general, every expense of the outfit, and premium of insurance. A partial loss, on either ship or goods, is that proportion of the prime cost equal to the diminution in value occasioned by the damage. Where the policy is valued, the loss is that proportion of the value in the policy which the difference between the price of the sound, and the price of the damaged, bore to the price of the sound at the port of delivery. Thus, if sugars are valued in the policy at L.30 per hogshead, and are so damaged as to be worth no more than L.20, 0s. 8d. per hogshead, while, if sound, they would have brought L.23, 7s. 8d., the difference being L.3, 7s., the loss would be that proportion of the L.30, which L.3, 7s. bears to L.23, 7s. 8d.; and the same rule holds whether the goods come to a rising or to a falling market. 3. The effect of an adjustment.—An adjustment of the loss indorsed on the policy, and signed by the underwriters, is like a note of hand, and supersedes all further proof on the point. At the same time, the underwriters will be allowed to traverse it by direct evidence, disproving the grounds of adjustment. See Adjustment.

15. Of return of premium.—The premium and risk are co-relatives. The insurer cannot be exposed to the risk without being entitled to the premium, nor entitled to the premium without having been exposed to the risk. It remains, therefore, to be considered, under what circumstances the insured shall be entitled to demand a return of premium. 1. Where the contract is void ab initio.—This is owing either to want of interest in the insured, or because the insurance is illegal, or on account of fraud. When there is no interest, or an interest much below the sum insured, the insurer must return the whole premium, or retain so much of it only as may be proportioned to the actual interest; and where there are more than one policy, the underwriters settle according to the sum subscribed by each, without regard to priority of dates. If the insurer might at any time have been called on for the loss, the premium is carried; therefore, in a valued policy, though there be twice the amount of the value insured, no return is claimable. A voyage on trade with an enemy is not insurable; yet the premium cannot be demanded back—Potior est conditio possidentis. But when the policy is void without any fraud on the part of the insured, the premium may be demanded; or where it is void from the fraud of the underwriter, the same thing happens. It seems to be doubtful when the fraud is on the part of the insured. 2. Where the risk has not been commenced.—In this case, whether it be owing to the neglect or fancy of the insured, the return of the premium may be demanded, since the underwriters never ran the risk of which it was the consideration. When the voyage is divided into separate risks, the premium may be allocated according to the several risks; and in case one or more has not commenced, a proportional return may be demanded. When the insurance is at and from a place with convoy, and the ship sails without convoy, the premium may be demanded back, but under a small deduction for the insurance at the port of departure, for which the underwriters were liable. When the risk has commenced, though the insurer should be relieved by a deviation, or by the voyage being abandoned, the premium cannot be demanded back by the insured. 3. Upon the performance of some stipulations.—It is frequently a stipulation, that upon the happening of certain events, or the performance of certain things, the insured shall return a part of the premium. If the event shall have happened, the insured will be entitled to the return, though the underwriter be liable for a partial loss. 4. Of the deduction of one-half per cent. on a return of premium.—Where the insurer puts a stop to the risk, the underwriter is entitled to one-half per cent. from the premium, which, in that case, he retains, on account of the entries he has had to make in his books. See Marshall's Treatise on the Law of Insurance.

16. Of the action on the policy.—The action on the policy of insurance is a maritime action, and as such could formerly be brought before the Judge-Admiral alone in the first instance; and it was only by appeal that the Court of Session had jurisdiction. But this is now one of the class of actions which were, by the Judicature Act, 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 28, appropriated to jury trial.

17. Of the duties.—There are certain stamp duties payable on marine insurances. These are regulated by 55 Geo. III., c. 184, amended by 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 23. See, on the subject of marine insurance, Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Bell's Com. i. 593, et seq.; *Ersk. II. INSURANCE ON LIVES.

The insurance upon life is a contract by which an underwriter, for a certain sum, proportioned to the risk (judged of from the age, state of health, or profession of the person whose life is to be insured), engages to pay a certain sum, should the person die within the time limited in the policy. To prevent the application of this useful expedient to the improper purposes to which it was sometimes applied, it was enacted, by the statute 14 Geo. III., c. 48, that no insurance shall be made on the life or lives of any person or persons, wherein the person, for whose use the policy is made, shall have no pecuniary interest; or by way of gaming or wagering; policies made contrary thereto being declared void and null. And it is provided, that the names of those interested in the policy shall be inserted therein, and no greater sum can be recovered from the insurer than the value of the interest of the insured on such life or lives. Under this interest a creditor may insure his debt, where the debt stands upon a personal obligation only. He may either himself open a policy on his debtor's life, or he may have assigned to him a policy opened by the debtor on his own life. It has been doubted whether an heritable creditor can validly insure his debtor's life. A father has no insurable interest in the life of his son; but in a policy opened by a person on his own life his family has a sufficient interest. The interest is not to be reckoned by the actual value of the life. It is not diminished to the creditor by collateral securities; for while the debt subsists the policy is good, leaving the collateral securities to be otherwise available. In a life insurance, the underwriter usually undertakes to answer for all those accidents or diseases to which human life is subject, except duelling, suicide, the hands of justice, and death at sea. But death by duelling, suicide, and the hands of justice, are not understood to be excepted where the insurance is effected on the life of another. The death must happen within the time specified in the policy, in order to render the insurer liable; and although the insured receives the wound of which he dies before, if he does not die till after the period, the insurer is free. Fraud may be the ground for voiding this, as it does every other contract into which it enters. When the risk has once begun, though it should be shortened by the suicide of the person, the whole premium is due; there is no apportionment of the premium, and no return of any part of it. See Bell's Com. i. 627; Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Bell's Princ. § 518, et seq.; Illust. 518.

Where a party effected an assurance on the life of another, it was at one time held that his right to recover upon the policy was limited by the interest he had in the life of the party assured at the time when the as-

tion for recovery was brought, and consequently, that if the debt of a creditor who had effected an assurance was paid at that date he could not recover. Such was the law laid down in the case of Godsall v. Boldero, 25th Nov. 1807, 9 East. 71. A different law was laid down in the case of Dalby v. The India and London Life Assurance Company, 2d Dec. 1854, 18 Jurist, 1024. It that case it was held, that the provisions of the act 14 Geo. III., c. 48, were satisfied if the party effecting an assurance on the life of another had an interest in the life at the time the assurance was effected. Whether the case of Godsall v. Boldero was otherwise rightly decided or not, it may be doubted whether the judgment did not go too far in restricting the claim of the plaintiff to the interest he had in Mr Pitt's life at the date of the action being brought. Possessing, as he did, an interest in Mr Pitt's life, down to the date of his death, it would rather seem that he was entitled to recover the amount of his interest as at the date of the death, and that the circumstance of a third party having paid the debt after Mr Pitt's death ought not to have prevented his recovering the amount assured. The purpose of the statute seems to have been to prevent a party holding an assurance on the life of another when he had no interest depending on the life. If, however, the party retain his interest, down to the death of the party whose life is assured, the object of the statute seems to be satisfied. In the recent case, however, effect was given neither to this middle view, nor to the view adopted by the Court of Queen's Bench, and it was held that the third section of the statute was to be taken in connection with the first section, and that a party effecting an assurance upon the life of another was entitled to recover whatever amount of interest he had in the life at the date of effecting the assurance, although the day after effecting it his interest might have entirely ceased. It may be doubted whether such a result was intended by the legislature in passing the act. It may rather be thought that the true object of the statute was to prevent any party not merely effecting, but also holding a policy of assurance on the life of another, when he had no interest in the life. To effect an assurance one day having an interest, and to hold it the following day without an interest, has rather the appearance of being an evasion of the statute. If, therefore, the construction recently put upon the statute be the right one, it will be for the legislature to consider whether the statute ought not to be amended, so as to prevent any one holding a policy of assurance upon the life of another, when he has no interest in the life. Public policy would seem to point to such a limitation in the law of life assurance. See 3 Ross's L. C. 703, et seq.

INSURANCE AGAINST FIRE.

This is a contract by which the insurer undertakes, in consideration of the premium, to indemnify the insured against all losses which he may sustain in his house, furniture or goods by means of fire, within the time limited in the policy. The contract must be by policy on stamped paper; but the agreement may be so conclusively fixed before delivery of the policy, as to ground an action for implementing it by a regular policy. The insurer must have value; but it is not required that he should have the absolute and unqualified property of the effects insured: he may insure as a trustee, an heritable creditor, a fiar, or a factor with the custody of the goods. But the nature of the property must be distinctly specified; and all the insurances, by those having an interest in the same subject, must not exceed its fair value. Fire policies are not valued policies: they limit, but do not measure, the liability for loss. The settlement is on the principle of average loss, not of abandonment. When insurance against fire is made at different offices, intimation of the different insurances should be made to each office. The dangers against which the insurer undertakes to indemnify the insured are those arising from fire; but there is an exception of those arising in case of invasion, foreign enemy, or any military or usurped power, or civil commotion; and to this effect a memorandum or condition is entered in the policy. In England fire policies are not assignable at law, but they are in equity. They are assignable in Scotland, provided the interest goes with them. Upon the death of the insured, the interest is continued in his heir; but it can be assigned only with the consent of the insurer. Where a loss happens, evidence of the loss must be produced to the office; and allowance is made not only for what has been actually consumed, but for what has been damaged, and also for the expense incurred in removing the furniture. But it is not held a loss by fire if there be no ignition; as in heat by effervescence, or injury by the over-heating of a flue not followed by actual ignition. Upon each insurance an annual duty is payable; see 19 Vict., c. 22, and acts therein referred to. From this annual duty, insurances upon agricultural produce, farming stock, and implements of husbandry are, by statute, excepted, provided such insurances are effected by a separate and distinct policy, relating solely to such agricultural subjects;

3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 23, § 5. It is also provided by the same statute, that, in rendering their quarterly accounts, insurance companies shall deliver to the commissioners a separate account of all insurances of agricultural produce, farming stock, &c.; § 6. See, on fire insurance, Bell's Com. i. 539-543, 625, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 508, et seq.; Illust. ib.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Newcastle Fire Insurance Company, Dow's Appeal Cases, iii. 255; Menzies, 9 D. 694.

Intendment; the understanding, intention, and true meaning of law. Also, the true meaning of parties contracting, as distinguished from the literal interpretation of the words employed. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Intercommuning, Letters of. Letters of intercommuning were letters from the Scotch Privy Council passing (on their act) in the King's name, charging all and sundry the lieges not to reset, supply, or intercommune with the persons thereby denounced; not to furnish them with meat, drink, house, harbour, or any other thing useful or comfortable; nor to have intercourse with them by word or writing, or otherwise, under pain of being repute art and part in their crimes, and dealt with accordingly; desiring all sheriffs, bailies, &c., to apprehend and commit such rebels to prison. See Nimmo's Hist. of Stirling (per M'Gregor, Stirling), 2 edit. vol. ii. 426, in note.

Interdict; is an order of the Court of Session, or of an inferior court, pronounced, on cause shown, for stopping any act or proceedings complained of as illegal or wrongful. The interdict is obtained in the Court of Session on presenting what is termed a note of suspension and interdict to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills. It may be resorted to as a remedy against all encroachments either on property or possession; and is a protection against any unlawful proceeding. For the form of the note see Shand's Pract. p. 1059; and 1 and 2 Vic., c. 86, § 6. In the course of the proceedings, the propriety of granting an interdict will be discussed. But the decision on that point is quite distinct from the question of right; and an interdict may be granted in consequence of previous possession, though there be no ground to support an ultimate decision in favour of such possession. It is necessary, however, that the party applying should have both title and interest to apply for an interdict. When a note of suspension and interdict is passed, and a declaratory action also brought into court, the action, of suspension and interdict, and the declaratory action may be conjoined, and the right in dispute settled in the course of the conjoined action. In the inferior courts, the procedure is analogous, only that, instead of a note of suspension and interdict, the process commences by a summary petition to the inferior judge. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 47; tit. 3, § 20; Bank. vol. ii. p. 619; Bell's Com. i. 123; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Shand's Pract. pp. 440, 448, 460, 975; MacLaurin's Sheriff-Court Process; Jurid. Styles, vol. ii. p. 78; Thomson on Bills, 216. See Injunction.

Interdiction; is a system of judicial, or of voluntary restraint, provided for those who, from weakness, facility, or profusion, are liable to imposition. It is directed at the sight of the judge, on proper evidence of the facility of the party, or voluntarily imposed by the party himself. Hence the distinction into voluntary and judicial interdiction. Voluntary interdiction, is imposed by the sole act of the interdicted person, who, being conscious of his facility, lays himself under this restraint. This interdiction is usually executed in the form of a bond, whereby the granter obliges himself to do no deed which may affect his estate, without the consent of certain persons therein named, technically called interdictors. But although this is a voluntary restraint, it cannot be recalled at the pleasure of the person who has laid himself under it. It may be removed, however, 1. By a sentence of the Court of Session, either on the ground that it was originally unnecessary, or that the interdicted person has, since the date of the bond, become rei suæ providus. 2. Without judicial interference, it may be removed by the joint act of the interdictors and the interdicted person. 3. Where a quorum of interdictors is named, the restraint ceases, if by death, or otherwise, the number of interdictors is reduced below the quorum. Judicial interdiction, is imposed by sentence of the Court of Session; generally proceeding on an action at the instance of a near kinsman of the facile person; but sometimes ex nobili officio of the Court, where, during the dependence of a suit, they discover that any of the litigants, by reason of natural infirmity, is subject to imposition. Judicial interdiction cannot be recalled but by the authority of the Court of Session, by whom it was imposed. The sentence of the Court, recalling the interdiction, affords security to those afterwards contracting with the interdicted person, even although evidence should be brought that he still continues profuse. An interdiction need not be served against the interdicted person; but it must be executed or published by a messenger-at-arms at the market-cross of the jurisdiction within which the prodigal resides, by publicly reading the interdiction there, after three oyesses. A copy of the messenger's execution must be affixed to the cross; and thereafter the interdiction and execution must be registered in the books both of the jurisdiction within which the interdicted person resides, and in that within which his lands lie, within forty days after the publication; 1581, c. 119; 1597, c. 264; or the interdiction may be recorded in the general register at Edinburgh; 1600, c. 13. And before such registration, the interdiction has no effect against third parties, although they should be in the private knowledge of it; but it operates against the interdictors themselves, as soon as it is delivered to them. All deeds done by the interdicted person, after interdiction thus duly completed, without the consent of the interdictors, and affecting his heritable estate, are reducible. Registration in the general register secures all the lands belonging to the interdicted person, within Scotland, from alienation by him; but where the interdiction is recorded in the particular register, it protects the lands within that district only. Interdiction imposes no restraint on the interdicted person's management of his moveable property, of which he may dispose not only by testament, but by deeds of present alienation. Hence creditors, in personal bonds granted after interdiction, may use execution against the debtor's person, and against his moveable estate; such bonds being reducible only in so far as diligence against the heritable estate may have proceeded upon them. Onerous or rational deeds, granted by the interdicted person, are effectual without the consent of the interdictors; but he cannot alter the succession of his heritable estate by any settlement, however rational. Deeds granted with consent of the interdictors are not reducible, although lesion or prejudice to the interdicted person should be proved. In such a case the only remedy is an action against the interdictors for indemnification of the loss occasioned by their undue consent. The interdictors have no concern in the management of the interdicted person's estate, or in the receipt of his money; their duty is confined merely to interposing their authority to reasonable deeds; and hence they are accountable for nothing but fraud or fault in giving their consent. Where a deed has been granted by the interdicted person, which is liable to reduction on the head of interdiction, an action of reduction, ex capite interdictionis, may be brought not only by the heirs of the interdicted person, and by the interdictors, but by the interdicted person himself. *Ersk. Interest Excluding a Witness. Interest in the issue of a cause or trial was formerly a ground of exclusion against a witness, but now it is enacted by 15 and 16 Vict., c. 27, § 1, inter alia, That "no person adduced as a witness in Scotland before any court or before any person having by law or by consent of parties authority to take evidence shall be excluded from giving evidence by reason of interest." This Act does not apply to instrumental witnesses; who, however, are not disqualified by any interest which is not material and direct; Menzies' Lec. p. 110.; Dickson on Evidence, 370, 889. No objection made by a witness against his own deposing is sustained, unless where the fact put to him may infer guilt or infamy; and accordingly, in exhibitions and other cases, witnesses may be examined upon facts which may infer against themselves fraud and damage. As to the former state of the law on this subject, see Stair, B. iv. tit. 43, § 8; More's Notes, ccccxiii.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 25; Bell's Com. ii. 482-5; Bell's Princ. § 2244, and authorities there cited; Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 142; *Hutch. Interest (AS A QUALIFICATION OR DISQUALIFICATION.) In order to entitle a party to institute an action in a court of law, he must have a title, and also a proper interest in the issue, for if he can derive no benefit from the result, the action will not be sustained; the presumption being, "that it is calculated to distress the defendant, and done in emulationem vicini;" Kames' Equity, 37. Such cases are necessarily of rare occurrence; but it is a question frequently tried, whether a person has sufficient interest to sist himself as a pursuer or defender, in a cause to which he has not been specially summoned. Where an action is raised against a party, who, if unsuccessful in his defence, will have a claim of relief against another, the party liable in relief may appear and defend the action. One may appear and defend his author's title, where an action has been raised for setting it aside. A landlord having interest may sist himself as defender in an action raised against his tenant. In actions of competition, such as multiplepointings, rankings and sale, &c., a party, though not cited, may appear and compete, and crave a preference. But it has been held, that the omission to cite the real creditors in possession, in a process of ranking and sale, cannot be supplied by their appearing and sisting themselves. In some cases, the interest has not been held sufficient to make it competent for a party to sist himself. Thus, one cannot appear and defend an action raised against another for payment of a sum contained in a document of debt, on the ground that he has the preferable right to the debt. Nor can the debtor, in an action of maills and duties, object to decree passing against his tenants who have not entered appearance. Where a creditor has a peculiar interest, adverse to the general interest of the creditors, he will not be allowed to vote, where the object or effect of that vote is to stifle inquiry, or determine any questionable matter against the interest of the creditors generally. A creditor, however, having an adverse interest, although himself ineligible as trustee, will not be deprived of his right of voting in the election of a trustee, without evidence of collusion to the injury of other creditors. Marine policies of insurance are invalid, unless they contain the name of a person or persons interested in the event. And by 14 Geo. III., c. 48, no policy of insurance against fire is valid where the person for whose use it is made has no interest in the event; nor can any greater sum be recovered than the amount of the interest of the insured. In life assurance there is, by statute, the same necessity for the person insuring having a pecuniary interest in the life which he insures. Bell's Com. i. 604, 625-9; ii. 350, 367-9; Princ. §§ 456, 461, 508, 520; Illust. §§ 461, 520; Shand's Prac. 139, 489; Maclaurin's Sheriff Prac. 90, 393. Interest in the cause is a ground of declination of a judge. Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 25; Bank. ii. 480; Shand's Prac. 62. See Declination.

Interest of Money; may be defined to be the creditor's share of the profit which the borrower or debtor is presumed to make from the use of the money. The prohibition in the law of Moses to take interest had operated so powerfully with the clergy, that by the canon law it was prohibited, and the taking of interest was regarded as criminal. This led to various devices, such as the introduction of wadsets and of annuallent rights (see Bond); until at last, on the wider diffusion of commercial notions, the taking a certain rate of interest was made lawful. After the Reformation there was no restraint on the amount of interest, when by the act 1587, c. 52, the rate of interest was regulated, and was then fixed at 10 per cent. From that time it gradually fell, till by 12 Anne, stat. 2, c. 16, it was reduced to 5 per cent. By the Acts 4 Will. IV., c. 98, 7 Will. IV., and 1 Vict., c. 80, and 13 and 14 Vict., c. 56, bills of exchange and promissory-notes were exempted from the operation of the usury laws; and by the act 17 and 18 Vict., c. 90, 1854, all existing laws against usury were repealed; subject to the following provisos,—1st (§ 2), That transactions previous to the passing of the act should not be affected; 2d, (§ 3), That the expressions legal or current rate of interest should continue after the passing of the act to mean the same rate of interest as before; and 3d (§ 4), That the act should not affect the laws as to pawnbrokers. The statutes as to usury are contained in a schedule annexed to this act.

Interest is due ex lege or ex pacto. It is due ex lege, or by the act of the law itself: 1. By statute, as in the case of bills of exchange, inland bills and promissory-notes, which by 1681, c. 20, 1696, c. 36, 12 Geo. III., c. 72, bear interest from their date, in case of non-acceptance, or from the day they fall due, in case of non-acceptance or non-payment. Interest is due on the whole sum contained in a horning, interest as well as principal, accumulated into a principal sum from the day of denunciation, if made at the head burgh of the debtor's residence; 1621, c. 20; and by 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114, §§ 5 and 10, the registration of an execution of charge has the same effect as denunciation on letters of horning. Sums paid by cautioners on distress bear interest by the Act of Sederunt, Dec. 21 1590. By Act of Sederunt, July 31 1690, where there is a sequestration of rents, and a factor appointed, the factor is liable in interest on the rents recovered, or which he might by diligence have recovered, within a year after they are due. Interest is due ex lege, on the price in a sale of lands, from the time at which the purchaser gets right to the rents, and that from whatever cause the delay to pay the price may have originated. Where one receives money belonging to another, which formerly bore interest, he is liable for interest on the sum received; or, when money is paid at the desire of one, he must be liable for the interest of the money advanced at his desire. Merchants, in the same way, are entitled to interest on the price of goods sold by them, where the payment is beyond the usual credit of the trade. Interest is not due on feu-duties ex lege; it requires express stipulation; Napier, 31st May 1831, 9 S. and D. 655; Marquis of Tweeddale, 1842, 4 D. 862. See Denunciation. Drawer of a Bill. Double Bonds. Interest is due by paction, express or implied. It is due by express paction wherever the ground of debt bears a clause of interest; but in the expression of this clause there must be no provision for accumulating the arrears of interest into a principal sum bearing interest. Yet it is allowable to take a bond payable at a term for the principal sum, and interest from the date of the advance to that term, by which means the whole becomes a principal sum bearing interest from that time. Interest is due from tacit or presumed paction, as, where a person becomes bound for interest on a sum for the time past, which implies an obligation for the time to come. Interest can in no case begin to run until the debt exists; and therefore, wherever it is made to run for a period prior to the existence of the debt, the contract becomes usurious. Interim Decree; is a decree disposing of part of a cause, but leaving the remainder unexhausted. The most ordinary examples of such decrees occur in cases of accounting, or in actions concluding for a certain sum, where the defender admits so much to be due, but disputes the balance. In these, and similar cases, it is competent to the pursuer to apply for an interim decree to the amount of the admitted or indisputable balance. According to the strict rule of the Judicature Act, 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, it would seem not to be competent to pronounce such an interim decree until the record is closed; but in one case, where a party in his defences made such an admission, interim decree was pronounced for the admitted balance before the record was closed, and quoad ultra, a record was, in that case, directed to be made up; Crauford, 22d Nov. 1833, 12 S. & D. 113. Formerly no interim decree could be extracted until the final issue of the cause, unless the judge granted warrant for extracting it as an interim decree. Hence, where such a decree was pronounced, or where, in the course of a process, the expenses of any part of the discussion were incidentally found due and discerned for, a warrant to extract the decree as an interim one had to be applied for, where there was any risk of the payment not being made without an extract. This is now altered by 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 28; and interim decrees are now extractable without a special allowance, unless it is otherwise directed. Similar rules apply in the inferior courts. See MacLaurin's Form of Process, 426. In Sheriff-court causes above £25 value, interlocutors giving interim decree for payment of money are, under 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 24, reviewable by the Court of Session. See also Record. Decree.

Interim Execution, pending an Appeal.

The presentment and intimation of a petition of appeal to the House of Lords, and warrant of service, suspends execution of a decree of the Court of Session. But, by the act 48 Geo. III., c. 151, § 17, it is declared, "that when any appeal is lodged in the House of Lords, a copy of the petition of appeal shall be laid by the respondent or respondents before the Judges of the Division to which the cause belongs, and the said Division, or any four of the Judges thereof, shall have power to regulate all matters relative to interim possession or execution, and payment of costs and expenses already incurred, according to their sound discretion, having a just regard to the interests of the parties, as they may be affected by the affirmance or reversal of the judgment or decree appealed from." Under this statutory provision, the practice is, for the respondent in the appeal who wishes to have interim execution pending the appeal, to present a summary petition to the Division of the Court to which the cause belongs, to which petition a copy of the petition of appeal is appended; and the prayer of the petition for interim execution is, that the Court may allow the decree of the Court of Session appealed against to go out and be extracted in name of the petitioners, and execution to proceed thereon, notwithstanding the appeal, with the expense of extract, upon caution to repeat what may be paid under the decree, in the event of the decree being reversed in the House of Lords. This petition is intimated by delivering copies to the agent of the appellant in the Court of Session, and in the ordinary case the prayer of it is granted. Cases illustrative of this article will be found in Shaw's Digest. See, inter alia, Sir J. Inglis Cochrane, 1849, 12 D. 302; Young, 1852, 14 D. 746, 811; Granger, 1857, 19 D. 1010; Russell, 1858, 20 D. 772; Tulloch, ib. 1319. Interim Factor. Under the former bankruptcy statutes, 54 Geo. III., c. 137, §§ 16, 17; 2 and 3 Vict., c. 41, § 45; and 16 and 17 Vict., c. 53, § 1, the first step in a sequestration was the appointment of an interim factor for the preservation of the bankrupt's estate until the election of a trustee, which was a matter frequently attended with delay. See Bell's Com. iii. 360. By the recent bankruptcy act, 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, provision is made for the immediate election of a trustee, and the appointment of an interim factor is no part of the ordinary procedure in a sequestration. The interim preservation of the bankrupt's estate, pending a petition for sequestration, and until the election of a trustee, where this needs to be attended to, is provided for by §§ 16 and 17, the former of which enacts that "it shall be competent for the Court to which a petition for sequestration is presented, whether sequestration can forthwith be awarded or not, on special application by a creditor, either (1) in such petition, or (2) by a separate petition, with or without citation to other parties interested, as the said Court may deem necessary, or (3) without such special application, if the Court think proper, to take immediate measures for the preservation of the estate, either (1) by the appointment of a judicial factor, who shall find such caution as may be deemed necessary, with the powers necessary for such preservation, including the power to recover debts, or (2) by such other proceedings as may be requisite; and such interim appointments or proceedings shall be carried into immediate effect; but if the same have been made or ordered by the sheriff, they may be recalled by the Court of Session on appeal taken in manner hereinafter directed." Section 17 gives power to the sheriff, upon cause shown by a creditor, or without any application, if he shall think fit, at any time after the sequestration and before the election of a trustee, "to cause to be sealed up and put under safe custody the books and papers of the bankrupt, and (2) to lock up his shop, warehouse, or other repositories, and (3) to keep the keys thereof till a trustee is elected and confirmed.

Interim Managers. Prior to the passing of the Burgh Reform Act, it was customary for the Court of Session, where a royal burgh had been disfranchised, or had no regular magistrates, to appoint persons by special commission to act as officers of the law in completing of feudal rights, where property might be in danger by the death or supervening incapacity of the proper functionaries. Thus, when the city of Edinburgh was, after Michaelmas 1745, without a magistracy, and so had no bailies to receive resignation or give sasine in burghage tenements, the Court appointed certain persons bailies for that special purpose, till a new magistracy should be established in due course of law. Since then there have been frequent instances of this power having been exercised in the appointing of persons not only to give sasine, but to manage all the ordinary affairs of the burgh during its disfranchisement. Such emergencies, however, are now provided for by the statute 16 Vict., cap. 26, entitled "An Act to provide for the supplying of vacancies in town councils of burghs in Scotland, consequent on null or irregular elections." On the death of any sheriff-depute, the Court of Session has power, ex nobili officio, to appoint an interim deputy, who acts under their authority, not only as an officer of the law, but as a judge. Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 23; Shand's Prac. p. 42. See Burgh Royal.

Interim Possession. In all advocations of interlocutors pronounced by sheriffs, it is competent to the inferior judge to regulate, in the meantime, on the application of either party, all matters regarding interim possession, having due regard to the manner in which the mutual interests of the parties may be affected in the final decision of the cause. This interim order is not subject to review, except by the Lord Ordinary or the Court, in the course of discussing the process of advocacy. But full powers are reserved to the Court of Session or Lord Ordinary, during the discussion of the cause, to give such orders and directions in respect to interim possession as justice may require. 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 42; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 86, § 4; A. S. 10 July 1839, § 130. See Advocation. Interim Execution.

Interim Warrant. Where, in a process of ranking and sale, there is a class of creditors preferable on a particular subject which has been sold, it is the practice, without waiting for the sale of the remainder of the property, to prepare an interim scheme of division, that the price may be divided without delay. The expense of such interim warrants falls on the particular creditor thereby benefited. The principal and interest of these preferable creditors' debts is accumulated at the term of the payment of the price; and, unless when the warrant is obtained expressly in payment of interest, the partial payments are, contrary to the ordinary rule in indefinite payments, deducted from the accumulate sum. It was formerly common for preferable creditors to obtain interim warrants on the judicial factor, or purchaser, or bank in which the money was consigned, for sums to account of their claims. But the confusion thereby occasioned led to the A. S. 11th July 1794, by which, § 13, it was declared that no creditor should in time coming draw by interim warrants any sum out of the common fund without sufficient cause shown to the Court, and in no case should draw full payment; and that no interim warrant should be granted before decree of certification is pronounced, except for interest or annuities. No such application can be received after the 25th February for the winter session, or the 5th of July for the summer session, or during the five sederunt days preceding the rising of the Court for the Christmas recess; A. S. 13th July 1844, and A. S. 21st Dec. 1765. When it is doubtful whether or not an interim warrant should be granted, a remit is made to an Ordinary to investigate. The common agent, or, before his appointment, the agents for the raisers of the process, may get interim warrants on the factor for payments to account of the expenses of the proceedings. Bell's Com. ii. 280; Shand's Prac. 919. See Ranking and Sale.

Interlineations. The subscription at the bottom of the page of a formal writ does not apply to the interlineations in that page. Such interlineations, when of no importance, are held pro non scriptis, and as if they were blank. Stair, B. iv. tit. 42, § 19; More's Notes, cccviii.; Ross's Lect. i. 143; Menzies' Lect. 123; Dickson on Evid. 389. Interlocutors; correctly speaking, are judgments or judicial orders pronounced in the course of a suit, but which do not finally determine the cause. The term, however, in Scotch practice, is applied indiscriminately to the judgments or orders of the Court, or of the Lords Ordinary, whether they exhaust the question at issue or not. All interlocutors pronounced by Lords Ordinary must be signed by the Judge pronouncer; and interlocutors of either Division of the Court must be signed by the presiding Judge in presence of a quorum of the Court; I.P.D., for In Presentia Dominorum, being added to the presiding Judge's signature, 1693. c. 18. Every paper given in to process in the Inner or Outer House, in terms of an interlocutor, ordering or allowing the same to be given in, and also every reclaiming note, and every note craving to repone the petitioner, which, by Act of Sederunt, is required to be presented within the reclaiming days, must have prefixed thereto a full copy (including the date) of the interlocutor ordering or allowing such paper, or of the interlocutor complained of, as the case may be. The interlocutor need not be repeated in the body of the paper. There must also be prefixed, in like manner, a copy of any interlocutor prorogating the time originally allowed; A. S. July 11, 1858, § 110. Every interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is final in the Outer House, subject, however, to the review of the Inner-House; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 17; 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, §§ 11, 12. The Lord Ordinary may, with consent of both parties, correct or alter any interlocutor at any time before extract, provided that consent be given by the counsel for the parties in a minute signed by them; A. S. July 11. 1828, § 63. It is also competent to get a clerical error corrected. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 40, Note by Mr Ivory; Bank. vol. ii. p. 675; Shand's Prac. 347, 968; Maclaurin's Sheriff-Court Prac.; Dickson on Evid. 342, 625; Shaw's Digest, voce Process; Stewart, Dow's App. Cases, ii. 35.

By 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 47, Sheriffs are empowered to pronounce and sign interlocutors when furth of their sheriffdoms; and by § 20, any sheriff-substitute or sheriff may correct "any merely clerical error" in their judgments, "at any time before the proceedings have been transmitted to the judge or Court of Review, not being later than seven days from the date of such judgment." By § 13 the grounds of judgment must be set forth in the interlocutor or in a note. Interlocutors pronounced in the Court of Session in causes commencing in the inferior Courts where proof is allowed, must specify and separate findings in fact and findings in law; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 40; Shand's Prac. p. 465. This rule is applied also to all interlocutors pronounced by the inferior courts, where matter of fact is disputed and proof is allowed; A. S. 15th Feb. 1851. An interlocutor not signed is null; Smith, 1846, 9 D. 190. By 11 and 12 Vict., c. 79, § 10, provision is made for a new and shorter form of interlocutor of relevancy in criminal cases in the Court of Justiciary. See Clerical Error.

Interlocutory Decree. In England, in a suit in equity, if any matter of fact be strongly controverted, the fact is usually directed to be tried at the bar of the Court of Queen's Bench, or at the assizes, upon a feigned issue. If a question of mere law arises in the course of a cause, it is the practice of the Court of Chancery to refer it to the opinion of the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, upon a case stated for that purpose. In such cases interlocutory decrees or orders are made. Interlocutory judgments are such as are given in the middle of a cause, upon some plea proceeding on default, which is not intermediate, and does not finally determine or complete the suit. But the interlocutory judgments most usually spoken of are those incomplete judgments by which the right of the plaintiff is established, but the quantum of damages sustained by him is not ascertained, which is the province of a jury. Interlocutory orders are such as do not decide the cause, but settle some intervening matter relating to the cause. Tomlin's Dict. h. t.

Interlocutory Judgment. As contradistinguished from a final judgment, an interlocutory judgment is any judicial order or interlocutor pronounced in the preparation or disposal of a cause, whether in the Court of Session or in an inferior court, which is not decisive of the whole merits of the suit. In the inferior courts, it is not competent to advocate an interlocutory judgment, except under the circumstances explained, voce Advocation; and, in the Court of Session, an appeal to the House of Lords is not competent against an interlocutory judgment, except with the leave of the Division of the Judges pronouncing it, or unless there has been difference of opinion among the Judges. 48 Geo. III., c. 151, § 15. See also 1 and 2 Vict., c. 86, § 3; 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, §§ 19, 24; 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 12; Paton's Appeal Practice. See Appeal. Final Judgment. Advocation.

International Law. The term law of nations, among the Romans, had a somewhat different signification from that which it bears in modern times. It comprehended all those laws and customs which are so reasonable in themselves, as to be embraced by all civilized nations, modified by the particular constitution of each individual state. But the division of modern Europe into a number of independent kingdoms, and the frequent intercourse maintained between them, has given birth to a system of express or tacit rules, scarcely, if at all known among the Romans, and termed the law of nations, or international law. This law considers independent nations as so many political persons in a state of equality, and owing to each other duties similar to those which individuals reciprocally owe. By it are constituted the rights of war, the security of ambassadors, the obligations arising from treaties, and the like. It also comprehends those rules generally received by sovereign powers for fixing the order of their mutual correspondence during war and peace; such as the form of declaring war previous to any acts of hostility, the regulations relating to reprisals, to contraband goods found on board neutral ships, to the exchange of prisoners, and to suspensions of arms or negotiations of peace, the ceremonial of receiving and entertaining ambassadors, the privileges indulged to their servants and domestics, &c. Recent legal authors have also considered under this head questions relative to the conflict of laws; to what is called comitas; to the effect given in one country to the law of another; the constitution, evidence, interpretation, and dissolution of foreign contracts; the force of foreign awards; the laws of succession to foreign heritage or moveables; the mutual relation between the bankrupt laws of different countries, and so forth. See Inst. of Justinian, lib. i. tit. 2, and Commentators; Grotius de Jure Belli ac Pacis; Mackintosh's Discourse on the Law of Nature and Nations; Stair, B. i. tit. 1, §§ 11 and 16; More's Notes, i. et seq.; *Ersk. Interpretation. It is scarcely possible to express laws in such terms as to avoid all ambiguity. Such a degree of precision is perhaps unattainable; and the want of a clear and distinct idea of the object, or of views sufficiently comprehensive, or the defect of language, will constantly either encumber the regulation, or leave some parts of the rule to be inferred. Even in the framing of private deeds (which properly form the law of the transaction, for the regulation of which they are provided), the same inaccuracy prevails; and, circumscribed as the object is, the provisions of the deed will be found in many cases to have fallen short, or to have misrepresented the views and intentions of the parties. Hence, rules of interpretation are required, which may insure just and uniform decisions. The rules for interpreting a statute have been laid down by Mr Erskine; and every deed which receives the decision of a court has rules of interpretation peculiar to itself, drawn from the general scope and intention of the deed; from the nature of the transaction; from the legal rights of the parties, independently of agreement; and from circumstances which it is impossible to particularize, but which render this one of the most important studies of the lawyer, and in a particular manner of the conveyancer; since a thorough knowledge of the rules of interpretation must ever be the surest ground on which to place that knowledge which is required in framing deeds. Stair, B. iv. tit. 1, § 61; tit. 43, § 21; More's Notes, i.; Bank. i. 339; iii. 52, 82, 93; *Ersk. Interrogatories. An interrogatory, although frequently used to signify every kind of question put to witnesses or others, is applied in a technical and more limited sense to a written question previously adjusted. By the Act of Sederunt "regulating procedure in jury causes" (16th February 1841, § 17), it is provided, That "when it shall be made out upon oath, to the satisfaction of the Court, that a witness resides beyond the reach of the process of the Court, and is not likely to come within its authority before the day of trial, or cannot attend on account of age or permanent infirmity, or is labouring under severe illness, which renders it doubtful whether his evidence may not be lost, or is a seafaring man, or is obliged to go into foreign parts, or shall be abroad and not likely to return before the day of trial, it shall be competent to examine such witness by commission, on interrogatories to be settled by the parties, and approved of by one of the principal Clerks of Session, or Record Clerk; and it being established at the trial, to the satisfaction of the Court, by affidavit, or by oath in open Court, that such witness is dead, or cannot attend, owing to absence, age, or permanent infirmity, it shall be competent to use at the trial the evidence so taken, subject to all legal objections to its admissibility; and, in all cases where a commission is granted upon the application of one party, for examining witnesses as aforesaid, it shall be competent to the other party to have a joint commission, or to propose cross interrogatories to such witnesses, to be settled as aforesaid; and, in addition to the interrogatories so settled, it shall be competent to the commissioner to put such additional questions to the witnesses as may appear to him to be necessary, taking care to mark the question so put as put by him. That when one party obtains a commission to examine witnesses, and does not use the evidence obtained under the commission, the other party may use the evidence given under it at the trial, provided he satisfies the Court, at the trial, that he could not bring the witness or witnesses whose evidence he proposes to read, in which case he shall be liable for the expense of the commission. The depositions taken on commission shall not be used, if the witnesses so examined shall afterwards be brought forward at the trial." Under § 21 of the same Act of Seiderunt, motions for such commissions may be made during vacation before the Judge who is to try the cause, or before either of the Judges appointed to be on the circuit at which it is to be tried, or, in their absence, before the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, it being shown to the satisfaction of such Judge that the motion could not have been made during session. No alteration is made on these provisions by the act 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36. In the A. S., 3d July 1823; also in Macfarlane's Jury Prac. App. 343, and Jurid. Styles, iii. 785, will be found the form of interrogatories attached to a commission for taking a proof. See also Bell's Com. ii. 395; Macfarlane, 88, 93, 188; Dickson on Evid. 973. See Commission to take Proof. Evidence.

Interruption; as a law term, is usually applied to the step legally requisite to stop the currency of the period of a prescription. Various prescriptions have been introduced, depending on uninterrupted possession or uninterrupted silence, or acquiescence for a longer or shorter period of time, according to circumstances. The principles of these prescriptions, and the nature and effect of each, are explained under the title Prescription. At present it is only necessary to observe, that the acts whereby each of the prescriptions may be legally interrupted, and in effect put an end to, are of various kinds—as by an acknowledgment of debt—by citation in an action, or by execution of diligence—by partial payments, in the long negative prescription—and by payment of interest in all of them—by an instrument of protest, which is termed civil interruption, or interruption via facti. There is a register of interruptions, which it is sometimes necessary to examine in a search of incumbrances. The term interruption is not properly applicable to the triennial prescription. In cases where that prescription is pleaded, the question is, whether the statute applies, or has been obviated by the requisite "pursuit." See Dunn v. Lamb, 1854, 16 D, 944, and authorities there cited. See also Napier on Prescription; Dickson on Evidence; Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, §§ 22 and 73; tit. 12, § 56, et seq.; B. iv. tit. 35, § 14; *Ersk. Interventus Rei. See Rei interventus.

Intimation; is a step necessary in certain circumstances for the complete transference of a right. An assignation is completed by intimation, which is necessary both for completing the transference, and for interrupting bona fides on the part of the debtor, so as to give the assignee a preference in competition. Intimation is regularly made by the assignee giving notice, in presence of a notary and witnesses, to the debtor personally, or at his dwelling-house, the procurator of the assignee reading the assignment of the special debt, or leaving a written schedule or copy of it. The proof of notice is a notarial instrument. But there are many substitutes for this formal method of intimation. It is sufficient if the debtor be a party to the assignation, or if he acknowledge having received notice in writing on the back of the assignation, or by letter; but a letter written to the debtor is not sufficient. Judicial notice is sufficient. A promise to pay, proved by writing, is sufficient. Certain assignations require no intimation. Stair, B. iii. tit. 1, § 5, et seq.; B. iv. tit. 32, § 4; More's Notes, p. cclxxi.; *Ersk. Intoxication. See Drunkenness.

Intrinsic; is a term applied to circumstances sworn to by a party on an oath of reference, so intimately connected with the point at issue that they make part of the evidence afforded by the oath, and cannot be separated from it. More's Notes to Stair, p. ccccxviii; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2 §§ 11 and 12; Bell's Com. i. 333; Dickson on Evidence, 818; Thomson on Bills, 652. See Evidence, Extrinsic, p. 342.

Intromission; is the assuming of the possession and management of property belonging to another, either on legal grounds or without any authority. Intromission is therefore either legal or vicious.

I. LEGAL INTROMISSION.

1. Intromission as an adjudger.—The adjudication was originally a purchase under reversion; and the estate having been in general proportioned to the debt, the rents were held to indemnify the adjudger for the interest of his money. But as this diligence degenerated from its original purity, the estate was carried off by the debt, however inadequate it might be to the value of the estate. An attempt was made to remedy this injustice, by the act 1621, c. 6, by which the rents of the estate, in so far as they exceeded the interest of the debt, were annually, during the legal, to be applied in payment of the principal sum. And, in the case of a minor, this was, by the act 1663, c. 10, to continue during his minority; and if, after this, the debt were not completely paid off, the estate, by the expiration of the legal, or period of redemption, was to become the property of the adjudger. This so far checked the abuse; and hence, where adjudgers have entered into possession by a decree of mails and duties, they are accountable, not only for what they have intromitted with, but for what they might have intromitted with by proper diligence. They are chargeable by a rental, and are entitled to take credit for those arrears only, in attempting to recover which they can show that they have used the most exact diligence. See Adjudication. Expiry of Legal.

2. Intromission as an heritable creditor.—In the common case, a written obligation requires a written discharge; but heritable bonds usually contain a clause empowering the creditor to intromit with the rents of the subject; and as, when the creditor has intromitted, his intromissions consist of acts which may be proved, the proof of these forms one of the exceptions to the general rule, that a written obligation requires a written discharge. Proof of intromission under such a warrant, therefore, will be received to reduce the debt in whole or in part. See Discharge.

3. Intromission on more than one title.—Where one in possession of an estate is called to account by a person claiming a right to the estate, and the person in possession holds two titles, one of which is preferable, the other inferior, to the title in the person competing, it becomes a question whether the previous intromissions are to be imputed to the strongest or weakest of his titles; for, should the intromitter be obliged to impute his intromissions to the preferable title—as, for instance, to an adjudication or heritable bond—then all his intromissions must go to extinguish the heritable debt, which being thereby paid off, he draws nothing in respect of his inferior title; whereas, if he be allowed to impute his former intromissions to his inferior title, his future intromissions, after the appearance of the competitor, will go in extinction of his preferable claim, and thus a considerable advantage will be enjoyed by him. The rule of the law of Scotland, under certain modifications, authorizes this last mode of settlement. See Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1 § 30; Stair, B. iii. tit. 2, § 29; Bank. vol. ii. p. 229; Bell's Com. ii. 85, 531, et seq.; Bell on Leases, ii. 31, 315; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, ii. 412; Tait on Evidence, 3d edit. p. 313; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. ii. p. 399; Brown's Synop.

II. VITIOUS INTROMISSIONS.

The term vicious intromission is applied exclusively to the heir's unwarrantable intromission with the moveable estate of the ancestor; his intromission with the heritage or rents of the heritage, being termed gestio pro herede. The effect of vicious intromission is to render the heir who is guilty of it liable, under the passive title, of vicious intromission, for the debt of the ancestor universally—the severity of this passive title being intended to prevent the carrying off of moveables, which are, from their nature, so liable to embezzlement. With the same view, its consequences are extended to every intromitter with the effects of the deceased, whether he be the heir or a stranger to the succession. A confirmation as executor puts an end to the vicious intromission, since it infers an intention on the part of the intromitter to account for his intromissions, which takes off the vitiosity, and renders him liable only to the extent of his intromissions. This passive title is available only to creditors whose debts are constituted by an obligation inter vivos; and therefore legatees, or donees mortis causa, cannot sue upon it. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 49, et seq. See Executor. Behaviour as Heir. Passive Titles.

Intrusion; is the delict of entering into possession of an heritable subject without any title in the person entering. The remedy is generally sought in the Sheriff-court by an action or petition for ejectment. See Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 192; Brown's Synop. h. t. Articles Ejection and Intrusion. Delinquency.

Invecta et Illata. This term, in questions of hypothec and thirlage, applies to the articles brought within the tenement, or within the thirl. In the case of urban tenements, there is an hypothec upon the invecta et illata; that is, on the household furniture and articles for the use of the family, or for ornament, which are brought into the house; or over the instruments and utensils brought into a workshop by the tenants, for carrying on the business of the shop or manufactory. In retail shops, the articles there are liable to the same hypothec; but, to render it effectual to the landlord, the goods on sale must be sequestrated. See Hypothec. Furniture. In thirlage, again, there is sometimes a thirlage of the invecta et illata, in the case of a village where all the grain brought within the village "that tholes fire and water" (such are the terms of the astriction) is liable to certain thirlage. These terms apply to malting and drying within the thirl, but not to baking and brewing; and accordingly no mulcture is due, in the thirlage of invecta et illata, for flour or oatmeal imported in that state into the thirl. Stair, B. i. tit. 13, § 15; B. ii. tit. 7, § 20; B. iv. tit. 25, § 3; More's Notes, p. lxxii; *Ersk. See Thirlage.

Inventory; is a regular list of articles, or of an estate, describing each article fully and precisely by itself, and seriatim, so as to point out every article of which the estate consists. The evidence afforded by a regular and orderly list of articles has been resorted to by the law on different occasions, for the benefit of heirs, or of creditors, or of minors; and regular inventories have been required in different circumstances, where those beneficially interested in the estate are unable to attend to their own interest; as in the case—

1. Of heirs.
2. Of pupils, minors, and insane persons.
3. Of creditors and bankrupts.

J. INVENTORY FOR THE SECURITY OF HEIRS.

This has been resorted to in the case of moveable succession as well as of heritage.

1. Inventory in a service cum beneficio inventarii.—The entry of an heir by inventory was introduced by the act 1695, c. 24, entitled, an "Act for obviating the frauds of apparent heirs," which, after making certain provisions against the contrivances of such heirs in prejudice of the creditors of their predecessors, provided that thereafter they might enter to their predecessors "cum beneficio inventarii, or upon inventory, as use is in executories and moveables." This inventory "must be full and particular" as to the heritable estate of the ancestor, and must be lodged within the year, with the clerk of the shire within which the lands lie: it is signed by the heir, the judge, and clerk of court, and recorded in the sheriff-clerk's books. In special circumstances, however, the Court will, on a summary petition, authorize the recording of the inventory after the expiration of the year and day; Bell, 23th May 1830, 8 S. & D. 839. An extract of the inventory must, within forty days after the expiration of the tempus deliberandi, be recorded in a register kept for that purpose in the books of Session. When the inventory has been made up within the year, and recorded in the books of Session within the forty days after the expiration of the year, the heir may enter at any time thereafter, with all the advantage of the act 1695, c. 24; and there is no alteration in the form of the service farther than that it is stated that he is served heir cum beneficio inventarii. The lodging of the inventory infers of itself no passive title, provided it be not followed up by service. Bank. vol. ii. p. 311, et seq.; Bell's Com. i. 663; Bell's Princ. § 1926. The benefit of entry with a limited responsibility is now effected in a more simple way under the Service of Heirs Act (10 and 11 Vict., c. 47, § 25), which practically supersedes the provision of the old act on this subject. Menzies' Lect. p. 766. See Beneficium Inventarii.

2. Inventory of personal estate.—Is a list of the whole moveable effects belonging to a deceased person, which must be given up on oath by his executor or nearest of kin, or other person entering on their administration. This is required, under penalties, by the act regulating the duties payable on succession, 16 and 17 Vict., c. 51, §§ 45, 46. It is also necessary as part of the procedure in confirmations of executors. See Confirmation. Executor. Stat. 21 and 22 Vict., c. 56, §§ 8-15. By § 8 of the latter statute inventories of personal estates of deceased persons may be given up and recorded in, and confirmation granted by, any commissary court to which it is competent to apply under the act for appointment of an executor-dative. Under § 9, the inventory in the case of a person dying domiciled in Scotland may include personal estate in any part of the United Kingdom—personal estate in England and Ireland being stated separately. By § 11, such inventories must be sworn to before the commissary or his depute, or the commissary-clerk or his depute, or a commissioner appointed by the commissary, or a magistrate, or justice of the peace, or British consul. By § 15, for securing the payment of the stamp duties, the inventory required by law to be exhibited before obtaining confirmation must extend to and include the whole personal and moveable estate of the deceased in the United Kingdom, and the value thereof. A very full account of the procedure in this matter, so far as not altered by the recent statute, with a form of the inventory itself, will be found in the Appendix to the Juridical Styles, vol. ii. 2d edit. Stair, B. iii, tit. 8, § 54; Bell's Com. ii. 82, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 1894-7-8; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. ii. p. 491-5.

II. INVENTORY FOR THE SECURITY OF PUPILS, MINORS, AND INSANE PERSONS.

The tutorial or curatorial inventory is a list of the whole estate, heritable or moveable, which belongs to a minor, made up by the tutor or curator before he enters on his office, at the sight of a judge, and after citing the nearest of kin on the sides of the father and mother of the minor. In an action for making up tutorial inventories, the citation of the next of kin on the mother's side is sometimes dispensed with, where they live beyond the jurisdiction of the Court; but such dispensation can be granted only on a petition to the Court, stating the circumstances; Nasmith's Tutors, 8th Dec. 1830, F. C.; Hobbs, 29th June 1831, 9 Sh. 841; Dingwall Fordyce, 1836, 14 Sh. 992; Bannerman, 1838; 10 Jur. 241; A. & B., 1841; 16 F. 1055. This inventory is ordered to be made up by the act 1672, c. 2, and three duplicates thereof, subscribed by the tutor or curator, and by the next of kin, and by a delegate appointed by the judge, are directed to be judicially produced before the Judge Ordinary; and, after being signed by the clerk of Court, one duplicate is to be delivered to the next of kin by the father, another to the next of kin by the mother, and the third to the tutor or curator. If, after completing the inventory, any other property or estate be discovered, or shall open to the minor, it is to be added to the former inventory within two months after the minor has attained possession; the same forms being observed as at first. Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 21, et seq. The penalties of neglecting to make this inventory are, 1. That no expense incurred in the affairs of the minor shall be allowed to the tutors. 2. They shall be accountable for omissions, and may be removed from their offices as suspect; Ersk. ib. § 22. Forms of the summonses, and other writs used in the above cases, will be found in Bell on Deeds, vol. iii. More's Notes to Stair. p. xli.; Bank. vol. i. p. 168; Bell's Princ. § 2081-95; Shand's Prac. p. 560; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. ii. p. 493-503; iii. 39, 270-3. See Curatory. Tutor.

By the Pupils' Protection Act (12 and 13 Vict., c. 31, §§ 3, 25), all judicial factors, and persons served tutors of law to pupils, or appointed tutor-dative to pupils, insane persons, or idiots, or served curators to insane persons or idiots, are required, within six months of receipt of their bond of caution, to lodge with the Accountant of Court a distinct rental of lands, &c., and an inventory of moveables; and they must close their accounts once in every year, on a day to be fixed by the Accountant, and lodge an account with the Accountant within a month of that day, § 4.

By the Bankruptcy Statute (19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, § 80), trustees on sequestrated estates are required, "as soon as may be after the appointment," to make up and transmit to the Accountant in Bankruptcy an inventory and valuation of the bankrupt estate and effects.

Inventory of Process. The clerks of Court are directed to make out and maintain a correct inventory of the articles of which each process consists; specifying the dates of the productions and ingivings. Two duplicates of the inventory are made, of which one remains in the custody of the clerk of Court till the final transmission of the process to the keeper of the records, and the other forms one of the articles of the process when transmitted to the Lord Ordinary for advising. A. S. 10th March 1798, and 8th July 1819; Alexander's Abridg. of A. S. 109, 160-1.

Investiture; is the complete act by which a right of land is conferred, consisting anciently of the possession given to the vassal by the superior in presence of the pares curia, where, without writing or any other ceremony, the vassal was fully and completely possessed of his feu. But now this right is conferred by a charter and recorded instrument of sasine following upon it, or by the charter itself being recorded in the register of sasines, in virtue of the Titles to Lands Act. Without this, no feudal right to land is completed; and what is called the investiture is thereby completed. Where, therefore, lands have been vested in a person by charter and sasine, the charter and sasine are said to be the investiture of the estate; and the person called by the title-deeds to succeed on the death of the vassal, whether heir-male of the vassal's body, or heir-at-law, is said to be the heir of investiture. See Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 17; Bank. i. 509; Shaw's Digest, 181. See Infeftment. Charter. Titles to Land.

Invoice; a particular account of merchandise, with its value, custom, and charges, &c., sent by a merchant to his factor or correspondent in another country. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Irritancy, Legal and Conventional. The irritancy of a right is its forfeiture in consequence of some neglect or contravention. Such a forfeiture takes place either by the force of the law alone (ex lege), or in consequence of some previous stipulation (ex contractu). Of the former kind, is the irritancy of a feu from non-payment of the duty during two years. (See Tinsel of the feu.) In like manner a lease may be dissolved during its currency, by the operation of a legal as well as of a conventional irritancy. Legal irritancies are incurred by the lessee allowing his rent to fall into arrear for two full years, or by the lessee deserting possession, or neglecting to cultivate the farm at the usual period. The law with regard to this irritancy was formerly rather uncertain, and the Act of Sederunt, 14th Dec. 1756, was passed with the view of establishing a definite and permanent rule. Where a tenant has irritated his lease, by being two years in arrear, the lessor may have the irritancy declared before the Judge Ordinary, and insist on a summary removing. If a tenant run one full year's rent in arrear, or desert his possession and leave the farm unlaboured, action may be raised before the Judge Ordinary, who may discern him to find caution within a limited time, for arrears, and for the rent of the five succeeding crops, or during the currency, if the lease be of shorter duration than five years; and on failure, may discern him to remove, and eject him in the same way as if the lease were determined, and the lessee had been legally warned in terms of the statute, 1555, c. 39. If the amount of a year's rent be due, it is of no consequence whether it be the rent of a single crop, or made up of portions of the rents of several years. The landlord is not bound to accept of partial payments; and debts of the landlord, or even public burdens, paid by the tenant without authority, are not computed so as to diminish the year's rent due. In construing the act relatively to desertion, or leaving the ground unlaboured, the leaning has been in favour of the tenant. The Act of Sederunt is applicable only to agricultural subjects, not to mines, collieries nor fisheries. Urban subjects are also excluded. But it is thought that the older law, viz., that the tenant might be removed, if he were behind in payment of his rent, unless he found caution as to the future, is still applicable to urban subjects. Conventional irritancy is the result of a stipulation in the lease. To secure regular payment, a clause is sometimes inserted in the lease, bearing, that if one whole year's rent shall remain unpaid after the term of payment specified, or, if two years' rent be allowed to run into the third unpaid, the lease shall, in the option of the lessor, be null and void, without any procedure of law, and the irritancy shall not be purgeable. In construing this clause, the decisions at first fluctuated a little; but it is now settled, that the irritancy is constituted by two years' rent remaining unpaid. Of course, conventional irritancies must vary according to the views of the contracting parties, and any complete enumeration of them is impossible. The following stipulations, however, sometimes occur. That the lease shall be void, on the bankruptcy of the tenant; on his non-residence; on his not searching for minerals, within a specified time, and continuing to work them; on his assigning or subletting; on his not possessing the farm with his own stocking. This last clause has not been strictly construed. At first, actions of declarator of irritancy, and extraordinary removing, were competent only before the Court of Session; but this power was afterwards given to Sheriffs; A. S. 14th Dec. 1756. There has been a good deal of discussion as to the jurisdiction conferred upon the sheriff by this Act of Sederunt, on the ground that actions of declarator can be pursued before the Supreme Court only. But with respect to conventional irritancies, it has been settled, that a clause in a lease, although expressed in the form of an irritancy, may, if it form a reasonable condition of the contract, support an action of removing before the sheriff; and that declaratory expressions do not necessarily infer a declaratory summons, so as to render the action incompetent before the Judge Ordinary; Hall, 19th May 1831, 9 S. & D. 612. In a former case, where the lease contained a provision that it should expire on the tenant's bankruptcy, and where the defender joined issue in the inferior court, on various pleas in fact and law, without objecting that no declarator of irritancy had been raised in the Supreme Court, and the cause had been more than a year in dependence, before that plea was resorted to, it was held that the action was competent before the inferior court. Irritancies are purgeable at any time before decree. This is done by payment where the irritancy is for a failure in payment, or by producing a renunciation or decree of reduction of a sublease, where it is founded on the tenant's subsetting the farm; and in general by performing, where that is possible, the thing, the failure to perform which occasioned the irritancy. (See Purging an Irritancy.) But should the tenant allow a decree in absence to go against him and be extracted, he may find it difficult to get quit of the irritancy; and where there has been an appearance for him in the action, however absurd the defence, he will, on that decree becoming final, be deprived of all relief. Stair, B. ii. tit. 10, § 6; B. iv. tit. 5, § 3, and tit. 18; More's Notes, lxxx; Bank. vol. i. p. 584; vol. ii. p. 101; Bell's Princ. § 1248; Bell on Leases, i. 180, 199, 229; ii. 14, 17; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Shand's Prac. 554; McGlashan's Sheriff Court Prac. p. 46; *Jurid. Irritancy of a Feu. See Tinsel of the Feu.

Irritant Clause; is a clause by which certain prohibited acts specified in a deed, if committed by the person holding under the deed, are declared to be void and null. But where the right of property is conferred on the donee or substitute, his acts and deeds as far burden the property. Hence, in order to make the prohibition effectual, another clause, called a resolute clause, is required, whereby the right of the contravener is resolved and put an end to on his committing the acts against which the irritancies are directed. It is by the joint aid of those two clauses that the object of the maker of the deed is attained. Stair, B. i. tit. 14, § 4; Elchies' Annotations, p. 110, et seq.; More's Notes, clxxvi. et seq.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 8, § 25; Bank. i. 584; ii. 101; Bell's Princ. § 1731; Sandford on Entails; Duncan's Digest of Entail Cases. See Tailzie.

Ish and Entry. The clause, cum libero exitu et introitu ("with free ish and entry,") in the tenendas of a charter, imports a right to all ways and passages, in so far as they may be necessary to kirk and market, through the adjacent grounds of the granter, who is, by the clause, laid under that burden. But though the ground through which the donee must necessarily pass should belong to another than the granter, and though it should not be subjected to any conventional servitude, it arises from the rights and obligations essential to property, that every proprietor must afford to, and is entitled to claim from his neighbour, free ish and entry. This right, however, which is founded in necessity, will not be extended to all convenient passages, or to roads by the nearest line, or through different parts of the grounds belonging to the conterminous proprietor. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 79; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 9; Bank. i. 592.

Issue; has different significations in law: it means the progeny begotten between a man and his wife; the profits arising from amerciaments and fines; or the profits of lands and tenements (see Exitus); but it most generally signifies the question of law or fact issuing out of the allegations and pleas of the pursuer and defender in a cause. When, in the course of pleading, one party makes an averment which his opponent denies, the parties are said to be at issue. Issues are either upon matter of law, or upon matter of fact. Issues in law are pure questions of law for the determination of a judge. In Scotland, an issue in law is brought out either, 1st, As preliminary, or in the shape of a question of relevancy; or, 2d, As resulting from admitted or proved facts; or, 3d, As arising out of a special verdict, bill of exceptions, or reserved question of law. In the recent practice of the Court of Session, the tendency has been to avoid disposing of questions of law before ascertainment of the facts, where there is issuable matter on record; although there are circumstances in which the Court will dispose of an action upon the relevancy in law of the averments upon which the cause depends; Earl of Galloway v. Grant, 20th June, 1857; Dobbie v. Johnston and Russell, 26th February 1859. The result of this course of practice is, that, in the general case, where parties do not renounce probation, and the questions arising between them are such as require and admit of proof, matters generally resolve at once into an issue or issues of fact. For the ascertainment of such matters of fact there are various forms of procedure adapted to the nature of the cause and of the matter to be ascertained; inter alia (1.) Proof by commission, 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 49; (2.) Remits to persons of science and skill; (3.) Trial of special questions of fact before the Lord Ordinary under 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 48; and lastly (4.) Trial by jury (or before the Lord Ordinary of consent without a jury, under § 46 of the above statute) upon issues adjusted at the sight of the Court. Of these the most important is the last; and in that form of process no step is of more consequence, or requires greater delicacy and attention on the part of practitioners, than the adjustment of the issue or issues.

As to the causes specially appropriated to jury trial, and which, in the ordinary course, lead to issues of fact, see the article Jury Trial. It is to be observed, however, that it is not merely in the enumerated actions, but wherever matters of fact suitable for trial by jury, and not appropriated to any other form of procedure, require to be ascertained, that issues may be ordered.

The mode of adjusting issues now in use is regulated by the Court of Session Act of 1850 (13 and 14 Vict., c. 36), by which the procedure in jury causes is assimilated as far as possible to the procedure in other Court of Session causes (§ 36). The offices of Issue Clerk and Jury Clerk are abolished, and their duties are transferred to the clerks of Session (§ 37); and it is enacted by section 38, as to the procedure for the adjustment of issues, "that where, in the course of any cause before the Court of Session, matter of fact is to be determined, and an issue is to be adjusted with reference thereto, it shall be the duty of the pursuer to prepare and lodge in process the issue he proposes, and it shall be the duty of the defender to prepare and lodge in process any counter issue required by the nature of his defence; and the Lord Ordinary, before whom such cause depends, after causing issues to be prepared and lodged as aforesaid, shall forthwith appoint parties to attend him at chambers, or shall order the case to the roll, for the adjustment of an issue or issues, for the trial of such cause, or of such matter of fact arising therein as is to be determined by jury trial; or if such issue or issues be not adjusted and settled with the consent of parties at the meeting or enrolment so fixed, or at a second such meeting or enrolment for the same purpose, if such second meeting or enrolment shall be appointed by the Lord Ordinary, the Lord Ordinary shall immediately report the matter to the Inner House, by whom such issue or issues shall, upon such report, be adjusted and settled." Section 39 enacts, "That it shall not be necessary to engross any issue or issues with a view to trial by jury, but such issue or issues, when adjusted and settled, as aforesaid, by the Lord Ordinary or the Court, shall at the same time be approved by interlocutor to that effect, and shall be signed and authenticated by the judge as relative thereto, which proceeding shall be equivalent to engrossment as at present practised." In order to discourage unnecessary disputes before the Lord Ordinary upon the terms of issues, involving the necessity of reporting the matter to the Inner House, the Court have recently disposed of the question of expenses connected with such reports apart from the general expenses in the cause, and in the same manner as if parties had gone to the Inner House on a Reclaiming Note; Mackellar v. Duke of Sutherland, Jan. 14, 1859; 21 D. 222.

As to the general principle on which issues are framed in Scotland, doubts have recently been suggested (see case of Tulloch v. Davidson, July 17, 1858, 20. D. 1319) whether, in consequence of certain observations in the House of Lords in the case of Morgan v. Morris (20. D. H. L. p. 18; 39. Jur. p. 690), it is not necessary to make the issues more precise and specific than has been usual in recent practice. The observations referred to were to the effect that the issues adjusted are independent of the record, and that it is incompetent to refer to the record for the purpose of limiting or controlling a general issue. See opinion of LORD CHELMSFORD in the above case of Tulloch v. Davidson, and the opinion of LORD BROUGHAM in the case of Leys, Mason, and Co. v. Forbes (5 W. and S., p. 403). See also, however, the opinion of LORD CAMPBELL to a contrary effect in the case of the Househill Co. v. Neilson, 6th March 1843, 2 Bell's App. p. 1. Issues are framed in the form of questions, raising not merely isolated points of fact, but the general question or questions on which the case or cases of the parties depends, or is alleged to depend; and these questions are expressed in as short and concise a form as possible, "consistently with a fair indication of the nature of the points in dispute, and the legal principles which are involved in the discussion of them" (Macf. on Iss., p. 11). No issue will be allowed on a point not fairly within the action as laid, nor on a matter even within the grounds of action, if vaguely and indefinitely, or inconclusively set forth in the record. To entitle a party to an issue of fraud, or of acquiescence, or of homologation, or of other matter involving legal considerations, the averments on record must be specific. The mere general statement of fraud, acquiescence, &c., will not do; but facts must be set forth relevant and sufficient in law to support the statement. It is usual to preface the issues with such admissions as may be proper, for the purpose of narrowing the point or points to be tried. The Court, however, are not in use to compel a party to allow the facts admitted by him on record to be thus set forth. (See Admissions.) Where several different claims are involved they are referred to, as specified in a schedule subjoined; but this schedule is not in any other sense to be held a part of the issues than as showing the limits of the claims. Malice must be inserted in the issue where the defender is entitled to found on the protection of privilege, but not otherwise. (See Malice, Probable Cause.) Although both the summons and condescendence aver malice, it does not of necessity follow that it must be inserted in the issue. In actions for reducing deeds, where the grounds of action infer an absolute nullity, the general issue is adopted, e. g., whether the deed in question is not the deed of the party whose deed it purports to be? But where it is voidable only on special grounds, issues specifying the particular grounds of reduction are the proper issues. It is sometimes necessary for the defender to take an issue. Where his defence is a simple avoidance he does not require a separate issue. But where the case depends on two separate and distinct pleas, as to which the onus of proof is thrown on the parties respectively, each ought to take an issue. In general, the same issue or set of issues serves, where several defenders are called in the same action about the same subject matter. But special circumstances may render it inexpedient to adhere to this rule. After the issues have been adjusted and settled, the parties can have no farther discussion regarding them; a rule strictly adhered to, unless when both parties consent to an alteration. It is, however, competent for the Court at the trial, whether both parties consent or not, to allow a mere verbal alteration, or the correction of a clerical mistake, in the writing out or engrossing of the issues. For the forms of issues in different cases, see Macfarlane and Cleghorn on Issues (1849), and the cases in the Session Reports under the head Process. See also Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 35,

Issuing of Bills. In questions as to the power of making certain alterations on the terms of a bill or note, it is of importance to determine whether or not it has been issued. A bill or note is issued as soon as it is in the hands of a person entitled to enforce payment, whether it has been given in exchange for a cross acceptance, or for any other value, and whether the payee and holder is the drawer or a third party. But it is not issued unless it is in the hands of the payee or other holder, when drawn in favour of a third party, or if it is made payable to the drawer, unless it has been accepted or indorsed by the drawer. In England, an accommodation bill, which, though both accepted and indorsed, was deposited in the hands of an agent for behoof of all parties, was held not to be fully issued till it had been given to a third party. *Thomson on Bills, 187. Jactus Mercium, levandæ navis causa; or Jettison. Where goods are thrown overboard for the purpose of lightening a ship during a storm, the owners, both of the ship and of the cargo saved, are liable to the owners of the goods thrown out for the common benefit, in a proportion of the loss. The necessity of the measure must be determined upon by the master and a majority of the mariners. But where the mast goes by the board, or the anchor is lost through the violence of the storm, and not by a voluntary act for the general benefit, the loss falls on the ship and freight alone. And even where any of these articles have been cut away to avoid danger, there is no contribution if the danger arose from the state of the articles themselves. Where the ship, notwithstanding the jettison, has been at last wrecked, if any part of the goods have been saved from the wreck, the owners of the goods previously thrown overboard to lighten the ship will have a claim to a proportional contribution from those whose goods are saved;

the presumption being that the prior lightening of the ship was the means of preventing the total loss of the goods. See this subject treated of, voce Contribution. Jail-Fees. Jailors had been in use to charge fees against debtors at so much a-day. But the point having been tried in a question between a jailor and a person imprisoned for a civil debt, it was held that the magistrates of every burgh are obliged to keep up a free jail; and that neither they nor their jailors are entitled to exact any such dues from debtors incarcerated in their prisons; *M'Whinnie, Dec. 7, 1803, Mor. p. 11,769. Jedge and Warrant; is the authority given by the Dean of Guild to rebuild or repair a ruinous tenement. A petition is presented, praying the judge to visit the premises, and to grant warrant to build agreeably to a plan, and to find and declare the expense of the building to be a real and preferable debt affecting the subject; the account to be cognosed by the court after the building is completed. On this application the Dean of Guild, after a citation of all parties interested, summons a jury to examine the subject; and their verdict, on the necessity of the operation of building or repairing, authorizes the Dean of Guild to grant a warrant for having it done. The accounts are afterwards produced to the court, referred to tradesmen, and being approved of by those to whom they are referred, they are by the court declared to form a real burden on the property. This form is usually resorted to by those who have a title to the area, but are doubtful of the validity of their title. It may also be resorted to by an adjudger or heritable creditor in possession; since, without such judicial authority, it is doubtful whether he would, in accounting with other creditors adjudging, have a claim for the expense laid out in repairs. But where the person having right to the reversion or property either cannot be found, or takes no charge of the property, the creditor, adjudger, or other possessor is safe to make the repairs required; the Dean of Guild pronouncing a decree, cognosing and declaring the amount of repairs, and costs of the proceedings, with interest, to be a real and preferable debt affecting the tenement, and granting a warrant to the applicant to let or possess the tenement until the sums expended, with interest, shall be repaid. The extract of the decree is the ground and voucher of the debt and of the preference, and the recording of it in the Dean of Guild books is held legal notice of the burden. (See Search of Incumbrances.) Where the tenement is ruinous, and has been uninhabited for three years, a judicial procedure is authorized by the statute 1663, c. 6, the provisions of which will be found in the article Houses. Where a tenement belonging to several persons has been burnt, and some of the proprietors will not consent to rebuild it, any one of them may apply to have the rest decreed to give their concurrence to a plan and elevation made out, and to build their respective portions within a limited time; and on their failure, for a warrant to the petitioner to do the work at their expense. The expense of the rebuilding the storeys or subjects becomes, as in the other cases, a real burden on the property, and the petitioner may have warrant to let or possess the subjects until fully indemnified. The form of the application and of the other proceedings in the jedge and warrant will be found in Jurid. Styles. See also Bank. B. iv. tit. 20, § 2; Bell's Com. i. 750; *Kames' Stat. Jewish Law. The judicial law of Moses has no binding authority as law in this country. Ersk. B. i. tit. i. § 26.

Jewish Religion. Persons of the Jewish religion are relieved from taking the declaration required by 9 Geo. IV., c. 17, and are required instead thereof to make and subscribe the declaration set forth in the 8 and 9 Vict., c. 52. See that act, and 21 and 22 Vict., c. 48. As to Jewish marriages, see 10 and 11 Vict., c. 58. As to Jewish schools, and rights of property, see 9 and 10 Vict., c. 39, § 2.

Joint Obligant; means a person bound along with another to pay or perform. Such co-obligants were termed in the Roman law correi debendi. Where the obligation is to perform any act, they are bound in solidum, and each may be sued singly to perform the act; but where the obligation is to pay money, or to deliver fungibles, which admit of being divided into parts, each will be liable only for a proportional performance of the obligation. Even where the original obligation is such that it cannot be divided, and where, therefore, performance of the obligation might have been demanded from either of the obligants, yet where the obligation has not been performed, and where, in default of performance, a sum of money in name of damages has been awarded in lieu of performance, the money so substituted being divisible, each obligant will be liable only pro rata. Generally speaking it is only where joint obligants are bound jointly and severally, or bound as full debtors, that they are held liable singuli in solidum, or each for the whole, the exceptions to this rule being, 1st, In the case of the obligants, in a bill of exchange, who are bound jointly and severally, whether the obligation be so expressed or not; and 2d, In the case of indivisible obligations, as above explained. Alexander, 28th Nov. 1827, 6 S. & D. 150; *Darlington v. Joint Trade or Adventure. This differs from society. A copartnership is held in law as one person, all the partners being bound in singuli in solidum for the debts of the company. But a joint trade is merely an union of the joint adventurers for a particular adventure, in which there is no corporation nor firm to bind the persons concerned, who are not bound unless by their own acts, or the stipulation of the contract. Yet the joint concern is so far a pro indiviso property, that the creditors of one individual concerned cannot appropriate the joint stock to his own payment until the debts of the concern be paid off, and the other persons concerned receive their shares. A company may be partners to a joint adventure, and this to the effect of introducing a preference in favour of the creditors of the adventure over the creditors of the proper company. Where goods are purchased for the purpose of carrying on the joint adventure, the adventurers are liable as partners for the price. But there is no such responsibility for goods purchased previously to the contract, though afterwards brought into stock. In dealings within the limits of the concern, each partner is præpositus negotiis societatis, but he has no implied mandate to bind the partners generally. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 29; Bell's Com. ii. 649; More's Notes on Stair, xcviij; Thomson on Bills, 269; Blair's Justice of Peace, h. t.; Tait on Evidence, 299. See Partnership.

Joint-Stock Companies; are associations of a number of individuals for the purpose of carrying on a specified business or undertaking. They are generally formed for the accomplishment of extensive schemes of trade or manufacture, or the completion of some object of national or local importance, to execute which individual capital or energy would prove inadequate; such as railways, bridges, canals, &c. They have also been found well adapted for the formation of banks, as the success of such establishments depends entirely on the amount of public confidence reposed in them. Joint-stock companies are usually constituted by a written contract, binding every one who becomes a shareholder to contribute an amount of capital corresponding to the number of shares which he may hold, and to concur with the other shareholders in carrying on the proposed undertaking under specified regulations. The transactions, however, of the company are not conducted by the personal co-operation of the shareholders, as partners in trade, but are managed by directors chosen by the association, and announced to the public by advertisement or otherwise. The shares are transferable. They are held by the original subscriber to the stock by means of a scrip receipt, which certifies that he is entered in the books of the company as possessor of a certain number of shares.

The scrip receipts are not transferable; and in the event of a sale, a regular stamped deed of transfer is required to be signed by both parties before witnesses. These deeds of transfer make over to the purchaser for a specified sum of money, a certain amount of the capital stock of the company; and the purchaser binds himself to fulfil all the conditions of the company's contract. The sale of a share in a joint-stock company cannot be relied on as terminating the seller's personal responsibility, unless it be accompanied by such precautions as are necessary in dissolving an ordinary partnership; Bell's Com. ii. 630. But a clause is usually inserted in the contract, by which the remaining shareholders guarantee the seller of stock against all the consequences of his personal responsibility. Several of the old banking establishments, such as the Bank of Scotland, the Royal Bank, and the British Linen Company, claim exemption for their partners from all responsibility beyond their shares. But with reference to associations of that nature of more recent formation, the understanding of the public, and of the companies themselves, undoubtedly is, that the holders of stock are liable to the full extent of their fortunes. Some legal writers, on the authority of a decision pronounced in the middle of last century, are inclined to hold it as the law of Scotland that the responsibility of the partners of joint-stock companies is limited to their shares; Stevenson and Co. v. M'Nair, 14th Dec. 1757, M. 14607; 5 Brown's Sup. 340. The question seems not to have occurred for determination since; but there is a strong impression that, were such a question to be raised, the individual responsibility would be held unlimited. A joint-stock company, with a descriptive firm, has no persona standi by that firm, and the partners cannot subscribe it to bind the company. But although an action cannot be raised by or against the company by a descriptive firm, action may be maintained by the social name, along with that of the partners, or against the society by its name only, if the partners be called. A distinction has been taken between a proper and a descriptive firm relatively to the right to sue and defend: the decisions upon this point are cited in the article Firm. Under the act 7 Geo. IV., c. 67, joint-stock banking companies may, on fulfilling certain conditions, sue and be sued in name of their manager; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 28, note by Mr Ivory; Bell's Com. ii. 627; Bell's Princ. § 399; Illust. ib.; Thomson on Bills, 561. See Partnership. Bank.

Persons not fewer than seven may now form themselves into a corporated company.

with or without limited liability, by subscribing their names to a memorandum of association in the form A, annexed to the Act 19 and 20 Vict., c. 47, 1856, and by having such memorandum registered in terms of that act. A partnership of more than twenty persons cannot now carry on any trade or business having gain for its object, unless it is registered as a company under the act, or are authorized to do so by some private act of Parliament, or by royal charter or letters patent. The memorandum of association sets forth (1.) The name of the company; (2.) The place of the registered office in which the company is to be established; (3.) The objects of the company; (4.) The liability of the shareholders, whether it is to be limited or unlimited; (5.) The amount of the nominal capital of the company; (6.) The number of shares, and the amount of each share. Where a company is formed with limited liability, the word "limited" must be the last word in the name of the company. Every subscriber to the memorandum of the association must take one share at least, and the number of shares taken by each subscriber must be set opposite his name in the memorandum, and upon the incorporation of the company he is entered in the register of shareholders as a shareholder to the extent of the shares taken by him. The memorandum of the association may be accompanied by articles of association signed by the subscribers to the memorandum, and prescribing regulations for the company, the articles being in the form C annexed to the schedule of the act. The memorandum, and also the articles of association, must respectively bear the same stamps as if they were deeds, and the execution by any person of the memorandum or the articles must be attested by one witness at least. The memorandums and articles must be delivered to the registrar of joint-stock companies, who retains, and registers, and certifies under his hand that the company is incorporated; and in the case of a limited company, that it is limited. On this being done, the subscribers of the memorandum become a body corporate by the name prescribed in the memorandum, having a perpetual succession and a common seal, with power to hold lands. Shares in the company are then issued, which form personal estate, and each share is distinguished by its appropriate number. A register of the shareholders is kept containing (1.) The names, addresses, and occupation of any of the shareholders and the shares held by each of them, distinguishing each share by its number; (2.) The amount paid by each shareholder; (3.) The date at which any person was entered in the register as a shareholder;

(4.) The date at which any person ceased to be a shareholder in respect of any share. An annual list of the shareholders must be made, specifying also (1.) The amount of the nominal capital and the number of shares; (2.) The number of shares taken up to the date of each annual list; (3.) The amount of calls made on each share; (4.) The total amount of calls received; (5.) The total amount of calls unpaid; and (6.) The total amount of shares forfeited. No notice of any trust, expressed or implied, or constructive, is entered on the register as receivable by the company, and every person whose name is entered on the register is, for the purposes of the act, deemed to be a shareholder. Shares are transferred in the form F in the schedule, and are executed both by the transferor and the transferee, the transferor remaining a shareholder until the name of the transferee is entered on the register. Calls unpaid on any share constitute a debt due by the shareholder to the company. The management and administration of companies formed under the act are regulated by §§ 28 to 58 inclusive. The winding up of such companies is regulated by §§ 67 to 105 inclusive. In the event of a company being wound up by the court or voluntarily, the existing shareholders are liable to contribute to the assets of the company to an amount sufficient to pay its debts, and the costs, charges, and expenses of winding up the same, with this qualification, that if the company is limited no contribution is required from any shareholder exceeding the amount, if any, which may be unpaid on the shares held by him. Where a company (not a limited one) is wound up, any person who has ceased to be a shareholder within the period of three years prior to the commencement of the winding up, is deemed, for the purposes of contribution towards payment of the company's debts, and the costs, charges, and expenses of winding it up, to be an existing shareholder, and has in all respects the same rights, and is subject to the same liability to creditors, as if he had not ceased to be a shareholder, with this exception, that he is not liable in respect of any debt of the company contracted after the time at which he ceased to be a shareholder. Where, also, a limited company is wound up, any person who has ceased to be a shareholder within the period of one year prior to the commencement of the winding up, is deemed, for the like purpose, and to the like effect, to be an existing shareholder. The winding up of a company is held to commence at the time of presenting the petition to the Court, or, if the company is wound up voluntarily, at the time of passing the resolution authoricing the winding up. Where a former shareholder of an unlimited company is made to contribute, he is entitled to be indemnified by the transferee of his shares in a degree proportioned to the shares transferred. Where a former shareholder of a limited company is made to contribute, the transferee must indemnify the transferor against all calls made or accrued due on the shares transferred subsequently to the transfer. Where the directors of a company, constituted under the act, declare and pay any dividend when the company is known by them to be insolvent, or any dividend the payment of which would to their knowledge render it insolvent, they become jointly and severally liable for all the debts of the company then existing, and for all that shall be thereafter contracted so long as they shall respectively continue in office; the amount of such liability, however, not to exceed the amount of the dividend paid. If, however, any of the directors shall be abroad at the time of making the dividend so declared or paid, or shall object thereto, and shall file their objection in writing with the clerk of the company, they are exempted from this liability.

The Act 19 and 20 Vict., c. 47, 1856, was amended by the Act 20 and 21 Vict., c. 14, 1857, and the Act 21 and 22 Vict., c. 60, 1858. The Acts relating to the winding up of Joint-Stock Companies are 7 and 8 Vict., c. 111, 1844; 11 and 12 Vict., c. 45, 1848; 12 and 13 Vict., c. 108, 1849; and 20 and 21 Vict., c. 78, 1857. The Acts relating to Joint-Stock Banks are 7 and 8 Vict., c. 113, 1844; 9 and 10 Vict., c. 75, 1846; 20 and 21 Vict., c. 49, 1857; and 21 and 22 Vict., c. 91, 1858.

Jointure; is a conventional provision to a widow, consisting of an annual payment to her in money during her lifetime, or of a liferent assignment of the rents of lands, or sometimes of the liferent of lands called a locality, in which she is infeft, and whereby she takes her chance of the rise or fall in the rents of the lands. If a jointure-house be provided, it is by a liferent infeftment, or by an obligation to pay a certain rent in place of a house. In whatever way the jointure is constituted, whether by an annuity or by a locality of lands, and in whatever way it is secured, whether it rests on a personal obligation or is secured heritably, it excludes the widow's terce, unless the contrary be expressed. See Terce. But if, by fault or fraud of the husband, the wife's jointure is left unsecured, she seems entitled to recur to her terce; and sometimes there is a stipulation to that effect. Bank. ii. 289; Bell's Com. i. 637; Bell's Princ. § 1947; *Jurid. Judges. Jurisdiction flows from the Sovereign alone, and is divided into civil and criminal. The Court of Justiciary, consisting of the Lord Justice-General and Lord Justice-Clerk, and five of the Judges of the Court of Session, termed Commissioners of Justiciary, is the supreme criminal jurisdiction in Scotland. The Court of Session, consisting of a Lord President and twelve ordinary Judges (of whom the Lord Justice-Clerk is one), is the supreme civil court. Inferior to these, and possessing, to a certain extent, both a civil and criminal jurisdiction, are the sheriffs of the different counties and the magistrates of royal burghs; and inferior still in point of jurisdiction are the justices of the peace. There was also formerly a Commissary Court, which exercised, to a certain extent, the jurisdiction of the ancient ecclesiastical courts. And the jurisdiction on the seas, and within flood-mark, and over all maritime questions, was exercised by the Lord High Admiral, acting by the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, and by inferior admirals. But the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty has been transferred to the Court of Session, and that of the Commissary Court partly to the Court of Session and partly to the Sheriff of Edinburgh. See Commissaries. Admiralty. The Scotch Court of Exchequer, which was established at the Union, consisted of a Lord Chief-Baron and four puisnè Barons, and had jurisdiction in questions of revenue; but the jurisdiction of this Court also has been transferred to the Court of Session. See Exchequer. The Judges in these Courts, with the exception of the magistrates of burghs and of justices of the peace, receive stated and regular salaries, corresponding to the rank and dignity of their stations; and they hold their offices ad vitam aut culpam. See Courts. Session, Court of. College of Justice.

Judge Ordinary; a name applied to all those Judges, whether supreme or inferior, who, by the nature of their office, have a fixed and determinate jurisdiction in all actions of the same general nature, as contradistinguished from the old Scotch Privy Council, or from those Judges to whom some special matter is committed; such as commissioners for taking proofs, messengers-at-arms, who, in poindings, &c., have a kind of judicial authority, macers of the Court of Session, who, under the old law, had jurisdiction in services, and other the like cases of special or extraordinary jurisdiction. Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 15.

Judgment; the sentence of the law pronounced by a court upon the matter contained in the record. The judgments pronounced in the different courts, unless it is otherwise provided by statute, may be brought under the review of a superior judicature, with the exception of the judgments pronounced by the Court of Justiciary. Thus the judgments of inferior courts may be brought under review of the Court of Session; and the judgments of the Court of Session are subject to the review of the House of Lords. See Jurisdiction. Appeal. Decree. Interlocutory Judgment.

Judicatum Solvi. See Caution.

Judicial Procedure. This term is applied to all proceedings in a court of law falling under the cognisance of the judge. The particular rules, according to which the proceedings in the several courts in Scotland are conducted, will be more minutely treated of under distinct titles; but some general principles applicable to judicial process may here be taken notice of. 1. Although the general rule of law is, that no judicial step can have any effect except against those who have been regularly called as parties, yet there are certain proceedings which affect the whole community, upon the principle that they are parties. Thus the judgments pronounced in any suit are binding upon those only who are proper parties to it; and, therefore, although such judgments may be regarded as precedents for the determination of similar questions, they do not amount to res judicata, nor preclude the trial of the same points in a question between other parties. On the other hand, the existence of certain judicial proceedings infers litigiosity, which may have important effects even against third parties, who contract or enter into transactions with the party against whom litigiosity strikes. See Litigiosity. 2. The courts of law are of course open to every individual, whether a subject of this country or a foreigner. But with regard to the latter, he must have a mandatory resident in Scotland, personally liable for the expenses or costs of suit, in case they should be awarded against his constituent. See Defender. Mandate. 3. In order to secure a more strict attention to the forms of judicial process, it has been deemed expedient, generally speaking, to commit the conduct of all lawsuits in the inferior and supreme courts exclusively to certain licensed practitioners, who have undergone a course of study to qualify them for that duty, and who are subjected to certain probationary trials. In the Court of Session, although a party may be heard viva voce upon the merits of his case, he must devolve the general management of the process upon a counsel and agent. The same rule prevails in the sheriff courts and in the other inferior courts, in all of which (with certain exceptions introduced by special statutes intended to facilitate the recovery of small debts) the business is conducted by procurators duly admitted. 4. In judicial proceedings a party is entitled to aver any fact pertinent to the cause, however much it may militate against the character of his adversary, or of any witness offered against him; and action will not be sustained on account of pertinent, although calumnious, expressions thus used judicially. But any libellous matter irrelevantly introduced is not entitled to this protection—a distinction which has been recognised and repeatedly acted upon. See Process. Courts. Defamation. Damages. Expenses.

In the case of Davidson v. Paul, 29th June 1848, 10 D. 1457, it was ruled that a party might sign his defences. In a subsequent stage of the same case, it was ruled, however, that a party could not sign the minute closing the record. See Davidson v. Paul, 23d Feb. 1849, 11 D. 703. It was also ruled, in the case of Rennie v. Murray, 12th Nov. 1850, 13 D. 36, that a condescendence must be signed by counsel, and not by the party himself.

Judicial Factor; is a factor or administrator appointed by the Court of Session on special application by petition, setting forth the circumstances which render the appointment necessary. The power of making such appointments is vested in the Supreme Court ex nobilitate officio, and as coming in place, it has been thought, of the Scotch Privy Council. The cases in which such appointments are usually applied for and made are, where a father has died without a settlement, leaving his children in pupillarity, in which case the factor is called a factor loco tutoris; or where a party resident abroad has succeeded to an estate in Scotland, the factor in that case being called a factor loco absentis. So also, where, from insanity or mental incapacity, extreme age, or even severe indisposition, a party has become incapable of managing his affairs, the Court of Session will appoint a curator bonis; or where trustees named by a party deceased have declined to accept, or have died or become incapable of acting, from bankruptcy or other causes; or where tutors have been removed as suspect; or where a subject, or its rents and profits have become the subject of judicial competition, or have been placed under sequestration; and generally, in all cases where, but for such an appointment, there is risk of the property perishing, or being injured or going to waste, the Court will, on the application of a party, or of the parties interested, name a curator bonis or judicial factor, with what are called "the usual powers." On his appointment, the factor must find caution for his intromissions and management, his cautioners being bound con-

junctly and severally with him; but the Court have refused to accept a party's co-curators as his cautioners. In his management of the estate, he must conform to the directions of the A.S. 13th Feb. 1730; 11th Dec. 1849; 11th March 1851; the chief injunctions of which are, that the factor shall make up and lodge in Court a rental of the estate, or an inventory of the money and effects falling under the factory; that he shall annually lodge a state of his accounts, and that he shall do proper diligence in recovering rents and debts, and, if necessary, confirm money and moveable effects, as executor-dative and as factor. He holds the funds subject to the orders of the Court, and if he fail in observing these directions, he may be removed; and failure to lodge his accounts annually subjects him in a "mulet," to be modified by the Court, and not to be under one half-year's salary. The duties of a judicial factor in bankruptcy proceedings are regulated by A.S. 25th Nov. 1857. As to the extent of the factor's powers many questions have arisen. By the Act of Sederunt 1730, he is empowered to grant leases to continue during the term that the estate remains under the inspection of the Court, and for one year more; but with regard to other acts of administration, the practical result of a series of adjudged cases on the subject seems to be, that the Court never will give, prospectively, any extraordinary powers. If, however, in the course of the management, any emergency occurs, the Court, although with hesitation, will confer special powers on special application, but only in cases of absolute necessity. In special circumstances, powers to grant leases to endure for various periods have been conferred. Such powers, however, when granted, must always be exercised periculo petentis, and subject to challenge by the parties interested. The great object which, in all such cases, the Court has in view, is to preserve the property for the parties to whom it belongs as entire and as much unchanged as circumstances will possibly permit; and power to raise an action of reduction, to carry on a particular manufactory, and the like, has been expressly refused, leaving it to the factor to act in such matters on his own responsibility. This judicial management being in its nature temporary, expires when the cause which gave rise to it ceases, or when a more permanent judicial manager or guardian is appointed. The factor's commission or fee is generally fixed at 5 per cent. on the sums received by him; but in special cases higher and lower rates have been adopted; Moore, 3d July 1849; 11 D. 1495. Before a judicial factor can obtain his discharge, the Court must be satisfied that he has faithfully performed his duty, which is generally ascertained by a remit to an accountant, and he is not entitled to be exonerated on producing an extra-judicial discharge by parties interested in the estate; Christie, 16th Feb. 1844; 6 D. 681. Where the factory is important, and the intrusions large and numerous, it sometimes happens that the factor applies at certain stated intervals to the Court, to have his accounts audited to a particular date, and to have a balance struck; which avoids the inconvenience of having old accounts and vouchers investigated when the circumstances connected with them are out of mind. The Court will not appoint more than one person judicial factor or curator at the same time, or one party to be factor, whom failing another; and although an unmarried woman may be appointed, a married woman, being herself under curatory, will not be appointed even to take charge of the estate of her insane husband. They have also declined to appoint a husband to be factor to the children of his wife by a former marriage, and likewise a party entitled to be tutor-at-law to a pupil to be factor on his estate. At common law, a factor or trustee is not entitled to purchase debts due by his constituents, or rights affecting the estate under his charge; and in the case of judicial factors appointed by the Court of Session over landed estates under sequestration, the common law principle is fortified by the Act of Sederunt 25th Dec. 1708, whereby such factors are prohibited, either directly or indirectly, from "buying in and composing the debts affecting the same." And it is declared, that if any such purchases are made, they shall be held equivalent to a discharge and renunciation of the debts so bought in and acquired by the factor; so that the lands and the debtor shall be freed and disburdened of the same; and further, that if any abatement or gratuity shall be obtained from any of the creditors to whom they make payment of any of the rents, the abatement or gratuity shall accrue to the common debtor and his creditors. Judicial Sale; a term applied, in a general sense, to any sale which takes place under judicial authority. The circumstances in which, in the practice of the law of Scotland, such a sale may be made are various. Thus, in the process of sett, one of the alternative conclusions of the action is, that the ship shall be sold by judicial authority, and the proceeds divided among the shareholders. See Sett. So, in the case of an indivisible heritable subject, any one of the common proprietors is entitled to call upon the co-proprietors either to purchase his share at a certain price, or to sell him their shares at the same rate, or to concur in exposing the subject to sale by public roup. See Common Property. Other instances of judicial sale are, the sale under a sequestration for rent, the sale of poinded effects, the sale of a minor's estate in a process of cognition and sale, and the sale of a perishable subject, pending a litigation respecting the right of ownership, or the like. By much the most important judicial sale, however, is that of the heritable property of an insolvent person, for the purpose of dividing the price among his creditors. Under the Bankruptcy Act, if any part of the sequestrated estate consists of land or other heritable subjects, it is in the power of the creditors, at the meeting held after the examination of the bankrupt, or at any other meeting called for the purpose, to resolve that the trustee shall dispose of the heritable estate by public sale, or bring it to a judicial sale; and if such resolution has been made before an heritable creditor, having a power of sale, shall have commenced proceedings for sale,—or if such proceedings, after being commenced prior to the date of such resolution, have thereafter been unduly delayed,—such creditor is not entitled to interfere with the sale by the trustee. If a public sale be resolved on, the sale is to be made by auction, at the upset price, and in the manner which shall be fixed by the trustee, with consent of the commissioners; it is provided, however, that the estate shall not be sold for less than the upset price, and that such upset price shall not be less than sufficient to pay the debt, principal interest, and expenses of the heritable creditor. It is competent for the trustee, with concurrence of a majority of the creditors in number and value, and of the heritable creditors, if any, and of the accountant, to sell the heritable estate by private bargain, on such terms and conditions as the trustee, with the concurrence of those parties, may fix. It is provided that the trustee shall make up a scheme of ranking and division of the claims of the heritable and other creditors on the price of the estate sold; that such scheme shall be reported by him to the Court of Session; and that the judgment thereon shall be a warrant for payment out of the price against the purchaser of the heritable estate. Provision is also made for the granting of interim warrants out of the price; 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, §§ 114, 115, 116, 117. The important process of ranking and sale, which may be considered not only as a species of real diligence, but also as an action of competition, is treated of under the article Ranking and Sale.

Judicium Dei; the term anciently applied to all extraordinary trials of secret crimes, as those by single combat, the ordeal of fire, &c. See Combat.

Jugglers; are included amongst vagabonds and Egyptians, and other descriptions of idle and disorderly persons, against whom many penal laws were enacted by the Scotch Parliaments. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 39; Hume, vol. i. p. 474. See Egyptians. Vagabonds.

Jurats; in England, officers, like aldermen, sworn for the government of corporations. This term is also applied to the clause with which English affidavits close. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Affidavit.

Juratory Caution; is a description of caution, sometimes offered in a suspension or advocacy, where the complainer is not in circumstances to offer any better. Where a person wishes to advocate the judgment of a sheriff, or other inferior judge, upon juratory caution only, for expenses, he applies, by petition, to the judge of the inferior court, praying that such caution may be received; which application is intimated to the opposite party or his agent. Before any such application is granted, the complainer is required to depone, at a time and place previously intimated to the opposite party or his agent, in order that an opportunity may be offered of cross-interrogating him as to whether he has any lands in property or liferent, or bonds, bills, or contracts containing sums of money. Should he acknowledge that he has, he must condescend upon them, and depone that he has no other lands, bonds, bills, or contracts containing sums of money belonging to him. The complainer must also lodge with the clerk of the inferior court the bond of caution; a full inventory of his subjects and effects of every kind; and an enactment subjoined to the inventory, bearing that he will not dilapidate any of his property, and that he will not dispose of the same, or uplift any of the debts due to him, without consent of the respondent or his agent, or the authority of the judge (under pain of imprisonment, or being otherwise punished as guilty of fraud), till the advocacy be discussed, and till there be an opportunity of doing diligence for any expenses that may ultimately be found due by him. Farther, the complainer must lodge in the hands of the clerk of the inferior court the vouchers of any debts due to him, and the title-deeds of any heritable subject belonging to him, so far as in his possession or within his power. And juratory caution has been refused, in respect of the non-delivery of the title-deeds, although they were not in the suspender's possession, but in that of his agents, subject to a right of hypothec, which they refused to waive. The complainer, if required, must grant a special disposition to the respondent of any heritable subject he may be possessed of, and an assignation of all debts or other rights due to him, for the respondent's further security. The disposition and assignation are made out at the expense of the respondent, and by his agent, and remain with the vouchers and title-deeds, if so deposited, in the hands of the clerk, subject to the directions of the court, till the advocacy be discussed. Upon all this being done to the satisfaction of the judge, he grants leave to advocate on juratory caution, which is certified by the clerk of the inferior court. In case of a note of advocacy which does not pass de plano, or a note of suspension being presented on juratory caution, the Lord Ordinary, when he appoints the bill to be answered, names a commissioner to take the complainer's deposition; and the complainer intimates to the opposite party or his agent that he may attend at the time and place fixed by the commissioner. Where the juratory caution is offered in the Bill-Chamber, the lodgment of the bond of caution, inventory, &c., is made with the clerk of the bills, till which time it is not necessary for the opposite party to give in his answers in the Bill-Chamber. 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 41; 14th June 1799; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 3; 11th July 1839, §§ 121-25; Alexander's Abridg. of A. S. 111, 114, 302-4. Before the sheriff grants leave to advocate, he must be satisfied with the examination of the complainer, and with the fulfilment of all the other requisites above enumerated; and in one case, which went no farther than the Bill-Chamber, where the complainer's examination seemed contradictory, and yet the sheriff had granted leave to advocate, reserving to the respondent to urge any objections founded on the nature of the complainer's deposition, the Lord Ordinary refused the bill, observing that the sheriff ought not to have granted leave to advocate unless he was satisfied.

Where any note of advocacy is presented on juratory caution, it is incumbent on the advocator to make immediate application to the lawyers for the poor for a report that he has a probabilis causa litigandi; and if the advocator fails to make such application, or if the lawyers for the poor, upon such application, report their opinion that no probabilis causa has been established, it is provided that the advocacy shall be dismissed, with expenses, unless full caution be forthwith offered and found in common form. 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 34. Juri Sanguinis Nunquam Prescribitur; a Roman law maxim, importing that the right of relationship, being a personal right, is not lost non utendo. It is not to be understood, however, that one cannot, by prescription, establish his right to a subject which another claims in virtue of his right of relationship. Thus, after the lapse of the vicennial prescription of retours, the party served, although not the true heir, may exclude him. All that is meant is, that, if no other heir has been entered, the right of blood is not lost by the negative prescription, but that a person may enter heir to his predecessor, although he died centuries ago. Stair, B. ii. tit. 12, § 15; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 12; Bank. ii. 352; iii. 49. See Prescription. Vicennial. Retour.

Juri pro se Introducto Cuique Licet Renunciare; a Roman law maxim, importing that any one may at his pleasure renounce the benefit of a stipulation or other right introduced entirely in his own favour. Thus, in the ordinary case, if a mandate bear a definite term, this is understood to be in the mandant's favour, and he may recall the mandate at any time. But the rule is altered when the mandate is partly for behoof of the mandatory, who then has an interest that the term agreed upon should not be altered. Stair, B. i. tit. 12, § 8; tit. 13, § 8; B. ii. tit. 9, § 38; tit. 11, § 6.

Jurisdiction; is either civil or criminal. By the one, questions of private right are determined; by the other, crimes are tried and punished. Jurisdiction may be also divided into superior, inferior, and mixed. In this sense, the jurisdiction of the Courts of Session and Justiciary is superior, since the sentences of all the inferior courts of Scotland are subject to the review of one or other of them; while their sentences (with the exception of the Court of Justiciary), though subject to review in the House of Lords, are not subject to the review of any court in Scotland. Inferior judges are those whose sentences are subject to the review of our Supreme Courts, and whose jurisdiction is confined to a county, burgh, or other special territory. Mixed jurisdiction partakes of the nature both of superior and inferior jurisdiction. Thus, before they were abolished, the High Court of Admiralty and the Commissary Court of Edinburgh had a universal jurisdiction over all Scotland, and might review the sentences of inferior admirals and commissaries—in so far they possessed a superior jurisdiction; but, on the other hand, their own judgments were subject to the review of the Court of Session or of Justiciary, and in so far they were inferior courts. See Delegated Jurisdiction. Appeal. Where a new civil jurisdiction is created by statute, with a power of judging in special matters, this jurisdiction is not exclusive of the judge formerly competent to that species of causes, unless the statute shall expressly give an exclusive right to the new court. It follows, also, that such new jurisdiction (unless the contrary be expressed) will be accounted subordinate, and subject to the review of the Supreme Civil Court. It is not sufficient to give a supreme and sole jurisdiction, that a new court is declared to have the right of determining finally; to confer such a power, the judgments of the court must be declared final, and not subject to review or appeal. *Ersk. Jurisprudence; is that science the object of which is to show in what manner the rights of individuals may best be protected. It points out the true nature of a right; it anticipates the dangers to which the enjoyment of rights is exposed, from crime, from injustice, or from uncertainty; and it directs the enactment of laws which may furnish incentives to virtue and discourage crime; which may protect the rightful owner from the force or fraud of aggressors; and which may establish rules for defining and rendering certain the rights of individuals, and prescribing the manner in which such rights are to be acquired, transmitted, and extinguished. See Law. International Law. Rights.

Jury; a certain number of men sworn to inquire into and try a matter of fact, and to declare the truth according to the evidence legally adduced. They are called jurors from juratores, as being sworn to return their verdict faithfully; and in order that the evidence may be properly laid before them, and no illegal evidence admitted, the trial proceeds under judicial superintendence and direction, and in presence of the parties or their counsel. In criminal cases, the number of the jury is fifteen; and the majority of that number determine what the verdict shall be. In civil causes, the number of the jury is twelve; and the jury must be unanimously agreed in their verdict, according to the practice in England. But by Act 17 and 18 Vict., c. 59 (31st July 1854), it is provided, that if, upon the trial by jury of any civil cause in the Court of Session in Scotland, the jury are unable to agree upon a verdict, and if, after having been kept in deliberation for a period of six hours, nine of said jury shall agree, the verdict agreed to by such nine may be returned as the verdict of the jury, and shall be taken, and shall have the same force and effect as if found unanimously by the whole of the said jury. During the said period they may be furnished with necessary refreshment by leave of the judge. And by the Act 19 and 20 Vict., c. 56 (21st July 1856), which constitutes the Court of Session the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, this provision is (by § 6) made applicable to the verdicts of juries in Exchequer causes. An Act has just (Aug. 1859) been passed in Parliament shortening the period of deliberation provided by the above Statute, 17 and 18 Vict., c. 59, to three hours. The English and Scotch law relating to high treason having been assimilated at the Union of the kingdoms, the jury, in all cases of high treason, also consists of twelve; and their verdict must be unanimous. See Treason. Exchequer. See also Evidence. The Act 6 Geo. IV., c. 22, for regulating the qualifications and manner of enrolling jurors in Scotland, and choosing of jurors on criminal trials, made many important alterations on the former practice. 1st, As to the qualification. Every man between the ages of 21 and 60 years is qualified to serve, if he be infert in his own right, or in right of his wife, in heritage, in fee, or in liferent, to the yearly value of L.5 at least, in the county or city from whence the jury is to be taken; or if he have moveable property worth L.200 at least. But Peers, Judges of the Supreme Courts, sheriffs, stewards, magistrates of royal burghs, ministers of the Established Church, and all other ministers of religion who have taken the oaths, and whose place of meeting has been duly registered, parochial schoolmasters, practising advocates, practising writers to the signet, solicitors before the supreme and inferior courts who have taken out their annual certificates, all acting clerks or other officers of any court of justice; all jailors or keepers of houses of correction; all professors in universities, physicians and surgeons duly qualified and practising as such; all officers of the army or navy on full pay; all officers of Customs or Excise; messengers-at-arms and other officers of the law—are exempted from being returned or from serving. 2d, The sheriffs or stewards of each county or stewartry were directed, before the 1st January 1826, to make up a roll of all the qualified persons within their territory, to be entered in a book called The General Jury Book, to be kept in the sheriff or steward-clerk's office of each county or stewartry, and to be open to public inspection on payment of a fee of one shilling. (See General Jury Book.) 3d, The sheriff or steward must select from the list in the general jury book the names of all persons qualified to be special jurors under the Jury Court Act, 55 Geo. III., c. 42 (i.e., paying cess upon L.100 of valued rent or upwards, or assessed taxes on a house rented at L.30 yearly or upwards), the names so selected to be entered in a Special Jury Book, to be kept in like manner in the sheriff-clerk's office, open to the public on the same terms; the persons whose names are inserted in the special jury book being liable to serve as special jurors in all cases, civil or criminal, where special juries are required; and the names of the persons qualified to be special jurors at the same time remaining in the list in the general jury book. The qualifications required by the Act 55 of Geo. III. having been found to be in many counties such as not to furnish an adequate number for the discharge of their duties, an act was passed extending the qualification; 7 Geo. IV., c. 8. Under this act, every person, residing within any county or stewartry in Scotland, who is infertile, and possessed of, lands and heritages in any part of Scotland, yielding the sum of L.100 sterling of real yearly rent or upwards, at the time, or who is possessed of personal property to the amount of L.1000 sterling or upwards, is qualified to serve as a special juror in Scotland, exclusive of, and in addition to, those qualified to serve as special jurors, in terms of 55 Geo. III. See Special Jury Book. 4th, The counties of Edinburgh and Lanark respectively are divided into separate districts, and have separate lists of the jurors for each district made up; and the sheriffs of Haddington and Linlithgow are directed to transmit from their counties certified copies of the lists, both general and special, to the sheriff of Edinburgh, from which lists, as well as from the Edinburgh lists, the names of jurors required for trials in Edinburgh are taken in certain proportions, stated in section 7 of the statute, viz., 24 for the city of Edinburgh, 6 for the town of Leith, 6 for the remainder of the county of Edinburgh, 5 for Haddington, and 4 for Linlithgow; and in the same proportions where fewer than 45 jurors are required to be returned. And in all criminal trials, one-third of the whole 45 returned must be special jurors. 5th, Where the attendance of jurors at the circuits is required, the clerk of court must give notice to the sheriffs of the counties within the circuit of the number of jurors required; and the sheriff or steward must return the number required from the different counties in certain proportions, as directed in section 8 of the statute; taking the names from the special and general jury books. 6th, In criminal trials in inferior courts, the clerk of the inferior court will be in like manner furnished with names to the number required from the jury books of the county in which the court is held, one-third of the whole number returned being persons qualified as special jurors. 7th, In all returns made by sheriffs, the names must be returned in regular order, beginning at the top of the lists in the jury books; commencing every new return with the name immediately after that of the last juror in the preceding return; provision is then made for correcting the lists as occasion may require, and for going through the lists in regular rotation. 8th, Where the person to be tried is entitled to a jury of landed men, the sheriff, when required, must make a return of the names of landed men as they stand in the jury books, a majority of the jurors in such return being landed men. 9th, Any wilful or unwarrantable departure, on the part of the sheriff, from the provisions of the statute, will subject him in a penalty of L.50, to be recovered on summary complaint before the High Court of Justiciary, or the Circuit Court of Justiciary; half the penalty going to the Crown, the other half to the party suing for the same. But no irregularity in making up or transmitting the lists, or in the warrant of citation, or in summoning jurors, or in returning any execution of citation, will constitute a good objection to jurors whose names have been served on any person accused of a crime, reserving it to the court to judge of the effect of a felonious return. This provision is further strengthened by 9 Geo. IV., c. 29, § 7, which puts an end to all such objections by the general enactment, that it shall not be competent, in any criminal cause or prosecution whatsoever, for any prosecutor or person accused to state any objection to any juror, or to any witness, on the ground of such juror or witness appearing without citation, or without having been duly cited to attend. 10th, The Lord Justice-Clerk, or any one of the Commissioners of Justiciary, may direct such number of persons, exceeding forty-five, as may be deemed necessary, to be summoned on any criminal trial in the High Court of Justiciary or in the Circuit Court; the warrant for summoning jurors requiring the signature of one of the said Judges only, and it being unnecessary to annex a copy of the signature of the Judge to the list of assize served on the accused. 11*th*, Peremptory challenges, without cause assigned, may be made of five jurors by each party in a criminal trial; the challenge to be made when the name of the juror challenged is drawn from the ballot-box. But of the five special jurors to be chosen, not more than two can be challenged peremptorily by each person accused, or by the prosecutor. Challenges, on cause shown, are unlimited; but where the ground of objection is that the juror has not the legal qualification, that can only be proved by the oath of the juror objected to; and no objection whatever to a juror can be competently made after he is sworn to serve. 12*th*, In all criminal trials, the number of jurors returned, unless the contrary be directed, is forty-five; and the fifteen jurymen to be taken from that number for the particular trial must be chosen in open court by ballot, in the manner pointed out in section 17 of the statute. And the jurors once so chosen may continue to serve on the trials of other persons accused, provided such persons and the prosecutor consent, and provided that the names of the jury so continuing to serve are contained in the list of assize served on the accused, and that such jurors are duly sworn to serve on each successive trial. 13*th*, The several courts mentioned in this act have power to excuse one or more jurors from serving, the grounds of excuse being stated in open court. 14*th*, All verdicts, whether unanimous or not, must be returned viva voce by the chancellor of the jury, unless the court direct a written verdict to be returned; the chancellor to mention whether the jury are unanimous or not, and that fact to be recorded with the verdict. This statute, section 21, also provides for the union of several counties in Scotland into districts, or larger counties, in cases of high treason, in order to obviate the inconveniences arising from the want of proper court-houses, and from the difficulty of getting a sufficient number of jurors for the grand and petty juries within the present limits of a county. In furtherance of this object, and quoad hoc, the counties of Edinburgh, Haddington, and Linlithgow are held as one county, under the description of the county of Edinburgh, the sheriff-depute of Edinburgh being held to be the sheriff of that enlarged county; the counties of Roxburgh, Berwick, Selkirk, and Peebles, as one county, under the description of the county of Roxburgh; and so on through the other counties; it being lawful for the commission of Oyer and Terminer to sit in any town or place of the several counties, so held to be one county, whereof the county in which the treason has been committed is one. See Treason. It is sufficient for the legal citation of any juror or witness, in any cause or legal proceeding, civil or criminal, that such citation be given by any officer of the law duly authorised, without witnesses; and the oath of such officer, in support of the execution, is received as sufficient evidence of such citation when the same is questioned in a court of law; 1 Will. IV., c. 37. To verify the fact of his having cited the jury, the officer has to exhibit under his hand a written execution, setting forth his having done so, which, by immemorial custom anterior to the statute of Will. IV., is good without witnesses, under the hand of the officer alone.

It is always important, and often very difficult, to determine whether a particular offence should be prosecuted before an inferior court with or without the assistance of a jury. And the court, in cases where they think that a jury has been improperly omitted, are in use, not only to suspend the sentence simpliciter, but to find the prosecutor liable in expenses. The principle, as laid down by Hume, is, that an inferior judge may try without a jury on a libel concluding for fine and damages, or imprisonment only, or banishment forth of the burgh or county; Hume, ii. 147. This principle was confirmed by a former course of decisions. But of late the Supreme Court have adopted a different principle, and have held that the proper criterion is the nature of the crime charged, not the conclusion of the libel. What the nature of the crimes must be to require a jury has never been determined as a general rule, the court having usually confined their judgment to the special case brought before them. In each individual case, therefore, it is left to the prosecutor to judge whether the offence is one of that grave and serious nature which requires a jury, whatever the punishment may turn out to be. A late writer recommends that where the charge is of such a kind as to warrant, if proved, six months' imprisonment, and caution to the amount of £50, the case should not be tried without a jury; Alison's Prac. 53. In police offences, the sheriffs and inferior burgh courts may punish with fine and imprisonment without a jury. And inferior burghs have still the power, though of late never exercised, of inflicting, without a jury, corporal pains, such as scourging or the pillory. But sheriffs or justices of peace cannot exercise that power summarily, at least in the more grave and serious transgressions. In many of the greater burghs the magistrates have a right of sheriffship, and, in virtue of it, instances have not been wanting of late years of trials by jury taking place before the magistrates of Edinburgh. All citations for criminal trial by jury must now be on fifteen days, whether in the supreme or inferior courts; and for summary trials without a jury, six days is the proper period. See Criminal Prosecution. Justiciary, Court of. Sheriff. Burgh.

The Statute 55 Geo. III. c. 42, introducing jury trial in civil causes in Scotland, provides that the common jurors shall be summoned by a precept signed by the clerk of the Jury Court; and that the number summoned shall not be less than thirty-six, nor more than fifty. From that number the jury is chosen by ballot, each party having four peremptory challenges. Persons so summoned as jurors, and failing, without a sufficient excuse, to attend, may be fined, not exceeding L.5, nor less than L.2 sterling. It is also provided by the same statute that either party may apply for a special jury, qualified in the manner above explained; and that the sheriff shall make up lists of persons qualified as special jurymen before the 1st of January yearly, and return the same to the clerk of the Jury Court before the 31st of January. The number of persons to be returned by the sheriff as special jurymen to try any issue must be thirty-six; and, on receiving this list, the clerk of the Jury Court must give notice to the agents and counsel for the parties to attend him; and, in his presence, each party alternately (beginning with the pursuer) strikes off one name from the list, until the number is reduced to twenty, which twenty are summoned to attend on the day of trial. In case either party fails to attend at the time fixed for reducing the list to twenty, the clerk of court shall strike off one for him, alternately with the other party who attends; and the jury for trying the issue is the twelve of the said twenty who shall appear first, on their names being called over in court. Where a full jury does not appear, the Court may direct the Sheriff to add to the list the names of any other persons then in court who shall be entered in some other list of jurors for that city or county; and the trial will proceed with those persons whose names were originally inserted in the list of jurors, together with the persons so added, in the same manner as if all those names had appeared in the original list—any person so added wilfully withdrawing being liable to a fine not exceeding L.5, nor less than L.2 sterling. Every juror who acts as a jurymen on the trial must be paid, by the party against whom the issue is found, the sum of twenty shillings; and, in the case of a special verdict, this sum must be paid equally by both parties, the party ultimately successful being entitled to charge the sum so paid by him as part of the costs of the suit, in case costs are awarded to him against his adversary. By the Statute 59 Geo. III., c. 35, § 25, this provision is altered to a certain extent, and the amount of the sum paid to each juror for serving on a jury directed to be regulated by the presiding judge, no juror being entitled to more than twenty shillings for one trial, unless in cases of adjournment to a second day, when the sum may, in the discretion of the judge, be extended to forty shillings. The chancellor or foreman of the jury, in civil causes, is chosen by the majority of the jury after they are sworn, the juror first sworn having a double vote in cases of equality. The verdict, in which the jury in civil causes must be unanimously agreed, is declared verbally by the chancellor, and taken down by the clerk in writing before the jury is discharged; and if the jury are not so agreed within twelve hours after they are inclosed, they shall be discharged, unless they apply for further time; the issue, where the jury is discharged without returning a verdict, being either tried by another jury or disposed of by a proof on commission, as the Court may direct. But see provision already quoted from the Statute 17 and 18 Vict., c. 59 (31st July 1854), and the Act of 22 and 23 Vict., c. 7, Aug. 1859. Where a view of the subject in dispute is considered necessary, such view will be directed by the Court, and six jurors selected for that purpose, the viewings being summoned by the Sheriff to attend at the place in question some convenient time before the trial, and the matters in question being shown to them by two persons named by the Court. The expense of a view must, in the first instance, be equally borne by all the parties, and no evidence connected with the issue can be given at the time of taking the view. In all trials of any civil cause before any of the Judges of Justiciary on circuit, the jury are to be taken from the lists prepared for the trial of criminal offences; 1 Will. IV., c. 69, § 11. If any other judge is appointed to try the cause, the Court may, if necessary, cause a jury to be summoned therefor, in the manner provided by the Acts 55 Geo. III. c. 42, 59 Geo. III., c. 35, and 6 Geo. IV., c. 120. The qualifications of jurors in the Court of Exchequer, are, by the Statute 6 Anne, c. 26, settled upon principles nearly similar to those which have been above explained. There is no longer any distinction as to qualification between juries in Exchequer causes and other civil causes tried in the Court of Session. See 19 and 20 of Vict., c. 56, § 6 (21st July 1856). See Exchequer. Some interesting historical speculations concerning the nature and high antiquity of juries will be found in the Introduction to Mr Ivory's Form of Process in the Jury Court. See Ivory, ii. 259. Jury Trial. Jury trial in criminal cases "has, by custom from time immemorial, been the regular, constitutional, and ordinary way of trial for crimes in the Supreme (Criminal) Court of Scotland;" Hume, ii. 135; and in certain civil matters, e.g. services of heirs, cognition of idiots, ascertaining the extent of the widow's terce, dividing property amongst heirs-portioners, &c., inquests on juries have been immemorably known in our practice. It has also been asserted by legal antiquarians, that at one time jury trial was the prevailing form of trial in all civil causes in Scotland. See Bell's Styles, vi. 1, et seq.; also Ivory's Form of Process, ii. 259. But it was not until the year 1815 that jury trial was attempted to be introduced, at least into the modern form of process in civil causes. The statute by which this form of trial was introduced was 55 Geo. III., c. 42, by which an institution called the Jury Court was established. This Court was composed of a Lord Chief-Commissioner, who required to be legally qualified to hold the office of a Senator of the College of Justice, and of two other Judges or Commissioners, who were at the same time Judges of the Court of Session. The Court had, besides, a suitable establishment of clerks and other officers, who, after the union of the two courts, continued to discharge their duties in the Court of Session, both at Edinburgh and on the circuits. See Clerks of Jury Causes. The Jury Court was further regulated by the Statutes 59 Geo. III., c. 35, and 6 Geo. IV., c. 120; and the experiment having been thus made, it was considered to have been so far successful as to justify the incorporation of jury trial with the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court of Session. This was effected by the Statute 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. 69, whereby the powers and duties of the Lord Chief-Commissioner, and of the other Commissioners, were, to a certain extent, reserved and continued for a period of three years. Under that statute all jury causes are directed to be prepared for trial by the Lords Ordinary respectively before whom such causes depend. And it is provided that the Lords President of the two Divisions shall respectively try by jury all issues arising out of causes depending in these Divisions respectively, when such trials take place in Edinburgh; but in the event of the indisposition or necessary absence of either of the Lords President, such issues may be tried in Edinburgh by any other Judge or Judges of the Division of the Court before which the cause may depend. Either party may apply to the Division of the Court to which the cause belongs to have the issue or issues tried before such Division; and the Division may or may not, in its discretion, order the cause to be so tried. The Lord President of each Division of the Court may order any issue or issues to be tried before his Division of the Court. And trials by jury under said statute may proceed at all times, as well during session as in the vacation, as the Division of the Court before which the cause stands enrolled shall appoint; and all causes remaining untried, and entered as ready for trial at the termination of the winter or summer session, or at the commencement of the Christmas recess, shall be tried at sittings of the Court, to be held immediately after these periods respectively; excepting only such causes as, on the motion of any party, the Court may think fit to postpone. All proceedings for the correction of errors or injustice alleged to have been committed in the trial of a cause—all questions reserved for decision after trial—all questions relating to the application of the verdict, or the rights and interests arising therefrom—and all questions of expenses are appointed to proceed before the Division of the Court to which the cause belongs. Trials out of Edinburgh may take place before any one or more of the Judges of the Court of Justiciary when upon circuit; or, when it is thought necessary by either Division of the Court, they may direct any causes or issues to be tried by any other Judge or Judges of the Court of Session at any circuit town. Accordingly, the trials at circuit frequently take place before one of the Judges of the Court of Session, specially appointed for that purpose; 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. 69, § 3, 11. Although the Jury Court, as a separate tribunal, was thus abolished, yet the provisions of the statutes introducing jury trial, in so far as not inconsistent with the incorporating act, were declared to remain in force; and all the rules and regulations which were in observance in the Jury Court at the time of its abolition, established and enforced by Act of Sederunt, it was enacted, should continue and be observed as applicable to jury trial in the Court of Session, § 16, until altered by acts of sederunt, which the Court were thereby empowered to pass. The Jury Court, as first established, was not a court of independent jurisdiction. On the contrary, every case which came before it must have originated in the Court of Session, or in the Admiralty or Commissary Court. As originally established, indeed, this Court may be said to have been of the nature of a judicial commission, for the ascertainment, by means of a jury, of certain facts deemed pertinent to a cause, by the judges of the court by whom the issues were remitted to the Jury Court to be tried; and those acts having been so ascertained, the verdict of the jury was returned to the court from which the remit came, to be applied according to law. Afterwards, however, the original constitution of the Court was so far altered that it possessed a kind of privative jurisdiction in certain actions; and, although the acts which introduced this privative jurisdiction had reference to the Jury Court as a separate establishment, the incorporating act (§ 2) provides, that all causes and issues, which, if they had occurred before the passing of the act, must, by law, have been tried by jury in the Jury Court, shall be tried by jury in the Court of Session. The classes of actions so appropriated for trial by jury were all actions on account of injuries done to the person, real or verbal; assault or battery; libel or defamation; or on account of any injury to moveables or to lands, where the title is not in question; or on account of breach of promise of marriage; seduction or adultery; or any action founded on delinquency, or quasi delinquency of any kind, where the conclusion is for damages and expenses only; for, although all such actions must have been brought into the Court of Session or the Court of Admiralty in the first instance, yet the judge before whom the action came was required to remit it de plano to the Jury Court, to be there prepared for trial; and, where the verdict exhausted the conclusions of the action and contained no special findings which might require the judgment of the Court of Session on the law, then the Jury Court might ordain execution to follow in common form, and might also award the expenses incurred both in the Jury Court and in the Court of Session; 59 Geo. III., c. 35, §§ 1, 2, 3, 19, 20. The Statute 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 28, adds to the preceding enumeration, "all actions on the responsibility of shipmasters and owners, carriers by land or water, innkeepers or stablers, for the safe custody and care of goods and commodities, horses, money, clothes, jewels and other articles, and, in general, all actions grounded on the principle of the edict Nautæ caupones stabularii; all actions brought for nuisance; all actions of reduction on the head of furiosity and idiocy, or on facility and lesion, or on force and fear; all actions on policies of insurance; all actions on charter-parties and bills of lading; all actions for freight; all actions on contracts for carriage of goods by land or water; and actions for the wages of masters and mariners of ships or vessels."

Power was given to the Lord Ordinary, in all cases where matters of fact had to be proved, to order the whole process to be remitted to a jury for trial, without reporting to the Inner-House; or he might himself direct such issues as he thought fit, to be prepared and remitted for trial. In like manner, power was given to the Divisions of the Court respectively, to remit all cases, where matters of fact required to be ascertained, for trial by jury, or themselves to appoint particular issues to be tried; 59 Geo. III. c. 35, §§ 4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Power was also given to the Court of Session, in reviewing the sentences of inferior judges, except in consistorial causes, to send such issue or issues to be tried by a jury, as seemed necessary for ascertaining facts not proved to their satisfaction by the evidence already taken, or which might have been omitted in the cause; the verdict to be returned to the Court of Session, to assist that Court in the determination of the cause. All consistorial jurisdiction of inferior judges, except as to granting of confirmations, being abolished, the exception in regard to those actions is no longer applicable. And as to consistorial actions before the Court of Session, it is competent; by the Acts 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV., c. 69, § 37, to either Division of the Court, or to a Lord Ordinary after advising with the Division of the Court to which he belongs, to direct that any such cause, or any issue or issues of fact connected therewith, be tried by jury. This provision is, by § 16 of the Act 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, made applicable to all consistorial actions, though not specially mentioned in said act. It is also competent to the Court of Session in reviewing the sentences of inferior judges to remit the whole cause for trial by jury, with such directions as to the proof already taken as to them may seem proper. And in all cases originating in the inferior courts, in which the claim is in amount above £40, as soon as an order or interlocutor allowing a proof has been pronounced in the inferior courts (unless it be an interlocutor allowing a proof to lie in retentis, or granting diligence for the recovery and production of papers), it is competent to either of the parties, who may conceive that the cause ought to be tried by jury, to remove the process into the Court of Session by bill of advocacy, which is passed at once, without discussion, and without caution. And if no such bill of advocacy be presented, and the parties proceed to proof under the interlocutor of the inferior court, they are held to have waived their right of appeal to the House of Lords against any judgment which may thereafter be pronounced by the Court of Session, in so far as, by such judgment, the several facts established by the proof are found or declared; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 40. This section of the statute has been held to apply only to interlocutors allowing a proof prout de jure; Hamilton, 10th June 1837, 15 S. & D. 1105. See Advocation. Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 35. Trial by jury was thus made imperative in certain classes of cases, and left discretionary with the Court of Session and House of Lords, in all other cases coming before them, where matters of fact require to be ascertained. In the latter class of cases, the whole cause may be remitted for trial and disposal by a jury, or, in the discretion of the Court, an issue or issues, having reference to a particular part of the cause, or to special facts, may be sent for trial. Causes determined by the Court of Session, and appealed, are sometimes remitted by the House of Lords, with instructions to send issues to a jury for trial. It was decided by a majority of the whole Court, that, in the cases enumerated in the statutes as appropriated for jury trial, where the conclusion is for damages and expenses only, they had no power to take proof by commission, on remit, or in præsentia, but must remit all such cases to be tried by jury. Kerr, 10th March 1837, 15 S. & D. 784.

Many of the above provisions have been materially altered by an act of Parliament passed in July 1850 (13 and 14 Vict., c. 36), and which came into operation on 1st November 1850, entitled "An Act to facilitate Procedure in the Court of Session." By that act, which recites the several statutes 55 Geo. III., c. 42, 59 Geo. III., c. 35, 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, 11 Geo. IV., and 1 Will. IV., c. 69, and 1 and 2 Vict., c. 118, it is enacted, § 36, that in all causes appropriated for trial by jury, or in the course of preparation for trial by jury before the Court of Session, the procedure, both before and after the closing of the record, shall be in all respects the same, so far as applicable, as in other Court of Session causes for the time. Section 38 provides for the mode of adjustment of issues in any cause in which matter of fact is to be determined. Section 39 does away with the necessity for engrossing issues, and provides, as equivalent thereto, that the issues, when adjusted and settled by the Lord Ordinary or the Court, shall be approved of by interlocutor to that effect, and shall be signed and authenticated by the judge as relative thereto. By § 40 it is made competent, after issues are so approved of, to the Lord Ordinary in the cause, on the motion of either of the parties, to appoint a time and place for the trial of such issue or issues; such time being as soon after the date of such approval as, with reference to the proper trial of such issues, conveniently may be, and, except upon special cause shown, not later than three weeks from the date of such motion, and it is declared that such trial shall proceed at the time and place so appointed, unless at the time of such appointment one or other of the parties shall intimate to the Lord Ordinary that he objects thereto, in which case the Lord Ordinary shall report the matter to the Court, by whom it shall be fixed when and where the trial shall proceed. Unless a different arrangement is made by the Court, on motion to that effect, the Lord Ordinary before whom the cause depends is to preside at the trial of such issues, where such trial takes place during the sitting of the Court; § 41. All the powers in regard to summoning of juries for trial of issues in civil causes, previously exercised by the Court, or any Division of the Court, is conferred on the Lord Ordinary, and he is empowered, on the application of either of the parties, to appoint any issue or issues to be tried by a special jury; § 42. In every trial before the Court of Session, one counsel for the pursuer and one for the defender is to be heard after the whole evidence is closed; § 44. Bill of exceptions upon the ground of the undue admission is not to be allowed, if, in the opinion of the Court, the exclusion of such evidence could not have led to a different verdict; and it is not imperative on the Court to sustain a bill of exceptions on the ground of undue rejection of documentary evidence, when it shall appear from the documents themselves that they ought not to have affected the result at which the jury have arrived; § 45. With the consent of the parties, a Lord Ordinary, after an issue is adjusted, may try such issue before himself, without a jury; unless the Court, on the report of the Lord Ordinary, deem this course inexpedient and improper. On such trial the Lord Ordinary is to take notes of the evidence, and hear counsel thereon; the proceedings to be conducted as nearly as may be as in an ordinary jury trial. Within eight days after the proceedings at the trial are concluded, the Lord Ordinary shall pronounce an interlocutor specifying particularly what he finds in point of fact. Either party may, by written note, within eight days, bring this interlocutor under the review of the Lord Ordinary upon his own notes of the evidence; and he may, within eight days after hearing parties, either correct his interlocutor as regards such findings in fact, or order a new trial. If either of the said periods of eight days extend into vacation or recess, the period shall be held not to elapse until the fourth day after the next meeting of the Lords Ordinary, or the Court thereafter; § 46. The Lord Ordinary's findings, in point of fact, are final, unless it shall appear that they proceed on some erroneous view of the law as to competency of evidence or otherwise; but either party may, on a reclaiming note to the Court, raise any question of law which may be relevantly raised on the evidence, as given in the Lord Ordinary's notes. No objection to any finding in point of law by the Lord Ordinary in the course of the trial shall be competent, unless such objection was stated and noted by the Lord Ordinary at the time; and the notes of the Lord Ordinary shall be referred to for no other purpose than to decide such questions of law. Appeals against any judgment by the Court upon such questions of law are put on the same footing as appeals against bills of exceptions; § 47. It is also competent to a Lord Ordinary, where there are any questions of fact which it is desirable should be investigated without jury trial or proof on commission, to pronounce an interlocutor specifying such questions, to which the parties are to address their proof, and appointing such questions to be tried before himself, without a jury; and the proof shall be limited to such questions, and shall proceed at such time and place as may be appointed, unless, on review, it appear to the Court that such a mode of investigation is not expedient, or the interlocutor be otherwise altered by the Court; and the Lord Ordinary shall on each such question find separately, and his findings thereon shall be final, subject always to the like review, correction, and objection as would be competent thereagainst, under the statute, if such questions had been tried by the Lord Ordinary on issues; § 48. In any cause not falling within those specially enumerated in 6 Geo. IV., c. 128, above quoted, it is competent to a Lord Ordinary, with consent of both parties, or upon the motion of one of the parties, with the leave of the Inner-House, on the Lord Ordinary's report, or to the Court when the cause comes into the Inner-House, to appoint the evidence in such case, or any portion of the evidence, to be taken on commission. And the Court may allow proof on commission in any of the enumerated cases, except an action for libel, or for nuisance, or in one which is properly and in substance an action of damages.

An interlocutor of the Court approving of the issues, in regard to which there is a difference of opinion among the Judges of the Division, may be appealed from to the House of Lords. Johnston v. Johnston, 10th Aug. 1859. 3 Macqueen, House of Lords.

The procedure in regard to jury trial is also regulated by A. S. of 16th February 1841, 10th July 1844, 24th February 1846, 18th July 1850, and 22d June 1859.

Without noticing the provisions more properly belonging to "process," those in force relating to jury trial, under the statutes and acts of sederunt, seem to be the following:—

1. Notice of trial for the sittings or the circuit may be given by the pursuer as soon as the issues are finally adjusted and authenticated. If he fail for ten days thereafter to give such notice, or if, after giving notice, he countermands the same, and does not renew the notice of trial within ten days after the countermand, it is competent to the defender to give notice of trial, and also to countermand the notice in the same way as the pursuer. But if the defender countermands, the pursuer's right to take the lead revives for other ten days after such countermand; A. S. 24th Feb. 1846. In M'Cowan v. Wright, 17th July 1852, 24 Jurist, 652, it was laid down by the Lord Justice-Clerk (Hope), that this provision gave right to the defender to give notice of trial, on the failure of the pursuer so to do for ten days after issues were settled—only in cases to be tried before the Lord Ordinary during session; that the defender is only entitled to give notice if the pursuer allows the sittings to elapse, and then forfeits his lead; and that it was a misconstruction of the acts to hold otherwise. And a notice given by the defender in the above state of matters was discharged. The circumstances, however, would have justified that motion independently of the above construction of the Act of Sederunt, which may well be doubted. See also M'Neill v. Caldwell, 22d March 1853, 15 D. 582, where the pursuer was also held not to have lost the lead. In Gilmour v. Gilmour's Trs., 11th March 1852, 14 D. 675, in appointing, on the defender's motion, a cause to be tried before a particular judge and a special jury, the pursuer's right to countermand, if he should see proper, was reserved to him, he having given the notice of trial.

2. As to trials before a Lord Ordinary, it has been held, where a motion was made to a Lord Ordinary within a few days of the close of the session, to fix a day for trial before him; and where the three weeks, therefore, expired before the next session, that he might fix a day for the trial during the next session; A. B., 16th March, 1855, 17 D. 759. Giving notice of trial for the ensuing sittings will not prevent either party from making a motion to the Lord Ordinary to fix a day for the trial before himself, under § 40 of 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36; Morrison, 7th July 1853, 15 D. 816. When such motion is made, the Lord Ordinary must report it to the Court—M'Laren, 6th June 1854, 16 D. 898—who must fix when and where the trial shall proceed; and while it has been held that the absolute right formerly in the pursuer to fix the time and place of trial is taken away by the statute, when the defender avails himself of the power to make a motion to the Lord Ordinary under § 40, still some cause must be shown to the Court for disturbing a notice of trial given by the pursuer, and the fact of the pursuer having given a notice of trial for the sittings is material in a question of fixing the time and place; Faulks, 17th June 1854, 16 D. 964. But on the report of the Lord Ordinary, the trial was fixed by the Court to proceed before his Lordship, although the defender had previously given notice of trial for the sittings; Carron Co., 7th Feb. 1857, 19 D. 384. It is no reason for withdrawing a trial from before the Lord Ordinary during session, that the expense of citing the jury makes the cost of trial greater than at the sittings; Lauder, 21st Nov. 1857, 20 D. 71; or that the trial is likely to occupy more than one day; Musket, 2d Feb. 1856, 15 D. 486. Where a new trial had been granted on a defender's motion as against evidence, the pursuer, on 4th July, the day immediately following the interlocutor granting the new trial, gave notice of trial for the sittings in July. The defender thereafter, on 17th July, moved the Lord Ordinary to fix the time and place of trial. The Court held the motion so made before the Lord Ordinary incompetent under the statute, as an indirect attempt to deprive the pursuer of his right to countermand; Shields, 17th July 1856, 18 D. 1301. But see Boyd, 19th Feb. 1856, 18 D. 618; Halliday, 27th June 1857, 19 D. 929; also Welsh, 6th Feb. 1858, 20 D. 513; and Moffat, 7th Jan. 1859, 21 D. 212, where, in a question affecting the defender's character, issues having been adjusted, and the pursuers having, on 23d Dec. 1858, given notice of trial for the circuit—on the defender's motion to the Lord Ordinary to fix the time and place of trial before himself, in terms of the statute—the Court fixed the trial to take place before his Lordship.

3. To entitle a party to go to trial he must give fifteen days' notice previous to the trial, if the cause is to be tried in Edinburgh; and if the trial is to be on the circuit, he must give notice on or before the second last day of the session immediately preceding the circuit at which the cause is to be tried; A. S. 16th Feb. 1841, § 12. When a notice of trial has been given by either party for the sittings after the winter session, or after the summer session, or during the Christmas recess, it is not competent for him to countermand such notice after the expiry of the time within which notices of trial require to be given for such sittings; but either party, after the expiry of said time, may apply to the Court to postpone the trial for any cause which could not have been foreseen previous to the expiry of such time; and such application may be made after the termination of the session to the Judge who is to preside at the trial, or, in his absence, to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, it being shown to the satisfaction of such Judge or Lord Ordinary that the application could not have been made to the Court during session; A. S., 22d June 1859.

4. An application for interdict against a threatened nuisance is not one of enumerated causes; Arnot v. Brown, 7th May, House of Lords, 1 M'Q., 229, 24 Jurist, 42. In a reduction on the head of facility and lesion, the Lord Ordinary, after advising with the Court, allowed proof by commission, the action, though one of the enumerated causes, not being "an action for libel or nuisance, or in substance an action of damages;" Livingstone, 7th Feb. 1852, 14 D. 456.

5. When a party gives notice of trial in Edinburgh or on the circuit, the other party, if he wishes to have the place of trial changed, must, within four days of the receipt of such notice, make a motion in the Division for that purpose.

6. Notice of motion for a special jury must be given also within four days after giving or receiving notice of trial, which notice of motion must be lodged and served 36 hours before it is moved in Court. The mode of striking the special jury is prescribed by A. S. 16th Feb. 1841, §§ 14 and 15. A special jury will not be granted merely in respect of the status of the parties; Lazars v. Syme, 25th June 1852, 14 D. 919.

7. All plans, maps, models, or other such productions proposed to be used at the trial of a cause, must be lodged eight days before the trial, if in Edinburgh, with the Clerk of Court, and if in circuit, either with said clerk or with the sheriff-clerk of the county town where the cause is to be tried, notice of the lodging being at sametime served on the opposite agent; but the Court may, if it be made out on oath to the satisfaction of the Court that such productions could not be lodged in time, permit them to be used at the trial. In like manner, all writings meant to be put on evidence at the trial must be lodged with the clerk eight days before the trial, and notice given at sametime to the opposite agent of the writings being lodged. No writings but those lodged as aforesaid can be used at the trial, except of consent. But the Court may permit such writings to be given in evidence at the trial on its being established to the satisfaction of the Court that they could not be lodged eight days before the trial, nor before the period at which they are actually produced or exhibited to the opposite party, and that notice to the opposite party had been given of the particular writing or writings proposed to be produced; A. S. 16th Feb. 1841, §§ 18 and 19. This rule held to apply to writings in the possession of the party before the record was closed, and not then produced by him; and an exception to the ruling of the presiding judge who excluded such writings sustained. Cameron v. Cameron's Trustees, 21st Dec. 1850, 13 D. 412.

8. A trial will not be allowed to proceed in absence of a party, unless the presiding judge is satisfied that due notice of trial has been served upon the party, or upon the known agent, or the agent in the former proceedings of the cause.

9. In examining witnesses at a trial, the counsel who begins the examination of the witness shall continue it until he exhaust the examination. A counsel on the opposite side may then cross-examine until he exhaust the cross-examination; and then the counsel who first examined the witness may re-examine, confining his re-examination strictly to such new matter as arise in cross-examination, unless with permission of the Court. When a special verdict is to be found, it may, with consent of parties, be settled out of Court by the order of the presiding judge, or otherwise; but if parties do not consent to this mode of settling it, the different parts of the evidence shall be stated to the jury, that they may find the facts which are to constitute the special verdict.

10. Where the counsel for either party excepts to points of law laid down by the presiding judge in the course of a trial, or in his charge to the jury, the counsel tendering such exception shall deliver in a note thereof to the judge at the time the exception is taken; and the same shall be certified by the judge at the time, by subscribing his name to such note. And a note of all such exceptions shall be finally settled and certified before the jury is enclosed to consider their verdict. A. S. 16th Feb. 1841, § 32. See, as to the proper signing of such note at the trial, Pollok, 4th July 1845, 7 D. 973; Hurlet Alum Company, 12th Feb. 1850, 12 D. 704; House of Lords, 26th June 1850, 7 Bell, 100.

11. All the regulations as to notices of trial, abandonment of suit, not proceeding to trial, and as to not appearing and proceeding with evidence at the trial, and all other provisions regulating the conduct of parties as to trials, are the same in the case of a new trial as in the case of an original trial; A. S. 16th Feb. 1841, § 41.

12. In case either party do not appear at the trial of a cause after due notice of trial has been given by the opposite party, the party appearing, if pursuer in the issue, shall be entitled to lead his evidence, and go to the jury for a verdict, and, if defender in the issue, he shall be entitled to a verdict in his favour, without leading evidence. If the party appearing decline to proceed in this manner, the judge presiding at the trial shall certify to the Division the fact of the other party not appearing, and the Division shall thereupon proceed as in cases in which parties are held as confessed, unless it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Court that the failure of the party to appear at the trial was occasioned by some sufficient cause; Do. § 46.

13. The Act of Sederunt of 10th July 1844 regulates the mode of charging for witnesses summoned for either party to give evidence at a trial, and the sums to be allowed to them; and the Act of Sederunt of 18th July 1850 contains regulations as to the printing of documents to be used at the trial.

14. In regard to trials before the Lord Ordinary, under the 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, without a jury, the "trial" is held to embrace the whole proceedings, including the rehearing before the Lord Ordinary, until his final deliverance is obtained; and so that to entitle a party to raise by reclaiming note objections in point of law to his interlocutor or verdict, he must ask from the Lord Ordinary findings in point of law; Balfour, 9th July 1854, 16 D. 1028. And that when a Lord Ordinary, after pronouncing an interlocutory verdict and appointing a rehearing, was removed to the Inner-House, there must be a new trial (also without a jury) before the Lord Ordinary who succeeded him in the Outer-House. Allan, 20th June 1855, 17 D. 969.

15. Questions to be tried before a Lord Ordinary without a jury, under § 48 of the Act 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, ought to be such as to exhaust the debateable matter, and so framed as to admit of being answered by a simple negative or affirmative, and not so as to embrace a general inquiry; Buchanan, 11th March 1857, 19 D. 716. And it is not competent to a Lord Ordinary to pronounce after such trial findings as to facts not embraced in the questions. Buchanan, ut supra.

ing for a certain period after his predecessor's death, as to the propriety of taking up the defunct's succession, is one of the privileges of an apparent heir. Formerly, the period was one year; and hence, until the expiration of year and day after the ancestor's death, the heir could not be forced to enter as heir. By the Titles to Land Act (1858), § 27, the period is limited to six months. See Annus Deliberandi. Heir. Beneficium Inventarii. Inventory. Entry of an Heir.

Jus in Re—Jus ad Rem. These two expressions are derived from the Roman law, and serve to mark the distinction between the right in a subject enjoyed by the proprietor, and that enjoyed by a mere creditor for its delivery. The proprietor of a subject, he who has the jus in re, is entitled to claim the subject, or to defend it against all the world. The mere creditor, or he who has the jus ad rem, possesses no real right, and can claim the subject only from the debtor in the obligation. This distinction is well illustrated by the contract of sale. The completion of the contract of sale does not of itself transfer the property of the subject. The buyer is, before delivery, merely a personal creditor of the seller; and if the subject were to pass out of the seller's hands, the buyer would have no claim against the new possessor for the subject itself, but only an action of damages against the seller for not implementing his contract. The difference between jus in re and jus ad rem is also clearly marked in cases of bankruptcy. If one person has a right of property in a subject possessed by another when he becomes bankrupt, that subject cannot be seized by the bankrupt's creditors, but must be restored to its owner. If, however, all the right possessed be a jus ad rem, the other personal creditors of the bankrupt are not excluded. Stair, B. i. tit. 1, § 22; tit. 7, § 2; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 2; Bell's Com. i. 279; Bell's Princ. § 3, 87; Bank. i. 89; Brown on Sale, Introduc. p. 3, et seq. See Sale. Property. Personal and Real. Obligation. Contract. Possession.

Jus Mariti; is the uncontrolled power of administration of the goods in communion, vested by law in the husband. In virtue of this right, the husband acquires an unlimited right of management and disposal of the moveable estate of the wife, whether belonging to her at the time of the marriage or acquired during its subsistence. The husband is entitled to sue for, recover, and in his own name discharge, all sums due to his wife, and falling under the communion; and his creditors may also attach them for payment of the husband's debts; insomuch that, where the rents of the wife's heritable estate, or the interest of heritable bonds, in which she is creditor, have been so attached as, falling under the jus mariti, she is not entitled to claim from the creditors an aliment out of the profits of her own property. Hence, the marriage may be said to be in effect a legal assignation by the wife of her whole moveable estate in favour of the husband; in virtue of which, even after the dissolution of the marriage, the husband or his heirs may recover subjects falling under the jus mariti, but not recovered during the subsistence of the marriage. This right includes all moveable subjects, the rents of the wife's heritage, the interest of heritable or of personal bonds. For, although personal bonds, bearing interest, are declared by statute to be moveable as to succession, yet the same statute expressly excepts from the jus mariti the principal sums in such bonds; 1661, c. 32. The jus mariti as to a particular subject (but not per aversionem) may be renounced by the husband in an antenuptial contract of marriage; or an estate may be given to the wife by a stranger, exclusive of the jus mariti. Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 13, et seq.; Stair, B. i. tit. 4, § 9, et seq.; More's Notes, p. xix. et seq.; Bank. vol. i. p. 128, et seq.; Bell's Com. i. 61, 632-8; Bell's Princ. § 1561; Illust. ib. See Goods in Communion. Husband. Contract of Marriage.

The legal assignation implied in marriage does not convey to the husband any moveable estate conveyed to the wife before marriage, by a deed excluding the jus mariti of any husband she might marry, it being immaterial whether the exclusion of the jus mariti has been made before or after marriage. Accordingly, in the case of Young v. Loudon, June 26, 1855, 17 D. 998, a wife was held entitled to protect, against the diligence of her husband's creditors, furniture conveyed to her before marriage by a deed excluding the jus mariti of any husband she might marry. Legitim may be sued for by a husband in his own name, and without his wife's consent. See the case of Macdougall v. Wilson, Feb. 20, 1858, 20 D. 658. Where, however, a wife has a right of election between her legitim and the provision in her father's settlement, the exercise of that right by the husband is subject to the control of the Court; and he or his creditors will not be entitled to enforce the wife's claim of legitim to her prejudice and that of her children. See the case of Stevenson v. Hamilton, Dec. 7, 1838, 1 D. 181; and the principle established in that case was affirmed by the subsequent case of Lowson v. Young, 16 D. 1098, in which it was held that a wife had the option of adopting the provision in her father's settlement in the place of her legitim, and that she could not be controlled in the exercise of that option by her husband or his creditors. In the case of Smith v. Frier, Feb. 7, 1857, 19 D. 384, an heritable bond belonging to a wife had been conveyed by her in security to a third party, with the consent of her husband, shortly before his bankruptcy. A competition arose between the creditor assignee and the trustee in the sequestration for the interest which fell due subsequent to the assignation; and it was held that the interest claimed did not fall under the jus mariti of the husband, and the creditor assignee was preferred.

Jus Relictæ; is the share of the goods in communion to which a wife is entitled on the dissolution of her marriage by death. (See Goods in Communion.) Where the marriage is dissolved by the predecease of the husband, the moveables or goods in communion, after deduction of debts, suffer a division. When the husband has left children, either by his last or by any former marriage, the division is tripartite—one-third goes to the children as legitim—one-third is the dead's part, which is at the husband's disposal, and, failing his destination of it, it will go to the children as his executors—and the remaining third goes to the widow as jus relictæ. Where there are no children, the goods in communion are divided into two equal parts—one-half is dead's part of the husband, and the other jus relictæ. The wife has right to the jus relictæ, although she should also have a conventional provision from her husband, unless, in accepting such provision, she has bound herself to renounce her jus relictæ; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 632. On the predecease of the wife, where there were no children, the division formerly was into two equal parts, one of which belonged to the husband, and the other to the next of kin of the wife, unless she had destined it otherwise. This, however, was altered by the Act 18 Vict., c. 23, 1855; and now a wife's representatives have no right to any share of the goods in communion, and no legacy or bequest by the wife will affect these goods. See Goods in Communion. Where there are children of the marriage, or of a former marriage of the husband's, not for-familiated, the wife's share is only one-third; Stair, B. i. tit. 4, § 23. The husband cannot affect the jus relictæ by any testamentary, or revocable, or other mortis causa deed, although he may diminish its amount indirectly during the subsistence of the marriage by his manner of administering the goods in communion; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 16. Personal bonds bearing interest are declared, by 1661, c. 32, to be moveable and descendible to executors; but that statute makes an exception of the rights of husband and wife, and, consequently, such bonds do not fall under the jus relictæ.

As the jus relictæ is a share of the free goods in communion only, it follows that, if the husband is insolvent at the dissolution of the marriage, the wife cannot, in virtue of this right, compete with his creditors; nor does it create any jus crediti in the wife, entitling her to rank on the bankrupt estate. See Divorce. The jus relictæ being a legal right, vested in the wife, to a certain proportion of the goods in communion, is not to be regarded as a succession. Hence it vests in the wife without confirmation. Stair, B. i. tit. 4, § 23; More's Notes, pp. cv. cxxv.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 15; Bank. vol. i. p. 135; Bell's Com. i. 142, 632; Bell's Princ. §§ 1591, 1946; Illust. § 1580; Graham, Dow's Appeal Cases, ii. 314. See Confirmation. Executor. Executry. Dead's Part. Contract of Marriage.

Jus Crediti; signifies the right vested in the creditor in a debt or obligation; and in legal phraseology the term is frequently used in contradistinction to a mere spes, or defeasible expectancy. This jus crediti is often of great importance; for although a person may not be entitled to be put in immediate possession of a subject, yet the obligation to deliver it to him at some future time creates in him a vested right, which forms part of his estate. Thus, when heritage has been conveyed by a trust-disposition, the completion of the title in the person of the trustee, although it vests the fee in him, yet leaves to the person for whose behoof it is intended a jus crediti, as a real burden on the trust-estate. The consequence of this right is, that the creditors of the trustee are not entitled to attach the trust-estate for the trustee's debts. And while the maxim of the law, that a fee cannot be in pendente, is satisfied, an effectual right is constituted for persons yet unborn, or otherwise incapable of holding the fee. Where heritable subjects are vested in trustees, with directions to convey specific portions of the heritage to the parties beneficially interested, the jus crediti thus created is heritable. If, on the other hand, the trustees are directed merely to pay over to the parties interested a sum or share of the general trust-fund, or of the proceeds of the trust-estate, the jus crediti is moveable. Under a marriage contract, provisions to the heirs of the marriage constitute in them a jus crediti, which vests in themselves, and transmits to their representatives, without service or confirmation, so that although, in some respects, they are heirs in questions with creditors, yet they are creditors in questions with heirs. As a consequence of this jus crediti, it has been held that the heir entitled to claim the benefit of the contract may discharge his claim under it, even before he could demand the fulfilment of its terms. And where the father is bound not merely to provide the heir or children of the marriage in a sum, but to make payment of it to them at a term which may happen to exist before the father's death, they are, in virtue of their jus crediti, entitled to come into competition with the father's onerous creditors; and the preference will be determined according to the nature of their rights, and the priority of the diligence used upon them. More's Notes on Stair, cxcviii.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 40, and Note by Ivory; Bell's Com. i. 34, 636; ii. 5; Bell's Princ. §§ 1482, 1968, 1980, 2017; Illust. § 1482; Sandford on Heritable Succession, i. 239, 243, 256; ii. 50; Majendie, Bligh's Reports, ii. 692.

Jus Devolutum. In order that a church may not remain too long vacant, the patron must present to the presbytery a fit person to supply the cure within six months after a vacancy has occurred by the death of the last incumbent, or otherwise; and, if the patron fail to make such a presentation within the six months, the right of presentation devolves upon the presbytery. The right of presentation, thus accruing to the presbytery, is called the jus devolutum. It will be sufficient to bar the exercise of the right of the presbytery, if the patron's presentation to a new incumbent be executed within six months after the vacancy occurs, although, from accidents not imputable to the patron, the presentation should not reach the presbytery until after the expiration of the six months; Lord Dundas, 15th May 1795, Mor. p. 9972; 1567, c. 7. See 1592, c. 115; 1712, c. 12; Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 17; Hill's Church Prac. 58; More's Notes on Stair, cclxliii.; Connell on Parishes, 494; Brown's Synop. 1177, 1498; Cook's Prac. in Church Courts, 70.

Jus Præventionis; the preferable right of jurisdiction acquired by a court, in any cause to which other courts are equally competent, by having exercised the first act of jurisdiction. Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 9. See Jurisdiction.

Jus Quæsitum Tertio. Where, in a contract between two parties, a stipulation is introduced in favour of a third, who is not a contracting party, the right thus created is said to be jus quæsitum tertio. Such a right, generally speaking, cannot be recalled by the contracting parties, and the third party, so far as he is concerned, may require exhibition and implement of the contract. In one case, where a promise, though gratuitous, had been made in favour of a third party, that party, although neither present nor accepting, was found to have right thereby. But provisions or destinations in contracts of marriage, in favour of other parties, are regarded, not as jura quæsita tertio, but as destinations of succession, which may be altered by the spouses at pleasure. The maker of an entail, although he has delivered it to a third party, may demand it back for the purpose of cancelling it; and the substitutes cannot claim any jus quæsitum under it; but where the entail has been recorded, and an investiture expedited upon it, it cannot be altered or revoked, unless express power to that effect has been reserved in the deed. A right taken in favour of children by a father or other relation, and intimated to the children, cannot be recalled, either by the father himself or his creditors. When the purchaser of lands has been taken bound to pay the price, or a part of it, to the creditors of the seller, a right is thereby vested in the creditors, upon which they may use inhibition against the purchaser. And in such cases, the purchaser is not at liberty to prefer such creditors as he thinks proper, but, having received a list of the creditors, is bound to pay each creditor in this list proportionally. But the delivery of money by a person, with orders to apply it to a particular destination, vests no right in those for whom it is destined till it be paid to them, or until they are informed that it is held for their behoof. In the meantime, the money may be reclaimed by the person who delivered it, or it may be arrested by his creditors. Where a person takes a right in the name of a third party, which he never intimates or delivers to him, the insertion of the third party's name is regarded as a mere trust created in him for the benefit of the person who directed his name to be inserted. But some authors have thought this inconsistent with the general doctrine of jus quæsitum tertio. A trust-settlement partakes of the nature of jus quæsitum tertio, since the object in view is, not the beneficial interest of the trustee, but some purpose to be accomplished in which a third party is interested. A trust-disposition, for the behoof of creditors, and although followed by infestment, is not effectual to the creditors, and vests no interest in them, unless they accede to it where accession is a condition of the trust. Stair, B. i. tit. 10, § 5; More's Notes, lxii. and cases there cited; Bell's Com. i. 31; Brown's Synop. h. t.; Kames' Equity, 321-7; McDonald, Bligh's Reports, ii. 547.

Jus Representationis. In heritable succession, this expression is usually applied to the rule of law, whereby the son or other issue of an elder son deceased, as coming in place of or representing their father, succeed to the grandfather's heritage, preferably to the grandfather's surviving younger sons, or other immediate children. This right of representation takes place in collateral succession to heritage, as well as in that of descendants in the direct line, but formerly had no place in moveable succession; but this was altered by the Act 18 Vict., c. 23 (1855), to the effect of allowing the issue of a predeceasing next of kin to come in place of their parent in intestate succession. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 11. See Succession. Executors.

Jus superveniens Auctori accrescit Successori. The supervening right of the seller or granter of a right accretes to the right of his donee or successor. This is the Roman law maxim, on which the Scotch law doctrine of accretion rests. See Accretion.

Jus Tertii. When a party in an action maintains a plea which he has neither title nor interest to maintain, he may be met by the reply, that it is jus tertii in him to maintain such a plea. It does not necessarily follow that the party so met would not be benefited by pleading another person's right; for there are frequently instances where, if he were allowed to do so, he would gain his own cause. All that is meant is, that although an objection may be pleaded against the title or claim of one party, it is the right of another than the opposite party to plead that objection, since, quoad him or his rights, the title or claim may be perfectly good. This will best be understood by examples. The cases in which the plea of jus tertii is most frequently urged are those where the rights of the pursuer and of the defender are both derived from the same author, and where the one cannot plead a defect in the other's title without admitting a defect in his own. In such a case, it is held to be the right of a third person to plead the objection against both. Thus, in a reduction of a sale, the defender objected that the title of the pursuer's author was defective. The pursuer's author being the common author of both parties, it was found to be jus tertii in the defender to object to that author's title; Livingston, 14th July 1768, Mor. 7847; Fraser, 26th Feb. 1794, Mor. 7849. It is usual, in granting leases, to insert a clause excluding assignees and sub-tenants. But when the tenant sublets the property, or, passing over his own heir, assigns the lease to a second son, or other person not his heir, it is jus tertii in his creditors or heirs to plead that the clause has not been complied with, since the limiting clause is held to have been introduced for the benefit of the landlord alone; Hay, 8th Dec. 1801, F. C. Mor. 15,297. In like manner, where a creditor had obtained decree of adjudication on his debt, and charter and infeftment thereon, the debtor being alive and abroad, it was found to be jus tertii to the daughters of the debtor to offer payment of the debt, and that the creditor was not bound to accept of it, and disencumber the subject; Gowans,

Justice, College of. See College of Justice.

Justice. In a legal acceptation, justice may be said to be the impartial administration of the law, according to the principle of giving to every man that which is his due. As applied to the conduct of individuals, justice consists in the conformity of their actions to the law as established. Thus, a man is said to be just, who, whatever his motives may be, acts conformably to the principles of justice, by implementing his legal obligations and engagements. Ersk. B. i. tit. 1, § 4; Stair, B. i. tit. 1, § 2; Bank. i. 2. See Equity.

Justices; officers deputed by the Sovereign to administer justice, and do right by way of judgment. In England, justices are of various kinds. Justices of Peace (see infra); Justices of Assize, or such as were formerly sent by special commission into the different counties to take Assizes; Justices of both Benches. See King's Bench. Common Pleas. Justices of the Forest, who heard and determined all forest offences; Justices of Gaol-delivery, or such as are sent with commission to hear and determine all causes appertaining to those, who, for any offence are cast into gaol, &c. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Justice of the Peace. Justices of the peace are persons appointed by royal commission to keep the peace within a certain district. Their commission is in the following terms: "VICTORIA, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, To our most dear and faithful counsellors, (the princes of the blood,) the most reverend father in God, and our faithful counsellor, Archbishop of Canterbury, primate and metropolitan of all England, our well beloved and faithful counsellor, our Chancellor of that part of our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Great Britain." Then are named the Archbishop of York, the Archbishop of Armagh, certain of the members of the Privy Council, the Lord Justice-General, Justice-Clerk, and Commissioners of Justiciary for Scotland for the time being, the Lord President and Judges of the Court of Session for the time being, the Lord Advocate and Solicitor-General for Scotland. These are followed by the names of the Gentlemen of the county.—"GREETING:—Know ye, that we have assigned you, jointly and severally, and every one of you, our justices, to keep our peace, in our county of _____, and to keep, and cause to be kept, all the ordinances and statutes for the good of our peace, and for the preservation of the same, and for the quiet rule and government of our people, made in all and singular their articles in our said county (as well within liberties as without), according to the force, form, and effect of the same; and to chastise and punish all persons that offend against the form of those ordinances or statutes, or any one of them, in the aforesaid county, as it ought to be done, according to the form of those ordinances and statutes; and to cause to come before you, or any one of you, all those who, to any one or more of our people concerning their bodies, or the firing of their houses, have used threats, to find sufficient security for the peace, or their good behaviour towards us and our people; and if they shall refuse to find such security, then them in our prisons, until they find such security, to cause to be safely kept. We have also assigned you, and every two or more of you, of whom any one of you, the aforesaid, (here the justices before named are again mentioned), we will shall be one, our justices, to inquire the truth more fully, according to the law and custom of the land, of all and all manner of felonies or capital crimes, poisonings, enchantments, sorceries, arts, magic, trespasses, forestallings, regratings, ingrossings and extortions whatsoever, and of all and singular other crimes and offences, of which the justices of our peace may or ought lawfully to inquire, by whomsoever, and after what manner soever, in the said county, done or perpetrated, or which shall happen to be there done or attempted. And also of all those who, in the aforesaid county, in companies against our peace, in disturbance of our people, with armed force, have gone or rode, or hereafter shall presume to go or ride; and also of all those who have there lain in wait, or hereafter shall presume to lie in wait, to maim, or cut or kill our people; and also of all victuallers, and all and singular other persons who, in the abuse of weights or measures, or in selling victuals, against the form of the ordinances and statutes, or any one of them, therefor made, for the common benefit of our people, have offended, or attempted, or hereafter shall presume to offend or attempt; and also of all sheriffs, bailiffs, stewards, constables, keepers of gaols and other officers, who, in the execution of their offices about the premises, or any of them, have unduly behaved themselves, or hereafter shall presume to behave themselves unduly, or have been, or shall happen hereafter to be, careless, remiss, or negligent in our aforesaid county; and of all and singular articles and circumstances, and all other things whatsoever that concern the premises, or any of them, by whomsoever, and after what manner soever, in our aforesaid county, done, or perpetrated, or which hereafter shall there happen to be done or attempted in what manner soever; and to inspect all indictments or libels whatsoever so before you, or any of you, taken or to be taken, or before others late our justices of the peace in the aforesaid county, made or taken, and not yet determined; and to make and continue processes thereupon against all and singular the persons so indicted or accused, or who before you hereafter shall happen to be indicted or accused, until they can be taken, surrender themselves, or be outlawed, or declared rebels; and to hear and determine all and singular the felonies, capital crimes, poisonings, enchantments, sorceries, arts, magic, trespasses, forestallings, regratings, ingrossings, extortions, unlawful assemblies, indictments aforesaid, and all and singular other the premises, according to the laws and statutes of the kingdom, as in the like cases it has been accustomed or ought to be done; and the same offenders, and every of them, for their offences, by fines, ransoms, amerciaments, forfeitures and other means, as according to the law and custom of the land, or form of the ordinances or statutes aforesaid, it has been accustomed, or ought to be done, to chastise and punish. Provided always, that if a case of difficulty, upon the determination of any of the premises before you, or any two or more of you, shall happen to arise, then let judgment in nowise be given thereon before you, or any two or more of you, unless in the presence of one of our justices, or of one of our justices appointed to hold courts of circuit, in the aforesaid county. And, therefore, we command you, and every one of you, that to keeping the peace, ordinances, statutes, and all and singular other the premises, you diligently apply yourselves; and that at certain days and places which you, or any such two or more of you (as is aforesaid) shall appoint for these purposes, into the premises you make inquiries, and all and singular the premises hear and determine, and perform and fulfil them in the aforesaid form, doing therein what to justice appertains, according to the law and custom of the land, saving to us the amerciaments, and other things to us therefrom belonging. And we command, by the tenor of these presents, our sheriff of the said county of _____, that at certain days and places which you, or any such two or more of you (as is aforesaid) shall make known to him, he cause to come before you, or such two or more of you, as aforesaid, so many, and such good and lawful men of his bailiwick, (as well within liberties as without,) by whom the truth of the matter in the premises shall be the better known and determined. We also command the keepers of the rolls of our peace in our county aforesaid to bring before you, at the days and places aforesaid, the writs, precepts, processes, and indictments aforesaid, that they may be inspected, and by a due course determined, as is aforesaid. In witness whereof, we have caused these our letters to be made patent. Witness ourself, at Westminster, the day of _____ in the _____ year of our reign.

Annexed to the commission there is an oath of office, which is now invariably taken by justices of the peace in Scotland, before entering on their office, instead of the oath contained in the Scotch acts. The oath is in these terms: "Ye shall swear, that as justice of the peace in the county of _____, in all articles in the Queen's commission to you directed, you shall do equal right to the poor and to the rich, after your cunning, wit, and power, and after the laws and customs of this realm and statutes thereof made: And ye shall not be of counsel with any person in any quarrel hanging before you: And that ye hold your sessions after the form of the statutes thereof made: And the issues, fines, and amerciaments which shall happen to be made, and all forfeitures which shall fall before you, you shall truly cause to be entered without any concealment or embezzling, and truly send them to the Queen's Exchequer: Ye shall not let for gift or other cause, but well and truly ye shall do your office of justice of the peace in that behalf: And that you take nothing for your office of justice of the peace to be done, but of the Queen, and fees accustomed, and costs limited by statute: And ye shall not direct, nor cause to be directed, any warrant by you to be made to the parties, but you shall direct them to the bailiffs of the said county, or other the Queen's officers or ministers, or other indifferent persons, to do execution thereof. So help you God."

The office of justice of the peace was attempted to be introduced into the practice of Scotland by the Act 1587, c. 82; but the state of manners, as exhibited in that statute, was not such as to promise success to a regulation of this kind, and it required repeated legislative enactments to lay the foundation of this valuable system. Nor does this appear to have been fully done until the time of the Usurpation, after which, the Act 1661, c. 38, prescribed those rules which have ever since, in a great measure, regulated this important branch of public police. By the Articles of Union, the laws for regulating the trade, customs and excise, are declared to be the same in Scotland as in England; and, accordingly, justices of the peace in Scotland are vested with the same powers with those in England in matters touching the customs and excise; and, by the Stat. 6 Anne, c. 6, § 2, the same powers were given to justices of the peace in Scotland which had formerly been enjoyed by justices of the peace in England in relation to, and for the preservation of, the peace; leaving the trials and judgments to be regulated by Scotch forms and customs. This act had the effect of doing away certain restrictions in regard to the persons subject to the jurisdiction of justices of the peace, and in regard to the time within which they were at liberty to act, and placed them on the same footing in those respects with the English justices of the peace. In Scotland, no particular qualification in rank or property is required to entitle a person to act as a justice of the peace. Whoever is named in the commission may accept and act. Neither is there any general disqualification preventing justices from acting, except that introduced by a recent statute, which declares, that no solicitor or procurator before any inferior court in Scotland, or the partner of such person, shall be entitled to act as a justice of peace while he or his partner shall continue to practise in a court of the above description; 6 Geo IV. c. 28, § 27. Even this restriction seems not to affect the nomination of such an individual, but merely to suspend his power of acting under the commission of the peace. No one named in a commission of the peace, is by law bound to accept the appointment. If he wish to abstain from being a justice, he may omit to qualify himself, by taking the usual oaths; and there is no reason for supposing, that a justice of the peace who wishes to be relieved of his office, may not resign as freely as any other public servant. Before acting, it is necessary to take the oath de fidei administratione in the above terms. The oaths of allegiance, of assurance, of abjuration, and of supremacy, must also be taken by the justices before they enter upon their office.

The general jurisdiction of justices of the peace relates only to the preservation of the peace. They are specially intrusted with the execution of several penal statutes concerning rural economy, such as the statutes relating to planting and inclosing, and the like; and various ministerial duties connected with the regulation of the highways are in like manner committed to them. They also judge in many important questions connected with the revenue of customs and excise, and other branches of the revenue, as to which the special statute imposing the duty gives justices of the peace certain powers; and, by special enactments in several statutes, certain ministerial or judicial powers are conferred on justices. Without enumerating those statutes, it may be stated as a general proposition, that no justice can safely act in virtue of statutory powers without having before him the particular statute conferring those powers. The civil jurisdiction of justices of the peace has been greatly enlarged by the small debt acts. See Small Debts. But, independently of those acts, justices of the peace judge in questions as to the aliment of natural children, as being in some degree connected with the public peace; see Bastard; and also, by usage, resting partly on statute, they judge in questions concerning servants' wages. With these exceptions, however, they seem to have no civil jurisdiction except under special statutes. They have a statutory jurisdiction with regard to the expense of march fences and the straightening of marches, and also (although that is not so clear) with regard to the damage done by cattle who have trespassed, and have been pained brevi manu on the grounds of another person. It is still more doubtful whether justices can competently judge in an action embracing a civil claim of damages for injury done by the offender, as well as a conclusion for fine or imprisonment ad vindictam publicam, e. g. in a libel at the instance of the public prosecutor and the private party for an assault. Under the small debt acts, a person who has been injured by assault or otherwise, may, no doubt, sue before the justices for reparation or damages from the person who has injured him, as a mere civil debt, provided he limits his claim of debt on that account to L.5. But there is an obvious and broad distinction between such a claim of debt under those statutes, and an action concluding for fine or imprisonment against the offender, on account of his offence against the public peace, and at the same time for civil reparation to the injured party. The jurisdiction of justices of the peace, in such mixed actions, may be warranted in some instances by custom, but it seems hardly reconcilable with sound legal principle. See Damages.

Although, generally speaking, justices cannot act in causes in which they are personally interested, they may act in all questions about the poor, vagrants, highways or other laws concerning parochial rates, though themselves liable in the burdens imposed for those objects; it has also been held that affidavits may be made before a justice though having an interest; Kerr, 12th June 1852, 17 D., H. L., p. 11. A justice of the peace may also commit a person who assaults or violently interrupts him in the execution of his office, until the offender find security to keep the peace, but he has no power to imprison in order to enforce his decisions in ordinary civil cases. Justices cannot act in the determination of any appeal to the quarter sessions, from anything relating to the parish or place in which they are subject to those rates; 16 Geo. II. c. 18, §§ 1, 3. By special enactments, commissioners of excise and customs, and others connected with those branches of the revenue, cannot act as justices in revenue questions cognisable by justices of the peace; and similar exceptions apply to officers of the army, and to coal-masters in questions relating to soldiers and colliers. See Colliers. Enlistment. There are various other exclusions under special statutes, for which see Barclay's Digest, p. 557. Unless authorized by special statute, justices cannot exercise any judicial or coercive power as justices beyond the county to which they belong; but they may perform ministerial acts, such as receiving the statements of a person who has been robbed or assaulted; and they may also exercise voluntary jurisdiction beyond their territory, such as taking affidavits in general, taking the judicial ratifications of married women, and the like. Justices are liable to criminal prosecution before the Court of Justiciary; and in like manner to civil actions of damages before the civil court, on account of oppression or injustice, or other illegal proceedings in their official capacity. But in such cases they are leniently dealt with, and large allowances are made for errors and defects in judgment and capacity, where it appears that they were acting bona fide for the public good. And, by a special statute, it is provided that, in actions against any justice of the peace in Great Britain or Ireland (which statute is held to extend to Scotland), for any summary conviction under any act of Parliament, or for anything done by him towards carrying such conviction into effect, if the conviction shall be quashed, the plaintiff (besides any penalty levied) shall recover only twopence without costs, unless malice and want of probable cause be expressly alleged; and that the penalty, damages or costs, shall not be recovered if the plaintiff be proved guilty of the offence, and the punishment undergone did not exceed that assigned by law; 43 Geo. III. c. 131, § 1, et seq. This act has been extended by 9 Geo. IV., c. 29, § 26, and 1 Will. IV., c. 37. Justices of the peace, however, ought to act with exceeding caution in everything relating to the personal liberty of the subject; for, in such cases, the plea of good intention will be no justification of an illegal act. This is particularly the case under the Liberation Statute, 1701, c. 6, whereby justices and other judges are subjected to penalties for error, whatever their intentions may have been. See Bail. Commitment for Trial. Arrestment of Persons. Backing a Warrant. Wrongous Imprisonment.

A justice of the peace receives no pecuniary recompense; but he will be reimbursed by the sheriff of the county for any pecuniary advances properly made for the public, in the execution of his office; such disbursements being either presented in Exchequer, or repaid from the rogue money of the county. A commission of the peace may be recalled at any time by the Sovereign, and it falls by the demise of the Crown; though, by 1 Anne, st. 1, c. 8, § 2, it is continued for six months longer, unless it shall be recalled by the successor. The clerk of the justices, or of the quarter sessions, is named by the Secretary of State, but failing his attendance, the justices may appoint a clerk pro re nata for any particular court. It is by the clerk that the books in which their proceedings are recorded are kept. See Clerk of the Peace. The fiscal is an officer who gives his instance or concurrence to the steps necessary to be taken for the apprehension and prosecution of delinquents; and this officer is also appointed collector of the fines and penalties which the justices of the peace have the power to impose. The procurators of the sheriff-court practise before the justices (except under the small debt acts), and the warrants of the justices are executed by constables, who are officers appointed by the justices of peace. See Constables. There is not in the Scotch commission a custos rotulorum, as in England; and the quorum, or a certain number of justices with superior powers, on account of their superior knowledge, formerly named by the English commissions, has never been introduced into the Scotch ones. See Custos Rotulorum. See, on the subject of this article, 12 and 13 Vict., c. 34; 19 and 20 Vict., c. 48; *Hutch. Justice-Clerk. See Lord Justice-Clerk.

Justice-General. The Lord Justice-General, as the President or head of the Court of Justiciary, was formerly an officer of high rank and consideration. For a long course of years, however, the office had been a sinecure, usually held by one of the Scotch nobility, while the duties of President of the Court of Justiciary were almost invariably discharged by the Lord Justice-Clerk. Hence, it was deemed expedient in effect to abolish the office; and, accordingly, by 1 Will. IV. c. 69, §§ 18 and 19, it was enacted, that, on the termination of the then existing interest, the office should devolve upon, and remain united with, that of Lord President of the Court of Session, who should perform the duties of presiding Judge in the Court of Justiciary, without salary. In this capacity the Lord President may also be present at any circuit court, and may dispatch the business there, whether any other judge or judges of the Court of Justiciary be present or not. See Justiciary Court. Circuit.

Justiciary Court. The High Court of Justiciary is composed of five of the Lords of Session, added to the Lords Justice-General and Justice-Clerk, of whom the Lord Justice-General, and, in his absence, the Lord Justice-Clerk, is President. The constitution of this Court was settled by the Act 1672, c. 16. At first, the judges were named for life, and thereafter they seem to have been removable at the pleasure of the Crown; but, at the Revolution, it was made an article of the claim of right, "that the changing the nature of the judges' gifts, ad vitam aut culpam, into commissions durante bene placito, is contrary to law;" and, by the commission in 1690, no such power is reserved by the Crown. The quorum of this Court consists of three judges; 1681, c. 22; 23 Geo. III. c. 45; Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 24, et seq.; Ivory's edit. note 58; Hume, vol. ii. p. 1, et seq. The Court of Justiciary had anciently justice ayres or circuits for distributing justice in the different parts of the kingdom. These, however, notwithstanding the regulations which were made for them, had fallen into disuse; and, in 1748, by the Stat. 20 Geo. II. c. 43, it was directed that circuit courts should be held regularly twice a-year, on which footing they have ever since continued. By the Stat. 30 Geo. III. c. 17, the spring circuit must be held between March 12 and May 12. By the 23 Geo. III. c. 45, the Lords of Justiciary are directed to continue in each circuit town at least three days; by 11 and 12 Vict., c. 79, § 8, the Judges on circuit in Glasgow are authorized to sit separately in different Courts—one Judge may proceed to business in the absence of his colleague; and when necessary the circuit Court may certify a case commenced before it to the whole Court of Justiciary for consideration. There are three circuits:—the South, consisting of the burghs of Jedburgh, Dumfries, and Ayr; the West, consisting of Glasgow, Inverary, and Stirling; and the North, consisting of Perth, Aberdeen, and Inverness. And under the Stat. 9 Geo. IV. c. 29, a winter circuit court, for criminal business merely, is held at Glasgow during the Christmas recess of the Court of Session. See Circuit Court.

The jurisdiction of the Court of Justiciary, which is the supreme criminal tribunal of Scotland, extends to all crimes, and includes the whole of Scotland; and it is superior to that of all criminal judges, whose sentences it is entitled to advocate or suspend. A libel may be brought before the Justiciary Court, concluding, not only for the pains of law, but for damages to the suffering party, if it arises out of an act of criminal delinquency; but the patrimonial conclusions alone cannot be brought, though the loss had arisen from a criminal act. The circuit court, however, has a civil jurisdiction by way of appeal, as to which, see Circuit Court Appeal. All persons, whether native or foreigners, are amenable to the Court of Justiciary, if the offence committed be one against the public laws of the realm; and this rule comprehends even Peers, in regard to assaults and inferior crimes; although, for treason or any other felony, they can only be tried by a court of their own order, assembled by the Lord High Steward of Great Britain. See Peer. Member of Parliament. This court cannot try crimes of a military nature, such as crimes against the Mutiny Act, nor offences of soldiers against the regulations or discipline of the royal navy, nor of ecclesiastics against the rules and discipline of their body. But in offences, not included in the above restriction, committed in the Scotch or high seas, on board a British vessel, belonging to a Scotch port, they have a privative jurisdiction; and in inferior maritime crimes, a jurisdiction cumulative with that of the sheriffs; for, although a statutory court may have been appointed for the trial of special offences, the Court of Justiciary, in virtue of their original and inherent jurisdiction over all offences, have a cumulative jurisdiction in such cases, unless the jurisdiction of the Court is expressly taken away. And on the same principle, where new offences are created by statute, it requires the clearest expressions to limit the cognisance of such offences to any other court, and exclude the jurisdiction of the Justiciary Court. This Court has a privative jurisdiction in the four pleas of the Crown (see Pleas of the Crown); as also in falsehood and forgery, when remitted from the Court of Session; in all statutory offences where transportation may be awarded; 9 Geo. IV., c. 69, § 11; in all capital crimes newly created; and in offences directed against the State, or the administration of justice, or the execution of their duty by its own officers.

There are also certain statutes creating offences, and limiting their cognisance to this Court; but these are almost all in desuetude. The Court of Justiciary has the exclusive power of providing a remedy for all extraordinary or unforeseen occurrences in the course of criminal business, whether before themselves or any inferior court. They have also the power of reviewing the sentences of all inferior criminal courts in Scotland; the method of review being either by advocacy, suspension, or appeal. No appeal lies from the decisions of the High Court of Justiciary, whether interlocutory or final, to the House of Lords, or to any other court. Justifiable Homicide; is homicide which the killer is bound or entitled to commit, on grounds of public or private duty. Public duty will excuse—lawful sentence of death; slaughter, necessary in the suppression of a riot; slaughter of a criminal by an officer, rendered indispensable by his violent resistance; homicide, on resistance of a civil warrant, when the resistance is such that the officer's life would be in danger if he were to persist in executing his duty; homicide by a sailor or soldier on duty, if violently invaded; homicide by a revenue officer on seizing run goods, when the resistance would put his life in danger were he to persist in making the seizure. Private duty will excuse—homicide in defence against an attempt to commit a felony; (for an enumeration of cases, see Hume, i. 217; Steele, 72); homicide in defence of life on a sudden quarrel, the motive being nothing less than that of saving life. The accused party, in order to justify the act, must show that he confined himself to the just measure of resistance, and that he entertained a reasonable apprehension of danger; and he must not have been in any degree the cause of the fatal strife. Hume, i. 195, et seq.; Alison's Princ. 105, 127; Burnett, 40, 57; Syme, 188, 219; Steele, 71; 9 *Geo. Justification; according to the English law definition, is a maintaining or showing good reason in court why one did the act or deed for which he is called to answer. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Kain; derived from canum, a word used in ancient grants to signify the fowls or animals deliverable by the vassal to the superior, as part of the reddendo. In modern practice, the term is applied to the poultry, eggs, &c., deliverable by a tenant to his landlord in terms of his lease. Where kain forms part of the rent, the Court, in estimating the value of property, sold according to a rental, allow such as is convertible into money at the option of the lessor, but disallow such as is not convertible. There is no such distinction, however, as between the lessee and a singular successor. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 32; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, pp. 294, 380, 634; Bell on Leases, i. 226; ii. 40, 4th edit.; Hutch. Justice of Peace, vol. ii. p. 458; Ross's Lect. ii. 236, 405.

Kelp. The introduction of the use of this article in the manufacture of glass gave rise to several questions as to the right to make it. These questions are either as between the neighbouring proprietors and the Crown, or as between landlord and tenant. It has been found that the taking of kelp is not one of the uses for which the shore is held by the Crown in trust for the public, and consequently the right is not inalienable by the Crown, but is transferred to the grantee, where land is granted bounded by the sea or sea-shore. In the case of the Earl of Morton v. Covington, June 20, 1760, M. 13,528, the defender's lands lay in a continued stretch along the sea-shore of Orkney, and the pursuer's were behind them, a little farther from the sea, except a small part which touched the shore. On the introduction of kelp as a manufacture, the pursuer claimed right to the ware of the whole coast, as inter regalia, and under his charter of the earldom of Orkney. But it was held that he had no right to the ware on the shore of the defender's lands. The designation of a glebe is a bounding charter; and where shores are not mentioned, although the glebe may be contiguous to the shore, the minister has no right to kelp. The right to kelp-ware is not a pertinent of an agricultural or pastoral farm, but may be let independently of, or along with, the lands upon the shores of which the kelp grows, under the denomination of the kelp-shores. In the Highlands and Islands, it is the practice for the proprietor to retain the shores in his own possession, and employ the tenants and cottars in manufacturing the kelp. More's Notes on Stair, clxxii; Bell's Princ. § 647, 1226; Illust. ib.; Connell on Tithes, 433; Bell on Leases, i. 357;

Kenning to a Terce. The kenning of a widow to her terce is the judicial act of the sheriff of the shire within which the lands lie. The widow is first served to her terce by the verdict of a jury, proceeding on a brieve from Chancery. By this verdict it is ascertained that the claimant is the widow of the deceased, and that certain lands are the lands in which her husband died infest. The next step is for the sheriff to ascertain the just proportion of the husband's lands which belong to the widow in virtue of her terce, and this is what is termed kenning her to her terce. It is done by the sheriff setting off two acres for the heir, and one for the widow alternately, through the whole property, beginning on the east or west of the property by lot. But as the object of kenning the widow to her terce is to separate the interests of the heir and of the widow, in order that each may possess independently of the other, an object not likely to be attained by this mode of division, it often happens that, in place of it, the parties agree to divide the estate into farms, or larger portions of the property, which division is then judicially authorized by the sheriff, and made the rule of his division. After the division is made by the sheriff, a procurator appears for the widow, sasine is given by delivery of earth and stone, and instruments are taken in the hands of a notary-public, on which an instrument is made out. The widow being thus kenneed to her terce, her title to her legal liferent is held as complete, and she may remove tenants from her terce lands, and possess them by herself or by her tenants. She may recover the rent of the lands, and exercise the other rights and privileges of a liferentrix. In this respect a widow kenneed to her terce is in a different situation from a widow entitled to a jointure from the estate of her deceased husband. Where the jointure has not been recovered out of certain lands set apart to her, she may have recourse on the other lands of her husband. But a widow kenneed to her terce is the proprietor of the rents; and if they are lost, they are lost to herself, without any recourse on the separate estate of her deceased husband. *Ersk. Key, delivery of. In a sale of merchandise deposited in a cellar or wareroom, the delivery of the key of the place in which the goods are deposited is held to be equivalent to actual delivery of the articles to the purchaser. Nor does it seem to alter the case where the seller possesses a master key, or where the particular warehouse of which the key is delivered is within an outer gate, the property of the seller. In the transference of goods in a bonded warehouse, certain entries in the custom-house books are directed to be made by special statute; 6 Geo. IV., c. 112, § 9. But it has been found, that where there are no goods in the cellar except those transferred, the common law will rule the case, and the seller, by delivering the key to the buyer, will transfer the goods beyond recall. Maxwell, 2d March, 1830, 8 S. & D. 618, 4th April, 1831; 5 W & S. 269. Kidnapping. The forcible abduction and conveying away of a person from his own country, and sending him to another, is an offence at common law, punishable in England with fine, imprisonment, and pillory. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Abduction. Child-stealing.

Killing; the act of depriving a being of life. Where a human being is killed, the act is, by the law of Scotland, justifiable, excusable, or culpable, according to the circumstances attending it. See Homicide. Murder. Justifiable Homicide.

Kiln. Although a kiln be let as part of, or along with, a mill, and although the suckeners resort to the kiln, it does not form part of the thirl, and the suckeners are not astricted to it. A proprietor has been found entitled to build a draw-kiln for burning lime, upon the very extremity of his grounds, although it made his neighbour's dwelling very unpleasant; Dewar, 20th Jan. 1767, M. 12,803; Hailes, 177. But a brick-kiln, situated on the extremity of one's property, having done real damage to another by scorching the garden, was ordered to be removed so far as necessary to prevent such damage; Ralston, 29th July 1768, M. 12,808. Bell's Princ. § 967; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 219; *Hutch. Kindly Tenant; or Rentaller. A rental right, (which is now almost unknown in practice,) was a lease granted by the landlord for a low and favourable tack-duty, to those who were either presumed to be lineal descendants of the ancient possessors of the land, or who were persons whom the landlord wished to favour. Such lessees were denominated rentallers, or kindly tenants. Originally, the entering of the rentaller's name in the landlord's, or the King's steward's rental-book, was held to be a sufficient title to him in all questions with the proprietors or his heirs; but the right was not effectual against singular successors, unless the rentaller could show a rental right, followed by possession. Where the rental right specified a certain period of endurance, it received effect for the specified period. If no period of endurance was expressed, it was held to create a liferent right in favour of the tenant; or where it was given to the tenant and his heirs, it created a right which descended to the first heir of the tenant; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 37, et seq. The rentallers of Lochmaben, who were formerly servants to the Scottish kings, have rights which may be transferred to strangers, and which give a perpetual right, effectual against the person in whom the barony of Lochmaben is vested. And although these rights have not been feudalised, yet they may be feudalised by the rentaller, of which there is an example in a case where an heritable bond by one of those rentallers was sustained as a good title, though the rentaller's own right had not been feudalised. *Irvine and Jop v. Kindred, or Consanguinity. Consanguinity is either lineal or collateral. Lineal is either ascending, as to the father, grandfather, and so upwards; or descending, as to the son, grandson, &c. Collateral consanguinity includes those descending from the same stock, but not each from the other, as for example, brothers, and the children of different brothers. See Consanguinity. In reckoning the degrees of kindred, the rule of the canon law is followed, which differs from that of the Roman law. In both, however, the degrees of consanguinity in the ascending or descending lines correspond; and each generation is reckoned a degree, as father and son one degree, father and grandson two degrees, and the same in the ascending line of kindred. But in reckoning the collateral degrees of consanguinity, the rules established in the two laws are very different. In the canon law, the degree of consanguinity between two persons descended from the same stock is reckoned according to their distance from the common ancestor; or where one is farther removed from the common ancestor than the other, the number of degrees is reckoned by the distance of the one furthest removed. Thus brothers and sisters are related in the first degree, because from their father, the common ancestor, there is only one remove; a nephew and uncle are related in the second degree, because there are two degrees between the nephew and the common ancestor; and cousins-german are related in the same degree, because there are two degrees between them and the grandfather, who is the common ancestor. But, in the Roman law, one degree is reckoned for each ascending generation, and one for each descending one, in the connection between collateral kindred. Thus uncle and nephew are counted three degrees, the uncle being one degree removed from the common stock, and the nephew two degrees removed from the same common ancestor, making together three degrees. In the same way cousins-german stand related to each other in the fourth degree, the grandfather, who is the common stock, being removed two degrees from each; and the degrees, both ascending and descending, being reckoned, they are held to be related in the fourth degree. *Ersk. King; the person in whom the supreme executive power of the State is vested. It is not the object of this work to do more than explain the rights and privileges of the Sovereign as recognised in the municipal law of Scotland. In this view, these rights may be considered in relation to property, or as they come in competition with the rights of subjects, or in regard to the Sovereign's paternal power, or his right of succession. The public right, which, as applicable to Scotland, is of chief importance, relates to the Sovereign's connection with the established Church of Scotland. Under the articles Church Judicatories—Church of Scotland—General Assembly—and Commissioner—the constitution of the Church of Scotland is shortly explained; and with a general reference to these articles, it may be observed, that as, by the constitution of the Church, no change can be made in its faith or doctrines but by acts of the General Assembly; and as the deliberations of that body are, to a certain extent, conducted under the superintendence of the Sovereign, no change of any political moment can ever be effected on the constitution or principles of the Church of Scotland without the intervention of the proper and constitutional guarantees against usurpation on either side.

1. The King's rights in relation to property.—

In regard to landed property the law considers the whole land rights as having emanated from the Sovereign; and, therefore, as to land rights, the rule is, that whatever has no proprietor belongs to the King—Quod nullius est fit domini regis. The possession of land confers no right without a title in writing. In order to constitute a right in land, there must either be a direct title in writing, or the possessor must hold it as part and pertinent of other lands which have been conveyed to him, with parts and pertinents, in the title-deeds. Possession, if not founded on one or other of those titles, confers no right to land; and hence, in absence of such a written title, the land may be claimed by the King or by his donatory. So also moveables which have once had an owner, who is now unknown, or treasures which have been hidden, and are discovered, belong to the King. The King's right in regard to land is constituted jure coronæ; no sasine is necessary, nor indeed competent, since a sasine implies a superior, by whom the possession may be given, while, upon feudal principles, the King has no superior. It follows that, when lands which held of the Crown fall to the King by forfeiture, they become virtually consolidated with the superiority; and, in the same manner, when the King succeeds as heir to one of his subjects, although a service as heir is necessary, yet no sasine follows; the right vests in the King without sasine. The property belonging to the Crown was anciently very extensive, and constituted the principal means by which the Sovereign supported the expenses of his Court. The Act 1455, c. 41, may be consulted as explanatory, not only of the extent of the royal domains at that time, but as descriptive of the consequences which flowed from the liberality or profusion of our monarchs. See Annexation. At present the Crown lands in Scotland, i. e. the lands belonging in property to the Crown, are of very insignificant extent; and the feu-duties due from the lands formerly granted in feu-farms under acts of Parliament; or the casualties of the Crown's superiorities; or the rights arising from forfeiture, or under the right of ultimus hæres; or of bastardy; are all that truly constitute the revenue of the Crown in Scotland. See Crown Lands. Lest the King, in the transference of the property thus vested in the Crown, might be involved in questions arising from the inattention of his officers, in royal grants, warrandice is not inferred, and the negative prescription does not run against the Crown; 1600, c. 14; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 31. A right of property also competent to the King is that of escheat. See Escheat. But independently of the property enjoyed by the King, there are certain rights which he holds, termed regalia, the principal of which is jurisdiction; and there are other regalia which the Crown may or may not transfer to individuals. Thus, 1. A right of forestry may be conferred on an individual; but where lands are conveyed within which a forestry is locally situated, the property of it is not carried without a special clause in the grant. See Forestry. 2. Salmon-fishings fall under the regalia, and may be conferred on a subject. See Salmon-fishing. 3. Gold and silver mines belong to the King. See Mines. 4. Rivers, ports, and highways, are inter regalia. A ferry or free port must be the subject of a special grant from the King. See Highways. Rivers. Ports and Harbours. Ferry. 5. The sea and sea-shores are in like manner held to be inter regalia. See Sea and Sea-shore.

2. The rights of the King in competition with the subject.—By the Statute 33 Henry VIII., c. 39, § 74, it is provided, "That if any suit be commenced or taken, or any process be hereafter awarded for the King, for the recovery of any of the King's debts, that then the said suit and process shall be preferred before the suit of any person or persons; and that our Sovereign Lord, his heirs and successors, shall have first execution against any defendant or defendants, of and for his said debts, before any other person or persons, so always that the King's said suit be taken and commenced, or process awarded for the said debt, at the suit of our Sovereign Lord the King, his heirs or successors, before judgment was given for the said other person or persons." And this act was extended to Scotland by the Articles of Union. The Crown's right under this statute has been held to be preferable to the landlord's right of hypothec, and that even after sequestration of the effects by the landlord, and at any time prior to the completion of the landlord's right by a sale of the hypothecated effects and a final decree in his favour for the proceeds. See Bell on Leases, i. 404. See also Crown Debt. Ex-tent.

3. The King's paternal power.—In virtue of this power, and as pater patriæ, where no tutors have been named by the father, or where those named refuse to accept, and the tutor-at-law does not undertake the office, the King may appoint a tutor-dative. This appointment may be obtained by presenting a signature of tutory in Exchequer, after calling the nearest of kin on the father and mother's side; and if such nearest of kin have no good objection to state to the appointment, a gift of tutory-dative will be made. The gift following on this signature passes the quarter-seal. See Tutor.

4. The King's right as ultimus hæres.—Where lands are taken to a person and his heirs whomsoever, and he dies without having made a settlement and leaving no person who can legally claim the succession, the lands go to the King as ultimus hæres; and the same rule applies to the defunct's moveable estate. See Last Heir. King's Advocate. See Advocate, Lord.

King's (Queen's) Bench; the Supreme Court of Common Law in England. It is so called because the King used formerly to sit in court in person. During the reign of a Queen, it is called Queen's Bench; and during Cromwell's Usurpation, it was called the Upper Bench. The Court consists of a Chief-Justice, and four puisne Judges. It was formerly ambulatory. The jurisdiction of the Court is very high. It has a superintending control over all inferior jurisdictions; superintends all civil corporations; commands magistrates to do their duty; protects the liberty of the subject by summary interposition; and takes cognisance of criminal as well as civil causes; the former, in what is called the Crown side or office; the latter, in the plea side of the Court. Its criminal jurisdiction extends from high treason to the most trivial misdemeanour or breach of the peace. Indictments from all inferior courts may also be removed into the Court of Queen's Bench by certiorari. The Judges of this Court are the supreme coroners of the kingdom; and the Court itself is the principal court of criminal jurisdiction in England. Tomlins, h. t. See Bench.

King's (Queen's) Evidence. In England, it has been usual with justices of peace, by whom prisoners are committed, to admit some one of their accomplices to become a witness, or, as it is generally termed, King's evidence, against his fellows, upon an implied confidence that, if such accomplice makes a full and complete discovery of that and of all other crimes with regard to which he is examined by the magistrate, and afterwards gives his evidence without prevarication or fraud, he shall not be punished for that offence. This discretionary power exercised by justices of peace is founded on practice only, and cannot, at all events, exempt the accomplice from being prosecuted. In England, the admission of an accomplice to be a witness against his associates amounts to a promise of a recommendation to mercy, upon condition of his making, at the trial, a full and fair disclosure of all the circumstances of the crime. Upon failure on his part to fulfil this condition, he forfeits all claim to protection. In Scotland, such bargains have seldom been made without the permission of the public prosecutor, even by sheriffs, still seldomer by justices of peace. And it seems to be now established in Scotland that it is only the public prosecutor who is invested with the uncontrolled power of tying up the hands of justice, by calling one of the accomplices in a crime as a witness for the prosecution. Inferior magistrates or jailors have no power to promise pardon to certain prisoners in the event of their being taken as King's evidence; and if they do so without authority from the Crown counsel, they exceed the limits of their duty; and the prisoner from whom these confessions have been thus obtained may, nevertheless, be brought to trial. A declaration, however, emitted by the culprit, upon the faith of his being admitted to be King's evidence, cannot be used or libelled on against him, should the public prosecutor bring him to trial. By the mere act of calling an accomplice as a witness, the prosecutor discharges all title to molest him for the future concerning the crime in question. This privilege is absolute, and is not, as in England, merely a right to a recommendation to mercy, nor is it at all dependent on the witness making a full and fair disclosure. The only remedy, in case of a witness retracting his previous disclosures, or refusing to make any confession after he is put into the box, is committal of the witness for contempt or prevarication, or indicting him for perjury, if there are sufficient grounds for any of these proceedings. Even where the witness was originally called by the Crown, the protection is absolute against a prosecution, not only at the instance of the public prosecutor, but also of the private party who has suffered from the offence. Bell's Notes to Hume, p. 561; *Blackst. King's (Queen's) Freemen. This name is applied to certain persons who, on account of their own service, or that of their fathers or husbands, in the army, navy, &c., have a statutory right to exercise trades as freemen, without entering with the corporation of the particular trade which they exercise. The exclusive privileges of burgh incorporations were, however, abolished by the Act 9 Vict., c. 19, 1846. See Burgh. Exclusive Privilege. Soldier.

King's (Queen's) Tradesmen. The Queen's tradesmen, holding commissions under the Privy Seal, with a clause of exemption, are not liable in assessment for the poor or other burghal prestations; but the privilege does not extend to persons holding appointments from the officers of the household. The right of the Sovereign to appoint tradesmen, and thereby to exempt them from taxation, is limited to one of each craft or occupation. 1592, c. 155; 1594, c. 225; 1597, c. 279; 1681; Dunlop's Parochial Law, 248; Shaw's Digest, 99.

Kirk-Session. A kirk-session is composed of the minister and elders of a parish. Before the Poor Law Act, 8 and 9 Vict., c. 93, the kirk-session, along with the heritors, had the right of administering the funds belonging to the poor of the parish. In the case of the Earl of Galloway v. the Minister and other Members of the Kirk-Session of Dalry, Feb. 22, 1810, it was observed by Lord Meadowbank, and assented to by Lord Robertson, that, by the law of Scotland, a parish was a corporation to certain effects, such as the management of funds belonging to the poor, or left for pious uses; that the minister, the elders, and the heritors did not form three separate corporations, but that the whole composed one body, in which each individual was entitled to his own vote. It seems doubtful, however, whether a kirk-session can sue or be sued as a corporation. In the case of the Kirk-session of North Berwick v. Sims, 2 D. 23, the summons bore to be at the instance of the kirk-session of a parish, and of the members thereof individually. The libel was amended at the suggestion of the Court, to the effect that the summons should be at the instance of the individual members of the session nominate, for themselves, and as composing the kirk-session, the kirk-session not being a corporation. In addition to the dues, kirk-sessions are, in some parishes, accustomed to exact fines from persons convicted of breaches of church discipline. Such individuals may, if they please, pay the fines in commutation of church censures, or other spiritual infliction; but kirk-sessions have no power to impose fines for offences of this nature, and could not enforce payment of them. A kirk-session cannot exact the payment of new fees not sanctioned by usage; nor can they increase the amount of such as are exigible by custom. Dues exacted for proclamation of marriage banns do not fall under the operation of the Poor Law Act, and a kirk-session is not bound to account for them to the parochial board; Kirk-session of Ceres, v. Inspector of Poor for parish of Crieff, Feb. 9, 1854, 16 D. 511. See Heritors. Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 5; tit. 7, § 63, Notes by Ivory; Dunlop's Parochial Knaveship; is one of the sequels of thirlage. The multure is the quantity of grain paid to the proprietor, or his tackaman of the mill to which the lands are astricted. The knaveship is that quantity of the grain which, by the practice of the particular mill, is given to the mill servant by whom the work is performed. Stair, B. ii. tit. 7, § 21; *Ersk. Knight; a title of dignity next in order to nobility. Knightship is the highest rank of a commoner; but a knight is still a commoner, and may sit as a jurymen on any commoner, as his peer. See Tomlin's Dict. h. t.; Bank. i. 53.

Knights Bannerets; were created on the field of battle by the King under the royal banner; now in desuetude. Bank. i. 54.

Knights Baronets; the only hereditary knights in Scotland. They were first created for encouraging settlements in Nova Scotia; now without regard to any such object. Bank. i. 54. See Baronet.

Knight's Fee; in England, was so much inheritance as is sufficient yearly to maintain a knight with convenient revenue. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Hide.

Knights of the Shire; two knights returned to Parliament from every county in England. Anciently, they were required to be real knights girt with the sword; but now notable esquires may be chosen. They must possess, as a qualification to be elected, not less than £600 per annum of freehold estate. See Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Bank. i. 54. See Parliament.

Labes Realis, or vitium reale; an inherent vice or defect in a right; in the title by which it has been acquired; or in the voucher, or written obligation on which it is founded; the effect of which is, that the right or voucher is null into whose hands soever it may come. Thus, theft, spuilzie, forgery, fraudulent vitiation of a bill, or the like, import a vitium reale. It has been now clearly established, that fraud is not an inherent vice, and that a bona fide purchaser from a fraudulent acquirer of a right is entitled to maintain his right even against the defrauded party. It has been made a question, whether or not force and fear constitute labes realis. See Fraud. Force and Fear. But a distinction is to be taken between rights acquired by fraud, fear, or the like, in which the disposer has a title of property to the goods, however liable it may be to be set aside; and another class of cases, in which the disposer never possessed any title to the property, as, for example, where the goods were stolen, or were possessed on some inferior title, as pledge, loan, or deposit. Here, the want of a title is a vitium reale, since no one can transfer to another a right which he himself does not possess; Nemo plus juris ad alium transferre potest quam ipse haberet. The true owner is entitled to follow the right wherever it may be taken, and to plead the maxim, Id quod nostrum est, sine facto nostro ad alium transferri non potest. In England, indeed, a contrary rule has been adopted where the stolen goods have been sold in open market; but this is admitted to be an exception to the orinary rule even of the English law, and has no place in the law of Scotland. See Market overt. Theft does not attach as a vitium reale to a bill of exchange, indorsation carrying the bill discharged of all latent exceptions. Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 15; B. ii. tit. 1, § 38; B. iv. tit. 35, § 20; tit. 40, §§ 21 and 28; More's Notes, pp. xlviii. cli.; *Ersk. Labores; a term applied to the lands cultivated by the monks themselves, and which were exempted from payment of tithes. It was afterwards confined to three religious orders, Cisterians, Hospitallers, and Templars. More's Notes on Stair, cccxxix; Connell on Tithes, 333, et seq. See *Teinds. Decimæ inclusæ. Laches; slackness or negligence. In England, laches of entry means neglect in the heir to enter. A person is said to be guilty of laches when he has unduly delayed any proceeding. Thus, in the case of a bill of exchange, he who delays notifying the dishonour, is guilty of laches, and loses his recourse. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Thomson on Bills, 486. See Mora.

Lady-Day; the 25th of March.

Lady's Gown; the present sometimes made by the purchaser to a wife, on the occasion of her renouncing a life-rent over her husband's lands. The lady's gown is recognised as a peculium separatum, part of the paraphernalia, and not attachable by the husband's creditors. Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 15; Bell's Princ. § 1560; Illust. ib. See Paraphernalia.

Lesio ultra Duplum. In the Roman law there was said to be lesio ultra duplum when the price of a thing sold was more than double its value. In that case, fraud was presumed, and the buyer was held entitled to set aside the sale, and to demand repetition of the price. There is no such rule in the law of Scotland, no action being competent for setting aside sales on account of the disproportion, however great, of the price to the value of the commodity. Lakes. In infeftments of land, woods and lochs are frequently specified; but if not specified, they are carried by the expression "parts and pertinents." The proprietor has right not only to the water of a loch entirely surrounded by his land, but also to the solum, for every purpose to which it may be turned. If the loch be not entirely within the property disposed, but partly within or adjacent to another property, the loch, unless it be otherwise provided in the deed, will be allocated among the proprietors whose lands front or surround it. Although, however, lochs surrounded by the lands of different proprietors are thus common property, they are not commonities within the meaning of the Act 1695, c. 38, nor can they be divided otherwise than by consent or by special act of Parliament. Lakes, which are the permanent sources to rivers, cannot be drained by the owner of the ground in which they are situated. But if the lake do not supply a stream, it is entirely within the power of the owner of the ground, provided there be no servitude over it in favour of water-gangs for mills or other works. Lakes, although navigable, are not, generally speaking, inter regalia, like navigable rivers. But it becomes a doubtful question when such lakes form great channels of communication in a district of country, whether their navigable character does not involve a trust vested in the Crown for the public benefit, which cannot be defeated by any grant, and which may be vindicated the moment the lake is laid open to public use. This point was involved in a case lately decided, but was not purely tried, being mixed up with certain specialities. The Commissioners for the Caledonian Canal led that canal through Loch Oich, which was surrounded on every part by the lands of Glengarry. The owner brought an action to have it declared, that as Loch Oich was surrounded on every part by his lands, it was his exclusive property, with the salmon therein, and the right of draining it; and that the occupation of it for public navigation in the course of the Caledonian Canal was a trespass, for which damages were due. It was found, 1. That the loch and its salmon were the exclusive property of the pursuer; but, 2d. That the claim for damage by navigation, to the injury of the privacy, amenity, &c., of the pursuer's residence and grounds, was incompetent under the canal acts; M'Donnell of Glengarry v. Caledonian Canal Commissioners, June 5, 1830, 8 S. & D. 881. See Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 73; Bank. i. 593; Bell's Princ. § 643, 1110; Illust. ib.; Hutch. Justice of Peace, ii. 449. See Regalia. Rivers. Common Property. Sea.

One of two joint-proprietors of a loch may communicate to a donee of a portion of his lands adjoining the loch a right in the loch, and the joint-proprietor cannot interfere if the donee and his author do not exercise a right of property in the loch beyond the extent of the disposer's right. See the case of Menzies v. Macdonald, March 10, 1854. 16 D. 827; affirmed, June 10, 1856. 2 Macqueen, 413.

Landed Men. In criminal trials, when the panel is a landed proprietor, he is entitled to have a jury the majority of whom are composed of landed men. The eldest son or apparent heir of a landed proprietor cannot claim this privilege, nor any one infeft in security or relief only, or on any inferior title to that of property. If the panel mean to avail himself of his privilege, he must allege and prove it by immediate production of his infeftment. 6 Geo. IV. c. 22, § 12; Alison's Prac. 387.

Landlord; in reference to the contract of lease, is the proprietor of the ground, or grantor of a lease. See Lease.

Landlord's Hypothec. See Hypothec.

Land-Tax. The land-tax of Scotland, or cess, is a permanent tax fixed at L.47,954 per annum, to be levied out of the land rent of Scotland for ever, subject, however, to a power of redemption. This burden on the land rent is payable partly from burghs and partly from shires; the inhabitants of burghs being assessed according to their rents and income, by stentmasters; and the inhabitants of counties, according to the yearly revenue of their land and other heritage, by the commissioners of supply. But although this be a tax which attaches to the land into whose hands soever it may come, it is still no more than a personal claim against the present proprietor, not properly a debitum fundi. It is a tax, however, which accompanies the land, the owner of the land for the time being liable for the tax as it falls due. But the arrears do not affect singular successors. See the statutes 38 Geo. III. c. 60; 39 Geo. III. c. 6 and 21; and the Consolidating Act, 42 Geo. III. c. 116. See also Bell's Com. i. 700. The commissioners of supply, by whom the land-tax is assessed, are empowered to do everything for adjusting the valuations of the several lands within their respective counties; and the rent fixed by those valuations is called the valued rent, in contradistinction to the old and new extent. The commissioners may alter the valuation of lands which have been overrated; but they are not permitted to alter the total sum charged upon the shire. The valuation of the county, as well as of the particular estates thus remaining the same, the duty of the commissioners of supply now is to split the valuations of larger properties, where parts have been alienated. In general, the valuation is put upon the vassal in possession. The proceedings of the commissioners of supply are subject to the review of the Court of Session; Wight on Elections, p. 182, et seq. The cess bears interest after it has been six months due, though no horning or other diligence has been used against the debtor; 1686, c. 2. The collection and management of the land-tax was given to the commissioners of taxes by the statute 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 13, § 4. The collector of the land-tax was formerly appointed by the commissioners of supply; but this appointment has been lately transferred to the treasury. See Commissioners of Supply. The following are the steps directed to be taken under the statutes for the redemption of the land-tax. Application must be made to two commissioners of supply to have the proportion of land-tax adjusted to the lands for which the exemption is to be purchased, and a certificate granted to that effect. The sale is then bargained for, and when it is completed, the owner of the land is exempt from payment of land-tax already imposed, but subject to any future imposition. The commissioners must continue, even after the exemption of any particular lands, to state in the certificate of assessment the land-tax charged on the parish, till all be redeemed; and they receive from the commissioners of taxes a certificate of the redeemed portion. The act gives power to sell lands under entail, or to borrow money upon the security of the lands, for the purpose of redeeming the land-tax of the entailed estate. Unfairness, such as a collusive lease affecting the price, is a ground for reducing the sale; but an error of judgment in the Court in executing the act, will not annul the sale. Land-tax, when paid by the tenant, constitutes a part of the rent paid by him for the land, and is to be considered part of the income for which the owner votes. See, in addition to the acts above cited, 41 Geo. III. c. 72; 53 Geo. III. c. 142; 57 Geo. III. c. 100; 1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. 123; 4 and 5 Will. IV. c. 11 and 60; 7 *Will. Lapsed Legacy. A legacy is said to lapse, that is, to fall, and not to be demandable by any one, where the legatee has predeceased the testator. In that case, where it is not otherwise directed in the testament or settlement, the lapsed legacy falls into, and becomes part of the residue of the estate. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 9; Bell's Princ. § 1877; Illust. ib.; Shaw's Digest, 605. See Testament. Legacy.

Larceny; in English law, a theft or felony of another's goods, in his absence. It is called grand larceny when the value of the goods taken exceeds, and petit larceny when the value does not exceed, 12d. Simple larceny is plain unaggravated theft; compound or mixed is theft, aggravated by taking the article stolen from one's house or person. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Last Heir. The Sovereign, in the character of last heir, is entitled to the property, both heritable and moveable, of any one who dies intestate, and without lawful heirs entitled to take up his succession. In like manner, the Sovereign succeeds to a bastard who dies intestate and without lawful heirs of his body, since a bastard, as having no father in the eye of the law, can have no heirs but his own children. In either case, where the heritable property holds of the Crown, there is an ipso jure consolidation; though, where it is given to a donatary, he must obtain a decree of declarator of ultimus hæres or of bastardy, and then present a signature to Exchequer, on which he obtains a warrant of infestment. Where the property holds of a subject superior, it is necessary to interpose a donatary, as the Crown cannot hold of a subject. The donatary must obtain a declarator, and complete his title holding of the subject superior. The declaratory action is executed against all and sundry; and where there is a widow she must be cited. Then a letter passes the quarter seal, charging the superior to give infestment to the donatary, to be held in the same manner and for the same duties and services as the deceased held. The widow of a bastard is entitled to terce and to her jus relictæ. As the Sovereign succeeds as heir, a deed done on deathbed hurtful to the Crown's right may be reduced, ex capite lecti. When the Crown succeeds as ultimus hæres, whether to a bastard or to a person lawfully born, the Sovereign or the donatary must pay the debts of the deceased so far as the value of the estate goes, but no farther; and the creditors of the deceased may attach the estate by proper diligence, calling as parties the Officers of State as representing the Crown. Latitat; in English law, a writ by which parties are originally called to answer in personal actions in the Queen's Bench; so called from the supposition that the defendant is hid, and cannot be found in the county of Middlesex to be taken by bill, but is gone into some other county, to the sheriff of which this writ is directed, to apprehend him there. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Law; in the sense in which it is to be considered here, applies to the different systems of rules by which the subjects in this country are associated; by which they conduct themselves in their intercourse with other nations; or by which the conduct of individuals is regulated, or their rights and interests in property ascertained. Hence, law is subdivided into departments, little connected with each other; and a change in one department may be made without at all affecting the others.

Constitutional law.—The law of the State is that by which the reciprocal obligations of the governors and governed to each other are regulated.

The law of nations—regulates the intercourse of one nation with another. This code is composed of written as well as of unwritten law; the one depending on the principles of natural reason and European usages; the other arising out of the subsisting treaties. By those the rights of the respective nations in peace and war are regulated. See International Law.

The municipal law.—The municipal law of a country is divided into the civil and criminal departments; the former ascertaining private property, and regulating the rights and interests of individuals; the latter prescribing a rule of conduct to each individual, in relation to himself, to his neighbour, to the public, and to religion; these rules being fitted for all stations, adapted to all circumstances, and enforced by punishment proportioned to the extent of the crime, or to the nature of the offence.

The criminal law of Scotland.—The criminal law of Scotland is founded on ancient usage, on acts of Parliament, on the Roman law, and also on the Jewish law; for all of those have contributed to the completion of our criminal code. Hence, an important distinction has arisen between the criminal law of Scotland and that of England. In England, the offence, before it can be comprehended under the legal description of a crime, must be declared to be so by statute, and the degree of punishment prescribed. In Scotland, the Supreme Criminal Court has an inherent power to take cognizance, to a certain extent, of new offences, and is authorized by usage to inflict an arbitrary punishment; that is, a punishment not affecting the life of the offender; and, generally speaking, and in the ordinary state of society, and for all practical purposes, this system is attended with great advantages. Hume, i. 12. We have differences equally remarkable in the forms of our criminal trials, to which the same observations are applicable, viz., that, in the ordinary state of society, and for the repressing of common crimes, our forms are more humane, and much more effective than those of England. Thus the law of Scotland requires the evidence of two witnesses to prove a criminal act, while the English law holds the evidence of a single witness sufficient. In Scotland, the libel, and lists of the names of the witnesses and of the jurors, are served upon the accused fifteen days before he is brought to trial, and he is allowed to be heard by counsel; whereas, in England, the accused is brought to the bar without enjoying the same advantages; and until the passing of the act 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 114, except in cases of treason, the accused in England were not allowed to be heard by counsel. Hume, i. 11. See Criminal Prosecution. Bail.

The civil law of Scotland.—The civil or municipal law includes the rules by which property is preserved or vindicated, and the rights and interests of individuals ascertained. Without speculating on the origin of the municipal code of Scotland, or attempting to trace the share which the aboriginal customs of the people, or the canon law, under the influence of the clergy, or the Roman and feudal laws, respectively had in producing the complex system by which our civil rights are now regulated, it is sufficient for all the purposes of the present sketch to observe, that institutional writers divide the existing law of Scotland into written and unwritten; the former consisting of the rules prescribed in acts of Parliament; and the latter, being the consuetudinary law, either founded on immemorial custom, or adopted into our system from the Roman law, or from the canon, or from the feudal law. The statutory law of Scotland commences with the acts of the Parliament of James I. of Scotland, in 1424; one peculiarity of the acts of the Scotch Parliaments being, that they may fall into desuetude, or may be abrogated by a contrary usage. See Desuetude. In this way it has happened that the Scotch statutes now in observance are not numerous. The Acts of Sederunt, which are the acts or ordinances of the Court of Session, have no proper legislative force beyond what relates to the form of administering justice in that Court. Where they go farther, as they do in some instances, they are to be considered rather as declaratory judgments, or declarations of the opinion of the Court on points of law, and a certification to the public of the judgment which will be pronounced when the case provided for occurs. But the Court may decide differently, or the House of Lords may disregard such declaratory acts, except when (as now frequently happens) a special enactment in a statute confers powers on the Court to make effectual and binding regulations by Act of Sederunt. See Act of Sederunt. The unwritten law consists of certain legal rules, such as the law of primogeniture, the law of deathbed, the terce, the courtesy, the legitim, and some others, established by immemorial custom. The decisions of the Court of Session, or of the House of Lords, where they have been uniform on the same point, have been held as proving our consuetudinary law; but it is as affording evidence of the custom, rather than as possessing any power in themselves, that with us adjudged cases have been regarded as forming part of the law. See Decisions.

The private law of a country may be regarded in two aspects: first, As it operates on those living under it; and, secondly, As it relates to foreigners. In regard to those under it, the security of property is chiefly to be considered; and in no country is property better secured than in Scotland. Our system of records gives a degree of security to the transmission of landed property which is peculiar to Scotland. The law of deathbed, which is also peculiar, operates for the benefit alike of the heir and of dying persons; and the law regulating the rights of debtor and creditor exposes every species of property belonging to the debtor to the attachment of the creditor; while, on a surrender of his property, a debtor whose misfortunes have been innocent may secure his personal liberty. In regard to strangers, the point of chief importance relates to the recovery of debts; with respect to which they enjoy, in common with domiciled Scotchmen, the full right of attaching every species of property belonging to their debtor; while those laws by which diligence is equalized, and the property of a debtor fairly distributed amongst his creditors, give an opportunity to distant creditors to claim and draw their shares along with those upon the spot. In particular, the Scottish system of mercantile sequestration is directed to the distribution of the whole estate of the debtor, and to the fair and legal ranking of every creditor, foreign or domestic. In fine, the law of Scotland, whether regard be had to security in the possession and transmission of property, or to the ready means afforded for the recovery of debts, or to the respect uniformly shown for the personal liberty of the subject, need not fear a comparison with any existing municipal code. The practical application of its principles is besides, generally speaking, rational and intelligible, and peculiarly free from the fictions and technicalities which, to a certain extent, conceal the merits of other systems from unprofessional inquirers.

Law of Arms; is that law which regulates the proclamation of war; the making and observing of leagues and treaties; assaults on and encounters with an enemy; and the punishment of offenders in camp, &c. The law of arms, when in force, supersedes the civil law. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See International Law.

Lawburrows; are letters passing under the signet, running in the Sovereign's name, and obtained at the instance of one who has, or thinks he has, reason to apprehend danger to his person or property from the acts of another. These letters command the person complained of to give security that the person at whose instance the letters issue shall be free from every violence to be done by the person against whom they are directed, or those depending on him, under a penalty fixed by the act 1593, c. 166. That statute, in the case of an earl or lord, imposes a penalty of L.2000 Scots; for a great baron, L.1000 Scots; for a freeholder, 1000 merks; for a feuar, 500 merks; for a yeoman, 100 merks; for every gentleman unlanded, 200 merks; for each person summoned on an assize, 100 merks. These penalties are now either increased or diminished by the judge at passing the bill on which the letters proceed, and the sum is always specified in the judge's deliverance. The person at whose instance the letters are obtained must bring proof of his cause of alarm, or swear that he dreads harm; and this oath is administered by the messenger before he executes the letters. Lawburrows are not granted to one spouse against the other, nor to a father against his child, unless on proof of the cause of dread, nor until application has been first served on the opposite party. In such cases of family quarrel, it has been suggested as a proper course, to appoint the application to be made, and answers to be lodged, within a limited time, under certification that in default a proof will be allowed. When the letters are executed, the person against whom they are directed must find caution to the extent required, within the days specified in the letters; which caution is lodged with the clerk in the Bill-Chamber, who issues a certificate of the fact. When these letters are taken out maliciously, and without probable cause, they may be suspended, and damages awarded; but where there is reason for them, if the person does not find caution within the time specified, the letters may be denounced and registered, and a caption raised thereon, which will be a warrant for imprisoning the person who has neglected to find caution. When the letters have been taken out, and caution found, they give rise (in case the person shall do any violence to the complainer or any of his family) to an action of contravention of lawburrows, which follows on the letters of lawburrows and bond of caution; and of course decree will be given against both the offender and cautioner. Contravention of lawburrows infers liability in the party complained of, whether he has found security or not. This action may properly be brought before the justices of the peace, when one of them has exacted the security. The fiscal must concur with the private complainer; but cannot prosecute alone, unless for ordinary punishment of the act as a breach of the peace; and, in such a case, a fine imposed on the offender would not free him from an action of contravention. The fiscal may insist criminally, where the private party's right to prosecute for contravention is barred, by remission, express or implied. By the tenor of the bond of caution, the obligants bind themselves that the complainer, his wife, bairns, servants, &c., shall be kept skaithless; but, unless these several parties have concurred in the application, an action of contravention for injury done to them will not lie at their instance, but only at the instance of the complainer himself. This action, being penal, is not incurred merely by the uttering of reproachful words, where they are not accompanied with violence, or at least with a real injury. The amount of the penalty is properly that stated on the bond; but sometimes, when the contravention is trifling, less is awarded, and occasionally no more is awarded than the actual damage. In this last instance, the amount levied goes to the party injured; but in other cases the penalty is equally divided between the complainer and the fisk. *Ersk. Leading a Witness. It is a general rule that leading questions, or such as have a tendency to suggest to the witness the answer expected from him, or to instruct him as to the answer he should give, are not allowed. Thus, it is not permitted, with the view of proving a conversation, to mention to the witness a particular expression, and ask whether it was used. This rule is not so strictly enforced in regard to cross-examination. Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 131; Alison's Prac. 596; Dickson's Law of Evidence, pp. 987-8.

Lease, Contract of; it is a mutual contract between the proprietor or lessor of lands, houses, mills, fishings, or the like, and a tenant or lessee to whom the temporary possession of the subject and its fruits or profits is given for a certain stipulated rent, or annual payment, in money, grain, or services. The lease was originally in the form of a grant from the lessor; but as agriculture improved, it became necessary to introduce a variety of conditions obligatory on both parties. Hence it assumed the form of a mutual contract. As this contract affects heritage, the right to which is regulated by charter and sasine, and by a system of records, it became necessary for the Legislature to interfere, and to render the tenant's right real, so as to prevent him from being dispossessed by a purchaser or other singular successor. This was done by the act 1449, c. 18, which declares, "That for the safety and favour of the poor people that labours the ground, that they and all others that has taken or shall take lands, in time to come, frae lords, and has terms and years thereof, that suppose the lords sell or anailzie that land or lands, the takers shall remain with their tacks until the issue of their terms, whose hands that ever the lands come to." In this manner has the lease not only of lands, but of houses, fishings, mills, &c. been secured during their currency against singular successors; but to entitle a lease to the protection of the act, it must be a written lease—it must have a stipulated rent—the term of its endurance must be specified—and possession must have followed on the lease. It is thus that a lease, though properly a personal contract, is made effectual against a singular successor. But against the granter and his heirs, a perpetual lease, or a lease where no rent is stipulated, or where the accruing rents are appropriated prospectively to the payment of a debt due to the tenant, will be effectual.

1. Of the constitution and effects of the contract.—In the constitution of the lease there are several matters worthy of attention; as,—1. By whom a lease may be granted. 2. The powers reserved by the granter. 3. To whom it may be given. 4. The powers conferred on the tenant. 5. The conditions of the lease. 6. The forms necessary for a binding lease.

1. By whom a lease may be granted.—To entitle a person to grant a formal lease, he ought to be infeft in the subject; for, although the subsequent infeftment of the lessor will validate the lease by accretion, provided there be no mid-impediment, yet, should he die un-infeft, the lease may be defeated, by a stranger coming into the feudal right, who does not represent the lessor, such as a purchaser, a stranger substitute in an entail, or an adjudging creditor. But the heir of the granter of the lease, taking the land as his representative, is bound by the contract. When the lessor is infeft, although he may be married, or even have given a locality to his widow, there is nothing to prevent him, in the exercise of his right of administration, from granting a lease; nor will his widow be permitted, on the right opening to her, to set aside the lease. During the pupillarity of the proprietor, a tutor is not entitled to grant a lease for a longer period than the endurance of his office; but a minor pubes may, with the consent of his curator, let a lease, though it will be liable to reduction on the head of lesion, if lesion can be proved. A proprietor is not prevented from exercising the common acts of administration, by having granted an heritable bond, which, as being merely a right in security, leaves the right of property unaffected in the person of the debtor. A proprietor, therefore, after granting heritable securities, may grant a valid lease; but the effect of real diligence is, to circumscribe the proprietor's power of administration; and, accordingly, our law has introduced what has been denominated litigiousity, by which, from the time that a summons of adjudication or letters of inhibition are executed and published, a lien is created over the subject, which exposes to challenge a sale made or a lease granted by a party against whom such diligence has been commenced. So also, a mercantile sequestration, which deprives the proprietor of the power of administration, will have the same effect. The law of deathbed also will expose to challenge, ex capite lecti, a lease to the prejudice of his heir, if the lease be an extraordinary act of administration; but not where it is a lease of ordinary endurance, and at an adequate rent; Semple, 1st June 1813, Fac. Coll. An entail, in like manner, circumscribes the powers of a proprietor; but that depends on the terms of the entail. See Tailzie. Grassum. Where a life-renter grants a lease, it can endure only during his lifetime.

2. The powers reserved by the granter independently of stipulation.—Under this implied reservation are included,—1. The mines and minerals, and the power of working them on payment of surface damage. 2. The trees and wood on the farm; the tenant having a right merely to the annual crops which the soil produces. 3. Where the subject is destroyed, the landlord is not bound to rebuild. See the case of Bayne v. Walker, as reversed in the House of Lords, 3 Dow, p. 233. In virtue of his inherent right of property, he may also hunt on the farm. 4. The landlord, independently of stipulation, has a right of hypothec, in security of his rent. This right gives the landlord a security over the crop of each year, for the rent of that year of which it is the crop; and over the cattle and stock on the farm for the current year's rent, which last right endures for three months after the last conventional term of payment of the year's rent. See Hypothec.

3. To whom a lease may be given.—This depends entirely on the convention of the parties; and all that is to be considered is, the extent of the right conferred by the terms used in describing the tenant. Where a lease is given simply to a tenant by name, it will go to his heirs on his death, if he dies before the expiration of the lease, although heirs be not mentioned. Where the lease is given to two persons, or to joint tenants, as they are termed, the interest of one of the tenants, on his death, will go to his heirs, and not to the surviving tenant. Where the lease is given to two, and to the longest liver, and to their heirs, each of the original tenants has a joint right; but on the death of any one of them, the heir of the deceased has no right, the whole belonging to the surviving tenant. Where, again, a lease is given to a company, it becomes a difficult question to say what effect is produced on the lease by a dissolution of the company. This point, therefore, ought to be settled by an express stipulation in the lease. It ought to be declared, whether the lease is to be thereby terminated, or whether a power of assigning or of subsetting is intended to be given; and the company ought to subscribe and to bind themselves, not by the firm of the company, but in their individual names, and as taking burden for the company. When a lease is given to a tenant, and to his heirs, it is the heir-at-law who is understood to be meant; and therefore care ought to be taken, either to give to the tenant a power of assigning or of subsetting, or at least a power of naming a successor in place of the heir-at-law; a precaution useful both to landlord and tenant, as the heir may be unfit or disinclined to take the management, or the tenant may be succeeded by heirs-portioners. Power ought also to be given by the lease to the tenant to appoint a manager of the farm for his heir, in case the tenant should die, leaving his heir in minority, or otherwise incapable of managing for himself—the manager so appointed being taken bound to perform the obligations incumbent on the tenant by the lease.

4. The powers conferred by the lease.—Under the lease, the tenant has a right to the annual fruits, and to the use and possession of the subject. Hence, where the subject of the lease is rendered unfit for the purposes for which it was let, overblown with sand, inundated, or otherwise destroyed, there must be a proportional diminution, and, in extreme cases, a total discharge of the rent. Where, from the inclemency of the season, a degree of sterility has been produced, such as to yield the tenant no more than seed and labour, cases have occurred in which the rent has been held not to be demandable. See Sterility.

5. The conditions of the lease.—The usual conditions of this deed are, on the part of the landlord, warrandice, which, whether expressed or implied, binds him, unless the contrary be expressly stipulated, to warrant to the tenant undisturbed possession during the continuance of the lease, and to protect him against all encroachments on his right. On the part of the tenant, the implied obligations are, that he shall stock and labour his farm according to the rules of good husbandry; that he shall regularly pay his rent; shall keep and leave the houses and inclosures on the farm in repair; and that he shall remove from the farm at the expiration of the lease. These, with obligations on the parties to perform their respective parts of the agreement under a certain penalty, are the common and ordinary conditions of the lease. But there may be an infinite variety of others applicable to the special circumstances of the particular case or the nature of the farm. In particular, it is common to prescribe positive rules as to the mode of labouring and managing the farm; though that practice is not now so prevalent as it once was, the most approved course being to prohibit an injurious rotation, or to prescribe a particular rotation for the last four or five years only of the lease, leaving the choice of a rotation consistent with good husbandry entirely to the tenant. These conditions may be enforced, by exacting or stipulating for a higher or additional rent for such parts of the farm as shall be laboured differently.

6. The forms necessary for a binding lease.—A lease merely verbal, to endure for more than one year, will not bind the parties. To produce this effect, writing must intervene. Even where possession has followed on a verbal lease, that is not sufficient; it may be resiled from, and terminated at the expiration of the current year, though stipulated to continue for a tract of time. In the case where money has been expended, or an engagement come under on the faith of the lease, although a breach of the verbal agreement may found a claim of damages, yet the verbal agreement will not be taken as a ground for giving effect to the lease. A verbal lease may, indeed, be made effectual against the grantor and his heirs, by rei interventus, provided such rei interventus shall distinctly apply to a right of longer duration than a single year. But a lease established rei interventu has no effect against singular successors without possession (see Rei interventus); and, generally speaking, the terms of a verbal lease cannot be proved by oath of party, so at least as to make it effectual for more than one year. But a written obligation to grant a lease is equivalent to an actual lease; and any writing, however informal, if followed by possession, will be as effectual as a formal written lease, not only against the grantor and his heirs, but against singular successors, provided such writing contain in gramio, the essentials of a lease under the statute 1449, c. 18, viz., a rent and a definite period of endurance, and that the writing is followed by possession referable to it. In order to be effectual to ground an action, a written lease must be on stamped paper. The want of a stamp may be supplied at any time on payment of certain penalties; but the practice of sisting process till the stamp be obtained is not correct. See Stamp Laws.

II. Of the transmission of the lease.—The lease may be transmitted by assignation, or the right of possessing under the principal tacksman may be given by a sub-lease. A power of assigning or of sub-setting, however, is not implied in a lease of the ordinary endurance of nineteen years. In such leases, therefore, an express authority to assign or sublet must be given. Where the lease exceeds nineteen years' endurance, or where it is given for a life rent, a power of assigning and subsetting is implied, unless expressly excluded; and in the case of an urban tenement, whether the lease be long or short, the tenant may assign or sublet, if not prohibited by the lease. When a sublease is given, the principal tenant, in the ordinary case, remains bound; but it is doubtful whether the same holds in the case of an assignation. Both the sublease and assignation are completed by possession; but it may happen that a lease is assigned which has been previously sublet; so that the assignee does not enter into the natural possession of the subject, but draws the rents only, and that is equivalent to natural possession. Where, again, it is necessary to complete the transference more immediately than can be done in this way, the assignation must be intimated to the subtenant or person in possession. On this point, which is attended with many practical difficulties, the following authorities may be consulted: Bell's Com. i. 66; Ivory's Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 26; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 398; Bell on Leases, i. 451; Russell, 3d Dec. 1822, 2 S. & D. 62; 5 S. & D. 891; 7 S. & D. 767; 1 W. & S. 620; 9 S. & D. App. 6; Young, 14th Dec. 1824, 3 S. & D. 388, and 3 W. & S. 404; Marston, 16th Jan. 1827, 5 S. & D. 200; Kennedy, 19th Feb. 1829, 7 S. & D. 435; Inglis & Co., 26th Feb. 1829, 7 S. & D. 469; Brook, 5th March 1830, 8 S. & D. 647, affirmed on appeal, 5 W. & S.; Hamilton's Trustee, 25th May 1830, 8 S. & D. 799. See also supra. voce Assignation, p.

78. But although an express power of assigning or subsetting be required, in order to authorize a tenant voluntarily to assign or sublet a lease of the ordinary endurance of nineteen years, yet such a lease is adjudgable by a creditor of the tenant, unless it contain an express exclusion of assignees and subtenants, in which case both voluntary and judicial assignees are inadmissible. As to the transmission of a lease on the death of the lessee, see supra, p. 517.

III. Of the termination of the lease.—When the term of the lease is expired, it is in the power of the landlord and tenant to continue the lease from year to year by tacit relocation; that is, to continue the possession from year to year on the old terms. The consequence of this is, that a warning is understood to be requisite in order to break the implied agreement. See Tacit Relocation. Formerly, this warning was regulated by the act 1555, c. 39, under which removing proceeded on a precept in the landlord's name. But the Act of Sederunt, Dec. 14, 1756, greatly simplified the process, by requiring, in place of the statutory and cumbrous form of removing, the mere calling of the tenant in an action of removing before the Judge Ordinary forty days before the Whitsunday of the year in which the lease is to expire. Where there is a regular lease, it generally contains an obligation to remove at the expiration of the term, and a warrant for letters of horning is given, in which case letters of horning may be raised and executed forty days before the Whitsunday of the year of removal—a charge on which the Act of Sederunt declares to be sufficient to entitle the landlord to obtain a warrant of ejection. The lease may be prematurely terminated by the tenant's desertion. In such a case, the safe course for the landlord seems to be to apply to the Judge Ordinary, stating the circumstances, and praying for judicial authority to dispose of the unexpired period of the lease by public roup, under a reservation of all claims against the tenant who has deserted. Where a subtenant has deserted, the same course may be pursued by the principal tacksman. A current written lease may also be brought to a close, during its currency, by a voluntary renunciation by the tenant, provided the landlord agrees to accept of it, and, upon principle, it would seem that such a renunciation must be in writing. If so, all agreements on the part either of the landlord or of the tenant, having in view the termination of a current written lease, may be resiled from, unless writing have intervened. It has been said that where the lease is informal, the renunciation may be so likewise; but in that case there must be circumstances corroborative of the renunciation to counterbalance the rei interventus on the lease. There is no particular form of renunciation required, but there must be a clear and explicit notice to the right party forty days before Whitsunday. See Removing. Renunciation.

A summons of removing may now be raised at any time, provided there is an interval of 40 days between the date of the execution of the summons and the term of removal, or where there is a separate ish as regards land and houses or other subjects between the date of the execution of the summons and the ish which is first in date. A lease which contains an obligation to remove has the same force and effect as an extract-decree of removing obtained by the party in right of the lease against the party in possession under the lease, whether the original lessor or not, and along with a written authority signed by the landlord, or his factor or agent, is a sufficient authority to any sheriff-officer or messenger-at-arms within the county within which the lands are situated, to remove the party in possession. Previous notice, however, must be given to the tenant, at least 40 days before the expiration of the term of endurance specified in the lease; or where there is a separate ish as regards land and houses or other subjects, at least 40 days before the ish which is first in date. The notice in the form of schedule I, annexed to the act, must be delivered to the party in possession, or left at his ordinary dwelling-house, or transmitted to his known address through the post-office by a sheriff-officer or messenger-at-arms. No removal under the act can take place after six weeks have elapsed from the expiration of the term of endurance specified in the lease, or from the ish which is last in date where there is a separate ish as regards the land and houses or other subjects. A letter of removal, in the form given in schedule K, has the same effect as an extract-decree of removal obtained against the granter of the letter, or any party in his right; but where the letter of removal bears date more than six weeks before the term of removal specified in it, 40 days' notice must be given. See act 16 and 17 Vict. c. 80, 1853.

By the act 20 and 21 Vict., c. 26 (1857), leases for thirty-one years and upwards may be recorded in the Register of Sasines, and such leases so registered are effectual against all singular successors in the lands let whose infestments are posterior in date to the date of registration of such leases. Such leases, when recorded, may be assigned, in whole or in part, in the form given in schedule A annexed to the act, and the recording of such assignment effectually vests the assignee with the right of the granter of the assignment in the lease to the extent assigned. Such assignment, however, does not prejudice the right of hypothec or other rights of the landlord. A party in right of any such recorded lease, and whose right to the lease is also recorded, may assign the lease in whole or in part in security for the payment of borrowed money, or of annuities, or of provisions to wives and children, or in security of cash-credits or other legal debt or obligation in the form given in schedule B annexed to the act, and the recording of such assignment in security completes the right of the assignee, and a real security over the lease is thereby constituted to the extent assigned.

Where the party in the right of any such lease or assignment in security is not the original lessee in the lease, or the original assignee of the lease, he must, before presenting the lease or assignment in security for registration, expedite a notarial instrument in the form given in schedule C, and the keeper of the register on such notarial instrument being produced to him, records the lease and assignment in security along with the instrument.

A recorded assignment in security is transferable in whole or in part by translation in the form given in schedule D, and the party in right of such recorded assignment in security is entitled, in default of payment of the capital sum for which the assignment in security was granted, or of a term's interest thereof, or of a term's annuity for six months after the capital sum or the term's interest or annuity shall have fallen due, may apply to the sheriff for a warrant to enter to possession of the lands leased, and the sheriff, after intimation to the lessee for the time being and to the landlord, shall, if he see cause, grant such warrant. The warrant so granted is a sufficient title to the party so obtaining it to enter into possession of the lands, and to uplift the rents from the subtenants, and to sublet the lands as freely as the lessee might have done. He is not, however, personally liable to the landlord in any of the obligations and prestations of the lease until he so enters into possession.

The heir of any party who dies vested in right of any such recorded lease or assignment in security may complete his title thereto by a writ of acknowledgment from the proprietor infest in the lands held by such lease, or from the party appearing on the register as in absolute right of such lease of or over which such assignment in security has been granted. The form of such writ is given in schedule E, and the recording of such writs in the register in which such lease or assignation in security is registered completes the title of the heir. No defect, however, in the title of the proprietor or grantor of such writ will affect the writ or title of such heir.

The heir of any party who dies fully vested in right of any such recorded lease or assignation in security, who obtains a general or special service to such party, or the general donee of such party, may complete his title to such lease or assignation in security by expediting a notarial instrument in the form given in schedule F.

Where an assignee dies without recording the assignation in his favour, his heir or general donee may complete his title by expediting a notarial instrument in the form given in schedule F, and the keeper of the register, on such instrument being presented to him, records the assignation along with the instrument.

The right of an adjudger of any recorded lease or assignation in security from the party vested in the right thereof, or from the heir of such party, is completed by recording the abbreviate of adjudication in the register in which the lease is recorded. A trustee on a sequestrated estate of any party in right of such lease or assignation in security may complete his title by expediting a notarial instrument in the form given in schedule F, and recording the instrument in the register in which the lease or assignation is recorded. The date of all such leases and assignations is regulated by the dates of recording. Renunciations and discharges of such leases or assignations may be in the form given in schedules G and H, and may be endorsed on the lease or assignation in security and recorded. Decrees of reduction of any such lease, or any assignation thereto, may also be recorded.

Leases containing an obligation upon the grantor to renew the same from time to time at fixed periods, or upon the termination of a life or lives or otherwise, are deemed leases in the meaning of the act, and may be registered, provided such leases shall, by the terms of the obligation, be renewable from time to time, so as to endure for a period of thirty-one years or upwards. No lease of land other than subjects held by burgh tenure executed after the passing of the act, unless executed in terms of an obligation to renew, contained in a lease granted prior to the act, can be registered, unless the name of the lands of which the subjects let consist or form a part are set forth in the lease, and no lease of lands, except where the same consist of mines and minerals, can be registered unless the extent of the land be set forth in the lease, and shall not exceed fifty acres.

Lease and Release; in English law, a conveyance of the fee-simple, right or interest in lands or tenements, under the statute of uses, 27 Hen. VIII. c. 10; giving first the possession, and afterwards the interest in the estate conveyed. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Leaseholders; as to their right of voting under the Reform Act, see Reform Act.

Leasing-Making; or verbal sedition, as it is also termed, consists, according to the language of the old statutes, in "slandorous and untrue speeches, to the disdain, reproach, and contempt of his Majesty, his council and proceedings, or to the dishonour, hurt, or prejudice of his Highness, his parents and progenitors," &c.; 1584, c. 134. By this act, and by the act 1585, c. 10, and others of a still older date, this crime is made punishable with death. But this having been declared a grievance in the claim of right, the punishment of the offenders was, by the act 1703, c. 4, declared to be an arbitrary one; and the punishment was still further mitigated by 6 Geo. IV. c. 47, by which it was provided, that persons convicted of leasing-making, sedition, or blasphemy, should be liable to be punished only by fine and imprisonment, or both, at the discretion of the court; or on a second conviction in the same way, or by banishment. So much of this act as regards the punishment by banishment is repealed by 7 Will. IV. c. 5. See *Ersk. Legacy; is a bequest or donation of a sum of money, or of a moveable subject, to be paid or delivered to the legatee by the executor of a deceased person, out of the moveable estate of the defunct. Legacies are usually bequeathed by a testament, by which the testator appoints an executor, and directs him, against a certain time (usually the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the testator's death), to pay the legacies to the legatee. Where the legacy consists of an article which is to be delivered, it is understood, unless otherwise directed, that the delivery is to take place immediately after the testator's death. The legacy is personal to the legatee to whom it is given; and were he to die before the testator, the legacy would lapse, and not be demandable by the heir of the legatee. If, therefore, it be meant to give a legacy to a person, and, in the event of his predeceasing the testator, to confer it on his heir, the bequest must be so expressed; in which case (should the legatee predecease the testator) a right to the legacy will vest in the heir, and, in the event of his death, the legacy will go to the heir of the testator, in preference to any other heir of the legatee. A legacy may be contained in a general disposition as well as in a testament. The legacy may be either general, or special, or universal. See Disposition General.

General legacy.—A general legacy is that where a certain sum of money, as L.100, or a certain amount of property of any kind, is bequeathed in general terms; and this is payable out of the moveable estate of the testator. If there be a shortcoming in the moveable estate, or any subsequent loss, it falls proportionally on all the general legacies. But if a sum be bequeathed for a special purpose, in making the abatement necessary on account of the shortcoming, where otherwise practicable, enough must be left to execute the purpose of the bequest.

Special legacy.—The legacy is said to be special, where a particular subject or debt is bequeathed to the legatee; in which case the legatee must bear any loss arising from the bankruptcy or inability of the debtor. But, on the other hand, he gets the subject or debt such as it is, and suffers no share of any loss which may fall upon general legatees in consequence of a shortcoming in the testator's fund for general legacies. Neither special nor general legacies, however, can be paid to the prejudice of the rights of the onerous creditors of the deceased. Where a particular debt is bequeathed, should it have been paid up during the lifetime of the testator, the legacy is at an end; or, should an heritable security be taken for the debt, that also, by converting it into heritage, operates an extinction of the legatee's right to the debt. But where creditors take a particular subject to the exclusion of a special legatee, they must assign their debts to him. A special legacy has the effect of an assignation mortis causa to the particular thing, the right to which is completed by the testator's death; and, consequently, such a legatee has his action directly against the possessor of the fund or subject, the executor being called as a party; while a general legacy confers on the legatee only a personal right of action against the creditor. A universal legacy comprehends all the testator's estate, or the reversion or residue, after satisfying expenses, debts, and other legacies. Verbal Legacy.—A verbal legacy is ineffectual to any greater extent than to the sum of L.100 Scots (L.8, 6s. 8d.)

If no term be appointed for the payment of a legacy, it is due at the testator's death, from which time it bears interest; but payment cannot be enforced till six months thereafter. If a day be fixed, or if an event, certain to arrive, be expressed, on the arrival of which the legacy is to become due, the legacy vests from the testator's death; but is not payable, nor does interest begin to run upon it until the arrival of the specified time or event. A possible condition in a legacy receives effect; an impossible condition is held pro non scripto. (See Vesting of Legacies.) When the testator bequeaths a subject belonging to another, which he believes to be his own, the legacy is ineffectual; but if he knows that it is not his own, the subject must be purchased, or the legatee otherwise satisfied out of the executry. The bequest of a thing erroneously supposed to be moveable is ineffectual. See *Ersk. Legacy and Residue Duties. For purposes of revenue, legacies are subject to certain duties, the rates of which vary from one to ten per cent. on the sum bequeathed; the duty rising in amount according to the remoteness of the relationship of the legatee, and reaching its maximum where he is not related to the testator. All legacies of L.20 and upwards, out of estates above L.100, pay duty. And where any legatee takes two or more distinct legacies or benefits under any testament, which together amount to L.20, each is charged with duty, although each or either separately may be under that value. A donation made intuitu mortis, while the testator is still in life, and in order to evade the duty, is not accounted an illegal evasion. The duty is payable by the legatee, unless the will shall otherwise direct; and if the first legatee is exempted from the duty, his substitutes are also, in dubio, held to be exempted. Before executors or trustees can legally retain the residue of the defunct's personal estate, or any part of it, they must deliver to the Stamp Office, or to the stamp distributor in whose district they reside, an account in duplicate of the particulars of such residue, with its amount, and the moneys arising from the sale or burdening of real estate, or the value of the real estate, if not sold, when it is directed by the deceased to be sold, and of all payments made out of it. The duty must be paid within fourteen days after the commissioners have assessed it, under a penalty of treble the amount of duty. The duplicate accounts must also be accompanied with an extract or copy of any will or testamentary instrument executed by the deceased, and all other documents necessary for ascertaining the duties exigible from the estate. The duties on legacies must be paid when the legacies are discharged; but if the legacies are retained by the executors for the use of legatees, who from infancy, absence, or any other cause, cannot yet receive them, the duties must be accounted for when the legacies are so retained. Where the legacy is payable at a future period, the duty must be paid immediately, if the interest of the legacy is directed by the will to be applied for the benefit of the legatee until that period arrive. All rents of heritable estates directed to be sold, and all dividends, interests, and profits arising from the personal estate of the deceased, subsequent to the time of his or her death, with all accumulations of such profits down to the time of the executors or trustees delivering the accounts, and offering to pay the duty on the residue, are considered as part of the deceased's personal estate, and must be accounted for accordingly; Attorney-General v. Cavendish, Trinity Term, 1810. Effects not consisting of money, or securities for money, are valued at the time the account is rendered, when inventories and proper valuations are required to be produced. Money in the public funds is valued at the medium price of stocks on the day on which the account is dated. The values of annuities are calculated by the tables annexed to 36 Geo. III. c. 52. Special circumstances attending a case may be introduced into the account, or stated in a separate paper annexed to it. Where the residue of the personal estate is given to one for life, a distinct account must be given of the profits which have accrued subsequent to the testator's death, and of the payments made for interest of legacies and of the testator's debts, so that the balance due to the residuary legatee for life may appear. Notwithstanding insolvency, an account must be rendered, to satisfy the commissioners that the estate is not chargeable with duty. Persons paying or receiving any legacy or residue liable to duty, without taking or signing a proper receipt, in which the duty is expressed to have been deducted, are subject to a penalty of 10 per cent. on the amount of such legacy or residue. Every legacy receipt must be dated on the day of signing, and the duty paid within twenty-one days from the date, under a penalty of 10 per cent. on the amount of the duty; and if the duty is not paid within three months from the date of the receipt, a penalty will then be incurred of 10 per cent. on the amount of the legacy. As above stated, the amount of the duty varies according to the nearness of the legatee's consanguinity to the deceased. The husband and wife are not subject to the duty on legacies, annuities, and residues, bequeathed to each other. Lawful children of the testator and their descendants, the father, mother, or any lineal ancestor of the testator, pay 1 per cent. Brothers and sisters, and their descendants, pay 3 per cent. Brothers and sisters of a father or mother, and their descendants, pay 5 per cent. Brothers and sisters of a grandfather or grandmother, and their descendants, pay 6 per cent. Strangers in blood, persons in any other degree of collateral consanguinity, and illegitimate children, pay 10 per cent. Where a husband and wife in different degrees of relationship to the deceased have been named as joint legatees, the rule of different rates is held to apply, and duty is paid on one-half of the legacy in the husband's, and on the other half in the wife's proportion. The rates given above are applicable only to the estates of persons who have died since 5th April 1805; 55 Geo. III. c. 184. The preceding summary has been abridged from the printed directions issued by the Solicitor of Legacy Duties in Scotland. See Succession.

Legal, or Legal Reversion. This is the period within which a debtor whose heritage has been adjudged is entitled to redeem the subject; i. e., to disencumber it of the adjudication, by paying the debt adjudged for. Or rather, it is the period on the expiration of which the adjudger may convert his judicial security into an irredeemable right of property, by obtaining decree of declarator or expiry of the legal. For the debtor may redeem the lands at any time before decree of declarator of expiry, or before forty years' possession has run on charter of adjudication and sasine. The legal of the special adjudication is five years; 1672, c. 19; of the general adjudication, ten years; 1661, c. 62, and 1672, c. 19; and of the adjudication contra hæreditatem jacentem, seven years: 1621, c. 7. Stair, B. iii. tit. 2, § 29; B. iv. tit. 3, § 2; tit. 23, § 7; tit. 36, § 2; More's Notes, p. cccv.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, §§ 10, 22, 39, 49; Bell's Com., 6th edit. ii. 943, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 829; Shand's Prac. p. 731; *Jurid. Legate; an ambassador or pope's nuncio. Tomlin's Dict. h. t.

Legatee; is the person to whom a legacy is payable.

Legitim, or Bairns' Part of Gear; is the legal share of the father's free moveable property due on his death to his children. Where a father dies leaving a widow and children, his free moveable estate suffers a division into three equal parts; one-third part is divided equally amongst all the children, whether of his last, or of any former marriage, as legitim; another third goes to his widow, as her jus relictæ; and the remaining third is what is called dead's part, which the father may dispose of as he pleases, by testament or otherwise. Where he has made no testamentary or other destination of the dead's part, it goes to his children, as his executors. Where the father leaves children, but no widow, or where the widow, in her contract of marriage, has renounced the jus relictæ, one-half of his free moveable property is legitim, the other dead's part; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 20. The children of a deceased child are not entitled to claim any part of their grandfather's moveable estate, as the legitim to which their parent would have been entitled. It is the children alive at the time of the father's death to whom alone the right of legitim belongs. The claim of legitim may be excluded by giving the children a provision in an antenuptial contract of marriage, in name of legitim. But where this has not been done, the right is not directly or gratuitously defeasible; and even where a conventional provision has been substituted in an antenuptial contract of marriage in lieu of the legitim, it would seem to be optional to the child or children either to accept the conventional provision, or to reject it, and insist for their legitim. Where, however, the conventional provision bears expressly to be given in name of legitim, the children can neither take the provision nor any other benefit under the contract, and at the same time insist for the legitim. A provision in a contract of marriage, whether antenuptial or postnuptial, whereby the legitim of the children should be entirely excluded, without making any other provision for the children, would be inoperative against them. The father, no doubt, in the exercise of his uncontrolled power of administration during his life, may, by converting moveable into heritable property, or even by a de præsenti and completed conveyance of his whole moveable property, diminish or entirely defeat the claim of legitim; Hog, 14th May 1800, Mor. App. h. t. The legitim cannot be diminished or affected by a deathbed deed, or by a testamentary, or mortis causa, or revocable deed of any kind, whether deathbed or not; the dead's part alone being disposable in this way. And no deed or settlement of the father, regulating the succession to the legitim, is effectual, even where the child is a bankrupt, a pupil, or an idiot. See Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 25; Bank. B. iii. tit. 8, § 15. Where a child has expressly discharged his claim of legitim, either gratuitously or on receiving an equivalent, during his father's life, he is said to be forisfamiliated. But the discharge must be express. The effect of a discharge of this kind is not to augment the dead's part; nor does it make the slightest alteration on the general amount of the legitim, which still continues to be a half or a third of the free moveables at the time of the father's death, the share of the forisfamiliated child going merely to increase the fund for division amongst the remaining children entitled to legitim; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 23. A discharge of the legitim by all the children leaves the moveable estate to be equally divided between the husband and wife; or, if the wife be already dead, it converts the whole into dead's part. And a discharge by one or all, after the father's death, makes the legitim accrue to the person entitled to the residuary right of succession. The child claiming legitim must collate any separate provision received from the father, unless such separate provision shall appear to have been intended by the father as a præ- pnum. All sums of money advanced for the child must also be collated; but neither the expense of education, nor inconsiderable presents, nor any advances which bear to be made over and above the legitim, are to be taken into computation. And in the Chandos case, the legitim was held not to be excluded by a child's acceptance from her father, under an English marriage-contract, of a provision declared to be her "portion or fortune." This provision was not imputed in fixing the amount of the legitim; Breadallbane v. Chandos, Jan. 20 and Nov. 19, 1836, D. B. & M. xiv. 309; xv. 48. The heir in heritage is excluded from a share of the legitim, unless he choose to collate the heritage with the younger children. The heir-male and of line, succeeding in the character of heir-male to an entailed estate in which the deceased had been infeft under an entail executed by a predecessor in favour of heirs-male, is not entitled to claim a share of the executry without collating his life-interest in the entailed estates; Anstruther, Nov. 28, 1833, S. & D. xii. 140; Jan. 20, 1836, S. & D. xiv. 272; Chandos, ut supra. But although the heir is excluded where there are other children, yet where he is an only child he will be entitled to legitim; Kennedy, 15th July 1622, Mor. p. 8163. The legitim vests in the children ipso jure without confirmation; but it does not constitute a jus crediti in them sufficient to entitle them to claim, or to rank in competition with the creditors of the defunct. Stair, B. iii. tit. 8, § 44; More's Notes, pp. ccxlvii-li.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 17; Bank, B. iii. tit. 8, § 15; Bell's Com. i. 632; Bell's Princ. § 1582, 1949; Illust. § 1583; *Kames' Stat. Legitimacy. A child is said to be legitimate which has been lawfully procreated in marriage, or legitimated by the subsequent intermarriage of its parents. All children born of a mother who, at the time of conception, was lawfully married, are presumed to have been begotten by him to whom at the time the mother was married; nor can this presumption be defeated, except by clear evidence that the husband of the mother could not have been the father of the child. Where a marriage is celebrated between parties, one of whom is already married to a person still alive, it would rather appear that bona fides on the part of one or both the parents will make the issue of the second marriage legitimate, but the point is not by any means fixed. The only case in which the question has occurred was compromised; but the opinions of the Court are given in Bell's Case of a putative marriage. Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 49; Bank. vol. i. pp. 46, 133; Bell's Princ. § 1624, et seq.; Illust. ib.; *Hutch. Legitimation; is the act whereby children, born bastards, are made lawful children, or by which certain of the privileges of lawful children are conferred on bastards. This may be accomplished—1. By the subsequent intermarriage of the parents. If, however, either of the parents was married to another person at the time of the birth, the child will not be legitimated by the subsequent marriage. When, again, another marriage has intervened between the date of the birth and the marriage of the parent, it was doubted whether legitimation took place. Voet held that it did so to all effects; while Erskine lays down the doctrine, that although the second marriage may legitimate the bastard in questions with his brothers of the full blood, yet the intervening marriage is so far a mid-impediment, that the children born of it are not prejudiced by the legitimation; Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 2. It has now been decided that legitimation takes place even although another marriage intervenes; Kerr, 6th March, 1840, 2 D. 752; but it was not decided in that case what the rights of the children so legitimated were in competition with the children of the intervening marriage. The effect of legitimation seems to follow, although the bastard should have died before the marriage, so as to confer on his descendants all the rights which belong to the children of one lawfully born. Parties domiciled and having bastard children in a country where legitimation per subsequens matrimonium is not recognised, cannot legitimate their children by marrying in that country, to the effect of entitling them to succeed to a landed estate in Scotland; Sheddan, 1st July 1803, Fac. Coll., Mor. App. voce Foreign, No. 6, affirmed on appeal, 2d March 1808. 2. So far as the rights of the Crown are concerned, bastards may be legitimated by letters of legitimation from the Sovereign, which generally empower the bastard, where he has no lawful children, to dispose of his heritage or moveables at any time during his life, and to make a testament. These privileges, however, he now enjoys without letters of legitimation. See Bastard. Letters of legitimation cannot affect the rights either of the bastard's lawful children or of third parties; nor can they give the bastard any right to legitim, or any other legal right of succession to his father or mother, or any other of his relations, as if he had been a lawful child.

But letters of legitimation may confer a right to succeed ab intestato to the bastard, on any one who would have been his heir, had the bastard been a lawful child; for, by conferring this privilege, the Crown only gives that which would otherwise have belonged to itself; Stair, B. iii. tit. 3, § 45; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 10, § 7. The question of legitimation per subsequens matrimonium depends not on the place of the child's birth, nor on the domicile of the parents at the date of its birth, nor on the place where the marriage was constituted, but solely on the domicile of the parents at the date of the marriage. Consequently, a child born in England of parents domiciled there at the time of its birth, would be legitimated by the subsequent marriage of its parents in England, if at the date of the marriage they were domiciled in Scotland, or in any other country in which the principle of legitimation per subsequens matrimonium was recognised. If, however, the parents were domiciled in England at the date of the marriage, the fact that the marriage was constituted in Scotland would not have the effect of legitimation. See the case of Rose v. Monro, 15th May 1827, 5 S. & D. 605. Reversed in House of Lords, 16th July 1830; 4 W. & S. 289; also the case of Munro v. Munro, 16th Nov. 1839; 16 S. 18. Reversed in House of Lords, 10th August 1840. 1 Rob. 492.

A child legitimated per subsequens matrimonium cannot succeed to real estate in England. This arises from the law in England in regard to the descent of land in England from father to son, that the son must be born after actual marriage between his father and mother. This is held to have been framed for the direct purpose of excluding in the descent of land in England the application of the rule of the civil and canon law, by which the subsequent marriage between the parents was held to make the son born before marriage legitimate. This rule of descent is held to be a rule of positive law annexed to the land itself, and is not allowed to be broken in upon or disturbed by the law of any other country. See the case of Birthwistle v. Vardell, 9; Bligh. 32; 2 Clark and Finelly, 571; and August 10, 1840, 7 Clark and Finelly, 895.

Lenocinium; is the husband's connivance at his wife's adultery, and his participation in the profits of her prostitution, or his lending himself in any way, directly or indirectly, to his own and her disgrace. It affords the wife an available defence against an action of divorce for adultery. The plea was found relevant in a case in which the husband had "caused, prompted, or hounded" the party with whom his wife had committed adultery to attempt to debauch her, although the pursuer averred that he merely intended a trial of her chastity. It has even been found a competent defence to a wife that her husband committed such indecencies towards her as invited others to seduce her. Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 45; Lothian's Consistorial Prac. p. 165; Bell's Princ. § 1534; Illust. ib. See Divorce.

Leonina Societas; a partnership in which one partner has all the loss, and another all the gain. Stair, B. i. tit. 1, § 3. See Partnership.

Lesemajesty. See Leasing making.

Lesion; is the degree of harm or injury sustained by a minor, or by a person of weak capacity, necessary to entitle him to reduce the deed by which he has suffered. Kames' Equity, 66, 167, 182, 363; Thomson on Bills, 103, 199. See Minor. Idiot. Facility. Fraud.

Lessor and Lessee; the parties to a lease. The former is the landlord or grantor of the lease; the latter the tenant in whose favour it is granted. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 15, 16. See Lease.

Lethal Weapon. In ordinary language, this term seems to import some such weapon as a sword, knife, or pistol; but, in cases of homicide, the law holds every weapon to be lethal by which a human being has died. Hume, i. 260; Steele, 82; Alison's Princ. 7.

Letters. Our ancient deeds were in the form of letters addressed to all and sundry, or to certain descriptions of persons, according to the nature of the subject; and more formal deeds, as the charter and judicial writs under the Signet, bear still the form of letters.

Signet Letters; are writs for enforcing the decrees of courts, or for attaching the property of debtors, or for citing defenders or other parties in actions before the Court of Session. These run in name of the Sovereign, and are authenticated by the Signet. See Horning. Caption. Inhibition, &c. Summons. Advocacion, &c.

Letters of Four Forms; were warrants for successive charges to debtors to pay before the penalty of rebellion was incurred; now abolished. Stair, B. iii. tit. 2, § 22; Bank. ii. 260; Menzies' Lectures, 278.

Letters of Marque; are warrants for reprisal, where British subjects are injured in their persons or goods by the subjects of foreign countries who refuse redress. Stair, B. ii. tit. 2, § 1; More's Notes, cliii.; Bank. i. 520.

Missive Letters. Where these relate to mercantile affairs, they will bind the parties, although neither holograph nor signed in the presence of witnesses. But wherever the transaction has no relation to mercantile transactions, in favour of which there is a departure from the established formalities, the letters must be executed agreeably to the statutory requisites, in order to be effectual to produce action; that is, the writer must be named and designed, and there must be witnesses to the subscription, who must also subscribe, and be named and designed; or the writing must be holograph of the grantor. Bank. i. 333; ii. 171; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 327; Bell on Deeds, 144; Tait on Evidence, p. 120; Bell's Com. 6th edit. vol. i. p. 53; Dickson's Law of Evidence, p. 409; Menzies' Lect. 828. See Deeds. Evidence.

Letters Conform. The letters issued by the Supreme Court in aid of the decrees of inferior judicatures, and authorizing execution in terms of those decrees, were anciently termed letters conform. They were granted by the Court of Session upon second summonses, calling the parties to the Court of Session to hear and see the letters granted, or show cause on the contrary; and the sentence pronounced on that occasion was called a decret conform. The same object is now attained by bills presented in the Bill-Chamber, and passed of course. Ross's Lect. vol. i. p. 237; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. voce Personal Execution. See this subject more fully explained under the article Decree Conform. See also Bills of Signet Letters. Diligence.

Letter of Attorney; in English law, a writing, authorizing another person, who, in such case, is called the attorney of the party appointing him, to do any lawful act in the stead of another; as to give sasine of lands, receive debts, or sue a third person, &c. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Mandate.

Letters of Correspondence. In criminal trials, letters of correspondence may be produced in evidence against the panel. A letter of a third party found in the panel's possession is not of itself evidence of its contents against him, since it may have been sent through mistake or malice. But a letter from the panel is evidence against him. Hume, ii. 395; Steele, 25; Alison's Prac. 611. Such letters may also be given in evidence in civil causes. See Production. Evidence.

Letter of Credit; a letter written by one merchant or correspondent to another, requesting him to credit the bearer, or a particular person named, with a certain sum of money, or to furnish him with goods. It was at one time held that no action would lie on a letter of credit, unless intimation were made of the furnishings, or advances made on the faith of it; but it is now fixed that no such intimation is necessary, and that the writer of every such letter is bound to understand that it may have been acted upon to its full extent. The terms of every letter of credit must be strictly complied with, otherwise no claim will arise against the writer; and a letter of credit addressed to one person cannot be transferred to another, so as to bind the writer. In the case of a proper or simple letter of credit, the debt constituted by its being complied with is between the writer and the person addressed; but the letter may be conceived in such terms as to raise a debt also against the person who is supplied by the mandatory. Where the letter is purchased with money, or for some other onerous consideration, by a person wishing for credit on a merchant at a distance or abroad, the holder of the letter incurs no debt by the letter being complied with. Where, again, the letter is not paid for, and merely contains an engagement to see the advances furnished to the holder made good, it becomes a written guarantee, and raises a debt against the person accredited in the first instance, and then against the writer of the letter, as his cautioner. Stair, B. i. tit. 11, § 7; More's Notes, lxxii.; Bank, i. 367; Bell's Com. i. 370; Thomson on Bills, 28; Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

In the case of Orr and Barber v. Union Bank, Jan. 31, 1852, 14 D. 395, a clerk of the pursuers, in whose favour a letter of credit had been granted by the defenders, obtained payment of the amount on a forged order. The Court held that no action lay against the defenders for repayment of the sum paid to them for the letter of credit, on the ground that the letter itself was not produced, it being in the hands of the defenders' correspondent. This judgment was reversed in the House of Lords, on the ground that the defenders were bound to show that the letter of credit had been complied with, or pay back the money they had received, and that the proper evidence that the letter of credit had been complied with was a draft by the party in whose favour it had been granted; August 7, 1854; 1 Macqueen, 513. By the act 16 and 17 Vict. c. 59, 1853, letters of credit are liable in a penny stamp-duty, and the stamp may be either impressed or affixed. By the same act (§ 19) bankers are not liable to pay a second time who have paid on a forged indorsement of a cheque.

Letter of Guarantee; an undertaking, in writing, to answer for the payment of a debt, or the performance of some engagement, in case of the failure of another person liable in the first instance. See Cautionary. Guarantee.

Letter Stealing. This offence was formerly capital; but by 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 81, explained by 6 Will. IV. c. 4, transportation or imprisonment was substituted as the punishment. Persons in Scotland accused of letter stealing are not entitled to insist on liberation on bail. But it is discretionary to the Court of Justiciary, or the sheriff, or sheriff-substitute, to admit such persons to bail. 6 Will. IV. c. 21. See Bail. Post-Office Offences.

Letters, Franking of. See Franking.

Levant and Couchant; in English law, a legal term for cattle that have been so long on the ground of another as to have lain down and risen again to feed. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Levari Facias; in English law, a writ of execution directed to the sheriff for levying a sum of money upon a man's lands and tenements, goods and chattels, who has forfeited his recognisance. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Kames' Equity, 390.

Levity. See Imbecility. Facility.

Lewd, indecent, and libidinous practices and behaviour towards females under the age of puberty, constitute an offence subject to arbitrary punishment. Hume, i. 309; Bell's Notes, 85; Alison, i. 225; Philip, 2 Irvine, 243.

Lex Apparens; according to the definition of Skene, is the law concerning single combat. Skene, h. t.

Lex Loci Contractus. In questions as to obligations contracted in one country, of which implement is sued for in another, the law of the country where the obligation was contracted is called lex loci contractus, and governs everything which relates to the nature of the obligation, ad valorem contractus; while the lex fori, or law of the country to whose courts the application is made for performance, or for damages, regulates whatever relates to the remedy, by suits, to compel performance, or by action for a breach ad decisionem litis. Thomson on Bills, 157. See Foreign, and authorities there cited.

Lex Rhodia. See Rhodia Lex. Contributim.

Lex Talionis; a rule of the judicial law of Moses, directing the punishment to be analogous to the crime;—an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth. Thus, if one swore falsely that another was guilty of a capital crime, the swearer was himself punished capitally. This law does not seem ever to have been established in any civilized state. It was at one time attempted to introduce the lex talionis into England in the case of malicious accusations; it being enacted, by statute 37 Ed. III. c. 18, that such as preferred any suggestions to the King's Great Council should put in sureties of taliation. But, after one year's trial, this punishment of taliation was rejected, and imprisonment adopted in its stead. Deut. xix. 16, et seq.; Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 2; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 75; Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Libel. This term, in the law of Scotland, is used in different significations; it is applied to the form of the complaint, or the ground of the charge on which either a civil or criminal prosecution takes place. It is also applied to scandal reduced into writing.

Criminal Libel.—For an account of the criminal libel, see Indictment. Criminal Letters. Criminal Prosecution. Amendment of the Libel.

Libel in a civil action.—The libel in the Supreme Civil Court is contained in letters passing under the Signet, called a summons, addressed to messengers-at-arms as sheriffs in that part. See Summons. Amendment of the Libel.

Libel.—Scandal reduced into writing, and published or circulated, is, of all others, the most public and permanent, and ought, therefore, to be punished with greater severity than where the scandal is merely spoken: the animus injuriandi is likewise more clearly evinced. This offence may be the foundation of a criminal prosecution, or of a civil action for reparation, or of a combination of both actions. The offence consists either in turning the person into ridicule or in blackening his moral character; and the punishment will be proportioned to the nature of the offence, and the malignity of the disposition which the offender may have discovered. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 81; Bank. i. 250; Bell's Princ. § 2043; Shaw's Digest, 510. See Injuries. Veritas Convicii. Defamation. Damages.

Liberation. Where a debtor is imprisoned under letters of horning and caption for non-payment of a debt, he is considered, not only as indebted to his creditor, but as guilty of civil rebellion. Hence, formerly, the mere payment of the debt was not sufficient to entitle the debtor to his release; it was further incumbent on him to present a bill of suspension and liberation, stating the fact that he had paid the debt, and praying to be liberated from prison. The expense with which this was attended seems to have moved the Court to take the situation of debtors into consideration; and accordingly, by Act of Sederunt, 5th December 1675, they authorized jailors to set debtors in small sums at liberty without the necessity of the form of a suspension and liberation. And, by the present practice, the mere payment of the sum for which the debtor is booked in the jail books entitles him to be immediately liberated—a suspension and charge to set at liberty being in no case necessary where a person incarcerated for non-payment of a civil debt, or for non-performance of a civil obligation, pays the debt or performs the obligation.

Under the statute 1701, c. 6, any person in custody for trial is entitled to call upon the prosecutor to bring him to trial within a reasonable period; and in the event of undue delay on the prosecutor's part, to obtain his liberty. The prisoner may run his letters, that is, he may apply in writing to any of the Lords of Justiciary, or other judges or judicatory competent for judging the crime or offence for which he is imprisoned; and within twenty-four hours, the judge must issue precepts to intimate to the public prosecutor and party concerned, if there be such, to fix a diet for trial,—under certification, that the prisoner shall be set free if a diet for trial be not fixed within sixty days. If the prosecutor fail to fix a diet, the prisoner may apply to any Lord of Justiciary or judge competent, who, on the matter being duly instructed, is bound, within twenty-four hours, to grant warrant for his release. The diet for trial before an inferior court may be any time within thirty days after the expiration of the sixty days; but the whole proceedings must be brought to a close within the thirty days, so that the prisoner may not be detained beyond ninety days in all from the date of his intimation, unless delay has taken place on the prisoner's own account and request. If the prosecutor fixes a diet within the sixty days, the additional thirty days for completing the proceedings begin to run from that date. If the prosecutor does not insist at the diet appointed, or does not bring the whole proceedings to an end within the time allowed, the prisoner may apply for release, which must be granted, just as if the diet had not been fixed within the proper time. When the trial is before the Court of Justiciary, instead of thirty days, the period within which the trial requires to be concluded is forty days. A prisoner once liberated on the ground of a diet not having been fixed, cannot be recommitted on the same charge, except upon new criminal letters from the Court of Justiciary, and on these his trial must be terminated within 100 days from the date of intimation; or, in the Court of Justiciary, within forty days from the time when the criminal letters are executed on the prisoner. If this is not done, he is entitled to a complete and final discharge for the offence. Refusal or delay on the part of judges or officers to give effect to this statute, makes them liable to penalties for wrongous imprisonment, which are recoverable in the Court of Session. Gross and wilful disregard of the law exposes the offender to the pains of less of office and incapacity for public trust. The act does not apply to trials for forgery or fraudulent bankruptcy before the Court of Session; but it does to all such trials before the Justiciary Court. Liberum Tenementum; according to Skene, commonly and properly called frank tenement or liferent; sometimes also used for the property, fee, or heritage. Skene, h. t.

Liberty. Every one is held to have a right to the enjoyment of absolute personal freedom, until he forfeits that right by committing crime or incurring debt; and, in order to prevent the abuse of these legal restraints on freedom, statutes have been passed, both in England and Scotland, for the purpose of providing against illegal imprisonment. In England there is the habeas corpus act; in Scotland, the act of 1701, c. 6, "for preventing wrongous imprisonment." See Habeas Corpus. Wrongous Imprisonment.

Libraries. On the principle, that no effectual entail can be made of property upon which infestment cannot follow, a library, or paintings, or other personal effects, though sometimes included in deeds of entail, are nevertheless liable to be attached by the diligence of the creditors of the heir in possession. More's Notes on Stair, clxxx. See Heirship Moveables.

License. See Attorney's Certificate.

License; a power or authority given to a man to do some lawful act. It is personal to the party on whom it is conferred; and cannot be assigned, unless it bear to be given to a man and his assignees.

License to Sell Spirits. No person is entitled, directly or indirectly, to keep any ale-house, tippling house or victualling house, or to sell ale, beer, spirits, strong waters, or other exciseable liquors, by retail, unless he have received a certificate from the local magistrates; and no one can actually retail exciseable liquors unless he possess an excise license, which cannot be granted without production of the previous certificate. The statutes regulating this matter contain provisions relative to the meetings of justices, the applications for certificates, the renewal and transference in the event of the death or removal of the person licensed, and as to the breach of certificates, appeals against decisions, the penalties to be exacted and the like, for which reference is made to the existing act. See Alehouses, and authorities there cited; also 6 Geo. IV., c. 81; 4 and 5 Will. IV., c. 75; 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 39; 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 72. In like manner, the makers and distillers of spirits require what are called general licenses, without which they are not authorised to make or deal in spirits and other exciseable commodities. The limits of this work, however, necessarily preclude any analysis of the various statutory regulations on this subject, all of which will be found digested in Huie's Excise Laws, voce Licenses.

By the act 16 and 17 Vict., c. 67, 1853, no certificate for the sale of spirits, wine, or other exciseable liquors can be granted, unless on the express condition that no groceries or other provisions to be consumed elsewhere shall be sold on the premises to which the certificate applies. Grocers, however, may obtain certificates for the sale of porter, ale, spirits, &c., and other exciseable liquors, by retail, but not to be consumed on the premises, at the same rate as is exigible for a certificate for a public-house. No certificate can be granted to blacksmiths, tacksmen of tolls, or toll-gatherers, or to any person occupying a house not hitherto licensed, situated at or near any toll-bar. One of the conditions annexed to the certificate is, that liquors shall not be sold before eight o'clock in the morning, and after eleven o'clock at night; nor on Sunday, except in the case of inns and hotels, and then only for the accommodation of lodgers and bona fide travellers. The police are empowered to enter any public-house, or any house where refreshments are sold to be consumed on the premises. A Commission has been appointed to inquire into the operation of this act, and evidence is now (1859) being taken in regard to it.

License to Kill Game. See Game Laws.

License to Preach. After the applicant for a license to preach has been subjected to his trials, the presbytery pronounce their judgment. If dissatisfied, they remand the student to his studies, or appoint new trials for him to undergo, or refuse altogether to license him. If their judgment is favourable, certain questions are put, and when the student has given satisfactory answers, he subscribes the formula in which the substance of the questions is embodied. The act against simony is then read to him in presence of the presbytery; the moderator is appointed to license him to preach the gospel; and the clerk is ordered to furnish him with an extract of his license. A license to preach, obtained without the bounds of the Church of Scotland, disqualifies a presentee to a parish. Hill's Church Prac. 44, 47, 64; Gillan's Acts of Assembly, vocibus Probationer's Ordination. License to Pursue; is an authority given by the commissaries to an executor, which entitles him to pursue the debtors of the deceased, but not to take decree. Ersk. B. iii.

Licking of Thumbs; a symbolical mode of indicating that a bargain has been concluded. It is occasionally practised in bargains of minor importance amongst the lower classes. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 5.

Lieges. The Queen's subjects.

Liege Poustie; is that state of health which gives a person full power to dispose mortis causa, or otherwise, of his heritable property. The term, according to our institutional writers, is derived from the words legitima potestas, signifying the lawful power of disposing of property at pleasure. It is used in contradistinction to deathbed—a liege poustie conveyance being a conveyance not challengeable on the head of deathbed; see Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 95. The tests of liege poustie, opposed to the presumption of deathbed, are, survivance during sixty days, and going to kirk or market unsupported. Stair, B. iv. tit. 20, § 40; More's Notes, p. cccxiii.; Bell's Com. i. 85, 5th edit.; Bank. vol. ii. p. 303; Bell's Princ. 3d edit. § 1788; Shaw's Digest, p. 160. See Deathbed. Morbus soniticus.

Lien; in English law, an obligation, tie, or claim annexed to, or attaching upon, any property, without satisfying which, such property cannot be demanded by its owner. Before the introduction of the term lien into Scotch legal phraseology, the right to retain the property of a debtor was recognised under the name of the right of retention; but of late, it has become general to employ the terms lien and retention indifferently to signify the same right. Mr More, indeed, draws a distinction between the two, holding that the right of retention was originally much wider in its operation than lien, being borrowed from the Roman law, and having been recognised and acted upon, before compensation was allowed to be pleaded by way of exception or defence. The right of retention he holds to have been a necessary counterpart of the diligence of arrestment in security. It would be a strange anomaly, he observes, if a third party could, by arrestment, compel the holder of any fund or article belonging to their common debtor, to retain it in security of his debt, while the holder himself could not retain it in security of a similar debt due to himself. In England, no right of retention at common law is recognised; and the lien of the English law is rather of the nature of an equitable encroachment upon the common law, proceeding upon the principle of implied agreement; More's Notes on Stair, cxxi. Whatever may have been the extent to which retention was originally permitted in the law of Scotland, it would rather appear that such a general right as that here spoken of, comprehending all cases where there is legitimate possession and a debt due to the possessor, is now no longer recognised; Bell's Princ. § 1431. The practical results of the English lien and the Scotch retention being now nearly assimilated, they will both be considered in this Dictionary under the general head Retention.

Lieutenant; an officer who supplies the place and discharges the office of a superior in his absence. The Lords-Lieutenant of counties are officers appointed by the Crown, who, upon any invasion or rebellion, have power to raise the militia, and to give commissions to colonels and other officers of that force, and to arm and form them into regiments, troops, and companies. Under the lords-lieutenant are deputy lieutenants, who are appointed by the lord-lieutenant, and presented to the Sovereign for approbation. A deputy lieutenant must be seised or possessed of an estate in property, either in his own right or in right of his wife, of four hundred pounds Scots of valued rent in Scotland, or be heir-apparent of some person seised or possessed of a like estate. And those who, being unqualified, or who, without delivering in their qualifications, act as deputy lieutenants, are liable to a penalty of L.100. The duty of the courts of lieutenancy is to superintend the balloting for the militia, and to make regulations concerning the volunteer forces. Regulations have been enacted by various statutes for the granting commissions in the militia by the lord-lieutenant, and carrying on the other business connected with the militia. The militia acts passed previously to 42 Geo. III. c. 91, were consolidated and superseded by that statute, which, although followed by other enactments, continues the groundwork of our militia law. When the services of the militia are not required, an annual act is passed suspending the operation of the militia statutes. But when these acts are in operation, a general meeting of the lieutenancy of every county, stewartry, city, and place is directed to be held at least once a year. These general meetings consist of the lieutenant, together with two deputy lieutenants at the least; or on the death or removal, or in the absence of the lieutenant, then of three deputy lieutenants at the least. At this annual meeting the lieutenant and two deputy lieutenants, or the three deputy lieutenants, may summon other general meetings on any days they may fix upon. Sub-division meetings consist of two deputy lieutenants at the least, or one deputy and a justice of peace. In questions arising out of the proceedings of courts of lieutenancy under the militia statutes, the Court of Session, before holding it competent to interfere, have required very strong prima facie evidence of excess of powers. In one case, a bill of advocacy or suspension was held to be incompetent, although there was reason for thinking that the commissioners had exceeded their statutory powers; and in another case, it was held to be settled that the excess of power must be flagrant before the Court of Session can be warranted to interfere, and stop or impede ministerial acts, conducted under colour at least of parliamentary authority, on which the general safety may depend. Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 7, note by Mr Ivory; Hutch. Justice of Peace, 59, et seq.; Kames' Stat. Law abridg. voce Lord-Lieutenant. See Militia.

Life. Life is presumed in law to extend to the age of 100 years, unless death be proved. What circumstances and presumptions shall be proof of death is a question of evidence. Several cases on this point are cited in Tait on Evidence, 478. See also *Stair, B. iv. tit. 45, § 17, 19thly; Ersk. Life Estates; in English law, estates of freehold, not of inheritance, analogous to the Scotch liferents. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Liferent. A liferent right entitles the liferenter to use and enjoy the subject of the liferent during life, without destroying or wasting its substance, or salva rei substantia, according to the expression of the Roman law. The proprietor of the subject is called the fiar; the subject, which is either a sum of money or an heritable subject, is called the fee; and the person in possession the liferenter. The legal liferents of the Scotch law are the terce and the courtesy. See Kenning to the Terce. Courtesy.

Conventional liferents of heritage are divided into simple liferents, and liferents by reservation. The former are constituted by a grant containing a precept of sasine, in virtue of which sasine must be taken, and recorded, in order to render the right effectual against the creditors and singular successors of the grantor. This right is regulated by the terms of the grant; and although the profits of it may be conveyed to another by assignation, the continuance of the right depends entirely on the life of the original grantee. A liferenter by reservation is more like a limited fiar than a mere liferenter. Such a liferenter must have originally possessed the whole property under his own sasine; and therefore, when he conveys the fee, reserving his own liferent, that reserved right rests on his original sasine, and requires no new infeftment for its constitution. Hence a liferenter by reservation, who has previously been infeft in the lands, is permitted to enter vassals, which a liferenter by constitution, or a liferenter by reservation, whose right was merely personal, cannot do; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 42.

Liferenters are entitled to the fruits and annual produce of the subject liferented; and they may possess by themselves, their servants or tenants; but the trees planted for ornament cannot be cut down by the fiar during the currency of the liferent. The liferenter must leave the subject in as good condition as that in which it was at the commencement of the liferent; hence a liferenter has no right to cut timber unless it grows again after being cut, or has been divided into hags and laid out in annual cuttings. But a conjunct fiar, or a liferenter by reservation, is entitled to cut timber come to maturity, though not laid out in hags, which, according to the practice of the country, is accustomed to be cut at maturity. Such liferenters are also entitled to cut wood of mature growth, for the purpose of maintaining the houses, &c., in tenantable condition. The liferenter is entitled to windfalls and underwood. A liferenter has no right to the mines or minerals; and where a right to coal is given, he cannot increase the average quantity which has been usually brought up. The obligation not to waste the subject exposes a liferenter to an action, at the instance of those interested in the estate, to find caution that he shall preserve the subject in the same condition in which it stood at the time of his entry; 1491, c. 25; and should he refuse to find caution, he may, under the act 1535, c. 15, be excluded from possession until he complies; Ersk. ibid. § 59. The liferenter of a house is bound to make the usual and necessary repairs; but if the house, from natural decay, becomes untenable in the course of the liferent, the liferenter is not bound to repair it, neither is the fiar. But should the liferenter be at this expense, he should do it under warrant of the judge ordinary; and, in that case, the expense incurred may form a burden on the fiar on the expiration of the liferent. Or, should the repair be made by the fiar, he will be entitled to claim from the liferenter the interest of the money expended in repairing the subject. See Houses. As to the liferent of furniture, see Furniture. Liferenters are liable in the burdens affecting the subject liferented, as feu-duties, minister's stipends and taxations; but not to occasional burdens, such as the building or repairing of churches or manses. The liferenter of a landed estate is also said by institutional writers to be burdened with the support of the heir, when he has no other fund of subsistence, though this does not take place in liferents of sums of money. And even in the case of a landed estate, such a claim would not now be listened to with much favour, and would not in any view be extended so as to deprive a liferentrix under a marriage-contract of any part of what is requisite for her own support. Nor does this claim affect the creditors of a liferenter. See Aliment. A liferent right is extinguished by the death of the liferenter; and the interest of his executors in competition with the fiar depends on the precise time of his death, and the state of the liferented subject. Where it is let to tenants, the liferenter's executors, if he survive the term of Whitsunday, have right to one-half of that year's rent; if he survive the term of Martinmas, his executors have right to the whole year's rent; and that although the conventional terms of payment of the rent may fall much later. Where a liferenter dies on the term-day of Martinmas or Whitsunday, the rent of that term is transmitted to his executors. For this purpose it was at one time held that he must have outlived the noon of the term-day; but it is now settled that the executors are entitled to the preceding term's rent, if the liferenter lives until the morning of the term-day. The executors are also entitled, under the Apportionment Act, to the proportion of the rent accruing between terms, for the period during which the liferenter survived. Where the subject of the liferent is in the natural possession of the liferenter, the executors have right to the crop of such parts of the lands as have been sown by the liferenter, but to no more. In a liferent of money due on a personal bond, the executor has a right to interest down to the day of the liferenter's death. Mills, though their profits are drawn de die in diem, are yet, from their connection with land, regulated by the same rules which apply to lands; and so also is a liferent annual payment in grain. But the liferents of fishings, collieries, salt-works, and other subjects, the profits of which arise from continual daily labour, are computed de die in diem until the liferenter's death, and do not depend on any particular terms. The same rules which regulate the termination of a liferent right regulate also its commencement, where that depends on the death of a person in possession. A liferenter of a superiority has right to the feu-duties, but not to the casualties, unless he be a liferenter by reservation. The liferenter gets the dividends or interest of bank stock, and the interest on a bonus, but not the bonus itself. Liferenters are not entitled, in the absence of express stipulation, to grant feus or leases effectual beyond the liferent. A liferenter is entitled to exercise the right of patronage. As to the right of voting for a member of Parliament, see Fiar; 2 and 3 Will. IV., c. 65, §§ 7, 8; 5 and 6 Will IV., c. 78, § 10. Liferent is extinguished not only by the death of the liferenter, but also by renunciation without recording. *Ersk. Ligantia; according to Skene, is a league, bond, or obligation: Homagium ligium, is homage without any exception; homagium non ligium, is homage made to an overlord, with reservation of the fidelity due to the King or an elder overlord. Skene, h. t.

Light. The servitudes of light and of prospect are servitudes whereby the servient proprietor is restrained from building or planting on his own grounds, or from otherwise exercising his right of property, so as to intercept the light or prospect of the dominant tenement. There is no such implied restraint on the use of property. On the contrary, every proprietor is entitled to make any use he pleases of his property, however detrimental to his neighbour's lights or prospect, provided such use is not wanton and emulous, or objectionable under the law of nuisance. This servitude from its nature seems to require writing towards its constitution; the exercise of a conterminous proprietor's right to intercept, being what is called res meræ facultatis, i.e. a right which he may exercise or not at pleasure, and which he will not lose non utendo for any period, however long. But a restraint on the free exercise of this right may be imposed by an express permission, or tolerance, of a certain number of windows looking into the adjoining property. It would also appear that a servitude of light does not imply a servitude of prospect also, an ell's distance having in one case been held sufficient for light, where there was no servitude of prospect. In connection with this subject it may be observed, that although a conterminous proprietor may strike out windows, so as to overlook his neighbour's grounds or garden, yet a restraint on this use of property, of the nature of a servitude, may also be created; or the party so looked in upon (if his neighbour have no servitude non officiendi liminibus), may raise a screen or wall for the express purpose of obstructing the view from such windows, and securing his privacy. Glassford, 12th May 1808, M. App. Property, No. 7; Forbes, 1st July 1724, M. 14505; Ogilvy, 5th Feb. 1678, M. 14534; *Ersk. Limitation; in English law, a certain time, assigned by statute, within which an action must be brought. This matter is regulated by certain acts of Parliament, called statutes of limitation. An impression has long been prevalent, that the limitation of the English corresponds exactly to the prescription of the Scotch law. But this seems to be a mistake, arising from the term prescription being applied to two distinct modes in which obligations are extinguished by lapse of time. In some cases where a certain period has elapsed from the time when the obligation was contracted, the jus crediti is presumed to be abandoned, or the obligation is presumed to be satisfied, and so extinguished. In other cases, after the lapse of a certain time, action is denied on an instrument or document of debt, without regard to the actual subsistence of the debt. It is this latter mode which has been considered analogous to the English limitation; and, accordingly, recent authors have applied to it the term limitation, and confined the term prescription to the former mode, i.e. to the absolute extinction of the debt. In this sense bonds of caution are said to be limited to seven years, bills and notes to six, and holograph writings to twenty; that is to say, they are, on the lapse of these respective periods, of themselves incompetent grounds of action or of summary diligence; although the debt which they contain may be established by other proof. But when a debt is extinguished by the lapse of forty years, the obligation is said to be prescribed, not limited. The distinction is important; and recourse is frequently had to it in argument; but the custom has been so long established of classing all these modes of dissolving obligations under one name, that it would not be advisable, in a practical work like the present, to separate them. They are therefore all treated of in the article Prescription.

Linen Manufacture. The linen manufacture was the object of several statutes before the Union. See 1693, c. 29. After the Union, a new system of regulations was adopted. The statute 13 Geo. I., c. 26, authorised the establishment of a board of trustees; and afterwards a board was instituted accordingly, which has been since considered as in some measure vested with the functions of the Scotch Privy Council. For the particular regulation of the linen manufacture, see 13 Geo. I., c. 26; 18 Geo. II., c. 24 and 25; 24 Geo. II., c. 36; 22 Geo. III., c. 36.

Lining, Brieve of. This was one of the brieves not retourable. It was directed to the provost and bailies for settling the boundaries of disputed property within burgh,—“lineari faciatis tenementum terræ de B.”—“et sic ut dictum tenementum per dictos limitores liniatum fuerit, ita illud de cæteris firmiter faciatis observari.” The formal issuing of such brieves is now almost entirely in desuetude, the dean of guild and his council being judges in all such matters. Stair, B. iv. tit. 3, § 13; Bell's Princ. § 2241; Jurid. Styles, i. 419. See Dean of Guild. Dean of Guild Court.

Lint. Lint is prohibited to be steeped in lochs and burns under a penalty of 40s. toties quoties, and confiscation of the lint to the poor of the parish; because it infects the water, kills the fish, is prejudicial to the cattle, and noisome to the neighbourhood; 1606, c. 13; 1685, c. 20. By a later statute, lint or hemp may not be steeped in any bog-hole, peat or moss or tan-pit, nor watered for two years successively in a pool or hole of standing water, unless the pool be near a running stream where fresh water may be often let in, under pain of forfeiting the hemp or lint for the use of the informer. 13 *Geo. Liquid. A liquid debt is a debt the amount of which is ascertained and constituted against the debtor, either by a written obligation or by the decree of a court. Stair, B. i. tit. 18, § 6; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 16; Bell's Com. i. 734; Bank. i. 492. See Compensation.

Lis Pendens; an action depending in court. It is a defence in an action that the same claim is the subject of a lis alibi pendens. It has been decided, in several cases, that the defence of lis pendens between the parties, in a foreign court of competent jurisdiction, is no bar to a similar action being tried in Scotland. A recent writer draws a distinction between the case where the defender has deserted the foreign law-suit, and has retired to Scotland, and that where he has found caution in the foreign country, and is going on with the suit there; and observes, that in the latter case, lis alibi pendens is a good defence, though not in the former. The English courts observe the same rule of rejecting the defence of lis pendens in Scotch courts. An action is depending whenever the summons is executed, and no other action can be raised till it is discharged; but the lis pendens must be regular, and the very same matter must be depending before another court.

It is no bar to an action of reduction and declarator against the creditors of a person deceased, to have it found that the pursuers do not represent their parents, that an action against them, on the ground of representation, is in dependence before the sheriff. A party cannot resort to an action of damages in the Supreme Court, after having instituted a similar action on the same species facti in another court. Where an action is depending in an inferior court, and one on similar grounds is brought in the Court of Session, the plea of lis alibi cannot be competently obviated by advocating the former ob contingentiam. It has been held competent for a sheriff, in vacation, to grant warrant, on application, to sell grain, and consign the price in Court, where delay might affect the value, although the grain was the subject of an action depending before the Court of Session, the pleas of parties on the merits being reserved, Bannatyne, iii. Literary Property; or copyright; is the property which an author or his assignee has in any literary work. The question has been much agitated whether, at common law, and independently of statute, the copyright vests in the author, so as to entitle him to claim reparation and damages from those who infringe his right. But it has been finally settled, both in Scotland and England, that the copyright of published works is protected by statute alone. The rule is different with respect to unpublished works, which are property at common law. The first statute on this subject was 8 Anne, c. 19, by which it was provided, that the author of any book should in future have the sole liberty of printing it for fourteen years; and if alive at the end of that term, for another period of fourteen years; and if any person should, within that time, print, reprint, or import such book, without the consent of the proprietor in writing, or should knowingly publish it without such consent, he should forfeit the books and sheets to the proprietor, and one penny for every sheet found in his custody, one-half to the Crown, and one-half to the prosecutor. But to entitle the author to the benefit of the statute, the whole book, and every volume thereof, must, under the act 15 Geo. III., c. 53, § 64, have been entered in Stationers' Hall, and sixpence paid for such entry; and nine copies of the book must have been delivered to the company's warehouse-keeper, before publication, for the use of the royal library, the libraries of Oxford and Cambridge, Sion College in London, the four Universities in Scotland, and the Advocate's Library; and also (by 41 Geo. III., c. 107, § 6) to Trinity College and King's Inns, Dublin. The regulations as to the delivery of copies to the public libraries fixed by 54 Geo. III., c. 156, were, that eleven copies of all works whatever, printed or published, should be delivered to the several universities, &c., if demanded, within twelve months after publication, but not copies of subsequent or second editions, without alteration, and that amendments of early editions might be printed separately and delivered. By the same statute, all books were required to be entered (within one month, if published in London, and three months, if published elsewhere), at Stationers' Hall, and one copy on the best paper to be then delivered for the British Museum, and 2s. to be paid for each entry, under a penalty of L5, and eleven times the price of the book; the warehouse-keeper at Stationers' Hall being bound to transmit lists of all publications to the librarians of the libraries entitled to copies, of the publishers, who may themselves, however, if they pleased, have delivered the copies at these several libraries. By 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 110, the former acts requiring copies to be delivered for the libraries of Sion College, of the Scotch Universities, and the King's Inn Library at Dublin, are repealed. Such an annual sum as may be equal in value to, and a compensation for, the loss sustained, is directed to be paid to the said libraries out of the consolidated fund; to be ascertained and determined according to the value of the books actually received by each library, in such manner as the Commissioners of the Treasury shall direct, upon an average of the three years ending 30th June 1836. The compensation must be applied in the purchase of books of literature, science, and the arts, for the use of the library; and no issue of money can be made until sufficient proof have been adduced of the application of the money last issued.

By the statute 54 Geo. III., c. 156, instead of two terms of fourteen years each, the author's right was extended to twenty-eight years absolute, and to the end of the author's life—the privilege being extended to authors of books published before the date of the statute (1814). The statute 8 Anne, c. 19, was, by 41 Geo. III., c. 107, extended to all parts of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British dominions in Europe; which last statute also increased the penalty to threepence per sheet; and, in addition, conferred on the author a claim of damages against transgressors. The four Scotch Universities, the two English Universities, and the Colleges of Eton, Westminster, and Winchester, as also the Trinity College of Dublin, are enabled to hold in perpetuity (under the penalties of the statute 8 Anne) their copyright in books given or bequeathed to them for the advancement of useful learning, and other purposes of education; 15 Geo. III., c. 52; 41 Geo. III., c. 107.

The act 5 and 6 Vict., c. 45, 1842, repeals the acts 8 Anne, c. 19, 41 Geo. III., c. 107, and 54 Geo. III., c. 156, and now regulates the law of copyright. By this act, the copyright of every book endures for the natural lifetime of the author, and for seven years after his death. If, however, the term of seven years shall expire before the end of forty-two years from the first publication of the book, the copyright endures for the term of forty-two years from its first publication. When a book is published after the author's death, the copyright endures for forty-two years. When the proprietor of a copyright of a book refuses to republish it after the author's death, the Privy Council, on complaint to them, may grant a license for its republication. Copies of every book must be delivered to the British Museum, and also, on demand in writing, to the following libraries:—The Bodleian Library at Oxford, the Public Library at Cambridge, the Library of the Faculty of Advocates at Edinburgh, and the Trinity College Library at Dublin. The British Museum is entitled to the best copy published of the book, and the other institutions to one of the ordinary copies only. Importation for sale or hire of any book published in the United Kingdom, and reprinted abroad, is prohibited, except by the proprietor of the copyright, or some one authorised by him. Copyright is declared to be personal property; and a book is interpreted to mean "every volume, part or division of a volume, pamphlet, sheet of letterpress, sheet of music, map, chart, or plan, separately published."

The property of prints and engravings, and of new models and casts of busts, &c., are secured to the inventors by similar statutory provisions; see 8 Geo. II., c. 13; 7 Geo. III., c. 38; 17 Geo. III., c. 57; 38 Geo. III., c. 71; 7 Will. IV., c. 59, and 15 and 16 Vict., c. 12, 1852. By special statute, the author of any tragedy or any dramatic piece not printed, or of any such printed after or within ten years before the 10th June 1833, has the sole right of representing it, or causing it to be represented at any place of dramatic entertainment for twenty-eight years. Those who infringe this right forfeit forty shillings, or the greatest benefit gained, or the greatest loss sustained, whichever shall be the greatest benefit to the author. The right of action is limited to twelve calendar months after the offence; 3

Will. IV., c. 15. The copyright statutes protect a work consisting of a single sheet, printed separately; or a part of a book, as a tale or a song in a book; and notes on a book; Bell's Princ. § 1359; Illust. ib. The title of a book or other publication is also protected.

The copyright of designs is now regulated by the act 21 and 22 Vict., c. 90, 1858; and international copyright by the acts 7 and 8 Vict., c. 12, 1844, and 15 and 16 Vict., c. 12, 1852. See Designs.

As already mentioned, unpublished documents are property at common law; and the publication of them is an invasion of the owner's right; and even when a manuscript has been given away or sold, the donee or buyer is not entitled to publish it, although he may make any other use of it. Nor is one entitled to take down the words of an unpublished play and afterwards publish it. Doubts having been entertained as to the right of a lecturer to prevent the publication of his lectures, this case has been provided for by statute. The author of lectures, or the person to whom a copy of lectures has been sold or conveyed for the purpose of delivering them in any school, institution, or other place, has the sole right of printing and publishing such lectures. The penalty on others publishing such lectures without leave, is the forfeiture of the copies, and one penny for each sheet. Newspaper printers publishing lectures without leave, are liable to the penalties. No person attending lectures for a fee or reward, is held to have leave to print, copy, or publish them, because of such leave to attend. The right to prevent publication ceases after expiration of the period allowed by the statutes of copyright. The protection does not extend to lectures, of the delivery of which notice has not been given in writing to two justices, living within five miles of the place of lecture, two days at least before their being delivered; nor to lectures in any university, public school, or college, or on any public foundation, or by any individual, in virtue, or according to any gift, endowment or foundation. The law relating to such lectures remains the same as if the act had not been passed; 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 65. Private letters cannot be published without leave of the writer. This rule is established on different principles in the law of England and Scotland. In England, it is held that the writer of the letters never lost the property of the letters, or, at all events, that he retains a joint property in them, which would be infringed by their being published without his permission. In Scotland, again, the writer or his representatives have a right to interfere, chiefly on the ground that his reputation may be injured by the publication of confidential letters. The English doctrine, that the right of property is the only ground on which one is entitled to interfere, produces an extraordinary result in the case of unpublished works containing libellous or dangerous matter. Such works cannot be legally published, and they are therefore held not to be property; so that when they fall into the hands of a person who prints and publishes them, the author cannot obtain an injunction. Literary property may be assigned either before or after publication, provided it be done in writing. In all actions in which another than the author is prosecutor, a written title is necessary under the statute. *Ersk. Litigiosity; is a tacit legal prohibition of alienation, to the disappointment of a begun or inchoate action or diligence, the object of which is, to attain the possession, or to acquire the property of a particular subject, or to attach it in security of debt. Without this, or some similar legal provision, whenever a creditor proceeded to do diligence for attaching or securing the property of his debtor in payment of his debt, the debtor might instantly, and before the completion of the diligence, dispose of his property and defeat the object of the creditor. Thus, the object of the diligence of inhibition is, to prevent a proprietor from alienating or burdening his heritable property to the prejudice of the inhibiting creditor; and there, litigiosity commences from the time that the diligence is executed. But, for that purpose, it is necessary not only that the diligence should be executed against the debtors, but published against the lieges. The adjudication, again, which attaches the heritable estate of the debtor in security of the debt, is founded on a summons; and from the date of the execution of the summons, the subject becomes litigious. Litigiosity operates even against onerous purchasers, and so presents a striking defect in the records. But, 1. Litigiosity does not affect the terce; 2. It does not operate against deeds executed in virtue of previous obligations, but only against voluntary deeds; and, lastly, Where there is undue delay or mora in proceeding with the action, or in completing the diligence, the litigiosity ceases to operate as a protection. *Ersk. Litiscontestation; was a term applied, in the Roman law, to the case where both the parties to a suit had stated their pleas judicially. It was held as a species of contract between them, that they should abide by the decision of the judge on the facts as proved. By the earlier practice of the Court of Session, after the parties had stated their respective pleas, the Court, after settling the relevancy, granted a warrant for proving the conflicting allegations, which was termed an act of litiscontestation. Before litiscontestation, and while no peremptory defence has been pleaded, the defender may withdraw, and allow decree to go out against him, which will be held to be a decree in absence; but, after litiscontestation, the defender cannot pass from his appearance, and the decree is held to be a decree in foro contentioso. In virtue of the judicial contract implied in litiscontestation, the action, even though penal, is, after litiscontestation, transmissible to heirs; for the parties, by an act of litiscontestation, are held bound, as if by a contract (quasi ex contractu), to acquiesce in the decision founded on the proof that may be brought of the points stated in the act of litiscontestation. Ersk. B. iv. tit. i. §§ 69, 70; Stair, B. iv. tit. 39; Bank. ii. 625; iii. 92; Brown's Synop. 1551; Shand's Prac. ii. 542. See Divorce. Abandoning an Action.

Livery; in English law, for delivery of sasine, is a delivery of lands, tenements, and hereditaments, unto him who has a right to the same, being a ceremony in the common law, used in the conveyance of lands, &c., where an estate of fee-simple, fee-tail, or other freehold passes; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. The corresponding term in Scotch law is infeftment, or sasine. See Executry. Infeftment. Sasine. Precept.

Loading. Under the contract of affreightment, the shipmaster and owners are bound to see that due preparation is made, and care taken of the goods in loading and unloading. Tackling must be supplied sufficient to guard against injury. The ship must be capable of receiving the sort of cargo for which she is engaged, and must not be overloaded, but room left for her own furniture, and the provisions of the crew, and the proper working of the vessel. A failure in any of these respects grounds a claim against the estate of the owners and master. Thus, if a cask be accidentally staved in letting it down into the hold of the ship, a claim lies for the loss; or if a ship is freighted to go to America for timber, and, owing to the small size of her port-holes, she cannot take in the large timber of that country, a claim of damage will arise to the merchant, on the warranty that there shall be no obstruction to the loading. In receiving goods on the quay, or in sending his own boats for them, the master is responsible for them from the moment of delivery. In the timber trade, if it is the custom to float down the timber in rafts by the merchant's servants, the responsibility of the shipowners and master begins only with delivery into the ship. But if the master send his crew to float down the timber, he incurs the risk from the moment the timber is delivered to them. Bell's Com. i. 547; Brodie's Supp. to Stair, 985; Bell's Princ. § 408; Illust. ib. See Ship. Affreightment. Charter-party. Warranty. Storage.

Loan. In its general acceptance, this word signifies the agreement by which the use of anything is given, under condition of its being returned to the owner. But as some articles, as provisions, must be destroyed in their use, or given away, as money, a distinction was made in the Roman law between mutuum and commodate; the former term being applied to the loan of fungibles, or such articles as perish in the use; the latter to the loan of those subjects which must be individually returned to the owner, and which subjects must therefore be of a nature capable of being used without destruction or alienation. In mutuum, the property of the subject is transferred; and if the subject be destroyed, the borrower to whom the property is transferred suffers the loss; but in commodate, as the property remains with the lender, and the use merely is given to the borrower, any loss befalling the subject must be borne by the lender. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 18; Bell's Com. i. 255; Bank. vol. i. p. 354; Bell's Princ. § 194, et seq.; Illust. § 199; Ross's Lect. i. 67. See Borrowing. Commodate. Mutuum.

Lobsters. In Scotland, the taking of lobsters is forbidden from 1st June to 1st September, under a penalty of L.5 for each offence. Two justices may try such a cause summarily, and the penalty goes to the prosecutor; 9 Geo. II., c. 33, § 4.

Locality. The decree of the Teind Court, modifying a stipend to a minister from the teinds of the parish, is called a decree of modification; and the adjustment or apportionment of the aggregate stipend amongst the several heritors liable to pay it, is called a locality. This allocation of the stipend is made according to certain rules; and the decree of the Court, approving of the allocation, is called a decree of locality; and, after such a decree has been pronounced, no heritor is liable in more than the proportion fixed by the decree. After the stipend is modified, and before a decree of locality has been pronounced, the minister may select any heritor he pleases, who will be liable in the first instance for the whole stipend, or at least as far as such heritor's teinds extend, although that should exceed his due proportion—the heritor so selected having, however, a claim of relief pro rata against the other heritors liable in the stipend; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 47. According to the present form of process, after an augmentation has been granted by the Teind Court (as explained voce Augmentation), the cause is remitted to the Second Junior Lord Ordinary, and the judicial process of locality then commences. The cause is enrolled before the Second Junior Lord Ordinary; the minister selecting the Division of the Court to which he chooses that the process shall belong. In this process, one of the first steps is to have a common agent appointed in the manner described voce Common Agent; and, at the same time, the heritors are ordained to produce their rights to the teinds within a time limited by the Lord Ordinary, under certification that, failing their doing so, a remit will be made to the teind-clerk to prepare a scheme of locality, either according to the proven rental or according to the rights and interests produced. This scheme, when prepared, is approved of by the Lord Ordinary as an interim scheme, according to which the stipend is paid, until a final scheme of locality is settled; and, in the meantime, the minister is furnished by the common agent, at the expense of the heritors, with an extracted decree, approving of the interim scheme. The duty of the common agent is to obtain a full production of the heritors' rights to the teinds, and their decrees of valuation, if there be any; and thereafter to prepare a State of the teinds, classifying and arranging the various rights of the heritors. The order in which the teinds of the parish are allocated upon is explained voce Teinds; and, in practice, the final scheme of locality, with which the process is closed, as well as the interim scheme, is framed by the teind-clerk; the parties interested being allowed judicially to see and object to the scheme, and to their respective rights and valuations. This is, in general, a long protracted process; and during its dependence, the interests of the minister are regulated by the interim decree of locality. The judgment of the Lord Ordinary on the questions raised in the course of the process of locality, whether between the minister and heritors, or among the heritors inter se, is final in the Outer-House, but subject to the review of the Division to which the cause belongs, by reclaiming note, lodged within twenty-one days after the date of the judgment. The decree of locality is enforced by diligence, passing under the signet. The Teind Court has no signet; but the extracted decree of that Court is the warrant for passing a bill at the Bill-Chamber for a horning on ten days' charge; which horning is signed by a writer to the signet, and must pass the signet of the Court of Session. This horning is a sufficient warrant for charging the several heritors, or their successors, or other occupiers of the lands, and intromitters with the rents and teinds. And if the incumbent die, or is translated, his successor, on production of the former horning, or of the extracted decree, with a certificate of his ordination and induction, will, on passing a bill at the Bill-Chamber, obtain a new horning. Teinds are debita fructuum only; and the arrears are payable by the actual intromitter, or his heirs, but not by a singular successor. Hence, teinds not being debita fundi, the decree is not a warrant for poinding the ground; but the minister may charge the tenants for payment of the sum localled on the lands possessed by them; and such tenant will be liable to the extent of his rents, crop, and teind, so far as the rent is in his hands. Observe, however, that the claim for stipend prescribes in five years. The decree of modification and locality is a sufficient warrant to poind and arrest the moveables or rents of the intromitter for the time; and if the party charged be mentioned nominatim in the horning, and if the precise sum charged for be there specified, he may be denounced rebel in common form. But this is not usual; the arrestment or poinding being, in the ordinary case, sufficient to attain the minister's object; especially as charges on such decrees cannot be suspended, except on consignment. Locality of a Widow. The lands life-rented by a widow under a contract of marriage are called her locality lands. Where lands are given in this way, the widow has the profits of the lands, whatever they may be; and should any loss arise from the bankruptcy of tenants or otherwise, she must bear the loss, without recourse on any other part of the husband's estate. Where power is given by deed of entail to provide wives, by way of locality, to a certain limited amount of yearly rent, it has been held that the rent payable at the date of the wife's infetment is the rule, and not that which may be payable from the lands given in locality at the period when the wife succeeds. And where a deed of entail allowed the heir in possession to provide his widow with a suitable liferent, "by way of locality, not exceeding the half of the present rent for the time," it was decided, that a locality which, at its date, did not exceed the half of the rent then payable, could not afterwards be restricted, though it came greatly to exceed the half of the free rents, and was alleged to be more than a suitable provision. Leases of lands, over which a locality has been constituted in favour of a wife, granted stante matrimonio by her husband in the fair exercise of his right of administration, are effectual, notwithstanding his decease. But it is usual in marriage-contracts to insert a power to grant leases of such lands. More's Notes on Stair, clxxviii.; Bell's Com. i. 55, 636; Bell's Princ. § 1947; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 95-7; Jurid. Styles, i. 184. See Jointure. Contract of Marriage.

Location. The contract of location is that by which the use of any moveable subject is agreed to be given for hire; or by which a person gives his work or services on the same condition. He who lets his work, or the use of his property, is called the lessor or locator, and the hirer is called the conductor or lessee. The lessee is entitled to the mere use of the subject let, which subject must be restored to the owner at the stipulated time. The lessor is bound to procure for, and to continue the use and enjoyment of the subject to, the lessee; but if by some fatality, not imputable to himself, he shall not be able to put the lessee into possession, he cannot be sued ex locato for damages; and, on the other hand, he has no claim for hire. But if the lessee should be excluded by any fault or act of the lessor, the implied warrandice of the contract would render him liable in damages. The lessee is bound to put the subject to no other use than that for which it is let—to preserve it in good condition during the lease—and to restore it to the lessor, and to pay the rent or hire agreed upon. The risk of the property let to hire remains with the owner, who is at all times liable for the loss or injury it may sustain; unless where he can prove that the loss has occurred through the negligence, fraud, or fault of the lessee. Where a workman, who lets his labour for hire, from carelessness or want of skill, neglects or destroys the work, he is liable to his employer in damages; but if through no fault of his the work has not been performed, he is entitled to the full stipulated wages. A servant, who is hired to a precise day or time, is entitled to his full wages, though he should, by sickness, be disabled for service for part of that time. But if the inability should continue long, and a substitute should be required, the master will be discharged from his obligation to pay wages; and if the servant die before the term be elapsed, his wages are due only for the time he served. If the master should die, or if he turn off a servant without a reasonable cause, the servant has a right to full wages, and also to his maintenance for the term agreed on. But should the servant desert his service, he forfeits his wages and maintenance, and is farther liable in damages. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, §§ 14, 15, 16; Stair, B. i. tit. 15; More's Notes, p. xcv; Bell's Com. i. 255, et seq., 451, et seq.; Bank. vol. i. p. 429; Bell's Princ. § 133, et seq.; Illust. § 137; Brown on Sale, pp. 574-6; *Hutch. Lochmaben. The small property called the four towns of Lochmaben is held by a tenure peculiar to itself. The proprietors are enrolled as kindly tenants in the rental-book of the proprietor of the barony; and this constitutes a title of property which has been judicially recognised. And although those tenants have neither charter nor sasmine, yet it has been held that they are not removeable by the landlord; and that they may dispense or burden their rights. Kindly Tenants of Lochmaben v. Lord Stormont, 24th November 1726, Mor. p. 15,195; Irving, 4th Feb. 1795, Mor. p. 10,316, and Bell's Folio Cases, p. 145; Mounsey, 30th Nov. 1808, *Fac. Lochs. See Lakes.

Lock or Gowpin; is the perquisite of the servant in a mill, and consists of a small quantity of meal regulated by the custom of the mill. This is one of the sequels, or small services, as the multure is the payment due to the proprietor of the mill, in right of the thirlage. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 19; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 212; Ross's Lect. ii. 171. See Thirlage.

Lockfast Places. The opening of lockfast places is an aggravation of theft, and, when combined with housebreaking, is of a very serious nature. It is immaterial how the security has been overcome, provided the place was locked, and the key was not in the lock. Alison's Princ. 296; Steele, 123. As to the mode of obtaining access to lock-fast places in order to execute diligence or the like, see Open Doors; King's Keys.

Locus Delicti. It is necessary in criminal libels to specify the place where the crime was committed with as much precision as the circumstances will allow, and so as not to embarrass or perplex the panel. But in crimes the nature of which makes the place immaterial, this rule is relaxed; as well as when the place cannot be known to the prosecutor with certainty. To warrant conviction, the place must be proved as set forth in the libel; but what amounts to such proof will depend entirely on the specialties of the case. Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 23; Hume, ii. 207, et seq.; Alison's Prac. 257. See Alibi. Indictment.

Locus Pœnitentiæ; a power of resiling from a bargain, before any act has been done to confirm it in law. It depends entirely upon the nature of the contract, what are the requisites of final and conclusive engagement in the particular case; but it is a general rule, that until such final engagement, there is always a privilege to either party to retract his intention of becoming bound, however strongly expressed. Thus, in consensual contracts, if one make an offer of such a nature that an express acceptance of it is expected, he may withdraw the offer at any time before acceptance. The rule, however, is different where the offer is of a gratuitous nature, and acceptance being presumed is not expected to be expressed. In such a case there is no locus pœnitentiæ, since, as soon as the offer reaches the party to whom it is made, there is a consensus in idem placitum. There may be circumstances, however, in which even a gratuitous offer may be withdrawn, as when the person making it has intimated his desire that he should be informed whether or not it is accepted. Where there is an engagement among several individuals, each has locus pœnitentiæ until the consent of the last has been given. The parties have locus pœnitentiæ where writing is legally requisite, or has been stipulated, and has not yet been authentically executed; such is the case in a verbal agreement about heritage. But sometimes the parties may be bound by a present agreement, although it is their intention subsequently to complete the transfer in a more formal manner. And whenever there has been rei interventus, following upon an informal agreement, the locus pœnitentiæ is barred. *Ersk. Lodgers. In England, it would seem that lodgers, though possessing the principal part of a house, have no right to vote in virtue of such possession, the owner, how small however the part reserved for himself, being the tenant of the whole in the eye of the law; Chambers' Election Law, h. t. But in Scotland, if the yearly rent paid by the lodger for his apartments, exclusive of board, amounts to L.10, the sheriffs are in the practice of enrolling him as a voter on this qualification. See Reform Act.

Lodging-Houses. It seems formerly to have been laid down, that the keepers of lodging-houses were, like innkeepers, &c., liable under the edict Nautæ, cautiones, for the safety of goods and luggage brought into the house by lodgers; May, 16th Feb. and 10th July 1694, Mor. 9236. But there has been no recent decision to support the old precedent. And in Watling v. Macdougall, 10th June 1825, S. & D. 83, "the Lords wished it to be distinctly understood that they did not mean to decide the question, whether or not the keepers of lodgings fell under the edict." The landlord's hypothec does not extend over the effects of lodgers in a lodging-house. More's Notes on Stair, lvii.; Bell's Com. i. 469; Bell's Princ. § 236; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 685. Log-Book. The log-book of a ship is a book into which the contents of the log-board are daily copied at noon, together with every circumstance deserving notice which happens to the ship, either at sea or in harbour. In the contract of insurance, as proof of loss, the log-book and protests taken on occasion of the loss, are expected to be furnished to the underwriters, to direct their inquiries; but they are not proofs on which the loss can be rested, unless they become so by the inevitable loss of other evidence. They may be used to contradict the evidence of the master or mate, whose statements they are; and the log-book, unless there be evidence of its loss, must be produced, as a check on the proceedings of the voyage. The log-book of a ship of war proves the time when her convoy sailed, or when a ship became part of her convoy. Bell's Com. i. 612; Bell's Princ. § 498. Tait on Evidence, 52. See Evidence.

Loosing of Arrestment. An arrestment may be loosed on caution, wherever it is laid on for securing an illiquid debt; but in every case where the debt is constituted by the decree of a court, or where there is a decree of registration, it can be loosed only on consignment of the debt; and, accordingly, there is a distinction in the form of the letters of arrestment in these two cases. From this rule, however, there are the following exceptions: 1. When the time of paying of the debt is not arrived, although the arrestment proceed on a decree, the arrestment may be loosed on caution. 2. An arrestment founded on a mutual contract may be loosed on caution. 3. So may an arrestment on a decree which has been suspended or turned into a libel. Arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem, are loosed upon the debtor's giving security judicio sisti; and where an arrestment appears to be nimious and oppressive, the Court of Session will grant warrant for loosing arrestment, without caution or consignment. A letter from an arrester passing from arrestment, or holding it as recalled, is equivalent to a discharge, or to a loosing of the arrestment. A discharge granted by an arresting creditor to an arrestee does not discharge the common debtor of the remainder of the debt, the arrestee having been discharged only as such. See 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114, § 20; and A. S., June 8, 1850. Lord; a title of honour given to a peer of the realm. It is applied also by courtesy to all the sons of a duke, and to the eldest son of an earl. It is also used to the judges of the Court of Session, and to other persons honourable by their offices. See Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Lord Advocate. See Advocate, Lord.

Lord Justice-Clerk. The Lord Justice-Clerk, in absence of the Lord Justice-General, is the presiding judge in the Court of Justiciary. He is also one of the Officers of State for Scotland, and one of the commissioners for keeping the Scottish regalia. The Lord Justice-Clerk is always one of the Senators of the College of Justice, and Lord President of the Second Division of the Court of Session. It appears that, prior to 1671, the Justice-Clerk was not one of the judges of the Court of Justiciary, but merely the clerk and assessor of Court; Hume ii. 17. Lords of Justiciary; the judges of the Court of Justiciary, or Criminal Court. See Justiciary Court.

Lords of Regality; were persons to whom rights of regalities were given by the Crown. Under those rights they possessed a civil jurisdiction equal to that of a sheriff; and their criminal jurisdiction extended to the four pleas of the Crown. Persons amenable to the jurisdiction of a Lord of Regality might have been repledged from the Justiciary. It was on account of this extended and royal jurisdiction that the persons to whom regalities were given received the titles of Lords of Regality, though only commoners. The Lord of Regality acted by a steward or bailie appointed by himself. Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 7. See Regality.

Lords of Session; the judges of the Court of Session. See Session, Court of.

Lost. Things lost (other than strays and waifs, regarding which there are certain peculiarities elsewhere noticed) may, after all means have been taken to advertise them, be possessed by the finder without fault; and if not claimed, he may dispose of them if they cannot be conveniently preserved without hazard. The loser has, however, a right to restitution on identifying his property, at any time within the long prescription; and if the finder sell the subject to a third party, that third party must, if called upon, restore it to the owner, and take his recourse under the warrandice against the seller. The effect of a personal exception raised against the owner, in consequence of neglect implying dereliction, must depend upon specialties and the degree of care with which the finder advertised. The possession of moveables presumes the right of property, and when the alleged true owner comes to vindicate his property, from a person in whose possession it is found, it is not sufficient for him to prove that it once belonged to him; he must also prove that he lost the possession, either by the fraud of some other party, or upon some footing which did not deprive him of the ownership. When title-deeds are lost, the remedy provided is an action of proving the tenor. See Proving the Tenor. Should the finder of a bill transfer it to another party for value, the acquirer has, under certain modifications, a full right to it. But an action lies to recover the document or its value from one proved to have found it. Formerly, in Scotland, the holder of such a document, though he got it from the thief or the finder, was not bound, even on notice by the former owner, to prove that he gave a consideration for it; but the other party required to prove that the holder gave no value. This, however, was altered by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 97, 1856, and the holder of a lost or stolen bill must now prove that value was given for it; but such proof may be by parole evidence. Bankers incautiously changing lost or stolen notes have, in several cases, been found liable for the amount; but this is a question necessarily depending upon specialties—the suspicious circumstances in which the bank-note was offered—the unusually large amount—the notices given of the loss or robbery, and the like. Although a bill or note should be lost or destroyed, even while in the drawer's hands, the creditor must protest it for non-acceptance and non-payment, as if it were extant, and must give due notice of its dishonour to all the previous parties, otherwise he will lose his recourse against them. The protest, in such a case, may be made on a copy of the bill or note. In Scotland, the tenor of a lost bill may be established by a process for proving the tenor, in which the pursuer must first prove the casus amissionis, and he will then be entitled to prove the tenor, in the same manner as is usually done in such processes. The action has occasionally been dismissed, on the ground, that the casus amissionis libelled was not sufficient to warrant a proving of the tenor. A proving of the tenor may be pursued by any party who has a direct interest in it. But, although the loss of a bill and its contents be thus proved, the creditor is not, in all cases, entitled, unconditionally, either to have a new instrument from the drawer in place of the former one, if it has been lost or destroyed before the term of payment, or to enforce payment of it when due. If, indeed, the first instrument have been actually destroyed, or if it were specially indorsed to the loser, the drawer, when called upon for a new bill or note, cannot object that he runs the risk of a claim from a third party on the former one. It is thought, however, that in Scotland, it would be necessary for one claiming payment of a lost bill not indorsed, or specially indorsed to him, or requiring the drawer to grant a new bill or note instead of it, to find caution that he will not indorse the first bill, if found, to a third party. If the lost bill or note is blank indorsed, or payable to the bearer, so as to be transferable by delivery, the creditor cannot maintain action for it, without finding security to the debtor against his being made liable for payment to some other holder. See the subject of lost bills fully and ably treated in Thomson on Bills, 309, et seq. See also Stair, B. i. tit. 7, § 3; tit. 11, § 2; More's Notes, xlviii., cli.; *Ersk. Lottery. State lotteries are a kind of public game at hazard, resorted to by Government in order to raise money for the service of the State. In Britain, these lotteries were sanctioned by Parliament, and managed by Commissioners named by the Lords of the Treasury for that purpose. In the reign of Queen Anne, it was thought necessary to suppress lotteries as public nuisances; but after that time, they were licensed by act of Parliament, under various regulations. The act passed in 1778 restrains any person from keeping an office for the sale of tickets, shares or chances, or for buying, selling, insuring or registering, without a license. The act also contains certain regulations for the prevention of fraud, prohibits the division of tickets into more than sixteen shares, and provides for the transacting of business in the lottery offices. A supplementary act was passed in 1793 to prevent the frauds committed by insuring tickets; but at length, state lotteries, which had been found to be highly prejudicial to public morals, were abated by a Treasury minute, which provided, that from and after the 18th of October 1826, they should cease and determine; and this abolition was accompanied with a prohibitory declaration against all attempts on the part of individuals to revive or continue them in any mode or form whatsoever. In the year 1831, a private act of Parliament (1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 8) was passed, under colour of which certain street property in Glasgow was disposed of by way of lottery; but it is now well understood that this act was passed per incuriam, and in ignorance of its true purport, and that any future attempt of a similar description would be unsuccessful. See 4 and 5 Will. IV. c. 37, by which the Glasgow street-lottery was brought to an end. It would rather appear that private lotteries may be removed as a nuisance at common law; but the point has not been decided. By 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 66, the advertisement in Britain of foreign and other illegal lotteries is prohibited, under a penalty of L.50. Hutch. Just. ii. 353, 365; Tait's Just. h. t.

Lucrative Succession. The passive title of præceptio hæreditatis, is that whereby an heir-apparent who accepts gratuitously of a grant from his ancestor of any part, however small, of the estate to which he is to succeed qua heir, is thereby subjected to the payment of all the debts of the ancestor contracted prior to the grant. But the heir, before he incurs this passive title, must be successor titulo lucrativa, by a lucrative title—that is, he must have received the grant gratuitously; for wherever an heir has made a bona fide purchase from his ancestor, not struck at by any of the bankrupt statutes, he does not incur any passive representation. Where, however, as in this case, the transaction is inter conjunctas personas, the mere recital of onerous causes in the deed will not be held sufficient proof of onerosity. If the price paid by the heir comes near the value of the property which he has thus acquired, he will thus escape the penal consequences of passive title; but prior creditors of the ancestor may set aside the right under the act 1621, c. 18, in so far as it appears to be gratuitous—the heir being in that case liable only in quantum lucratus est. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 87–89; Stair, B. iii. tit. 7; More's Notes, cccxxxviii.; Bank. ii. 374. See also Conjunct and Confident. Passive Titles.

As a special service no longer infers a general passive representation, it may be doubted whether the representation would now be held to extend beyond the value of the subject acquired by the heir from his ancestor. The acceptance of the subject is held to be equivalent to an entry as heir. It should, therefore, be attended with the same consequences, but not greater.

Luctus. See Imbecility.

Luggage. The proprietors of a stage-coach are liable for the safety of the luggage of passengers. The value of the lost article is ascertained in the manner explained in the articles Nautæ caupones, and Innkeepers. The coach-master takes his risk of the probable value of the luggage, including such a sum of money as may reasonably be carried in the portmanteau for the occasions of the journey. But if the luggage be of extraordinary value, this ought to be stated, and, if demanded, additional hire paid in proportion to the additional risk incurred; otherwise the coach-master will not be liable beyond the value to be reasonably expected; 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. 68. There is a lien on a passenger's or traveller's luggage for his passage money or fare. Bell's Com. i. 471; ii. 100. See Public Carriages.

Lunatic; is one who is seized with periodical fits of frenzy. See Idiot. Insanity. Imbecility. Brieve of Furoosity.

Lunatic Asylum. The act 20 and 21 Vict. c. 71, 1857, now regulates the care and treatment of lunatics; and the previous acts, 55 Geo. III., c. 69; 9 Geo. IV., c. 34; and 4 and 5 Vict., c. 60, are repealed. Under this act, the term lunatic means “any mad, or furious, or fatuous person, or person so diseased or affected in mind as to render him unfit, in the opinion of competent medical persons, to be at large, either as regards his own personal safety or conduct, or the safety of the persons and property of others, or of the public.”

Lyon-King-at-Arms. This officer takes his title of Lyon from the armorial bearing of the Scottish kings, the lion rampant. The officers serving under him are heralds, pursuivants, and messengers. The ancient duty of this officer was to carry public messages to foreign states; and it is still the practice of the heralds to make all royal proclamations at the cross of Edinburgh. The jurisdiction given to the Lyon-King-at-Arms by the acts 1592, c. 127, and 1672, c. 21, empowers him to inspect the arms and ensigns-armorial of all the noblemen and gentlemen in the kingdom, to distinguish the arms of the younger branches of families, and to give proper arms to virtuous and well-deserving persons; to matriculate such arms; and to fine those who use arms which are not matriculated, in L.100 Scots, with the forfeiture of the goods and furniture on which the arms are represented. The Lyon-King-at-Arms may deprive or suspend messengers by the advice of the Court of Session; and he may fine them to the extent of the sum for which, at their admission to the office, they found caution. The Court of Session has the power of reviewing the decision of the Lyon Court as to the matriculation of arms; but a reduction of a matriculation of arms is incompetent at the instance of a party who does not claim right to the arms in question. *Ersk. Macer. The mace-bearers are officers attending on the Courts of Session, Teinds, Justiciary, and Exchequer. They are nominated by the Crown, or by a person deriving right from the Crown; and, properly speaking, they are the servants of the courts, and the attendants on the judges on the bench. It is the duty of the macers to preserve silence in the court, to execute the orders of the judges, to call the rolls of court, and to execute such warrants for the apprehension of delinquents, &c., as are addressed to them. See 11 and 12 Vict. c. 79, § 6. When processes, after being borrowed, are not returned in proper time, they, as well as messengers-at-arms, may execute the captions issued against the borrowers to force them back. See Caption, process. The fixed salary of each of the seven macers of the Court of Session and of the Teind Court is, by 1 and 2 Vict. c. 118, § 25, £100 per annum; besides certain other gratuities, variable in amount, but divisible equally amongst the whole macers of those courts. They hold their office ad vitam aut culpam. There were three macers in the Jury Court before its incorporation with the Court of Session; and it was enacted, that the macers of the Jury Court should continue, both at Edinburgh and on the circuits, to discharge the duties of their respective offices in the Court of Session after the union of the two Courts; and that as vacancies should occur, the number of macers should be reduced, so that they should not exceed the number of macers formerly officiating exclusively in the Court of Session; 1 Will. IV. c. 69, §§ 12, 13. Brieves for serving heirs, where the Judge Ordinary is incompetent, or where expediency renders it necessary, were formerly directed to the macers of the Court of Session, as sheriffs in that part, under a special commission from the Scotch Chancery Office. The practice, however, was abolished in the year 1821; and by 1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. 38, § 11, those services which were in use to be conducted before the macers, are directed to proceed before the Sheriff depute of Edinburgh, or his substitute, under a special commission from Chancery, similar to that in virtue of which the macers formerly acted. Stair, B. iv. tit. 3, § 18; More's Notes, p. cccclxxvi.; Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 33; B. iii. tit. 6, § 7; tit. 8, § 64, and Notes by Ivory; Bank. vol. ii, pp. 507, 471; *Kames' Stat. Machamium; according to Skene, is manzie, hurt, mutilation, demembration, or

Machinery. Questions sometimes occur between landlord and tenant, or between heir and executor, as to the property of machinery in mills and manufactures; and in particular, as to whether certain parts of the machinery are heritable or moveable. Such questions are considered in the article Fixtures. In addition to the authorities there cited, see More's Notes on Stair, cxlv.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 2, § 4, note by Ivory. And as to leases of machinery in manufactories or public works, see Manufactories.

Magistrate. In a large acceptance, this term comprehends all in authority, including even the Sovereign. Magistrates, therefore, are either supreme or subordinate. The subordinate magistrates are those (as judges) who derive from the head of the State, or first magistrate, all their authority, and are accountable to him for their conduct. This term is colloquially applied to the provost and bailies of burghs. The magistrates of all burghs have the cognizance of debts and questions of possession between the inhabitants of the burgh; and it is generally supposed that the magistrates of royal burghs have as extensive a civil jurisdiction within the burgh as a sheriff has in his territory, except in so far as particular jurisdictions conferred by statute on the sheriff are exclusive. The criminal jurisdiction of the magistrates of burghs is now very limited, extending merely to petty riots and matters of police; but, in some of the larger burghs (as Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen), the magistrates have a right of sheriffship, which gives them the same jurisdiction within their bounds as the sheriff possesses in the county. The magistrates have been found competent judges concerning debts due to the burgh, and they have jurisdiction in a cause at the instance of a tacksmen of their customs; but they are incompetent to judge as to the power of levying assessments laid on by themselves in questions between the collector of the assessments appointed by them, and the parties on whom they are imposed. They have also been found incompetent in a question between their own treasurer and other parties relative to an alleged violation of the right of the burgh. Stair, B. iv. tit. 47, § 19; More's Notes, p. ccccxix.; Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 21; Dickson on Evidence, ii. 801; Ross's Lect. i. 90, 324, 343; Alison's Prac. 61; MacLaurin's Sheriff Process, 2d edit. 40. Magna Charta; the great charter of English liberties, granted in the ninth year of King Henry III., and repeatedly confirmed during the reign of that monarch and of his successors. It relates to the freedom of the church; the nobility; the guardianship and marriage of heirs; the dowers of women; the duties of sheriffs; the liberties of towns and corporations; the appointment of courts; remedies for oppression, and appeals against unjust judgments: and contains other the like provisions calculated to preserve the liberty of the subject and promote the welfare of the country. Magna Charta is the most ancient written law of England. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; 4 Blackst. c. 33, p. 423. See Liberty. Habeas Corpus.

Maihem or Mayhem; in English law, the violently depriving another of the use of such of his members as may render him the less able, in fighting, either to defend himself or to annoy his adversary. A person who maims himself, that he may have the more colour to beg, or that he may not be impressed for a soldier, may be indicted and fined. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Maiming.

Mail; is an old Scotch law term signifying rent. Grass-mail is the rent payable for cattle sent to graze on the pasture of another. The proprietor or principal tenant of the pasture has a lien or right of retention of the cattle in security of the grass-mail. Where the cattle of others are admitted to graze by a principal tacksman, his landlord's right of hypothec does not extend over such cattle, but only over the grass-mail payable for them. Bell's Com. ii. 29 and 104, and Bell on Leases, i. 398. See Grass.

Mail. It is an indictable offence for a servant of the Post-Office to open a mail-bag with an intent to steal; Alison's Princ. 342; and whoever detains letters or mail-bags in course of conveyance by post, which have been dropped and found on the highway or elsewhere, is guilty of a misdemeanor; 4 Geo. III., c. 81, § 1; Steele, 131. For the provisions of 7 Will. IV., c. 36, relative to robbery from the mail, and other Post-Office offences, see Post-Office Offences.

Mail-Coaches. The proprietors of mail-coaches are, like other public carriers, liable under the edict Nauta, caupones, and are responsible for the negligence of their drivers. But there are statutory restrictions of the liability of public carriers for certain goods above the value of L.10, unless certain specified conditions are complied with; 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV., c. 68. See Nauta, caupones. Carriers. Public Carriages. Luggage.

Mailles and Duties; are the rents of an estate, whether in money or grain; hence, an action for the rents of an estate, competent either to a proprietor or to one claiming right under a conveyance, legal or voluntary, or even an assignment to the rents, is termed an action of mailles and duties. This action is either petitory or possessory. The petitory action is founded on a right in the pursuer on which no possession has followed; and in such an action it is necessary to call not only the tenants, but also the proprietor or life-renter, and the pursuer must support his right of action by the production of titles preferable or superior to theirs. In the possessory action there is no occasion to call any other than the parties in the natural possession of the ground; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 49. In the action of mailles and duties there is an exception in favour of the tenant, who is not liable for arrears of rent after five years from the time of his removing from the lands. This quinquennial prescription was introduced by the act 1669, c. 9. Stair, B. ii. tit. 12, § 32; B. iv. tit. 22, §§ 7 and 15; tit. 26, § 4; More's Notes, p. cclxxiii.; Bank. vol. ii. p. 170; Bell's Princ. § 634; Illust. ib.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, pp. 663-8; *Jurid. Maiming. Shooting, stabbing, or throwing of sulphuric acid with intent to maim or disfigure, is a capital offence; 6 Geo. IV., c. 126; Alison's Princ. 168. See Shooting and Stabbing.

Mainprise; in English law the taking or receiving into friendly custody a person who otherwise might be committed to prison, upon security given that he shall be forthcoming at a time and place assigned. It differs from bail in this, that a person mainprised is said to be at large until the day of his appearance. A man let to bail is still within the judge's ward of time. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Maintenance; in English law the unlawful taking in hand or upholding of a cause or person; an officious intermeddling in a suit that no way belongs to one, by maintaining or assisting either party, with money or otherwise, to prosecute or defend it. It also signifies the buying or obtaining of pretended rights to land, for the purpose of raising actions upon them; or entering into an agreement by which a stranger gets the benefit of a suit, on condition of his conducting and prosecuting it. An attorney is guilty of maintenance who undertakes a suit upon the understanding that he is to bear all the costs out of his own pocket, and that his client will be free from all loss; or who offers to recover a doubtful claim, on condition of getting part of the product of the suit. At common law, persons guilty of maintenance may be prosecuted by indictment, and be fined or imprisoned, or be compelled to make satisfaction by action. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Pactum Illicitum. Buying of Pleas. Champerty.

Maintenance. See Aliment.

Majestatis Crimen; or treason; a crime aimed against the Sovereign or the State, and intended to subvert the constitution. See Treason.

Major; a person of full legal age, which, both in male and female, is the age of twenty-one years complete. See Minor. Curatory. Pupil. Tutor.

Major and Minor in a libel. The major proposition in a criminal libel names the crime to be charged, or, if it have no proper name, describes it at large, and characterizes it as a crime severely punishable. The minor proposition avers the panel's guilt of this crime, and supports the averment by a narrative of the fact alleged to have been committed; it being necessary that the minor agree with the major. And the conclusion infers that, on conviction, he ought to be punished with the pains of law applicable to his offence. Hume, ii. 155, 164, 181; Steele, 188; Alison's Prac. 228, 245.

Majority; the major or greater number of persons intrusted with the performance of a certain act or duty. Independently of special statute, or covenant, or of inveterate consuetude (as in the case of public assemblies, courts of justice, &c.), there seems to be no sound principle under which the majority can bind the minority. But under various statutes, of which the Bankrupt Statute is one, as well as under contracts of copartnership, nominations of trustees, the constitutions or charters of joint-stock companies, and other analogous associations, special enactments, conditions, or articles are usually inserted, declaring that the majority shall decide. Under the Bankrupt Statute, the majority of creditors in value or extent of debt determines the election of trustee or commissioners, or gives directions as to the management of the estate. More than a mere majority, however, is required to discharge the bankrupt or to accept of a statutory composition. See Bell's Com. ii. 357, et seq. See also Quorum. Sine quo non. Composition. Discharge.

Mala Fides; bad faith. A mala fide possessor is a person who possesses a subject not his own, upon a title which he knows to be bad, or which he has reasonable ground for believing to be so. A mala fide possessor, who retains possession to the prejudice of the true owner, is obliged to restore to the proprietor all the fruits and profits, natural, industrial, or civil, accruing during his mala fide possession; and that whether he has actually reaped the fruits and profits, or might, by proper care and diligence, have done so; or whether he has consumed them or not. It is often difficult to determine when bona fides ceases and mala fides begins, since this depends very much upon the circumstances of the particular case. Sometimes mala fides commences from the date of citation in the action of restitution; sometimes from liti-contestation; and sometimes, in very doubtful cases, bona fides has been held to continue till the judgment of the House of Lords. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 25; Stair, B. ii. tit. 1, § 24.

Male Apprehiata. See Omissa. Confirmation. Inventory.

Malice; a deliberate, preconceived design of doing mischief or injury to another. There can be no proper crime without the ingredient of malice; crimen dolo contrahitur. But if a man, having a malicious intention to kill one person, in putting his intention in execution, kills another, the malice will attach to this slaughter, and he will be adjudged a murderer. And although the maxim Culpa lata dolo æquiparatur does not apply to crimes in its full extent, yet gross negligence frequently subjects the person guilty of it to punishment. In actions of damages, it is sometimes necessary to allege and prove malice. In actions for wrongous imprisonment, this is not necessary, since such actions will lie against an individual merely for the improper use of diligence. Malice is an ingredient in the action for defamation; but in ordinary cases it is not necessary to aver malice, since it is implied in every insult and injury. There are, however, certain cases called privileged, in which the law presumes that the act complained of was done in the discharge of a duty, and requires that malice should be averred and proved. Such are injurious words written or spoken by judges or magistrates in the discharge of their duties; by parties, or witnesses, or counsel in a cause; by reporters of judicial proceedings; by authors or critics in the fair course of literary criticism or observation, and other the like cases. Hume, ii. 254; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, §§ 5 and 8; Alison's Princ. 2, 49, 434; Prac. 150; Bank. ii. 645; Bell's Princ. §§ 2039, 2044; Shand's Prac. 219; Borthwick's Law of Libel, 117, et seq.; Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 33, 61, 72, 221; Kames' Equity, 36. See Issue. Crime. Enmity to Panel.

Malicious Mischief. Any serious damage, wilfully occasioned to another's property, is an indictable offence, whether it has proceeded from malice or gross misapprehension of right. But inconsiderable damage, done through manifest ignorance, is not punishable as a criminal offence, unless aggravated by circumstances of tumult or outrage. The punishment of malicious mischief is arbitrary. Hume, i. 122; Alison's Princ. 448, 631. Steele, 157.

Malum in se—Malum Prohibitum. An act is called malum in se the culpability of which does not arise from special enactment, but from its being contrary to the law of nature and the rules of morality. An act is called malum prohibitum which, although innocent in itself, has been prohibited by statute. It was at one time thought that there was a distinction between them; that a party could not violate the natural law without criminality; but that the fine or other penalty attached to an act forbidden by statute was merely the price at which liberty to commit the prohibited act might be purchased. This fallacy, however, is now exploded; and it is settled that, where an act otherwise innocent has been lawfully prohibited, no one can disregard the prohibition without incurring guilt. Blackst. Introd. § 2, and Christian's Notes; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Penalties. Crime.

Malversation; misconduct in the discharge of a duty or trust. Malversation is a ground on which tutors may be removed as suspect. It has been held malversation that a tutor did not make up an inventory. Malversation in office subjects an officer to the punishment of fine, and sometimes of deprivation, as most public offices are held ad vitam aut culpam. See Brown's Synop. p. 532, for several cases in which agents, officers, &c., were deprived or otherwise punished for unfaithful discharge of their duty. Stair, B. i. tit. 6, § 26; Bank. i. 171; ii. 474.

Mandamus. In English law, a writ of mandamus is a command issuing in the Sovereign's name from the Court of Queen's Bench, and directed to any person, corporation, or inferior court of judicature; requiring to do some particular thing therein specified, which appertains to their office and duty, and which the Court of Queen's Bench has previously determined, or at least supposes to be consonant to right and justice. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Mandate; is a contract by which one employs another to act for him in the management of his affairs, or in some particular department of them, of which employment the person accepts, and agrees to act. The person giving the employment is called the mandant—the person undertaking it is called the mandatary. This contract is not binding on the mandatary until it has been accepted of. A mandate, generally speaking, is presumed to be gratuitous; and no commission is demandable unless it has been promised, or is presumed to be due from the nature of the employment or the business of the mandatary. A mandate may be constituted by writing, or it may be constituted even tacitly. Thus, when a person, in the presence and with the knowledge of another, acts for him, this will be considered as a mandate, and have the effect of binding him for whom the other acts. The appearance of an advocate in court implies a mandate from the party for whom he appears, unless the party be out of the kingdom, in which case there must be a written mandate. The mandatary is bound to execute the mandate in conformity with its terms; and whatever is done beyond his instructions does not bind the mandant. But where no instructions are given, the mandatary may act according to his own discretion, and his constituent will be bound. Where the mandatary purchases at a lower price than he is authorized to give, this is not inconsistent with his powers, since the less is included in the greater sum. Even where it exceeds the sum, he may still render his constituent liable, by restricting his demand to the sum which he was authorized to give. A general mandate implies no power of gifting—it does not imply a power to sell, nor to enter the mandant heir, nor to enter into a submission; and where a general mandate specifies certain particulars, the general words must be restricted to particulars of the same kind with those specified. The mandatary, in a proper mandate, where he has no claim to any recompense, is not held to be liable farther than for his actual intromissions, and for such diligence as a person employs in his own affairs. But where a recompense is due, he must act with that care which a man of prudence bestows on his own affairs, and must repair the damage arising from his neglect; and where a mandatary exceeds his commission, he is liable for all the consequences of such excess of power. See Culpa. Diligence. Mandates expire by the revocation of the mandate, or even by the nomination of a new mandatary; they expire also by the resignation of the mandatary; and they expire by the death either of the one party or of the other. Although a mandate expires on the death of the mandant, yet, if the mandatary be ignorant of his death, his actings will bind the heirs of the mandant. Even after he comes to know of the death of the mandant, the mandatary may proceed to complete transactions previously begun, and which require to be completed. After the death of the mandatary, his heir may finish what was left undone by the mandatary, if it requires dispatch, and there be no time to receive the directions of the mandant. See generally, on the subject of this article, Stair, B. i. tit. 12; More's Notes, p. lxxi, et seq.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 31, et seq.; Bank. vol. i. p. 392; Bell's Com. ii. 318, 349, 445, 463, 674; Bell's Princ. §§ 216-231; Illust. § 217; Tait's Justice of Peace, h. t.; Blair's do. h. t.; Tait on Evidence, pp. 299, 302, 338-9; Ross's Lect. ii. 228; Thomson on Bills, 220, 371; Davidson, July 14, 1815, 3 Dow, 229. Mandatory, in judicial proceedings. When a party, pursuer or defender in a cause, is resident out of Scotland, his opponent is entitled to insist that a mandatory for the absentee be sisted, who will be liable for costs, if they should be awarded against his principal. Such a mandatory is unobjectionable if he be in the same condition of life with his constituent, and not bankrupt, nor living in the Abbey for the benefit of the Sanctuary. It is no good objection that he may be thought insufficient for the costs; Duncan, 4th March 1830, 8 S. & D. 641; Turnbull v. Paul, 26th Nov. 1829, 8 S. & D. 124. If the pursuer go abroad during the dependence of the process, the action cannot proceed unless a mandatory be sisted. A Scotchman, proprietor of lands in Scotland, does not require a mandatory while abroad, where the property is sufficient to meet the expenses of the process. In the case of Sandilands v. Sandilands, May 31, 1848, 10 D. 1091, an absent proprietor was held bound to sist a mandatory, his title being under reduction. See the cases there cited. See also the case of The Caledonian and Dumbartonshire Railway Company v. Turner, Dec. 21, 1849, 12 D. 406. It would appear that a pursuer who has a domicile in Scotland must appoint a mandatory when he goes abroad, though on business; but on this point the decisions have not been uniform. A mandate, qualified with the condition that the mandatory is not to be liable for past or future expenses, will not be received unless the party be upon the poor's roll; and the mandatory will not be liable for expenses if the party be upon the poor's roll, even although the mandate be not so qualified. The mandate must apply to the action in court, and should be probative or holograph. A mandate to carry on a process in the sheriff-court is not sufficient to authorize an advocacy to the Court of Session. The mandatory of a pursuer is liable in expenses, but not in damages, if he act bona fide. The summons should be raised in name of the pursuer and his mandatory. The validity of proceedings in court is not affected by the want of a mandatory, it being the duty of the opposite party to state the objection if he mean to found on it. In the case, however, of statutory complaints against the resolutions of freeholders under the old election law, where the complainer was forth of Scotland, his petition and complaint was held incompetent if not presented by himself along with a mandatory, within the statutory period; Stewart, 14th June 1831, 9 S. & D. 727, and authorities there cited. But in ordinary cases it would seem that the want of a mandatory can be remedied cum processu on the objection being stated. See, on this subject, Arbuckle, 2d March 1827, 5 S. & D. 505; affirmed in House of Lords. Diligence at the instance of a party forth of Scotland does not require the intervention of a mandatory. See the case of Ross v. Shaw, Mar. 8, 1849, 11 D. 984. A pursuer has a right to require that a defender who is abroad should sist a mandatory. When a mandatory intends to withdraw, it is not enough that his name is omitted in the proceedings; he must lodge a minute, withdrawing from the process; and in that case, if no other mandatory be named within a reasonable time, the Court will pronounce decree of absolvitor, or in terms of the libel, as the case may be, and find the party and mandatory, conjunctly and severally, liable in expenses. And after such a judgment, the mandatory who has withdrawn is not entitled to resume and carry on the action, in order to show that no expenses should have been awarded; Gordon and Gibson-Craig, 11th Dec. 1823, 2 S. & D. 572. It has been said that a mandatory has no positive, but merely a relative existence, and that he is liable in costs only in the event of his principal being found liable; Reoch, 14th May 1831, 9 S. & D. 588. And a question of some nicety has arisen, whether, where the mandant has died abroad, and where his representative has not sisted himself, or authorized a mandatory to be sisted for him, the process can proceed to the effect of taking decree for expenses against the mandatory of the defunct. The difficulty is that, as regards the principal, there is no process, since it has fallen by his death, and hence no decree can be obtained against him; while, as regards the mandatory, the condition of his obligation is, that he shall be liable in costs only in the event of their being found due by his constituent. See the case of Cairns v. Anstruther, 16th March 1841, 2 Rob. App. 29; also the case of Marshall v. Connon, Dec. 16, 1848, 21 Jurist, 63.

In the inferior courts, even when the defender is within Scotland, his procurator, upon stating defences, must either produce a written mandate from the defender, or the service-copy of the summons or citation, which is held equivalent to one. A mandate of this description, however, does not make the mandatory liable for expenses, as in the case where the mandant is abroad. The rule, that a mandatory must be sisted for a person abroad, is the same in the inferior as in the Supreme Court. Shand's Prac. 154; Maclaurin's Sheriff Process, 73, 291; Thomson on Bills, 574. See Agent. Mandate.

Maneleta; in old law language, a kind of pestilent herb which grows amongst corn, called guld. The law of maneleta was instituted by King Kenneth, who ordained that he who through negligence suffered noisome herbs to spring up in sown land should for the first fault pay one ox, for the second, ten, and for the third be removed from the possession and labouring of the land. Skene, h. t.

Manerium; lands laboured with the hands. Skene, h. t.

Manner; or Mainour; from the French manier. To be taken with the manner, is an English law phrase, used where a thief is taken with the stolen article about him; as it were in his hands, or flagrante delicto. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Fang.

Manor; in English law, jurisdiction or right over a certain district of land. This was a noble sort of fee, granted partly to tenants for certain services to be performed, and partly reserved for the use of the lord's family, with jurisdiction over his tenants for their farms. Lords of manors were formerly in use to grant large parcels of land, which became manors themselves; the chief manor being called an Honour. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Manrent; signifies personal service or attendance. It was the token of a species of bondage, whereby free persons became bondmen or followers of those who were their patrons or defenders. Manse. The term was originally applied to a portion of ground set apart for the clergyman; but now, in Scotland, it is used to signify the dwelling-house of the clergyman, the ground to which he is entitled being termed his glebe. Every rural parish minister is entitled to a manse, and to have it upheld by the heritors; and where there is no manse, the minister is entitled to have half an acre of ground designed to him by the presbytery for a manse, offices, and garden, and to have the heritors ordained to erect a manse and offices thereon. The heritors on whom this burden lies are the proprietors of lands within the parish. Titulars or tacksmen of teinds are not liable; nor superiors in respect of the feu-duties of lands in the parish; nor liferenters. In the allocation of the expenses the general rule is, that each heritor pays in proportion to his valued rent, although this rule is not invariable; and in Shetland, where there is no valued rent, the real rent is taken as the criterion. Singular successors and creditors are not liable for arrears; but they are subject to this burden, in so far as it falls on the lands, for the years of their possession.

The statutes on the subject require that the manse should be near the church, and, except in special circumstances, this rule is observed. The leading statute is 1663, c. 21, which provides that where competent manses are not already built, the heritors shall build them, at an expense not exceeding £1000 Scots (£83, 6s. 8d. sterling), and not under 500 merks; and it has been questioned whether the heritors can be compelled to expend more than the statutory maximum. But this doubt is now confined to the case where a manse is proposed to be built in a parish where there has not been one previously; for where a manse has been once built, and the question is as to the rebuilding, adding to, or repairing it, the rule is, that the heritors must expend such a sum as may be necessary to render the manse a "competent" residence for the clergyman. In this respect, however, while in repairing, adding to, or rebuilding the manse, a style and size consistent with the mode of living of the day will be adopted, regard must also be had to the extent of the parish, to the amount of the stipend, and to other circumstances; and above all, moderation in dimension and simplicity in ornament must be rigidly observed. Acting on this principle, the sum most commonly allowed of late years, for rebuilding a manse, has been £1000 sterling; although a larger sum has often been voluntarily expended by the heritors in rendering the manse and offices suitable and comfortable.

It is frequently made a question whether the minister is entitled to have the manse rebuilt, or merely repaired and added to; but on this point it is impossible to lay down any invariable rule. Every case must depend less or more on its peculiar circumstances; and in reference to the circumstances of one of the latest cases, the law, so far as general, has been thus stated by Lord Moncreiff: "It appears to be settled on the one hand, that where a manse has been built, and accepted of and approved of by the presbytery, the minister is not entitled, simply on the ground that the accommodation is not such as may have been generally provided in other cases, or because the sizes and forms of the apartments may not be according to the fashion of the times, to require the heritors to make extensive alterations on it, or additions thereto; and that, even although some repairs may be necessary of a small or inconsiderable nature, such a necessity will not make way for a demand for re-modelling and adding to the house, so as to render it in all respects a suitable manse, according to the views entertained at the time. But, on the other hand, he (Lord Moncreiff) holds it to be equally settled, that where a manse has, either from original insufficiency or by the lapse of time, come to be in such a state that it requires extensive repairs to render it even habitable, it is then competent for the presbytery, and for this Court in reviewing their sentence, to consider not merely what is absolutely essential to render the old building habitable, but what ought reasonably to be done, by alterations and additions, to render the manse a suitable residence for the minister in the circumstances of the parish." Symington, infra cit.

The manse includes a dwelling-house, stable, barn, and byre; and the usual occasion for settling the matter between the minister and the heritors is the induction of a new incumbent. The manse is then either re-built, added to, or repaired, as circumstances may require; and when these operations are completed, the manse is, in the ordinary case, declared a free manse; that is, the presbytery, after due inspection, take the manse, as it were, off the hands of the heritors. This is a form introduced by practice for ascertaining that a competent manse has been provided. Its effect is to lay the burden of all ordinary repairs on the minister during his incumbency; and the heritors are entitled to have the manse declared free, whether it has been built or repaired voluntarily or under a decree of the presbytery. But this declaration will not bar the same incumbent from insisting for such repairs or additions as may be rendered necessary by the decay occasioned by time, or by the manifest incompetency of the manse as a suitable residence.

Where a manse stands in need of repairs or additions, or where a new manse is necessary, the course is for the clergyman, either on his induction or when the necessity occurs, to apply to the presbytery by petition to hold a meeting for the purpose of inspecting the manse. On this petition a deliverance is pronounced, appointing a visitation on a day fixed, of which edictal notice is directed to be given from the pulpit, and also by letters addressed by the minister to the non-resident heritors. At the same time, skilful tradesmen are directed to attend the presbytery on the appointed day, the expense of the tradesmen's attendance being borne by the heritors. At this diet the tradesmen make a report on oath, which is the ground for a finding by the presbytery, which is followed by an order for plans, estimates, and a contract, and finally by a decree of the presbytery against the heritors for the sum necessary to defray the expense of the building and other incidental expenses. The presbytery may proceed in absence of the heritors; but, in the ordinary case, the matter is otherwise managed:—The subject is taken into consideration at successive meetings of presbytery, and it is only in comparatively rare cases that compulsory measures are requisite against the heritors; but where that happens, and where the parties insist on having their respective rights judicially determined, the decree of the presbytery may be brought under the review of the Court of Session by suspension. The higher church-courts have no jurisdiction in this matter. While the re-building or repairs are in progress, or during the time that the minister is excluded from his manse, either by those operations or by a relative litigation, he is entitled to an allowance from the heritors as manse-rent. This allowance must be claimed in a separate process at the instance of the minister against the heritors, unless they consent to the Court awarding a sum as rent, in the suspension of the decree of the presbytery. If an action be raised for manse-rent, the summons must conclude against each heritor for his proportion of the rent, not against the whole heritors as jointly and severally liable; and where a difficulty had arisen as to the quantum of rent, the Court, in one case, remitted to the sheriff to report as to what would be a reasonable allowance.

It has been said by some authorities, that all ministers are entitled either to manses or to a pecuniary allowance in lieu of a manse; but this is a mistake. The ministers of royal burghs proper have no such right; although, where the royal burgh has a landward district attached, and forming part of the parish, it is now settled that the first minister is entitled to a manse; Auld, 16th June 1825, 4 S. & D. 99; House of Lords, 2 W. & S. 600. The second minister of a parish, whether landward or burghal, seems to have no legal claim to a manse; although, where a manse has been once provided by the heritors, they may be bound to keep it up. Dunlop, 88.

By 5 Geo. IV., c. 72, a statutory provision is made for an allowance or additional stipend in lieu of manse and glebe to clergymen whose stipend is under L.200, and who have no manse or glebe. The regulation of that statute is, that a payment shall be made from the public revenue, so as to raise the stipend to L.200 where there is neither manse nor glebe, and to L.180 where either the manse or the glebe is wanting. See Small Stipend. And the stat. 5 Geo. IV., c.

90, regulating the erection of government churches in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, also provides for the erection of dwelling-houses for the clergymen of such churches. Those dwelling-houses are on a very moderate scale, the statutory sum at the disposal of the commissioners for the erection both of church and dwelling-house not exceeding L.1500 sterling.

Numerous questions have occurred connected with the subject of this article, as to which see Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 40; More's Notes, clxx.; Bank. i. p. 667; ii. 29, 46; *Ersk. Mansion-House. The heir in possession under a deed of entail is not entitled to grant a lease of the family mansion-house or pleasure-grounds to endure beyond the period of his own lifetime. If he should do so, however, the lease does not expire eo ipso on his death, but must be set aside by reduction. By the Montgomery Act, as it is called, this prohibition is extended to the manor-place, offices, gardens, and adjacent inclosures, which have been usually in the natural possession of the proprietor; and building leases cannot be granted of any lands within 300 yards of the manor-place; 10 Geo. III., c. 51, § 6. By the same statute it is provided, that if the heir of entail expends money in building or repairing the mansion-house, he may become a creditor for three-fourths of the money expended to the next succeeding and subsequent heirs of entail, provided he take the steps prescribed by the statutes for preserving evidence of the expenditure, and making it a proper charge against the succeeding heirs. See the form of a summons for the expense of building a mansion-house on an entailed estate, Jurid. Styles, iii. 60. If there are more entailed estates than one, the right to build a mansion-house is not barred by the existence of a mansion-house already on another estate. The mansion-house is one of the rights to which the eldest of two or more heirs-portioners is entitled as a præcipuum. More's Notes on Stair, clxxxv.; Bell's Com. i. 53-8; Bell's Princ. § 1752, 1770; Illust. ib.; Bell on Mansus; according to Skene, a habitation, dwelling-place, or bothie; also, so much land as will sustain a man and his family honestly, and pay the duty to his master. Skene, h. t.

Manufactories and Machinery. Several statutes have been passed relative to the conduct of various manufactures, and the mutual rights and duties of master and workman. The health of young persons in factories has been provided for in certain salutary acts. See Factories. In some manufactories, justices of peace are empowered to settle differences between masters and operatives, by reference to persons of skill, or in other summary ways. The seducing of workmen to go abroad is an indictable offence; and the exporting of tools used in certain manufactures may be prevented by justices of peace, who are authorized to seize such tools when destined for exportation. A contract is beginning to come into use, by which the proprietor of a manufactory lets it for hire, along with the machinery which it contains, and sometimes with steam-power. When let without steam-power, there is no difference between such a lease and an ordinary lease of a shop,—the machinery or other articles being let according to inventory. When steam-power is included, the landlord lets the mill or building in whole or in part, with a right to each of the tenants to a proportionate share of the machinery, or of the chief mechanical power; and it is usually stipulated that the lessor shall keep the building and steam-engine, and the “great gearing” connected with the engine on the outside of the building, in proper repair; while the lessees are taken bound to keep the small machinery within their respective portions in repair. If the engine be not kept going regularly, the lessee may, upon notice in writing, appoint an engineer to superintend it, and to keep it going at the stipulated rate, and deduct the expense from the rent. A stipulation to make up stoppages, either by extra work or a deduction of rent, does not include extraordinary stoppages: the lessor is held to warrant the condition of his engine, and the lessee is entitled to damages to the extent of the loss sustained by any imperfection or fault in the engine. But although such is the general doctrine laid down by text writers on this subject (see Hunter on the Law of Landlord and Tenant, ut infra), yet the result of some decisions renders it at least questionable whether this contract is to be regarded as properly of the nature of a lease. Thus, where the question was whether, in a contract with the proprietor of a steam-engine for a supply of power, failure to pay rent for a single year entitled the lessor to stop the supply, the contract was held to be locatio operis, not lease, and the stipulated consideration to be hire, not rent; Auld, Jan. 31, 1827, 5 S. & D. 264. In a subsequent case it was found in the House of Lords (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session), that the price to be paid for a supply of steam-power and water is not rent, and that although the lease of a tenement and the hire of a steam-engine may be combined, yet they are separate stipulations; Catterns, June 6, 1834, 12 S. & D. 686, reversed 15th May 1835. *Kames' Stat. Manumission; in the Roman law, was the act by which a master gave liberty to his slave, or freed his son from the patria potestas. The slave, when made free, became his master's freedman, and owed him certain duties as patron; and if he failed in these, he returned to servitude. By the old law of England, while villanage subsisted, a lord might manumit his bondmen in various ways. Some were freed by delivery to the sheriff, and proclamation in the county; others by charter: one way was for the lord to take the bondman by the head, and say, "I will that this man may be free," and then push him forward out of his hands; and manumission was implied when the lord made an obligation for payment of money to the bondman, or sued him where he might enter without suit. Stair, B. i. tit. 2, § 13; Bank. i. 67; Ross's Lect. ii. 465; Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Manure. See Dung.

Manus Mortua. Dimittere terras ad manum mortuum, signifies to mortify lands, to dispose them to a kirk or university, the term being so used either because all casualties must necessarily be lost to the proprietor, where the vassal is a corporation which never dies, or because the property of those subjects is made over to a dead hand, which cannot, contrary to the donor's intention, transfer it to another. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 4, § 10; Skene, h. t. See Mortification.

Maps; may be founded on, when distinctly authenticated and sworn to. But a map is not evidence of itself; it is rather an admixture, explanatory of other proper evidence. Mucfarlane's Jury Prac. 183. See Plan.

Marches. By the act 1661, c. 41, ratified by 1685, c. 39, the proprietor of land may compel the conterminous proprietor to bear with him half the expense of a mutual fence or inclosure; and, in the same manner, fences once made may be kept in repair at the mutual expense of the parties. Where the march is a rivulet, which is not a sufficient fence, a proper fence may be built upon the spot, if it be practicable. The fence may run along one side of the stream; but if it be desired, the stream ought to run a space within the fence and a space without, that both parties may have the benefit of watering. A tenant, contrary to the general rule, is bound, independently of stipulation, to maintain march-fences erected by the landlord during the lease. See Fences. By the act 1669, c. 17, landholders may apply for a streighting of marches, and the judge ordinary may streight them, and order a compensation for what is taken from the one and given to the other. Considerable portions of land may be exchanged. Entailed lands are comprehended under these regulations, provided the excambion be regulated by the entail statutes. See Excambion. The conterminous proprietor ought to be called as a party. The obligation to bear the expense of half-march does not take place in small properties; and practice has excluded it where the property does not exceed five or six acres. Marcheta Mulieris; the "raide of a woman, or the first carnal copulation with her. King Evenus ordained that the lord of the ground should have the first night of each married woman within the same; but Malcolm III. abrogated this ordinance, and appointed each bridegroom to pay a piece of money, called marca, as a compensation," Skene, h. t. Bankton doubts the infamous origin of this casualty, i. p. 595; and Hailes, in a treatise on this subject, annexed to his Annals, attempts to show that no such custom ever existed in Scotland. He explains the term macheta to mean, a fine paid to the lord by a sokeman or villain, when his unmarried daughter chanced to be debauched; or a composition by the sokeman for the lord's permission to give his daughter in marriage to a person not subject to the lord's jurisdiction; or the fine for giving her away without such permission. Hailes' Annals.

Marginal Addition, or Note. A marginal addition to, or alteration on a deed, must be made before the final execution of the deed, by its being signed in presence of the witnesses. Marginal notes, being parts of the deed, require subscription. The practice is to comprehend them within the subscription; i.e., to write the Christian name upon the left side, and the surname upon the other, which must be done before the subscribing witnesses. The marginal note or addition ought to be mentioned in the testing clause of the deed: it ought to be there stated by whom the note or addition is written, and that the witnesses were also witnesses to the party's having subscribed the marginal note; otherwise it will be held pro non scripto. Such notes are presumed to have been added after the execution of the deed, unless the contrary is stated in the testing clause. *Ersk. Maritime Law. The maritime law partakes more of the character of international law than any other branch of jurisprudence; and both English and continental collections and treatises are received as authority in our courts. Formerly, the Judge-Admiral was judge in the first instance in all maritime causes; but his jurisdiction has been transferred partly to the Sheriff, and partly to the Court of Session. See Admiralty. The doctrines of maritime law are considered under the following heads in this Dictionary:—*Charter-Party. Letters of Marque. Bill of Lading. Freight. Salvage. Wrecks. Bottomry. Mark; an old English coin. The mark of silver is now 13s. 4d.; although in the reign of Henry I. it was only 6s. and a penny in weight. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Merk. Scots Money.

Mark. A subscription by a mark, and the name written around it in presence of witnesses, may, on a proof by the instrumentary witnesses, be the ground of an obligation; but it requires the evidence of the witnesses to give it validity; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, § 8. In England the personating of a person, and putting down his mark, has been held to be forgery. This form of accepting a bill is irregular, and contrary to the nature of bills, which are intended for summary execution. In certain circumstances, however, a bill so subscribed may be the ground of an action for the debt. *Stair, B. i. tit. 11, § 7; More's Notes, p. cccci.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, p. 309; Thomson on Bills, 48; Tait on Evidence, pp. 68-9, 117; Bell on Leases, i. 275. Market Overt. The law of Scotland differs from that of England as to the legal effect of a sale in open market. For the security of purchasers, the English law recognises the principle that property may in some cases be transferred by sale, although the seller has no right of property in the goods. Thus, if one steal an article, or retain in his possession goods which he has already sold; and if he sell these goods in open market, the buyer is secure of his purchase, it being held that a sale of anything vendible in market overt is not only good between the parties, but also binding on all (except the Crown) having any right or property therein. Market overt in the country is only held on the special days provided for particular towns by charter or prescription; but in the city of London every day except Sunday is market-day. The market, place, or spot of ground set apart by custom for the sale of particular goods, is also the only market overt in the country. In the city of London, however, every shop in which goods are publicly exposed to sale is market overt, but only for such things as the owner professes to trade in. But there are certain exceptions to the general rule; such as, that the property is not changed by a sale in a covert place in a fair or market—e. g. in a back room or warehouse, behind a hanging or cupboard, or where the windows of the shop are shut. In Scotland, again, no such privilege is attached to sales in open market; and the owner of goods, sold by one who has stolen them, or to whom they have been lent, may reclaim them from the purchaser. It is true that a second sale with delivery is effectual against the first sale without delivery; but this is not from any privilege of market, but from the universal doctrine of the law of Scotland, that the property of a thing sold is not transferred without delivery.

Although some doubt existed on the point in the earlier law, it is now assumed as quite fixed, that when corn, subject to the landlord's hypothec, has been sold by bulk in open market, the purchasers are safe against the operation of the hypothec. There are two exceptions to this rule: purchasers by sample in open market and purchasers at a public sale, who have been warned that the rent has not been paid, are subject to the operation of the hypothec. Earl of Dalhousie v. Dunlop, Feb. 17, 1828, 6 S. 626,—affirmed, Dec. 9, 1830, 4 W. & S. 420; Stair, B. ii. tit. 1, § 42; B. iv. tit. 25, § 6; More's Notes, p. xlviii., cli.; Bell's Com. i. 281, 287; *Add. Marking of Goods. The marking of goods is one of those forms of constructive delivery by which the property of a thing sold is transferred, while the seller retains possession. It cannot be said to be a general rule that marking goods is equivalent to delivery—Bell's Com. i. 181; but in the special case where there is some difficulty in the way of immediate delivery, marking appears to be equivalent. Thus, where the thing sold is not yet separated from the soil, and cannot instantly be separated and delivered, it is held as delivered when marked for the buyer; and the property of cattle sold while grazing seems to be transferred by their being marked for the buyer. Goods sold and sent to the buyer at a distance are not held as delivered while in the hands of a wharfinger or public warehouseman for the carrier's convenience; but if, in such circumstances, the buyer claim the goods and mark them as his, the delivery is completed. Bell's Com. i. 181, 201; Bell's Princ. § 1303; Brodie's Sup. to Stair, 897, note 9. See Delivery, and authorities there cited.

Marle-Pit. The landlord has the sole right to shell marle found within the farm; and he may work it, and make roads, &c., on paying surface damage. Marquis; is a title of honour below a duke, but above an earl.

Marriage; is a civil and solemn contract between a man and a woman, whereby they unite themselves for life in a domestic society, for the mutual solace and comfort of each other, and having in view chiefly the propagation of the species and the rearing of a family. This contract is indissoluble, except by the death of one or other of the parties, or decree of divorce founded on adultery or desertion; for, although impotency or a natural incapacity on either side for procreation is a ground on which the marriage may be annulled, yet it is not so much a ground for divorce as an essential nullity, in respect of which the contract may be declared to have been void from the first. The subject will be briefly considered in the following order:

- I. Of the constitution of marriage.
- II. Of the rights consequent on marriage.
- III. Of the manner and effects of its dissolution.

I. OF THE CONSTITUTION OF MARRIAGE.—

Marriage is a contract completed by consent alone. The parties must have arrived at the age of puberty; that is, the male at the age of fourteen, the female at the age of twelve, before they are held legally capable of the requisite consent; but after that age parties, where there is no disqualification, may validly intermarry. A marriage entered into even before the age of puberty, if the parties after arriving at that age cohabit as man and wife, is effectual; Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 2. A marriage, as regards the ceremony, may be either regular, clandestine, or by mere consent, without the intervention of a clergyman. A regular marriage is performed by a clergyman in presence of at least two witnesses, and is preceded by the proclamation of banns according to the rules of the church. A certificate of the session-clerk is received as evidence of proclamation of banns. See Banns. The consent of parents or of curators is not required in order to constitute a legal marriage by the law of Scotland. Clandestine marriages are also performed by clergymen, and are equally effectual with regular marriages; but they expose the clergyman and the parties to certain penalties. They differ from regular marriages in this, that they are not preceded by the publication of banns. See Clandestine Marriage. Marriage being a civil contract, may be completed by consent alone, solemnly and deliberately given de præsenti. In the case of an antenuptial contract of marriage, where the parties, according to the expression in the deed, agree to take each other as husband and wife, the effect of this agreement as a de præsenti acceptance is counteracted by the subsequent obligation which the deed also contains, to enter de futuro into a regular marriage; thus indicating the understanding of the parties that the written contract imports a mere engagement to enter into the marriage hereafter. See Espousals. Contract of Marriage. Deliberate consent de præsenti, without a copula, completes a marriage; for, according to the law of Scotland, consensus non coitus facit matrimonium. So, also, a promise or engagement to marry, followed by a copula, constitutes a marriage; for, præsumptio juris et de jure, consent de præsenti is presumed to have been adhibited at the time of the copula. In marriage thus constituted, the copula must be proved to have taken place. See Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, 16th July 1811, Consistorial Court, London, Haggart's Reports, ii. 54. It must be distinctly shown that the promise preceded the copula, for a promise after copula does not constitute marriage, unless the intercourse be renewed in such a way as to show that the new copula follows upon and is connected with the promise. The question has been raised whether promise subsequente copula constitutes a marriage ipso jure? or whether it requires a declarator or subsequent completion of the marriage, which may be barred by another marriage intervening? It was held, but with some division on the bench, that the marriage is constituted ipso jure; Pennycook, Dec. 15, 1752, M. 12,677. A promise or engagement to marry, however formal, where no copula has followed, may be resiled from; the party so resiling, however, being liable in damages for breach of promise. Marriage may be constituted by an acknowledgment in writing, or by an acknowledgment made to the midwife who delivered, or to the clergyman who christened, a child born to the spouses. But in order to fix the status, it is necessary that the written acknowledgment should have been produced and acted upon during the lifetime of both parties. It is not sufficient that, after a man's death, an acknowledgment by him is produced certifying that he was married to a certain person. This will not give the woman the status of his widow. Marriage also may be inferred from cohabitation, and from the parties living together at bed and board, and being habit and repute husband and wife; 1503, c. 77. But if the habit and repute have begun in avowed concubinage, a palpable change of purpose must be shown in order to establish a marriage by habit and repute. This statute gives the terce to a woman who has been reputed the wife of a man till his death. With regard to the evidence of a marriage having been contracted, the exchange of mutual consent de præsenti, or cohabitation, or habit and repute, may be proved by parole evidence; but a promise of marriage can, like other promises, be competently proved in the ordinary case only by writ or oath of party. When a marriage is once fairly constituted, no subsequent acts of the parties (except such as warrant divorce) can dissolve it; but in the case of an irregular marriage, it is competent to found on subsequent facts and circumstances as qualifying the previous apparent consent, so as to show that the parties never had any deliberate or serious purpose of marriage. See Evidence.

The legal disqualifications for marriage are, 1. Pupillarity, since a person before arriving at the age of puberty is not legally capable of giving consent. 2. Defect of judgment, as in the case of idiocy, because an idiot cannot give that consent which is requisite to complete the contract of marriage. 3. Impotency; but it is jus tertii in any other than the parties to plead impotency as a nullity. 4. The having entered into a previous marriage which still subsists. 5. By the act 1600, c. 20, a marriage between a divorced person and his or her paramour, mentioned as such in the decree of divorce, is declared illegal. See Divorce. Adultery. 6. Propinquity within the forbidden degrees is a ground for dissolving a marriage; and the act 1567, c. 15, adopts the Jewish law, by declaring that marriage shall be as free as God has permitted it, and that seconds in the degrees of consanguinity and affinity, and all degrees further removed, contained in the Word of God, may lawfully intermarry. By Leviticus, c. xviii., the following rules are laid down: 1. Intermarriages between ascendants and descendants in infinitum, are prohibited. 2. Marriage in the collateral line in infinitum, is forbidden; that is, where the one party is brother or sister to the direct ascendant of the other party. 3. In every instance not falling under those rules, marriage is lawful in the second degree, according to the canon law, or in the fourth degree, according to the Roman law. See Kin. Consequently, cousins-german, and all more remote relations, may intermarry. 4. The degrees in consanguinity which are prohibited are equally prohibited in affinity; and the rules are the same whether the parties are related by full or only by half-blood; Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 3, et. seq.

By the act 19 and 20 Vict., c. 96, 1856, no irregular marriage contracted in Scotland, by declaration, acknowledgment, or ceremony, is valid, unless one of the parties had, at the date of the marriage, his or her usual place of residence in Scotland, or had lived there for twenty-one days preceding the marriage.

II. OF THE RIGHTS CONSEQUENT ON MARRIAGE.—The first effect of marriage is to produce a communion of goods, which extends to all subjects not heritable, excepting personal bonds bearing interest. (See Bond.) Though the goods of the married pair are in communion, yet the management of them is vested by law in the husband, and this power of management is termed the jus mariti. See Jus Mariti. Goods in Communion. The husband is the proper curator of his wife; and immediately on the marriage, the office of her curator, where she happens to be in minority and to have a curator, expires; the whole of his powers and duties being devolved on the husband. Hence, in every action brought against a wife, the husband must be called for his interest; and, in virtue of the husband's power over the person of his wife, she cannot be imprisoned for debt. He is imprisoned in place of her for the non-payment of her debts, or the non-performance of her obligations, unless where the diligence issues against the wife on account of her failure to perform an act within her power, or where she is imprisoned in modum pænæ for a delict. See Delict. Another consequence of the curatorial power of the husband is, that he must sign as consenter to the wife's deeds; and where he does sign as such, the deed is not reducible on the head of lesion, as in the common case of a deed consented to by a curator. But all personal obligations on the wife are null, though signed by the husband as consenter, excepting in the case where she has a separate stock, exclusive of the husband's jus mariti, which the wife may assign or burden; or where a separation has taken place between the husband and wife; or where the wife is intrusted with the management of a particular branch of business, as præposita, or with the affairs of her husband; and there, her acts bind her husband. Under this præpositura are included furnishings made to the family, for which the husband is liable, unless he see reason to inhibit his wife. See Præpositura. Inhibition of a Wife. The wife may, without her husband's consent, execute a testament or a mortis causa conveyance of her landed estate, provided she be of age at the time of executing the deed. These are the rights consequent on marriage during its subsistence. The other rights arising to either party do not emerge until the dissolution of the marriage. See Terce. Jus Relictæ. Courtesy. Goods in Communion. Legitim, &c. Where either party, during the subsistence of the marriage, makes a gift or donation to the other, it is in the power of the donor to retract it, either by an express revocation, or by implication, as by making a subsequent donation of the same subject, or even by contracting debt, in satisfaction of which the subject may be taken notwithstanding the donation. But this does not apply to mutual remuneratory grants; hence, postnuptial contracts, where there have been no previous provisions for the spouses, are not, so far as they are rational, revocable. It is to be observed, however, that a deed by the husband, proceeding on the narrative of his having value of the wife's in his hands, is not revocable, unless on evidence of its falsehood. See Donatio inter Virum et Uzorem. Contract of Marriage. All deeds executed by a wife, or to which she consents, ought to be ratified by her in presence of a judge, and out of the presence of her husband. This ratification is a declaration by the wife, upon oath, emitted before a magistrate, that she has acted freely and voluntarily in executing the deed; and, if regularly done, it precludes her from challenging the deed. The ratification, however, has no effect in preventing her from recalling a donation to her husband. Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 1, 28, et seq. See Ratification.

III. OF THE MANNER AND EFFECTS OF THE DISSOLUTION OF MARRIAGE.—Marriage is dissolved by the death of either of the parties, or by a sentence of divorce. Divorce is the sentence of the Court of Session (as coming in place of the late Commissary Court), declaring the marriage to be dissolved; and the divorce may proceed either on the ground of adultery, or of wilful desertion. See Divorce. Desertion.

EFFECTS OF THE DISSOLUTION OF THE MARRIAGE.—Formerly, where the marriage was dissolved by death within year and day of the marriage, without the birth of a living child, and where the matter was not otherwise regulated in the contract of marriage, all grants made in consideration of the marriage became void; the tocher returned to the wife, or to her executors, or to the giver; and every interest in the estate of the husband returned to the husband. But this related only to the provisions as between the parties; for a provision to one of them, by a grant, for example, and not given to the other, was effectual notwithstanding the dissolution of the marriage. It was therefore provisions by the one to the other, or provisions made intuitu matrimonii, which fell by the dissolution within year and day without a living child. In accounting for the tocher in the event of such premature dissolution, the husband was entitled to deduct the funeral expenses of the wife; and where matters could not be restored on either side, the rule as to restitution did not hold, as it would have been unjust to restore to one party and not to the other. Gifts by the friends of the new married pair did not fall under the rule, but are divided; Waugh, Jan. 14, 1679, M. 6179. But the case of such a premature dissolution was usually regulated by a special clause in the contract of marriage, modifying or altering the legal rule. See Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 38, et seq.

By the act 18 Vict., c. 23, 1855, it is enacted, that when a marriage is dissolved before the lapse of a year and day from its date by the death of one of the spouses, the whole rights of the survivor, and of the representatives of the predecessor, shall be the same as if the marriage had subsisted for a year and day.

1. By the death of the wife.—If there has been a living child born of the marriage, and if the wife has left no heir to her heritage by a former marriage, the surviving husband has a liferent right to the rents and profits of the wife's heritable estate, which is called the courtesy. On the death of the wife, the goods in communion also suffer a division. Formerly, where there were no children, the free goods in communion, after deduction of debts, were divided into two equal parts, one of which belonged to the husband, the other to the next of kin of the wife, unless she had destined it otherwise by a testamentary or other deed. Where there were children of the marriage, or children of the husband by a former marriage not forisfiliated, one-third only was the wife's share. (Stair, B. i. tit. 4, § 21.)

By the act 18 Vict., c. 23, 1855, where a wife predeceases her husband, her next of kin, executors, or other representatives, whether testate or intestate, have no right to any share of the goods in communion; and no legacy, or bequest, or testamentary disposition thereof by the wife, will affect the goods in communion. On the death of the wife, the children have no claim to legitim, that being a claim which arises only on the death of the father; but formerly, if they were of age, they might have insisted for an immediate distribution of their deceased mother's share of the goods in communion. Where the children of the last marriage were under age, the father, as their administrator, was entitled to the management of this share; and if, in the course of such management, he became insolvent, before having accounted to the children for their mother's share, they had a jus crediti to the extent of that share, which entitled them to rank on their father's bankrupt estate. But before they could so rank, it must have appeared that at the date of the dissolution of the marriage the husband was solvent, and that the sum for which they claimed to be ranked was no more than the free third of the goods in communion. The children of the wife by a former marriage, who, along with the children of her last marriage, are her next in kin, might also have insisted for their proportion of their mother's share of the goods in communion immediately on the dissolution of the marriage; and where the wife had no children by either marriage, her next in kin of more remote degrees might also have insisted for an immediate distribution. See Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 41. See also Courtesy. Jus Relictæ. Executry. Executors.

2. By the death of the husband.—Where the wife has no conventional provision, she has a right to the terce, which is a liferent of a third of the heritage in which the husband died infest; 1681, c. 10. She has also the jus relictæ, which is a share of the free moveable estate, or goods in communion, amounting to one-half where there are no children of the marriage, or where the husband has left no children by a former marriage—and to one-third only where there are children. The widow has also a claim for aliment, from the time of her husband's death to the first term of payment of her provision. She has likewise a claim to mournings; and where she is delivered of a posthumous child, she is entitled to the expenses attending the birth, &c.; Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 41, note; see Mr Ivory's edition, note 172. The children, on their father's death, have a right to legitim, which is a third part of the free goods in communion. But although such are the legal rules, it generally happens that the parties, instead of leaving the law to operate, regulate their own rights and those of their children by special contracts of marriage or other settlements. In that case, the particular contract or deed will afford the rule, where it is not ultra vires of the contracting parties; as to which, see Contract of Marriage. Legitim. Jus Relictæ. Terce.

II. Effects of dissolution by divorce.—The effects of the dissolution of a marriage by divorce, whether on the ground of adultery or of wilful desertion, are fully explained under the article Divorce. See also Desertion. The legal or conventional rights of the children of the marriage are not altered or affected by this method of dissolving the marriage.

SEPARATION.—A wife, on account of harsh usage, may sue for a separate maintenance; which, on proving the husband's misconduct, she will be allowed; or the parties, on account of mutual dissatisfaction, or from other causes, may agree to live apart. The amount of the allowance made on these occasions is regulated by the rank and fortune of the parties, and by the other circumstances of the particular case. Where the terms on which the spouses are to separate are reduced into writing, the deed is called a contract of separation. But such voluntary separations are revocable at any time; for no such separation, whether judicial or voluntary, amounts to a dissolution of the marriage; and, while the marriage subsists, the law looks unfavourably on any arrangement adverse to the inherent nature of the institution. See Separation. And see, on the subject of this article generally, Stair, B. i. tit. 4; More's Notes, p. xiii; Bank, vol. i. p. 105, 140; Bell's Princ. § 1506, et seq.; Illust. ib.; Tovey, May 14, 1813, 1 Dow, 117; Macadam, May 17, 1813, 1 Dow, 148. Marriage; was a casualty in wardholding, which entitled the ward superior to demand a certain sum from the heir of his former vassal, on the heir's marriage, or on his becoming marriageable. Wardholding was abolished by the statute 20 Geo. II. c. 50; and as it had been customary for superiors in feu-rights to insert a clause, declaring that the vassal should be liable in the casualty of marriage, the same statute, § 10, prohibits such a clause, and declares it to be of no force, even although inserted in deeds prior in date to the statute. The compensation to superiors who may suffer by the retrospective operation of the statute is the same as that provided for superiors who have lost by the abolition of clauses de non alienando. Stair, B. ii. tit. 4, §§ 37-61; More's Notes, p. ccviii.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, §§ 18, 20, 21; Bank, vol. i. p. 637; *Kames' Stat. Marriage, English. Originally, the contract of marriage seems to have been as little encumbered with forms in England as in Scotland. But by the Marriage Act of 1757, it was required, under pain of annulling the marriage, that the consent of parents or guardians should be given to the marriage of minors; and that there should be publication by banns, and open celebration in the parish church, or in a chapel in which marriage was wont to be celebrated. The rules have, however, been considerably relaxed by recent statutes; and now the marriages of dissenters, such as Jews, Quakers, Roman Catholics, and other sects and persuasions, may be legally and adequately solemnized in their own synagogues, tabernacles, chapels or meeting-houses, subject to certain restrictions. It is now the law, that marriages may be solemnized not only in churches and licensed Episcopal chapels, but also at places of worship registered according to 52 Geo. III., c. 155, in the presence of a registrar, or his deputy, and two credible witnesses, or at the office of a superintendant-registrar, in his presence, and in the presence of a registrar of the district, or his deputy, and of two credible witnesses. The parties, solemnizing marriage in a registered building, may adopt any form or ceremony they may think fit, provided that in some part of the ceremony, and in presence of the registrar and witnesses, each of the parties declares as follows: "I do solemnly declare, That I know not of any lawful impediment why I, A. B., may not be joined in matrimony to C. D.;" and each of the parties must say to the other, "I call upon these persons here present to witness that I, A. B., do take thee, C. D., to be my lawful wedded wife, or husband." Provision is also made for the giving of notice in lieu of banns. See 4 and 5 Will. IV., c. 28; 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 85; 1 Vict., c. 22; and 3 and 4 Vict., c. 72.

Marriages, Registration of.—The registration of births, deaths, and marriages is regulated by the acts 17 and 18 Vict., c. 80, 1854; 18 Vict., c. 29, 1855; and 19 and 20 Vict., c. 119, 1856.

Martial Law; that branch of the laws of war which respects military discipline, or the government and control of persons employed in the operations or for the purposes of war. Military law is not exclusive of the common law, for a man, by becoming a soldier, does not cease to be a citizen; he is still answerable in the ordinary courts of law for his conduct in that capacity. Acts are passed annually for the government of the forces, naval and military. See Court-Martial, and authorities there cited. Law of Arms. See Mutiny Act.

Mason Lodges. The acts 37 Geo. III., c. 123, and 39 Geo. III., c. 79, against unlawful societies, were declared not to extend to regular lodges of Freemasons which were in use to be held before these acts were passed. But this exemption is not to be enjoyed unless two members of each lodge claiming it certified, upon oath, before any justice of peace, or other magistrate, that such lodge had, before passing the act, been usually held as a lodge of Freemasons, and according to the rules prevailing among such lodges in this kingdom; which certificate, attested by the magistrate, and subscribed by the persons certifying, must, within two months after the act passed, have been deposited with the clerk of the peace for the place where such lodge is usually held. It was also necessary that the name of the lodge, the places and times of its meetings, and the names and descriptions of all its members, should be registered with the clerk of the peace within two months after passing the acts; and this must still be done on or before 25th March, yearly. The clerk of the peace is directed to lay such certificate and registry once a year before the general sessions, who may order any lodge to be discontinued, if likely to be injurious to the public peace. Like most other societies constituted for other purposes than trade, mason lodges can neither sue nor be sued by their office-bearers; *Lodge of Lanark v. Master and Servant. A servant may agree to serve either for wages, or for bed, board, and clothing, &c., for a determinate time. Where this engagement is to continue for one year, it may be proved by witnesses; where it is meant to exceed that period, it must be established by writing. A servant, undertaking any particular work, ought to be acquainted with the work, and capable of performing it, and is liable for any loss arising from his want of skill, or carelessness. But if the loss or delay is not imputable to him, he is entitled to his full wages. A servant hired for a period of time is entitled to his wages, though he should be disabled for part of the time through sickness or accident. This has been carried the length of one-fifth part of the time, in an agreement for a year; Nov. 29, 1794, White. If he dies during his service, his wages are due only to the day of his death. Where the master dies, the servant is entitled to wages and board-wages to the next term. The same happens where the master turns off a servant between terms, or without giving the servant due time to provide himself with a place; but in these cases, as the servant is at liberty to employ his time, some allowance ought to be made, according to circumstances. A servant, on the other hand, who deserts his service, forfeits his wages, and is liable in damages, as well as to a fine. Servants' wages fall under the triennial prescription; and when it appears that a claim for remuneration is substantially a claim for wages as a servant, this rule holds, although there have been no agreement as to the remuneration; Smellie, Feb. 25, 1835, 13 S. & D. 544, and Nov. 17, 1835, 14 S. & D. 12. Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 5; More's Notes, p. lviii.; *Ersk. Master of a Ship. The shipmaster is the person who has the sole direction of the course and conduct of the ship. The shipmaster of a British ship must be a British subject, but there is no other limitation; and whoever holds the appointment may bind the owners in relation to third parties, even where he has not been appointed by the owners of the ship. While at home, the ship's-husband has the management of the outfit; but if there be no ship's-husband appointed, and the owners do not take the management into their own hands, the master has an implied power to order the outfit. While at home, he has no power to freight the ship; but when the ship is advertised for general freight, he has full authority to receive goods on board. When abroad, he may freight the ship, and take the management of the fitting out, victualling, and manning of the ship, and ordering of necessities. He may even borrow money for those purposes, provided the bond or voucher specify the purpose to which the loan has been applied. But this dangerous power is not extended beyond what falls within the proper province of the shipmaster. He may hypothecate the ship for necessities. His fault or neglect binds the owners to the extent of the value of the ship; and he himself is also bound. He may be dismissed by his owners at once, his only remedy being an action. *Ersk. Maxims. The maxims, particularly of the Roman law, are of great value, as embodying important legal principles in concise and apposite language. In the investigation of legal questions involving much nicety, and obscured, it may be, by perplexing details, it not unfrequently happens that a single legal maxim solves the difficulty, and enables the lawyer to systematize and arrange conflicting principles, and apparently inextricable involutions of fact. In the present work, many law maxims have been included in the alphabetical arrangement; but at the hazard of repetition, the principal maxims are here brought into one view,—referring to the separate articles for full expositions, where such have appeared to be necessary. Observe, however, that several of these maxims have not been adopted in the law of Scotland.

Measurement. The effect of a sale of land by measurement depends upon the question, whether the measurement is taxative or exegetical in its terms. Whenever it appears that the measurement forms part of the contract, and is looked upon by the parties as an essential condition, the purchaser's right is confined by that measurement as by a bounding description; but if the measurement is merely spoken of in advertisements, or appears upon a plan or survey of the estate, as giving a general idea of the extent of the estate, the purchaser is not bound or entitled to consider it as a condition, or as relieving him of his obligation to satisfy himself by his own inquiries. In one case it was held that infestment in a mill and four acres of land was demonstrative and not taxative, and entitled the holder, with immemorial possession, to resist a removing from land beyond the four acres; Douglas, Feb. 2, 1630, M. 2262. In leases, it is often a difficult question, whether or not the measurement given of the farm is intended to be taxative; and it has been recommended that a measurement ought never to be admitted into the description without some qualifying words, to show that the contents are expressed in a demonstrative sense only. It is not settled what would be the effect of a false measurement,—whether it would invalidate the lease or give a ground for abatement of the rent; Balmer v. Hogarth, March 11, 1830, 8 S. & D. 715; considered in the House of Lords in 1832—see 10 S. & D. 862. See Quanti minoris. The measurement of a commodity sold is often an important element in the question of the delivery of the commodity, and consequent transfer of the property. Bell's Com. i. 181; ii. 284; Brown on Sale, 44 et seq.; Bell on Leases, i. 201; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 290. Medical Jurisprudence; is the application of the principles of medical science to the administration of justice and the preservation of the public health. The subjects with which chiefly it is conversant are, the development of the human frame; the duration of life; personal identity; marriage; impotency; pregnancy; paternity; presumption of survivorship; mental alienation; nuisances; detection of forgery and coining by chemical tests; rape; murder; poison, and the like. Medietas Linguae; in English law, a jury, half natives, half foreigners, used in pleas between a foreigner and a denizen. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Meditatio Fugæ. When a creditor is in circumstances to make oath that his debtor, whether native or foreigner, is in meditatione fugæ in order to avoid the payment of his debt, or where he has reasonable ground for apprehending that the debtor has such an intention, it is competent for the creditor to apply to a magistrate, who, on inquiring into the circumstances, and finding reason to believe that the creditor's application is well founded, will grant a warrant for apprehending the debtor for examination; and may afterwards grant warrant to imprison him until he find caution judicio sisti. But should the creditor have proceeded without sufficient grounds for his application, he will be liable in damages; and even the judge who incautiously and illegally grants such a warrant incurs a similar responsibility. See Ersk. B. i.

tit. 2, § 21. This application is of a summary nature, and may be presented to any magistrate or judge ordinary; to the Court of Session,—the sheriff,—magistrates of burghs,—justices of peace, and when the debtor is in the Sanctuary, to the bailie of the Abbey. The last reported case of an application made to the Court of Session in the first instance was in the year 1700; but Hutcheson mentions a case which occurred in 1795; Hutch. i. 432. In general, the application is made to a magistrate exercising authority within the bounds where the debtor resides. If he has left that jurisdiction, he may be apprehended in any other place, on the warrant being indorsed by a magistrate exercising jurisdiction in the new territory; and, on being apprehended, he may be transmitted to the first magistrate for examination. The concurring magistrate cannot commit the debtor: to give him that power, there must be an original application to himself. When the creditor is a company, one of the partners of the company must make oath. When the creditor resides out of Scotland, the application is made in his name; but he must have a mandatary in Scotland. (See Mandatary.) The creditor must make an affidavit before a qualified person, and the mandatary ought to make a corroborative affidavit before the magistrate in Scotland. There is no necessity to produce a ground of debt—a claim of debt attested by the affidavit of the creditor is sufficient. It is not necessary that the debt be constituted by bill or decree, or that it be past due and payable. The Court has allowed this remedy even in cases in which the debt was contingent; but an application for warrant to incarcerate a person as in meditatione fugæ, till he found security not only for certain arrears and current rents, but for the prospective rents under a lease having fifteen years to run, was held to be irregular, and damages were awarded; M'Gill, March 17, 1837, 15 S. 882. The debt must in all cases be specific, that the cautioner may know the extent of his obligation. The circumstances which led the creditor to believe that the debtor means to fly the country must be stated, and the creditor's oath must bear this out. Without this statement and oath, both the creditor and judge would be exposed to a claim of damages at the instance of the debtor, were imprisonment to take place. But in the special case, where the debtor on examination admitted the debt and his intention to leave the country, the warrant of committal was supported without the creditor's oath. It is improper for the magistrate to delegate to any one the taking of the creditor's oath, or the examination of the debtor. The reasons of belief must be sufficient to satisfy the judge. Immediately on the application to the judge, if the grounds of suspicion be pregnant, he grants a summary warrant for apprehending the debtor; and, on his apprehension, he ought to be examined by the judge; and it is from the circumstances as appearing on that examination that the judge will be enabled to determine as to the propriety of granting a warrant of imprisonment. The creditor's oath is taken as prima facie evidence of the existence of the debt. But when the debtor denies his intention to leave the country, and admits no suspicious circumstances, the magistrate ought not to commit without further evidence. Where the debtor has not sufficiently explained himself on his first examination, he may apply for another. When a proof is to be taken, the debtor may be detained on a warrant during the time of proving; and he is sometimes committed till he find caution to abide the issue. In either case, he must be liberated on finding caution to abide the issue. It is not a sufficient ground for this warrant that the debtor means to remove from one place of the country to another; he must have intended to leave Scotland. But it may be granted wherever there is a real intention to leave the country, even although the debtor should have a good reason for going, and no fraudulent design. So far, indeed, has this been carried, that an officer proceeding to join his regiment abroad was found liable to be arrested on a meditatio fugæ warrant. But the Court have more recently disapproved of that extension of the doctrine; Bryson, 10th March 1812, Fac. Coll. and App. to Mor. A meditatio fugæ warrant cannot be granted upon a debt below the statutory sum for which a debtor can be incarcerated; Marshall v. Dobson, Dec. 18, 1844, 7 D. 232.

The meditatio fugæ warrant is given equally against a foreigner as a native. There has been considerable fluctuation in the decisions as to what will be sufficient to expose a foreigner to this warrant. But there must at all events exist the grounds of jurisdiction for an ordinary action at law. The cases relative to the application against a foreigner are collected by Mr Barclay, in his treatise on meditatio fugæ; and the conclusions at which he arrives on a review of these cases are, That a foreigner is subject to the operation of this warrant—1st, Where he has acquired a legal domicile by forty days' fixed residence in Scotland, whether the debt be foreign or not; 2d, He is liable to be attached for Scotch debts, even where he has not acquired a domicile; and this rule is strengthened if the debts have been contracted since his last arrival; 3d, Where he has left another country to avoid his creditors, and is in this country not with the intention of fixing his residence here, but with the view of avoiding his creditors; and in this case he may be attached by foreign as well as by Scotch creditors. The possession of a landed estate in Scotland has no effect upon his liability. It would appear that a meditatio fugæ warrant cannot be competently taken out against a foreigner not resident in this country, but on a journey of pleasure or of business, with no intention of defrauding his creditors; Bell's Com. ii. 563; Barclay, 57. This warrant differs from the ordinary personal diligence of the law, in so far that, being quodammodo criminal, it may be executed on Sunday as well as on any ordinary day. It may also be executed within the Sanctuary of Holyroodhouse, in which case the concurrence of the bailie of the Abbey is necessary. Nor will a personal protection under the Bankrupt Statute be any safeguard. Those, however, who are exempted from imprisonment by privilege, are free from the effects of the warrant; because it is a mere auxiliary to the right of imprisoning the debtor. When a debtor is imprisoned on a meditatio fugæ warrant, he is imprisoned for custody only, not that he may be compelled to pay by the squalor carceris; and therefore, although the magistrates should suffer him to escape, yet, if they recover his person in time to produce him at the requisite diets of court, they will not be liable to the creditor in any damages, or for the debt. This distinction between incarceration for debt and on a meditatio fugæ warrant was fixed in the case Brown, Nov. 16, 1792, Mor. 11,763. Relief from the imprisonment on this warrant is obtained by the debtor finding caution judicio sisti. See Caution judicio sisti. The law upon this subject has been very ably digested by Mr Barclay in his treatise on meditatio fugæ warrants, in the appendix to which styles are given of the petition and other procedure. Meliorations. Questions as to a claim for the expense of improvements upon land may be raised in three different situations: when the improvements have been made under a lease; when they have been made under a deed of entail; and when they have been made on a liferented estate. 1. Meliorations under a lease.—When a tenant, of his own accord, expends money and labour in the improvement of his farm, this is presumed to be done not for the permanent benefit of the farm, but for his own use during the remainder of his lease. A tenant therefore is, in general, held not entitled to any recompense for such improvements. (See Fences. Fixtures. Houses.) Where, however, a tenant makes improvements in contemplation of his lease subsisting for the full period, and it happens to be terminated abruptly, he is in equity entitled to recompense, when the landlord can be proved lucratus by the transaction. In urban subjects, a distinction is taken between the expense of ornaments or mere conveniences, and of necessary repairs. The tenant has no claim for the former without express stipulation; but he is entitled to be compensated for the latter. (See Repairs.) These are the rules when there has been no stipulation; but it is usual to make repairs and meliorations the subject of express agreement. A clause binding the landlord to make the necessary meliorations is binding on the heir in the first instance; but the lessee will have a claim against the executors, if he cannot obtain implement from the heir. An heir of entail succeeding is not liable at common law to implement stipulations for improvements entered into by the heir in possession; but he may be made liable to a certain extent, by the exercise of the statutory powers (see infra, No. 2). A clause in a lease obliging the lessor to make meliorations, or to allow the lessee a sum for that purpose, or to reimburse him for outlay, will be binding upon singular successors; Arbuthnot, Feb. 5, 1772, M. 10,424; Stotts, Feb. 20, 1817, F.C. See also Stewart v. McRa, Nov. 12, 1834, 13 S. 4. An obligation upon the tenant to uphold, with a right to indemnification of any excess of value in additions, limits the tenant to the mere rebuilding or reparation of what becomes ruinous, and to the making of necessary or suitable improvements, but gives no right to pull down old houses or erect new ones, not necessary or suitable to the farm. Express clauses supersede local customs, as to indemnification for meliorations. An obligation on the tenant to meliorate or repair, if not implemented by himself, falls upon his representatives. But the burden falls upon an assignee or a sub-lessee, whether acknowledged by the landlord or not.

2. Meliorations by an heir in possession.—Certain statutory powers have been conferred upon heirs of entail in possession, by the exercise of which they may throw a proportion of the expense of improvements upon the substitutes; 10 Geo. III., c. 51, §§ 9-26. But the heir in possession under a strict entail has no means of burdening succeeding heirs with the price of meliorations, except by compliance with the terms of this statute. The act provides, that any heir of entail, laying out money in improvements, shall be a creditor to the succeeding and subsequent heirs of entail for three-fourths of the money expended, to the extent of four years' free rent of the entailed estate, after deducting liferents, and public burdens, and interest of debts, provided he give notice in writing to the heir of entail next after his own issue, three months before commencing his improvement, of the kind of improvement intended; and lodge a copy with the sheriff-clerk; and annually, within four months after Martinmas, lodge with the sheriff-clerk an account signed by him, with the vouchers of the money expended that year. The Rutherford Act provides for improvements not executed in terms of the Montgomery Act; see act 11 and 12 Vict., c. 36, § 16, 1848. See Tailzie. Mansion-House.

3. Meliorations on a liferent estate.—A liferenter is bound to pay the interest of money laid out on necessary repairs of the liferented tenement. If the subject fall into decay or be destroyed by accident, neither the liferenter nor the fiar will be bound to repair or rebuild; and the liferenter may continue to draw the rent of the subject such as it remains. If, however, the fiar should repair or rebuild the house, the liferenter cannot possess it without paying the interest of the money expended. Laird v. Fenwick, Feb. 10, 1807; M. App. voce Liferenter. See Liferent. Memorandum. It appears to be settled in the law of England, that a memorandum, written either on a bill or note, or on a separate paper, with the consent of parties before they subscribe, may limit or do away with the effect of the instrument in questions between the original parties, but not against a bona fide onerous indorsee. The memorandum has this effect only when proved to have been written before the subscription of the bill or note; and a memorandum annexed to a promissory-note, specifying a particular place of payment, is not in any case to be held as part of the note, or as limiting its operation. Mercy, Recommendation to. A jury is not entitled, in those cases in which the law seems to be rigorous, to return a verdict of acquittal in opposition to law. Mese; of herring, contains five hundred. Skene, h. t.

Messenger-at-Arms; an officer appointed by and under the control of the Lyon King-at-Arms. (See Lyon.) Messengers-at-arms are said to be subservient to the Supreme Courts of Session and Justiciary, and they are employed in executing all summonses and letters of diligence, both in civil and criminal matters. Our signet letters seem to have been devised by the judges of the King's Court to supply the ancient writs of the law, and they were constantly directed to messengers-at-arms, as sheriffs in that part. It is the character, therefore, of sheriff in that part which has placed this duty in the hands of messengers-at-arms. Messengers and their cautioners are liable for damage occasioned by their undue or defective execution of diligence; but they are not liable for the loss of the debt until it has been constituted against the debtor. It is incompetent for a messenger to execute diligence for his own behoof and that of another party, on a bill which he has indorsed; Dalgleish, June 18, 1822, 1 S. & D. 506. A messenger cannot be a procurator before a sheriff-court; Bowhill, June 2, 1825, 4 S. & D. 61. In a simple reduction of a decree of suspension, the party who had, as messenger, signed the execution of intimation of sist, but was subsequently deprived of his office, was allowed to be called as a witness to disprove his own execution, and these circumstances were held only to affect his credibility; *Aitchison, Dec. 28, 1836, 15 S. 360. Messis Sementem Sequitur; the crop belongs to the possessor by whom it was sown; is a maxim applied to the case of bona fide possession, and also in questions between heir and executor. Where a person is in possession of land which he has reason to believe to be his own, and sows that land, he has right to reap the crop sown by him, although, before it be cut down, it should be discovered that another has a preferable title to the land. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 26; Connel on Parishes, 435. See Bona Fides.

Messuage; signifies the principal dwelling-house of a barony, in which sense it is synonymous with the English expression manor-house. In the law of England, messuage signifies a dwelling-house with some laud adjoining, assigned for its use. Under this name may be included a garden, shop, mill, cottage, chamber, cellar, or the like. See Skene, h. t.; Ross's Lect. ii. 137; Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Metus. See Force and Fear.

Michaelmas Head-Court; the annual meeting of the freeholders and commissioners of supply of a county, held at Michaelmas for various county purposes. This was formerly one of those meetings at which the presence of the heritors was required under a fine; but, by 20 Geo. II., c. 50, abolishing ward-holding, no heritor can now be fined for absence, unless he shall have been summoned as a jurymen, or for some other legal purpose. It was at this meeting that, under the old election law, the roll of freeholders was revised, applications for enrolment disposed of, and freeholders put upon the roll, and the roll purged of those who had died, or disposed of the property on which they formerly stood enrolled; Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 5. The duties formerly discharged by the freeholders were transferred to the commissioners of supply by 2 and 3 Will. IV., c. 65. See Election Laws. Reform Act. Commissioners of Supply.

Mid-Couples. Where an heir, assignee, or adjudger takes infeftment in virtue of a precept of sasine granted in favour of his predecessor or author, it is necessary to deduce in the instrument of sasine the writings by which he is connected with the precept; 1693, c. 5. These writings are called the mid-couples. More's Notes on Stair, cliv.

Mid-Impediment; the Roman law medium impedimentum; is anything which intervenes between two events, and prevents, quoad the former event, the retrospective operation of the latter. Thus, anything occurring between the date of a sasine on a precept a me and the charter of confirmation, to prevent the superior from granting a charter of confirmation, is called a mid-impediment. If the former proprietor have granted a conveyance to another person, on the procuratory of which that person has resigned and obtained a charter of resignation on which sasine has followed, the right will be completely transferred, and the superior's confirmation of the other conveyance will be unavailing. *Ersk. Com. i. 682; Bell's Princ. § 812; Illust. ib. See Confirmation. As to the mid-impediment of an intervening marriage, in questions of legitimation per subsequens matrimonium, see Legitimation.

Military Law. See Martial Law. Court-Martial.

Military Testament. Among the Romans, certain ceremonies necessary in testaments were dispensed with in the testaments of soldiers, on account of their ignorance, or ob imminens vitæ periculum. In like manner, in this country, soldiers may make nuncupative wills, and dispose of their goods, arrears of pay and other personal property, without the forms and solemnities required in other cases. Heineccii Elementa, p. 167; Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Milites; in old law language, freeholders holding their lands of barons in chief. Skene, h. t.

Militia; as distinguished from the regular forces, means the body of men who may be annually called out for a limited time, and armed and embodied for military service on occasions of emergency. After much uncertainty and change, the militia laws of England and Scotland were consolidated by 42 Geo. III., c. 90 and 91; and these statutes, with that of 49 Geo. III., c. 120, applicable to Ireland, contain, with some partial amendments made by later acts, the law applicable to the militia of the United Kingdom. The Sovereign appoints lords-lieutenant in England and Scotland (see Lieutenant), and governors in Ireland, to each county and province, with power to call out and train the militia annually, and to appoint twenty or more deputy lieutenants or governors, or other officers, subject to the royal approval. The qualifications for holding commissions are the possession of a certain amount of property, varying according to the rank. At the annual general meeting of the lieutenancy of each county, the next subdivision meeting is appointed, to which chief constables, or other officers, are required to direct constables or schoolmasters to return lists of all males, between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, in their respective parishes. By this means lists are obtained, which are transmitted to the Privy Council, distinguishing those liable to serve from those exempt. The men to be enrolled are chosen by ballot from every parish; all who are not above four feet and five inches in height, or are not approved of on examination by a surgeon, being discharged, and others balloted for in their place. Those who do not personally appear, or send an approved substitute to take the oath, are liable in a penalty of L.10. There are arrangements by which, with the consent of the inhabitants, volunteers, remunerated by parish assessments, may be substituted for balloted men. The following persons are exempted from serving:—Peers; commissioned officers of the other forces, whether on full or half pay; non-commissioned officers and privates of the other forces; persons serving, or who have served for four years, as commissioned officers in the militia; persons serving in the yeomanry or volunteers; persons serving, or who have served at any time within a year past, in the local militia; resident members of the several universities; clergymen of the establishments, and registered dissenting clergymen; parish schoolmasters; articulated clerks; apprentices; seafaring men; persons employed in the Royal Docks, the Tower, Woolwich Warren, the gun-wharfs of Portsmouth, and the stores under the direction of the Board of Ordnance; persons free of the Company of Watermen of the Thames; any poor man with more than one child born in wedlock, in England; any man with more than two lawful children, and not possessing property to the value of L.50, in Scotland; and in Ireland, any poor man not worth L.10, or who does not pay L.5 a year of rent, and has more than three lawful children under the age of fourteen. The Military Act and the Articles of War apply to the militia when called out, with the limitation that no punishment can extend to life or limb. There are separate provisions for recovering deserters, &c. In addition to the general militia, who are liable to be marched to any part of the United Kingdom, there was, during the late war, what was called the local militia, embodied under 48 Geo. III., c. 111 and 150, and completed by several acts since passed, by which the men are apportioned to the respective shires in England and Scotland. The balloting, enrolling, and exercising of the militia takes place at present only occasionally, an act being generally passed each session of Parliament suspending the operation of the militia statutes. When the balloting is going on, it is a common thing to insure against being drawn. In one case, where a militia ballot was illegally conducted, it was held that an insurance against the consequences of militia ballots did not bind the insurers to protect the insured against any consequences of such irregular ballot; Scott, 25th May 1814, 2 Dow's Reports, 322. Those who have served in the militia acquire certain privileges of trade, which they transmit to their children. See King's Freeman. Swinton's Abridg. h. t.; Kames' Stat. Law, h. t.; *Hutch. The militia in Scotland is now regulated by the act 17 and 18 Vict., c. 106, 1854.

Mill. There is not an invariable rule as to the question, whether or not a charter or conveyance of lands carries a mill previously erected upon them, without express mention of it. The right of thirlage attaching to mills formerly made them of such importance, that they were frequently taken to be distinct tenements, and conveyed by charter and infestment per se. In such circumstances the general rule is, that a mill does not pass as part and pertinent; but this is always a quæstio voluntatis; and wherever it appears that the mill never had been considered or transferred as a separate subject, and where the proprietor conveys all which is in his own titles, the mill is carried. From the indeterminate state of this matter, it is advisable that the deed of conveyance should expressly bear whether the mill is intended to be reserved, or to pass with the rest of the property. Where a mill already exists, with a thirlage in favour of another than the proprietor of the land, he is not entitled to build another mill, capable of grinding the astricted corn, since that might afford a temptation to defeat the thirlage. And in certain cases in which this had been done, the mill was either destroyed or ordered to be altered, so as to be incapable of grinding the astricted corn. The symbol for giving sasine in a mill is the clap and happer. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 75; *Ersk. Minerals; in a limited acceptance, are those fossils, as coal, lime, chalk, marle, &c., which belong in property to the owner of the ground, and which are not included under an agricultural lease, unless expressly conveyed to the tenant. Neither do minerals fall under a liferent, unless specially given to the liferenter, whose right being enjoyed salva rei substantia, does not extend to minerals. But where the minerals have been let on lease, and it plainly appears to have been the intention of the granter of the liferent that the liferenter should have the rents drawn from the lease of the minerals, that intention will receive effect; and a liferenter, although not entitled to dispose of the minerals, may yet use as much of the coal as is required in his own household. *Ersk. Mines; are inter regalia. By 1424, c. 12, gold mines are declared to belong to the Crown without limitation; and silver mines, when of such fineness that three halfpence of silver can be extracted from the pound of lead. But it would appear, that not only gold and silver, but tin, copper, and lead mines were formerly annexed to the Crown. See an unprinted act of the year 1592. By that statute mines are dissolved from the Crown; and it is made lawful to the Crown to set in feu-farm to the baron, or other freeholder of the ground, all metals or minerals that may be found within his own lands, on payment of the tenth part to the Crown, without any deduction of charges; and in case the freeholder should refuse to work them, they may either be worked for the use of the Crown, or feued out to others. In the interpretation of this statute, it has been found that a positive right is conferred on the freeholder, by which he may demand a right from the Crown, in pursuance of the statute; and that the word freeholder means the possessor of the dominium utile. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 16; Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 60; Bank. i. 573; Bell's Princ. § 669. See Gold Mines.

Minister. A minister of the Church of Scotland is inducted to his charge in the manner which has been explained in the articles Presentation—Call—Admission—Induction; and it is only necessary here to state his qualifications. The student must have gone through a course of philosophy in a university; and, after finishing that course, he must have studied divinity for a certain period prescribed by the Church. He may then be proposed to a presbytery to be taken on trials; and the presbytery must obtain the consent of the synod; and, if a report unfavourable to the character of the candidate has arisen in any of the presbyteries of which the synod is composed, his trials cannot proceed till the matter be inquired into. And should there be any oppression, redress will be obtained by applying to their ecclesiastical superiors. The person licensed must subscribe a formula, owning his belief in the Confession of Faith of the Church of Scotland, and promising to adhere to the same, and to defend the worship, discipline, and government of the Church, by kirk-sessions, presbyteries, provincial synods, and general assemblies, &c. The person licensed is after this termed a probationer; he is entitled to preach, but has no authority to dispense the sacraments; see License to preach. The probationer is then qualified to receive a presentation to a church, which is addressed to the presbytery within which the parish is situated; he is by them appointed to preach in the parish church; he is required to repeat his subscription to the formula; and he must undergo a second trial on his doctrine, literature, and moral character. A day is then appointed by the presbytery, at the distance of ten days, for the parishioners to meet in the parish-church, and witness the ordination, at which one of the presbytery preaches—informs the people that a presentation has been given to the candidate—and asks them to subscribe a call, inviting him to be their minister, and promising him subjection in the Lord. This is what is termed the moderation of a call; see Call. When the call has been sustained, the presbytery proceed to complete the settlement by putting to him, in the face of the congregation, the following questions: “1. Do you believe the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be the Word of God, and the only rule of faith and manners? 2. Do you sincerely own and believe the whole doctrine contained in the Confession of Faith, approved by the General Assemblies of this Church, and ratified by law in the year 1690, to be founded on the Word of God? And do you acknowledge the same as the confession of your faith? And will you firmly and constantly adhere thereto, and, to the utmost of your power, assert, maintain, and defend the same, and the purity of worship as presently practised in this National Church, and asserted in the 15th Act of Assembly, 1707? 3. Do you disown all Popish, Arian, Socinian, Arminian, Bourignian, and other doctrines, tenets, and opinions whatsoever, contrary to, and inconsistent with, the foresaid Confession of Faith? 4. Are you persuaded that the Presbyterian government and discipline of this Church are founded upon the Word of God, and agreeable thereto? And do you promise to submit to the said government and discipline, and to concur with the same; and never to endeavour, directly or indirectly, the prejudice or subversion thereof, but to the utmost of your power, in your station, to maintain, support, and defend the said discipline and Presbyterian government, by kirk-sessions, presbyteries, provincial synods, and general assemblies, during all the days of your life? 5. Do you promise to submit yourself willingly and humbly, in the spirit of meekness, unto the admonitions of the brethren of this presbytery, and to be subject to them, and all other presbyteries and superior judicatories of this Church, where God, in His providence, shall cast your lot? And that, according to your power, you shall maintain the unity and peace of this Church against error and schism, notwithstanding of whatever trouble or persecution may arise; and that you shall follow no divisive courses from the present established doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of this Church? 6. Are not zeal for the honour of God, love to Jesus Christ, and desire of saving souls, your great motives and chief inducements to enter into the functions of the holy ministry, and not worldly designs and interests? 7. Have you used any undue methods, either by yourself or others, in procuring this call? 8. Do you engage, in the strength of Jesus Christ, our Lord and Master, to rule well your own family, to live a holy and circumspect life, and faithfully, diligently, and cheerfully to discharge all the parts of the ministerial work, to the edification of the body of Christ? 9. Do you accept of, and close with, the call to be pastor of this parish; and promise, through grace, to perform all the duties of a faithful minister of the gospel among this people?" See farther on this subject, Church Styles, by Church Law Society, 1838.

These questions being answered satisfactorily by the presentee, the minister performing the service proceeds to invest him with the full character of a minister of the gospel, conveying to him by prayer, and by the imposition of the hands of the presbytery, all the powers implied in that character. He then receives and admits the person to be minister of the vacant parish, by which deed the presbytery create a connection between him and the inhabitants of the parish, which gives him a legal title to the emoluments provided by law for the person who officiates there, and which renders him incapable of holding any other charge. And the connection thus formed can be dissolved only by the act of the Church accepting of his resignation, or deposing him, or translating him to a different charge. Hill's Theological Institutes, pp. 187, 212; Hill's Church Prac. 64; Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, § 26; More's Notes, pp. ccxxxvii.-xli.-lxxiii.; Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 16; Bank. vol. i. p. 48; ii. 77, 221, 592; Bell's Com. i. 128; ii. 595; Bell's Princ. §§ 1163-6, 1172, 634. Minister's Claim to Vote. A parochial minister of the Church of Scotland is entitled to a vote in the election of members of Parliament. A presentation is not sufficient to give the qualification; there must likewise be induction, and all the other forms of appointing to the pastoral charge. There is no distinct provision in the Reform Act declaring ministers entitled to be enrolled; and the proper form of drawing the claim is, "I, A. B., minister of the parish of C., claim to be enrolled as liferent proprietor, by virtue of my office, of the manse and glebe of the said parish." But much less formal claims have been sustained, probably on the principle that the character of parochial minister per se, infers the right to a manse and glebe. Thus, the claim of "minister possessing or occupying the glebe," has been sustained. As the statute does not require occupancy in the case of owners, and as liferenters seem to be on the same footing with owners, it has been held that the minister may be enrolled on his manse and glebe, although it be in the immediate natural possession of another person; such as the minister's assistant and successor. Greater strictness has been required in the form of claims by dissenting ministers, whose appointment does not necessarily or ex lege carry the right to any heritable subject. Such a minister, claiming as a liferenter, must, in order to establish his claim of enrolment on a manse and glebe, show, 1st, The title to the subjects in the congregation, and that they hold it by right such as enables them to convey to him a liferent interest; and, 2d, his own title in the subjects—viz., that the congregation have conveyed a liferent right to him indefeasibly. But there has been some fluctuation in the decisions of the courts of appeal with regard to the claims of dissenting ministers. Ministers have been found not entitled to claim upon their stipends, or as drawing L.10 per annum out of the teinds. Cay's Reform Act, 95, 106.

Minister's Horning. The law on this subject is stated in the article Decreet Conform. The style of a minister's horning is given in Jurid. Styles, iii. 726.

Minister's Rental; the rental of the parish lodged by the minister in a process of augmentation and locality. See Augmentation.

Minor. In a large acceptation, a minor is a person under lawful age, or majority; but the term, when used in contradistinction to pupil, signifies a person above the age of pupilarity (twelve in females and fourteen in males), and under that of majority, which in both sexes is twenty-one years complete. Where a minor has curators, his deeds are not effectual to bind him without their consent; yet, in so far as he derives any benefit from his deeds, they will be binding on those with whom he contracts; and all obligations into which he enters, where the consideration has been profitably applied to his use, will to that extent be effectual against him. A minor with curators may effectually marry without their consent; he may also, without their consent, execute a testament bequeathing all his moveable funds; but he cannot, even with their consent, execute a settlement of his heritage. The curator of a minor merely consents, but cannot compel the minor to act; the minor has a right to inquire into the management of his affairs, and, if he sees reason, he may refuse to act. A minor's person is not subject to the control of curators. Where, again, a minor has no curators, he may act by himself; and his deeds will be equally effectual with the deeds of a minor having curators, who have concurred with him in the execution of the deed. Minors are entitled to be restored against all deeds done to their prejudices during their minority, whether they have been done by their tutors, or by themselves, with consent of their curators. In all cases, in short, where a minor can prove lesion, he is entitled to restitution; and the only difference is, that where the deed has been executed by a tutor, or by a minor with consent of his curator, or by the minor alone, where he has no curator, as the deed is effectual in law till set aside, a reduction of it becomes necessary; whereas deeds executed by pupils, or by minors having curators, but without their consent, are null, and the nullity may be pleaded by way of exception. In an action of restitution, the minor must prove lesion, proceeding from the want of judgment on the part of the minor, and not from any fraud or unjustifiable act on his part; nor will the minor be protected against necessary payments, to his tutor or curator for example, though the payment may have been misapplied. Lesion is presumed in a donation by the minor; in a bond of caution entered into by him; even in a bond for borrowed money by the minor lesion is presumed, unless the creditor shall prove that the money was employed profitably for the minor. And it has been decided, that a party is not barred from pleading minority against an action for implement of a cautionary obligation, by his having previously made affidavit that he had attained majority to obtain the degree of M.D., and thereafter assumed the title of doctor; Sutherland, Jan. 19, 1825, 3 S. & D. 449. But there is an exception to the plea of restitution in all transactions connected with any trade or commerce in which the minor may have been engaged; even a bond for borrowed money will not necessarily imply lesion, where the minor is engaged in trade. A minor pubes is not entitled to restitution against a marriage, although he may be restored against hurtful provisions in a marriage-contract. The minor may be restored against judicial acts, as where competent pleas have been omitted, or where the minor has been entered heir, and the debts of the ancestor exceed the value of the succession. The privilege of restitution may be exercised by the minor at any time within four years after his arriving at majority. But to entitle him to this privilege, he must have raised and executed the action of reduction of the deed or transaction he means to challenge within the four years, called the quadrimum utile. This privilege does not die with the person entitled to it, but may be transmitted to his heir, according to these rules: 1. Where a minor succeeds to a minor, the time allowed for claiming restitution depends on the minority of the heir, not of the deceased minor. 2. Where a minor succeeds to a major, who was not twenty-five years complete, the privilege continues with the heir during his own minority; but he cannot avail himself of his predecessor's anni utiles, except in so far as they were unexpired at his death. 3. Where a major succeeds to a minor, he has only the quadrimum utile, to be reckoned from the period of the minor's death; and if a major succeeds to a major dying within the quadrimum, he can avail himself of no more of the quadrimum than remained unexpired at the time of his predecessor's death; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 42. Mere revocation within the quadrimum utile is not sufficient. The deeds against which the minor is entitled to be restored, must be challenged by an action of reduction in the Court of Session within that term. The minor is entitled only to be replaced in his former situation, not to derive an advantage which he could not otherwise have enjoyed. An objection to a decree, as pronounced by an incompetent court, is not barred by the lapse of the quadrimum utile; Rankine, May 31, 1821, 1 S. & D. 43.

Another privilege of minority is, that a minor cannot be compelled to defend his right to his ancestor's heritage, when that right is challenged by one who claims the heritage on a right preferable to that which was in the minor's ancestor; minor non tenetur placitare de hereditate paterna. This privilege is limited to proper feudal heritage, and does not extend to leases, however long the period of endurance. Nor does it apply to the settling of marches, nor to the division of land, nor to a possessory action, nor to an action at the instance of the superior for feu-duties or casualties, nor where the action has been commenced in the lifetime of the ancestor. In order to entitle the minor to state this plea, he must be served heir and infest; and his infestment, when produced, supersedes all further production till he be of age. It is the heir of investiture alone who can plead the privilege; and it cannot be pleaded to support the fraud of the ancestor, nor to oppose the effect of the ancestor's obligation, nor in opposition to a minor suing for reduction on the head of minority and lesion; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 43, et seq. The persons of pupils are protested against imprisonment for civil debts; but this privilege does not extend to minors past the age of pupillarity, who are liable to personal diligence and imprisonment on account of non-payment or non-performance of civil debts or obligations; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 47. Minors, under seven years of age, are not liable to criminal prosecution; from seven to fourteen they are liable on conviction to an arbitrary punishment; and, above fourteen, they are liable to the ordinary punishment, even capital. A minor may be indicted without calling his guardian; Hume, i. 33; Steele, 66; Alison's Princ. 663; Prac. 227. Children under twelve cannot be examined upon oath, but they may be examined without it. The rule as to this is taken from the age as at the trial, provided the facts occurred not very long before; Hume, ii. 341; Steele, 15. A minor cannot be elected a member of Parliament; and the election is by statute declared to be void, under the same penalties as if he had presumed to sit without being returned; 7 and 8 Will. III., c. 85. Minors may sit till displaced, because the law presumes them to be of full years till the contrary is proved. The claim of a minor to vote cannot be registered; 1681; 1707, c. 8; but it would appear, that if the disability existed at the time of giving in the claim, but ceased before the sitting of the registration court at which it is considered, the claimant may be admitted; Cases cited in Cay's Reform Act, 17. It had formerly been decided, that the enrolment of a minor, under the provision that he should not vote till he was of perfect age, was contrary to law; MacLeod, Dec. 1765, M. 8684; Bell on Elections, 338. In England, it is held that majority is completed the day before the twenty-first anniversary of the birth-day; Chambers' Election Law, h. t. A minor may, with consent of his curators, exercise the right of a patron in presentation; *Brodie, June 9, 1830, 8 S. & D. 899. Minority; the period from birth until twenty-one years of age; or, in a more limited sense, the interval between pupillarity and majority. See Minor. Tutor. Pupil.

Mint; the place or establishment in which the Queen's money is coined. By 39 Geo. III., c. 94, and 1 and 2 Will. IV., c. 10, the salary of the master and worker of the mint was ascertained, and, along with the other charges of the mint, provided to be paid from various different sources, partly from fees, allowances, and emoluments authorized by the indenture between the Crown and the master, partly from the Consolidated Fund, partly by annual grants of Parliament, and partly from the profit derived from the coinage of silver and copper. By 7 Will. IV., c. 9, it is provided, that after the 5th of April 1837, all fees, emoluments, &c., payable to the master of the mint shall cease. So much of the above acts as authorizes the charging of money upon the Consolidated Fund for salaries to officers is repealed; and the seignorage accruing upon the coinage of silver or copper is directed to be paid into the bank, to the credit of the Consolidated Fund. It is made lawful for the Treasury to authorize the issue of money for the purchase of bullion for coinage, an account of which must be annually laid before Parliament.

Minute; a short memorandum or sketch taken in writing.

Minute. When it is necessary to preserve evidence of any incidental judicial act or statement, this is done in the Court of Session, and also in the inferior courts, by a minute. Thus, where the pursuer restricts his libel, or makes a reference to the defender's oath, or where the parties mutually consent to a judicial reference, or to a remit to persons of skill, or to waken a process, or to an interim decree, and, in short, wherever the object is to preserve special evidence of any of the res gestæ, this is done by a minute. Strictly speaking, those minutes ought to be prepared by the clerk of Court, as their form imports. They commence with the name of the counsel (or in the inferior court, of the procurator) for the party, and purport to be a statement made by him; e. g., "Patrick Robertson, for the pursuer, stated," &c. If the minute be answered, the answer proceeds in the same style. The minute is signed by counsel, or in the inferior courts by the procurator; and where it is a minute of reference to oath, it must also be subscribed by the party referring, or he must subscribe a written mandate authorizing it; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825; Maclaurin's Sheriff-Court Prac. 195. See Amendment of Libel. It sometimes happens, after an argument at the bar of the Inner House of the Court of Session, where questions of difficulty have been raised, that the Court, instead of pronouncing an order for Cases, appoints the parties to prepare and lodge Minutes of Debate. These minutes, which must be prepared by counsel, contain an argument on the points in dispute; and, after having been interchanged, revised, and relodged, they are printed and boxed for the Court in the usual manner; see Cases. In the inferior courts, when a proof, whether by witnesses or oath of party, is concluded, the inferior judge may either advise the case on the proof as it stands, or order minutes of debate or memorials on the proof or on the whole cause. These minutes must contain no previous narrative of the case, or detail of the procedure, nor quotations from the evidence, parole or written, except when absolutely necessary; but reference may be made to the proof by the page, or by the letters of the alphabet on the margin; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825, Sheriff-Courts, &c., c. ix. §§ 18 and 19. No statements can be introduced into these minutes not contained in the closed record or in the proof, and no productions can be made with them. MacLaurin's Sheriff-Court Prac. 210.

Minute-Book, of Records. The minute-book, as part of the system of records in Scotland, was first introduced by the general act 1672, c. 16, "Concerning the Judicatories," § 32. That part of the enactment, however, having been but little observed, an attempt was made to revive it, by A. S. 15th July 1692, which was immediately followed by the subsisting statute, 1693, c. 14. This statute, on the preamble that the preceding enactments had been neglected, ordained all the keepers of the registers of sasines, reversions, hornings, inhibitions, interdictions, allowances of apprising or adjudications, to keep minute-books of all writs presented to them, to be inserted in their several registers, expressing the day and hour when, and the names and designations of the persons by whom, the writs are presented, and that the said minute be immediately signed by the presenter of the writ, and also by the keeper, and be patent to all the lieges who desire inspection of it gratis; and that the writs be registered exactly in the order in which they are entered in the minute-book. The keeper not complying with these regulations is liable to deprivation, and to reparation of the loss which the parties may sustain. A sasine is held as recorded from the time of its being entered in this minute-book, provided it remains with the keeper until the operation of transcribing into the register has been completed; but when the sasine is taken out of the keeper's hands before being recorded, and is not returned till the sixty days are expired, it will not be allowed to be recorded as of the date of its presentment, though regularly marked debito tempore in the minute-book. It is now settled law, that insertion of a writ in the minute-book is indispensable to its due registration; but where either the minute-book has not been regularly kept, or where there has been no minute-book at all, the certificate on the sasine corresponding with the minute-book, or with the record-book, will be held as evidence of the registration. In a recent case, where two sasines were presented for registration on the same day, and by the same agent, and were both stated in the minute-book as given in between the hours of eleven and twelve, but the minute of the sasine prior in date was entered first in order and regularly signed, and the registration was in the same order, it was held, that the first in order was preferable, and that it was incompetent by parole to prove that they were de facto presented together. The Lord Ordinary (Moncreiff) in his note held, that when the act 1693, c. 14, required that the day and hour should be expressed, it was not meant to limit the question either of date or priority to the separate measured periods of sixty minutes in the usual reckoning of time in a day, but that it was implied, in the term hour, that there might be an equally clear case of priority within the minutes of the same nominal hour. It meant the precise point of time in a day; Douglas, Feb. 21, 1835, 13 S. & D. 505. In practice, persons searching the records usually confine their search to the minute-book, as being a statutory index, as it were, to the full register. And holding it to be settled that the minute-book is part of the record, it follows that a writ, although inserted ad longum in the register, will not be duly or availably recorded if it has not been entered, or if it has been imperfectly entered, in the minute-book. See an instructive case on this subject, Part v. Wood's Trustees, July 10, 1838, 16 S. 1363; where the omission in the minute-book of the names of two out of three inhibited parties was held by the consulted judges to void the registration, quoad the parties whose names were thus omitted, although the inhibition was inserted ad longum in the register against all the parties. Minute-Book of Court of Session; is a book in which is minuted, or shortly stated, the heads of the judgments, that is, acts and decrees pronounced by the Court, or by Lords Ordinary. These minutes are intended to apprise the parties of the judgments which are pronounced: they are therefore entered by the different clerks of Court of the date on which the judgments or interlocutors are signed. Protestations are also inserted in the minute-book. A sheet of this book is printed and circulated by the keeper of the minute-book twice a week during session; and unless where the Court in its judgment or decree expressly dispenses with the minute-book, no decree can be extracted until twenty-four hours after it has been read (or may have been read) in the minute-book. The keeper of the minute-book holds his commission from the Crown, and is paid by fees on certain entries in the minute-book. Bell's Com. i. 722-5; Shand's Prac. 115; Ross, Jan. 31, 1829, 7 S. & D. 354. See Decree. Protestation.

Minutes. The Minutes of a meeting of creditors contain the import of what has been stated and agreed to at the meeting. When regularly made out and authenticated, the minutes are legal evidence of the proceedings and votes. See generally, Stair, B. iv. tit. 1, § 64; Bank. ii. 493; Bell's Com. ii. 352-9, 365-6; Kames' Equity, 283.

Mischief. See Malicious Mischief.

Misdemeanour; in English law, a crime. Every crime is a misdemeanor; but a distinction has been taken between crimes of a higher and lower kind; the former being termed felonies, the latter misdemeanours. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Felony.

Misericordia; according to Skene, was a "merciamant, amerciamant, or unlaw." The word is still used in England to signify an arbitrary fine for an offence, called misericordia, because the amercement ought to be less than that required by Magna Charta. If one be immoderately amerced in a court that is not a court of record, the writ called moderata misericordia lies for moderating the amercement. Skene, h. t.; Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Misfeasance; in English law, a trespass. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Misnomer; misnaming a person. An error in the Christian name of the defender, though otherwise correctly designated, is fatal to a summons. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Shaw's Prac. 218.

Misprisions; from a French word signifying contempt, are generally understood, in English law, to be all such high offences as are under the degree of capital, but nearly bordering thereon. A misprision is said to be contained in every treason and felony; and if the sovereign so please, the offender may be proceeded against for the misprision only.

Misprisions are generally divided into two sorts; negative, which consist in the concealment of something which ought to be revealed; and positive, which consist in the commission of something which ought not to be done.

Misprision of treason, is committed by him who, being in the knowledge of a treasonable act, does not reveal it to a judge or justice of the peace. Hence, whenever a new treason is enacted, there necessarily results a new misprision of treason. By an act of Elizabeth, stat. 13, c. 2, it is declared, that those who forge foreign coin, not current in the kingdom, shall be held and punished as guilty of this offence. The punishment of this misprision of treason is perpetual imprisonment, forfeiture of goods, and of the profits of land for the offender's life. Misprision of treason, where accompanied with any probable circumstance of assent, may subject the offender to punishment as a principal in the treason. The form of prosecution for misprision is the same with that provided for actual treason. Hume, vol. i. p. 543; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 28; Bank. vol. ii. p. 261; Swint. Abridg. voce Treason; Tait's Justice, voce Treason. See Treason.

Misrepresentation. See Insurance.

Missives; in re mercatoria; are exempted from the solemnities requisite for the authentication of other deeds. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, § 4; Stair, B. iv. tit. 42, § 151. See Evidence. Deed. Date of Deed. Writ. Holograph.

Missives and Minutes of Sale and Lease. A binding sale of heritage may be concluded by an interchange of missives, as well as by a formal minute of sale. In the missives, the one party offers to buy or sell on certain conditions: the other party accepts of the offer. This constitutes a complete contract, which may be afterwards carried into effect by the execution of a disposition. See Disposition. The minute is a regular deed with a clause of registration for diligence, and a testing clause, executed according to all the requisites of the act 1681, c. 5. The missives may be holograph of the parties, the acceptor prefixing a copy of the offer in his own handwriting. If not holograph, the missives must be tested and authenticated like other probative deeds. The oath of party acknowledging his subscription will not supply a defect in any of the solemnities; and both missives must be probative, for the contract is binding on both or neither of the contracting parties; subject always to the legal effect of rei interventus and homologation. See Rei Interventus. Homologation [Locus Penitentia. Conditions are sometimes inserted in these preliminary deeds. Security may be stipulated for the regular payment of the price; which may be done by agreeing that the disposition shall be retained in the hands of the seller until the price be paid, and in such a case it has been held that the seller is entitled to the subject or the price; Baird, Aug. 1758, Mor. 14, 156. Another mode of securing the price is to make the sale conditional on the payment of the price. Where the seller declares that the sale shall be effectual only in the event that the price is paid against a day certain, the neglect to pay is suspensive of the sale, and the seller may dispose of the subject to another. The missives by which the bargain is concluded ought to be written on paper duly stamped, or they ought to be stamped afterwards, before they can be founded on in a court of law. A written minute of lease with mutual stipulations, or an obligation or missive letter by the proprietor to grant a lease, accepted in like manner by the lessee, has equal force with a formal lease. It is necessary that the writings be probative, or that the defect be cured by possession or rei interventus. If there be a discrepancy between the formal lease and the previous minute or missive letter, the lease itself regulates the agreement. An essential defect in the missives of lease cannot be supplied by oath. It would appear that missives of lease, like missives of sale, require to be stamped to found an action. For the forms of minutes and missives of sale and lease, see Bell's Deeds, i. 144, et seq.; Jurid. Styles, i. 72, 80, 99, 687. See also Bell's Princ. §§ 889, 1190; Bell on Leases, i. 303-4, 312, 274; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 285, 316, 327; Bell on Purchaser's Title, 141, 164; Ross's Lect. i. 359.

Mittimus; in English law, a writ for transferring records from one court to another. Also a precept in writing, under the hand and seal of a justice of peace, directed to the gaoler, for the receiving and safe keeping of an offender until he is delivered by law. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Mobbing; is a tumultuary assembly of a number of people, to the terror of the lieges and the disturbance of the public peace. The meeting must be attended with circumstances of actual violence, or of such a tendency thereto as may be the ground of a reasonable apprehension of danger. A meeting or convocation of this kind may arise from an act in itself legal—as where a messenger unnecessarily raises the country to assist in ejecting a tenant, and proceeds in an irregular manner with a multitude of people to drive the cattle and turn out the furniture of the tenant, where no resistance has been made. That would be an instance of a mobbing or convocation arising from a legal act, and other instances may be figured. There must not only be a tendency to violence in the convocation, but it must be a combination for violence in defiance of lawful authority. The offence of mobbing is distinguished from the crime of treason, by being confined to some matter of private concern, as a compulsory reduction in the price of grain—to prevent the division of a common—to rescue a criminal, &c. It is not necessary to the constitution of this offence that the assemblage shall have been brought together by preconcert. It is enough that an illegal outrage is committed or threatened, although the design of it should have been the result of a tacit confederacy, formed on the instant, and after the mob has been collected. In order to constitute the offence, it is only necessary that the property of individuals, or of the public, should be seized or damaged, or the persons of individuals in any way injured, or they themselves put in fear, or constrained to act contrary to their duty, interest, or inclination. The bare act of being tumultuously assembled for a violent purpose, though no further movement be made towards its execution, will fall under the offence of mobbing. He will be held as art and part guilty of this offence, who excites the mob, exhorts them to continue, or distributes money or liquor amongst them; even when the person is not present in the mob, if he should be able to communicate with, or direct the mob, or to influence their operations. The act of being present in a mob, if the person continues with them for any time, although he does not take an active part, may be construed into being art and part guilty of the offence; and, therefore, those who may be induced from curiosity to enter into a mob run a risk sufficient to deter any prudent person from attempting to gratify an idle curiosity of this kind. One who joins a mob does not eo ipso become art and part of a sudden and extraneous felony perpetrated by some rioters at the moment. When the libel on this crime is laid at common law, the punishment is arbitrary. The ancient law of Scotland, relative to convocations within burgh, seems now to be in a great measure superseded by the Riot Act, 1 Geo. I., c. 5. The first provision of that act relates to the pulling down, or demolishing of, or beginning to pull down, a church or place of religious worship, or dwelling-house, or barn, or out-house, by persons unlawfully, riotously, and tumultuously assembled; which shall be adjudged felony without benefit of clergy. 2. Where persons are riotously and tumultuously assembled for any purpose whatever, to the number of twelve, a proclamation is directed to be made, ordering them to disperse, and declaring that, in case of their continuing together for the space of an hour thereafter, to the number of twelve or more, after such command or request made by proclamation, it shall be judged felony without benefit of clergy. Should this proclamation be impeded by any of the mob, this is made instant felony in those who are "offenders therein;" and the magistrates, peace-officers, and all whom they shall call to their assistance, are by the act empowered to disperse, seize, and apprehend the persons riotously assembled, to the number of twelve, within an hour after proclamation; and the act declares, that if any of the mob shall be killed, maimed, or hurt, by reason of their resistance, all concerned shall be indemnified and discharged of the consequences; and should it happen before the expiration of the hour, that the meeting are not only tumultuous, but shall proceed to violence against the property or person of any one, force may instantly be repelled with force. Nothing can be more erroneous than the notion, that after the proclamation an hour must elapse before force can be used. The proclamation is in these terms: "Our Sovereign Lady the Queen chargeth and commandeth all persons being assembled immediately to disperse themselves, and peaceably to depart to their habitations, or to their lawful business, upon the pains contained in the act made in the first year of King George, for preventing tumults and riotous assemblies.—God save the Queen." This proclamation may be made by a justice of the peace or other magistrate; and if the mob continue assembled for one hour after the proclamation, they, and each of them, are guilty of the capital offence, whether or not they have attempted to commit any felonious outrage. By 52 Geo. III., c. 130, it is enacted, that "if any person or persons unlawfully, riotously, and tumultuously assembled together, in disturbance of the public peace, shall unlawfully and with force, demolish and pull down, or begin to demolish or pull down, any erection and building, or engine which shall be used or employed in carrying on or conducting of any trade or manufactory, or any branch or department of any trade or manufactory of goods, wares, or merchandise of any kind or description whatsoever, or in which any goods, wares, or merchandise shall be warehoused or deposited; that then every such pulling down and demolishing, or beginning to pull down and demolish, shall be adjudged felony without benefit of clergy." Hume i. 411, 433; Alison's Princ. 509; *Ersk. Mobilia Sequuntur Personam; a Roman law maxim, importing that moveables follow the owner's domicile; so that a deed of transference, executed according to the forms of the lex domicilii, is effectual to carry moveables situated in a country where such a mode of conveyance would not be effectual. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, § 40, note by Mr Ivory. See Foreign. Heritable and Moveable. Domicile.

Moderamen Inculpatæ Tutelæ; is a Roman law expression, signifying that degree of self-defence which a person may legally use, although it should occasion the death of the aggressor, without incurring the guilt of murder, or even of culpable homicide. Hume's Crim. Law, vol. i. p. 221; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 41. See Chaud Melle. Homicide. Justifiable Homicide.

Moderata Misericordia. See Misericordia.

Moderator; the person who presides at a dispute or in a public assembly. The president or chairman of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland is styled Moderator. The moderator is chosen on the day on which the Assembly meets, from among the ministers upon the roll prepared by the clerks. It is usual for the moderator of the last Assembly to propose his successor; and on one occasion, when there were two candidates, each was proposed by the moderator. Any member of Assembly may propose another candidate for the chair. The majority of members of Assembly determine in case of a division. In the event of a contested election, the candidates are first called upon to give their votes. The chairman or president of the Commission of the General Assembly, of a synod, and of a presbytery, is also called moderator. The minister of a parish is ex officio moderator of the kirk-session, and he may appoint any other person to preside in his stead. Hill's Church Prac. 2, 41, 81, 90, 98; Gillan's Acts of Assembly, 180.

Modification; is the term usually applied to the decree of the Teind Court, awarding a suitable stipend to the minister of a parish. The amount of the stipend is fixed by the Court on a due consideration of the state of the teinds—the extent of the parish—its population—and the necessary expenses to which the clergyman is exposed. The Court, although formerly restricted by the act 1617, c. 3, to a maximum, beyond which they could not augment the stipend of the minister, have not, by the subsequent commissions, been so restrained; and accordingly they are now in use to give a reasonable stipend to the clergyman, varying with the circumstances of the parish and the state of the teinds. The Court may also grant an augmentation of stipend after an interval of twenty years from the date of the last final decree of modification. The stipend, unless where peculiar circumstances render it necessary to modify it in money, must be modified in grain or victual, and paid in money, convertible according to the fair prices of the year for which the stipend is payable; 48 Geo. III., c. 138. See Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 46, et seq.; Bank. vol. ii. pp. 60, 516. See Augmentation. Locality. Stipend.

Modus; or modus decimandi; in England, is a particular manner of tithing allowed, different from the general law of taking tithes in kind. When tithes in Scotland have been valued, they are said to be paid by a modus. Bell's Princ. § 1147, et seq.; Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Moiety. A sum payable in moieties is payable in two equal shares, though sometimes, erroneously, the term is applied to a sum payable in two or three different parts or instalments.

Molestation; is the troubling of one in the possession of his lands. This is a delict which subjects the molester to a claim of damages. An action of molestation is a possessory action, calculated for continuing proprietors in the lawful possession of their lands during the dependence of any question in relation to the right thereto. The action may, by act of sederunt 1580, ratified by stat. 1587, c. 42, be brought before the Judge-Ordinary, or the bailies of regality. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 48; Stair, B. iv. tit. 27; Bank. vol. i. p. 280; Jurid. Styles, iii. 128, 137. See Ejection and Intrusion.

Money. The current coin of the kingdom, which may be offered in payment, is of gold, silver, or copper, to which is affixed the royal stamp, and to which such nominal value is given as the queen, by her prerogative, may think proper to fix. Money cannot be identified, unless separated and marked for the purpose. Money in possession of an insolvent person is a general fund for division among his creditors; and no sum, or part of it, can be claimed by any one, unless it be distinguished and ear-marked as specific. At one time, gold coin was the only legal tender, except for taxes, or sums below forty shillings; but by a recent act, conferring certain privileges on the Bank of England, it is provided, that unless, and until, Parliament shall otherwise direct, the notes of the Bank of England shall be a legal tender, except at the bank itself and its branches; 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 98, § 6. Silver coin is a legal tender to the amount of forty shillings. Tokens given by manufacturers to their workmen are not now, as formerly, permitted to be used as money; 57 Geo. III., c. 46, § 113. Money Scots is the ancient money of Scotland, and was one-twelfth the value of sterling money.

In the English courts, the bringing money into court, or, in other words, the offer of payment to a party, is affected by many considerations unknown in Scotch practice. According to the English rule, an offer of the debt due will either put an end to the lawsuit, or, should the plaintiff's claim exceed the just amount, will have the effect of throwing on him the expense of the after proceedings. See Tomlins' Dict. h. t. Stair, B. i. tit. 11, § 5; tit. 14, § 1; Bank. vol. i. pp. 356, 385, 407, 488; Bell's Com. i. 257, 264; ii. 378, 502; Bell's Princ. §§ 1332-7; Illust. § 1333; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. h. t.; Tait's Just. of Peace, voce Coin; Blair's do., h. t. As to the offence of counterfeiting the King's coin, see Coining.

Monks. The monks were the regular clergy, who had no cura animarum, nor the charge of any congregation, but were bound to close residence in their monasteries, unless when sent out on missions. They got the name of regular, because circumscribed by vow to certain rules of devotion and penance, according to the institution of their several orders. Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 4; Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, § 15; Bank. vol. i. p. 73; ii. 5.

Monograms; the signatures formerly admitted to deeds in place of full subscriptions, usually consisting of the letters of the subscriber's own name and of some tutelar saint fancifully combined. Ross's Lect. i. 126.

Monopoly; a license or privilege bestowed by the sovereign, by grant or otherwise, for the sole buying, selling, making, working, or using of anything. Monopolies are contrary to the spirit of the laws of this kingdom, and are void at common law. In England, by James I., c. 3, all monopolies, grants, letters-patent, and licenses, for the sole buying, selling, and making of goods and manufactures, were declared void, except in some particular cases; and persons aggrieved by putting them in use may recover treble damages and double costs by action on the statute. This does not extend to any grant or privilege conferred by act of Parliament, nor to any grant or charter to corporations or cities, nor to grants to companies or societies of merchants, for the benefit of trade; nor to inventors of new manufactures possessing patents; nor to grants or privileges for printing, making gunpowder, casting ordnance, &c. The Crown may grant to particular persons the sole printing of the Scripturae. In Scotland, an act was passed in the reign of Charles I. (1641, c. 76), declaring monopolies ineffectual; and since the Union, the same law rules both parts of the kingdom. A regulation made by the hall of Leith, confining the office of procurator before their court to those who had been apprentices to their procurators, was voided as a monopoly; Young, 21st Dec. 1765, Dict. 9564. See Bank. i. 411; Bell's Com. i. 109; Kames' Stat. Law, h. t.; Kames' Equity, 229, 341, 361; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Pactum illicitum. Exclusive Privilege. Patents. Literary Property. King's Freeman.

Moot; a hypothetical or debatable case, put and argued by young barristers and students of law at the inns of court in England, by way of practice, in a place formerly called Moot Hall. A bailiff or surveyor of the moots is annually chosen by the benchers. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Mora. Mora, or delay, is a general term applicable to all undue delay in the prosecution or completion of an inchoate bargain, diligence, or the like; and the legal effect of which may be to liberate the contracting parties, or to frustrate the object of the diligence. The question, whether or not undue delay has occurred, may be said to be a jury question; and in re mercatoria, the determination of it will be regulated very much by the usage of trade, or the practice of merchants in the particular transaction to which it relates. A creditor who has begun diligence against his debtor's person or estate, which he does not complete within the legal and requisite time, is said to be in mora; and such diligence will not be allowed to defeat the rights or diligences of subsequent purchasers or creditors. A superior who unduly delays to obey a charge to enter his vassal forfeits the non-entry duties during his life. Mora, in the performance of an obligation, subjects the debtor to liability for the direct loss sustained by the creditor; and if the subject to be delivered perish in the debtor's hands, after mora, the loss falls upon him, although he has not been otherwise in fault, unless it appear that it would have perished in the same manner in the creditor's hands. And even this is no defence, when it can be shown that the owner might have got it off his hands before the accident happened, especially if it be a thing for sale, and not for keeping. In the older law, on account of the disfavour in which the taking of interest was held, delay in the payment of a money debt did not entitle the creditor to interest without previous stipulation; but this doctrine has, in modern times, given place to more equitable rules. In general, the interest is held to be the loss which the creditor suffers by delay; but this rule is not inflexible; for when damage flows directly from the non-payment of money, the party failing to pay may become liable, just as one failing to implement an ordinary obligation is liable for the direct damages. Thus, in a recent case, a trustee for creditors sold the trust-estate to a party who bound himself to pay the price by instalments at certain terms. Upon the faith of this, the trustee intimated to an heritable creditor on the estate, that the sum in his bond would be paid by a certain day; which intimation was accepted and acted upon. The buyer having made no payment till nearly a year after the last of the stipulated terms, the trustee was unable to fulfil his engagement to the creditor, who raised action against the trustee for the loss and damage thereby sustained. It was held that the buyer was liable to the trustee in relief; Mansfield, Feb. 27, 1836, 14 D. B. & M. 585. Delay is incurred, in pure obligations, by disregarding the creditor's requisition; for when no term is stipulated, the time of performance is in the creditor's option. In obligations prestable at a stipulated day, the passing of the day puts the debtor in mora. See Dies interpellat pro homine. In conditional obligations, there is no mora until the condition has been purified; and even then, requisition, or the arrival of a previously stipulated term, is requisite. If requisition is impossible, mora is incurred if the obligation be not performed so soon as it may be; as in the case of restitution of things found, or coming in any other way into the possessor's hands without the owner's knowledge. In debts due to pupils, mora is incurred without requisition; and in obligations by delinquency, mora begins from the first moment that the obligation might have been implemented. In general, legal execution is not competent till there has been a failure to perform in terms of the obligation; but in some cases, precautionary steps for the creditor's security, by action or diligence, may be resorted to, before the arrival of the term of payment—e. g., where the debtor is vergens ad inopiam. See Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, § 45; Bell's Com. i. 326 et seq., 445 et seq.; ii. 34 and 153, 194, 201, et seq.; Stair. Moravians; a sect of dissenters, who, on account of conscientious scruples, are permitted, in lieu of an oath, to make a solemn affirmation in courts of justice, civil and criminal, and on all other occasions on which, either at common law or by statute, an oath is required to be taken. See Affirmation.

Morbus Sonticus; a mortal sickness. It has been otherwise defined, an illness so severe as to furnish a just excuse from the performance of duty, or the transacting of business. More strictly, the term is applied to incapacitating diseases; Laird, 9th July 1763, Mor. 3315. At one time, it was necessary to prove a morbus soticus in reducing a deed ex capite lecti; but this is not now the law. Stair, B. iv. tit. 20, § 41. See Deathbed.

Mortancestry. The brieve of inquest is sometimes called a brieve of mortancestry. But the two brieves were originally distinct; the brieve of inquest being intended for the purpose of proving the propinquity; whereas the brieve of mortancestry was used for calling into court those in possession of the ancestor's property, for trying the title under which they possessed; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 62. See Brieve.

Mortgage; according to Skene, is a deed wed, as a sum given upon lands in wadset, and under reversion, called a deed wed, because, by the old laws of the realm, the annual of the sum was reckoned a part of the stock and principal sum, contrary to the posterior practice, by which the annual was yearly paid until redemption. Skene, h. t.

In English law, it is a pledging or pawning of freehold or leasehold, or any other property of a nature not susceptible of personal delivery. The form of a mortgage of land is by a conveyance of the inheritance or estate to another, on condition that, if the borrower do not by a certain day repay the money, the lender may enter and enjoy the land; or, in technical language, that the lender's estate shall be absolute in the premises. In equity, the lender or mortgagee is held accountable to the borrower or mortgager for the true value; and if the mortgagee is in possession, by virtue of an ejectment brought at law, equity will make him render an account of the profits received; and this account may be opened at any time during twenty years. The right which a mortgager has to redeem his property is called his equity of redemption. Mortgagers, while in possession, may vote as long as the interest due does not reduce the beneficial interest below forty shillings; but after a mortgagee is in possession, the mortgager's right ceases. Mortgagees may vote if in possession of the premises mortgaged, but not otherwise. Mortgage is not a Scotch law term, as is sometimes supposed. The corresponding term in Scotch law is wadset; and the right of an heritable creditor by bond and disposition in security, or by heritable bond, is in some respects analogous to that of a mortgagee. The mortgage of ships is provided for by special statute; 6 Geo. IV. c. 110, §§ 45-7. See Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Stair, B. ii. tit. 10, § 3; Bell's Com. i. 164; Bell's

Princ. § 1739. See Ships. Wadset. Bond. Burdens.

Mortification, Mortmain. These terms are nearly synonymous, and are applied to lands given formerly to the Church for religious purposes, or, since the Reformation, for charitable or public uses. Those lands vested in the Church were held to be given for superstitious purposes, and were declared, by the act 1587, c. 29, to belong to the Crown. By the present practice, when lands are given for any charitable purpose, they are usually disposed to the trustees of the charity, to be held either in blench or feu. When mortifications are made for behoof of the poor generally, and the management is not intrusted to particular individuals, or when it is given to the "patron or overseers" of the poor, they fall under the administration of the heritors and kirk-session, in the same way as the ordinary funds for support of the poor, each member of the meeting having a vote; and this whether the benefit of the fund extend to the whole parish, or only to a particular district of it. Those only who are entitled to relief out of the ordinary parochial funds can claim the benefit of mortifications for behoof of the poor generally. It is declared by statute to be unlawful to alter, change, or invert any mortifications for support of schools and hospitals, or pious purposes, to any other than the specific use to which they are destined by the disposer; 1633, c. 6. This statute also gives right of action for calling the managers to account when they misapply the fund. The managers of a mortification may let in lease, or feu out the mortified lands, when for the advantage of the fund; and they may sell the superiority for a fair price. Where the managers of a mortified fund are changed, any set of administrators may call their predecessors to account; and any individual manager may call his brethren to account for malversation. Persons entitled to benefit under a deed of mortification have a right to pursue an action for enforcing their claims. The jurisdiction of the Court of Session extends over hospitals and mortifications, so as to entitle them to control the management of the administrators; and in the event of a failure of the administrators in whom the management of a mortification for a definite purpose is vested, it has been found that the Court of Session may supply the deficiency by a new nomination; but this rule is subject to limitation. Lands mortified by a private individual as glebe to the minister of a parish, are not teind-free; Wilson, Feb. 1, 1831, 9 S. & D. 357. Mortuus Sasit Vivum; a maxim of English law, implying that a right vests in the person of an heir simply by the death of his ancestor. This doctrine has never been adopted in the law of Scotland, which rejects the principle of an ipso jure transmission of rights requiring sasine, by mere survivorship. Bell's Princ. § 1690; *Sandford's Herit. Motions. A motion is an application to the court, by the parties or their counsel, in order to obtain some order of court, which becomes necessary in the preparation of the record or in the progress of a cause. In the Court of Session, the record in every cause is made up and closed under judicial superintendence; and in all defended causes, the several orders requisite in the preparation of the record, including not only the usual orders for condescendences, answers, &c., but all demands for diligences for the recovery of writings, and, in general, all incidental applications, are made on motion to the Lord Ordinary in the cause. These motions are disposed of according to a roll called the Motion-roll, called daily during session by the several Lords Ordinary. The course is, for the party making the motion to enrol the cause in the motion-roll of the Lord Ordinary before whom it depends. Notice of the enrolment and of its purpose must be given to the opposite agent, by a written or printed billet, delivered or despatched through the Post-office, on the day on which the enrolment is made—i.e., always forty-eight hours, at the least, before the cause is to be called in the course of the motion-roll; and in addition to this notice, the roll of motions for each day is put on a board exposed on the tables in the Outer-House. In this respect there is a distinction between the motion-roll and the weekly printed roll of new causes; as to which last no notice of enrolment is necessary, the printed roll being held sufficient intimation. Motions are disposed of summarily, and almost invariably on the day specified in the roll; whereas causes frequently stand for many weeks in the Debate-rolls of the Lord Ordinary. See A. S. 6th Feb. 1806, and Beveridge's Form of Process, i. 266. See Record.

In the inferior courts, the practice is in some respects similar to that in the Court of Session. The agent for the party making the motion sends to the opposite agent a written notice, at least forty-eight hours before the court-day on which the case is to be in the roll, intimating the precise nature and object of the enrolment. A note of the motion ought also to be lodged with the process, in the hands of the sheriff-clerk, in time to be entered in the roll. When a case is called in the motion-roll, the agent for the party making the motion is heard; and when his statement is completed, the opposite party's agent is heard in reply. No new motion, or addition to the motion intimated, should be made either by the mover or the respondent. In general, the sheriff disposes of the motion in court, and the interlocutor thereon is written out and subscribed, proceeding on the narrative of having heard parties' procurators; and no other writing on the subject forms part of the process. But the sheriff may make avizandum with the cause, and give judgment, or he may order written pleadings when the case is important and difficult. Maclaurin's Sheriff Prac. 71; Alexander's Abridg. of A. S. 182-90. See Enrolment. Record. Rolls of Court. Notes.

Mourning. A widow has a legal claim to mournings for her husband, suitable to his quality, where his estate or rank requires mourning in point of decency; and this claim was in one case found good although the marriage had not subsisted for a year. But although the widow's mournings are, in a competition with creditors, held to constitute a privileged debt, yet, in another case, a claim for a widow's mournings was found not effectual in competition with the husband's creditors, where the marriage had been dissolved within year and day; Neilson, 21st Nov. 1776, Mor. 6165. The claim of a widow for aliment and mournings will not be barred by her acceptance of provisions made for her by her husband, by a deed declaring these provisions to be in full of all claims whatever which she may have on her husband's effects. Mourning for such of the deceased's children as are to assist at the funeral also form a privileged debt; but no claim can be made by the children who were not present at the funeral. A minor has been found liable for an account of mournings incurred by him for himself, his brothers, and sisters; and in an action pursued against an apparent heir, brother to a defunct, by a merchant who furnished mournings to the deceased's family, and to the defender in particular, although without any alleged order from him, the defender was found liable. Stair, B. i. tit. 4, § 10; More's Notes, xxvii., cccxii.; Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 41; B. iii. tit. 9, § 43, Notes by Mr Ivory; Bell's Com. i. 633; ii. 156; Bell's Princ. § 1406; 1 Fraser, 524. Moveables. Moveables are, in the phraseology of the law of Scotland, opposed to heritable; so that every species of property, and every right a person can hold, is by that law either heritable or moveable. Hence, moveables are not merely corporeal subjects capable of being moved, but every species of property, corporeal or incorporeal, which does not descend to the heir in heritable; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 2, § 3. See Heritable and Moveable. Executry.

Muirburn. By 13 Geo. III. c. 54, every person setting fire to any heath or muir in Scotland, from 11th April to 1st November, forfeits 40s. sterling for the first, L.5 sterling for the second, and L.10 for the third and every subsequent offence; and on failing to pay the penalty within ten days after conviction, suffers six weeks' imprisonment for the first, two months' for the second, and three months' for the third and subsequent offences. The tenant is held liable, unless he prove that the fire was communicated from some neighbouring ground, or was raised upon his ground by some person not in his family or service. But the proprietors of high and wet muirlands are entitled to burn, or to authorize their tenant to burn, the heath between the 11th and 25th of April. The act extends to the Highlands. Multiplepoinding. This term means double poinding, or double distress, and gives name to an action which may be brought by a person possessed of money or effects which are claimed by different persons pretending right thereto. Thus, where money due by a debtor has been arrested in his hands by the creditors of his creditor, or where the rents of an estate are claimed by different claimants on the estate,—the arrestee, in either of those cases, may raise an action of multiplepoinding, calling the different parties who claim the fund in medio, and all others, to settle their respective claims judicially; and also to have it found, that (whoever may be entitled to the fund) the arrestee is liable only "in once and single payment." This action may be raised by the arrestee, or by the person on whom the claim is made; but it may be also raised, in his name, by any of the parties interested in the competition, without his consent, or even against it; and every person interested, though not made a party to it originally, may, in the course of that action, produce an interest in it, and plead the grounds on which he conceives himself to be entitled to a preference. In this way the action becomes a process of competition between the different claimants on the fund; the holder of which, having brought it into Court, quits the field. The conclusions of the action are,—1. That the raiser shall be liable in once and single payment. 2. That the parties may debate their respective claims; that he or they who have the best right to the subject or fund in medio may be preferred; and that the raiser shall be entitled to the expense of raising the action and bringing the parties into Court. The subject of the action is in general a sum of money, but it may also be moveable or heritable property, or even a deed. Where the subject in medio is a sum of money, it must be such a debt as the holder may be obliged to pay. Rents to become due cannot competently form the subject of this process. When trustees have been appointed by a party deceased to pay off his debts, &c., and objections exist against some of the claims, it seems competent for the trustees to call all parties in a multiplepoinding, to have the amount of the claims settled, the moveable estate distributed, and themselves exonerated; even though there be no double distress, and although a reduction has been raised of the settlement of the deceased, in so far as it conveys land; M'Dougal's Trustees, 9th July 1830, 8 S. & D. 1036. Where a defender, on being sued for payment in an ordinary petitory action, states as a defence that all parties interested do not concur in the suit, it seems competent for the pursuer to raise a multiplepoinding in name of the defender, calling himself and the other parties; M'Target, 12th May 1829, 7 S. & D. 591. When a multiplepoinding is raised in the name of a holder of a fund by one of the claimants, it must be intimated to the nominal pursuer, by being served on him by a messenger-at-arms, in the same manner, and on the same inducia, as if he were one of the defendants, and an execution of it must be returned along with the executions of citation; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 23. The multiplepointing is executed by short copies, and proceeds on the short inducia of six days without a bill. The summons does not require to be printed; but if the multiplepointing contain conclusions for exoneration, or declaratory conclusions, the rules as to inducia, printing and executing, are the same as in an ordinary summons. Where the person possessed of the funds is the real pursuer, he must give out a condescendence of the fund in his hands along with the summons; and where he is only the nominal pursuer, he must, at the first calling of the cause, either give in a precise and articulate condescendence of the amount of the funds in his hands, stating likewise any claim or lien which he may think he may have on the fund, or produce objections as his defences against the summons served as a claim on him; otherwise he is held as confessed, or a condescendence may be ordered from any of the claimants; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 47. Where the amount of the fund is correctly stated in the summons, a condescendence is unnecessary. The holder of the fund is liable to the expense occasioned by his delaying to condescend. At the first calling of the cause, if the condescendence is lodged, and no objections are made to the competency of the action, the usual interlocutor is pronounced, finding the raiser of the multiplepointing liable in once and single payment only, and appointing the creditors claimants to produce their claims and grounds of debt in the clerk's hands within ten days. The condescendence of the holder will at the same time be allowed to be seen. The defences of the raiser are in the form of objections, either to the competency, or that all having interest are not called. It is no objection to the competency that the nominal raiser has no funds of the common debtor. The claimants may also lodge objections. When a fund is proved to be in the hands of the raiser, it will be ordered to be consigned in a bank, on the motion of any of the claimants, the receipt to be taken payable to such person as the Court or Lord Ordinary may direct, and to be lodged with the clerk to the process. See Consignation. But the raiser cannot be ordered de plano to consign, if he have any claim to the fund. On consignation, the holder is entitled to decree of exoneration, if the summons contain conclusions of exoneration, and also to the expenses incurred by him, which he may retain from the fund in medio; or if he have consigned the whole, he will obtain warrant for payment. He does not get expenses if the multiplepointing was unnecessarily raised by him, or if he occasioned unnecessary litigation; and in this last case he may even be found liable in expenses to the other party. On an interlocutor finding the holder liable in once and single payment, or on a decree of exoneration being pronounced, the holder has no further concern with the process. If any claimant, after appearing in the action, proceed with diligence against the holder, he will be liable in damages; White, 13th Feb. 1772, M. 9133. The claimants in a multiplepointing must state their respective claims in the form of condescendences, with the conclusions to be drawn from the facts so stated, in the shape of notes of pleas, producing therewith their grounds of debts and other writings for instructing their claims; and it is competent to the Lord Ordinary, if he see cause, to appoint the creditors to meet and choose a common agent, who shall prepare and lodge a state of the claims and preferences, putting his objections, as therein stated, to each or any of the claims, in the form of answers to a condescendence, with a note of pleas; and, quoad ultra, the duty and nature of his office are similar to that of a common agent in a process of ranking and division. See Condescendence and Claim; Common Agent. If no common agent be appointed, the parties are required to revise their condescendences, each being allowed to state, in the close of his condescendence, his objections to any other claim or claims, in the form of answers to a condescendence, with a note of pleas; and thereafter the procedure corresponds, as nearly as may be, to what is provided in the case of an ordinary action; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 48. All parties having an interest in the subject of the action may appear and produce their claims, though not cited. An interlocutor preferring one creditor, has the effect of an interlocutor repelling the claims of all the rest; and each claimant who does not mean to retire from the contest must reclaim against the interlocutor preferring his competitor. By 1584, c. 3, one who can show a necessary cause of absence, or a minor who was without tutors or curators at the date of the proceedings, is entitled, if he had a preferable right to the fund, to reduce the decree, and even, although expressly called in the action, to claim from those preferred repayment of what he should have drawn; but if the party cited be a minor with tutors or curators, his only recourse is against them. Those who were not summoned will be entitled to show that the decree was erroneous, and that the fund should still be paid to them. To prevent such questions, it is the practice to publish advertisements in the newspapers, intimating the dependence of the multiplepointing, and requiring all having claims upon the fund to appear. These intimations generally contain a declaration, that those who do not appear shall be excluded from any share in the division. But no such declaration can deprive a creditor of his legal right of preference, should he afterwards challenge the decree of multiplepointing, and be able to establish such preference. See the case of Morgan v. Morris, March 11, 1856, 18 D. 797; also the case of the Magistrates of Dundee v. Lindsay and Morris, Dec. 14, 1856, 19 D. 168. Where any of the claimants have creditors, these creditors may claim to be ranked on the fund set aside for their debtor. Such claims are called riding interests. See Riding Interests. A multiplepointing has been called a "congeries of actions;" inasmuch as, in the competition, each claimant, as against the competing claimants, may maintain all legal pleas, including pleas reductive of the grounds of the competing claim; Bell's Com. ii. 299. See generally, Stair, B. iii. tit. 1, § 39; B. iv. tit. 17, § 7; More's Notes, p. cccxxviii.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, § 23; Bank. vol. ii. p. 615; iii. 36; Bell's Com. ii. 297-301; Bell's Princ. § 2266; *Kames' Stat. Multures. The multure is a quantity of grain, either manufactured or in kind, deliverable to the proprietor or tacksman of a mill in return for grinding the corn. There are other small dues, as the knaveship, bannock, lock or gowpen, exigible by the miller, or servant at the mill, by whom the work is performed. The multure is payable by every person who comes to the mill for the purpose of grinding the grain. But the tenants and proprietors of some lands are bound to use a particular mill; and the lands so bound, or restricted to the mill, are termed the thirl or the sucken, and the tenants or proprietors the insucken multurers; while those who use a mill without being bound to use it, are termed the out-town or outsucken multurers. Hence, multures are of two sorts—those due by the persons astricted to the mill, termed insucken multures, and the multure exigible from those who voluntarily use the mill, called outsucken multure. The former, of course, is much heavier than the latter, the amount of which always depends on the situation of the mill, and the competition there may be with other mills to which the outsucken multurers have access. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 20; Stair, B. ii. tit. 7, § 15; B. iv. tit. 15, § 2; More's Notes, pp. ccxxv., cclxxiii.; Bank. vol. i. 684-9; Bell's Princ. § 1018, et seq.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, pp. 206-11-14, 561; Mac-laurin's Sheriff-Court Prac. p. 13; *Hutch. Municipal Law, Municipia. Municipia were cities dependent on Rome, the citizens of which were allowed certain privileges as Roman citizens; and which preserved their own laws, under the name leges municipales. Hence the term municipal law came to signify the laws of any free city or kingdom, and municipal and civil law are synonymous; Ersk. B. i. tit. 1, § 18; Kames' Equity, 492-4.

Murder; is the depriving a human being of life, deliberately and wilfully, without a cause. The deliberation and malice, or forethought, with which it is committed is one of the characteristics of the crime of murder. But the malice or forethought is merely that wicked and mischievous purpose which is the essence of the crime, and which may have been engendered at the meeting of the parties. The act of killing, of itself implies malice; and it lies on the accused to prove any one of those palliating or justifying circumstances which the law admits. See Homicide. Should a person, therefore, occasion the death of another, though there may be ground to presume that he meant only to inflict a severe beating, even this shows such a disregard to the safety of his fellow-creature, and a resolution to proceed to such extremities in order to gratify his resentment, that he must abide the consequences; and if death ensue, he will be held guilty of murder. With regard to the nature of the weapon, there is this difference, that some, as fire-arms, &c., are perfectly inconsistent with any other than an intent to kill; but there are others which may be thought to favour the presumption that there was no such intention. The law, however, considers every weapon with which a murder is committed as lethal. In the same way, where a person gives a violent medicine in order to procure abortion, and death is the result, there is such a disregard of the safety of the person to whom the drug is administered, that the person by whom it has been administered shall be held guilty of murder. We have also in our law what may be termed statutory murder. Thus, by an old act, 1450, c. 30, the importers of poison, by which bodily harm may be taken, are to be punished with death; but the act has been long in desuetude. Another species of statutory murder is constituted by 1690, c. 21, which enacts, that any woman who shall conceal her being with child, during the whole time of her pregnancy, and shall not call for, or make use of, help in the birth, is to be reputed the murderer, if the child be found dead or missing. In order to avoid the effect of this statute, the mother who is charged with this offence must, in her defence, be able to prove that she discovered her pregnancy, and called for help. But by statute 49 Geo. III. c.

14, the punishment of this crime is made imprisonment not exceeding two years. A person is art and part of murder—1. By accession at the fact; as e.g. if he has gone out in company with others to commit the crime, though he does not do it with his own hand. 2. By accession before the fact; as by giving orders for its committal, or furnishing the immediate means of committing it. 3. By accession after the fact; as by concealing the corpse, assisting the murderer, &c. Hume, vol. i. p. 249, et seq.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 40, et seq.; Bank. vol. ii. p. 669; *Swint. Mute. By the old English law, a prisoner who stood mute, as it was expressed—that is, refused to answer to an accusation—was held guilty of the crime laid to his charge, and was frequently exposed to excruciating torture. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Mutilation; is the crime of disabling or wounding another in his members. It is punishable arbitrarily. But mutilation is usually considered as an aggravation of assault, and in that case the punishment generally awarded is transportation. Hume, i. 323; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 50, and Note 203, by Mr Ivory; Alison's Princ. 195; *Kames' Stat. Mutiny. The Mutiny Act is an annual act, entitled, "An act to punish mutiny and desertion, and for the better payment of the army and their quarters." This act regulates the quartering of soldiers, and declares the offences for which soldiers may be punished, and points out the mode of their trial. The Sovereign is authorized to give commissions for holding courts-martial for the trial of these military offences. And, by the 22 Geo. II. c. 33, the Lord High Admiral is, in like manner, authorized to give commission for holding courts-martial for the trial of offences committed at sea, by officers, mariners, or others in actual service. See Court-Martial; Enlistment. The offence of mutiny is open disobedience of, and resistance to, authority. Any officer or soldier who uses traitorous or disrespectful words against the sacred person of her Majesty, or the royal family; or who behaves himself with contempt or disrespect towards the general or other commander-in-chief of the forces, or speaks words tending to their hurt and dishonour; or who begins, excites, causes, or joins in, any mutiny or sedition in the troop, company, or regiment to which he belongs, or in any other troop or company in the service, or in any party, post, detachment, or guard, on any pretence whatever; or who, being present at any mutiny or sedition, does not use his utmost endeavours to suppress the same, or, coming to the knowledge of any mutiny, or intended mutiny, does not, without delay, give information to his commanding officer; is guilty of mutiny. And any officer or soldier who strikes his superior officer, or draws, or offers to draw, or lifts up any weapon, or offers any violence against him, being in the execution of his office, on any pretence whatsoever, or disobeys any lawful command of his superior officer, is guilty of mutiny. The Mutiny Acts confer a privative jurisdiction in Scotland on the Court of Session, as to all actions, complaints, and suits against any person for anything done in pursuance of these acts, or against any member of a court-martial, in respect of any sentence of such court, or of anything done in virtue or pursuance thereof; 7 Will. IV. c. 7, § 75. As changes are sometimes made upon the provisions of the Mutiny Act, it is always advisable to consult the subsisting act. See Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 36; Hutch. Justice of Peace; Tait's Justice, voce Soldiers; Blair's Manual, voce Soldiers.

Mutual Contracts. A mutual contract is an engagement entered into by two or more persons, by which a reciprocal obligation is raised; the one party being bound to give, or do, or abstain from doing, something, in return for something to be given, or done, or abstained from, by the other party. Consensus in idem placitum is not a peculiar attribute of the mutual contract; there is no contract, whether mutual or unilateral, which is binding without a consensus in idem placitum, expressed or implied. Stair, B. i. tit. 3, § 9; Bell's Princ. § 70. See Contract, Obligation, Promise, Offer, Locus Pœnitentiæ, Unilateral Contract.

Mutual Entails. If two persons enter into mutual obligations to execute entails in favour of each other, neither entail, when executed, is revokable without the consent of both parties; and if either party should sell his entailed lands, in consequence of the right which he still retained in them, with a fraudulent view to disappoint the succession, an action lies against him for damages. In the case of mutual and onerous entails, the prohibitions are effectual against the creditors of the entailor. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 5, § 24, and Note by Mr Ivory; Bell's Com. i. 47; Sandford on Entails, 114; Bell's Princ. § 1747. See Tailzie.

Mutuum; is that contract by which a loan is given of such things as are consumed in the use, or as cannot be used without their extinction or alienation,—such as corn, wine, money, or the like; and as to which, therefore, the obligation on the borrower is to restore as much, and of the same kind, quality, and value, as he received. For a farther explanation of this contract, and of the difference between mutuum and commodate, see

Namare; or Namos capere; to take a poid or a distress. Skene, h. i.

Name. It frequently happens, that under deeds of entail, or as a condition of bequests, or for other causes, a person changes his name. In such cases, where a royal license or authority has been obtained, and inserted in the Gazette, authorising the change or the addition, a petition to the Court of Session for permission to use the additional name has been held unnecessary, not only in respect of the previous royal license, but also on the general ground that there is no need of the authority of that Court to entitle a man in Scotland to change his name. See Kettle Young, 14th Jan. 1835, 13 S. & D. 262. See, however, the Acts of Sederunt, 30th June 1757, 20th January 1764, 8th July 1774, 11th August 1780, and some others, for examples of petitions to the Court for authority to change the name; although in some of these instances the parties were not notaries-public.

Name and Arms. It is a common provision in entails, that the heir in possession shall bear the name and arms of the entailor; and if fenced by irritant and resolute clauses, this condition will be effectual. If the injunction be that the heir shall use the entailor's name and arms exclusively, and if the heir should succeed to another entailed estate, the entail of which contained a similar condition, it would be incumbent on him to make his election, since, consistently with such a condition, he could not take both. Bell's Princ. § 1725. See Arms.

Name on Carts and Carriages. The general Road Act, 1 and 2 Will IV. c. 43, provides, that the owner of every waggon or cart, and also of every coach, post-chaise, or other carriage, let either in the whole or in part to hire, must paint in a straight line horizontally, upon some conspicuous part, on the off or right side of his waggon or cart, and upon the pannels of the doors of all such coaches, post-chaises, or other carriages, before they are used upon any turnpike-road, the Christian and surname, and place of abode, of himself, or the principal owner or partner thereof, in large, legible Roman letters, either of a dark colour upon a light ground or of a light colour on a dark ground, not less than one inch in height, with numbers beginning with No. 1, where more of such carriages respectively than one belong to the same owner, and proceeding in regular progression. This must remain so long as the vehicle is used upon any turnpike-road. Every owner using, and every person driving, such a vehicle on a turnpike-road without this provision being attended to, is liable to a fine not exceeding forty shillings for every offence, and the vehicle pays double toll. Every person driving any such vehicle, who refuses to stop and permit the name to be read or uncovered by any person requiring him so to do, forfeits over and above, for every such offence, a sum not exceeding forty shillings.

Narrative of Deeds. The narrative describes the granter and the person in whose favour the deed is granted, and states the cause of granting. The effect of this clause, in all questions between strangers, is to prove against the granter the facts therein set forth, which he will not be allowed to disprove except by the oath or writing of the receiver. But our practice has introduced a different rule, where the deed is between conjunct and confident persons, and where creditors are concerned. In that case, it is not necessary for the creditors to prove want of value; but the onus probandi is on the granter to prove that he actually gave the value which the deed bears to have been given. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 22; Bell's Com. ii. 191-7; Bell on Purchaser's Title, 29; Ross's Lect. i. 163, 373, 293. See Consideration. Conjunct and Confident.

National Debt. The debt due by Great Britain is, in the hands of the creditors, termed stock, and may be transferred from one creditor to another. See Stock. Several statutes have been passed appointing measures to be taken for the reduction of the national debt. The principal act is 11 Geo. IV. c. 27, as amended by 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 24, and 7 Will. IV. c. 17.

Nations, Law of. See International Law.

Native; according to Skene, born alaves or servants. Skene, h. i.

Nativi; or bondmen; were the slaves by whom, anciently, the ground was laboured. For the different ways in which men might be reduced to this state of bondage, see Reg. Majest. i. 2, c. 12, §§ 4, 5, and Quon. Attach. c. 56. Slavery is said to have been abolished 100 years earlier in Scotland than in England; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 60. See, however, Colliers.

Natural Children. A natural child is the child of a woman who was not married to the father at the time of conception, and who never was thereafter married to him. See Bastard. Legitimation. Children.

Natural Obligations; are those obligations which arise from the law of nature only, or from natural equity. Such is the obligation on parents, whose circumstances permit of it, to provide their children with reasonable patrimonies; or the obligation on a party who has bound himself, by an informal writing, to pay or to perform in terms of his engagement, even although, by reason of the informality, he may have contracted no binding obligation in law. The characteristic of a natural, as contrasted with a legal or civil obligation, is, that the latter may be legally enforced against the obligant, whereas the former cannot; although, where one has acted in implement of a natural obligation, he will not, generally speaking, be permitted to retract what he has done, by demanding repetition or restitution in an action. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 4.

Nature, Law of. The law of nature is that sense of justice, and that feeling of right and wrong experienced by every human being, and which has been emphatically described as a law written by the finger of God on the heart of man. Ersk. B. i. tit. 1, § 7.

Naturalisation; is a right conferred on an alien by act of Parliament, in virtue of which he acquires the privileges of a British subject. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 10, § 10, Note by Mr Ivory; Bank. vol. i. p. 80; Bell's Princ. § 2136; *Swint. Nautæ, Caupones, Stabularii. This is the title given to the well-known edict of the Roman prætor, by which shipmasters, innkeepers, and stablers were made answerable for the goods and effects of travellers which had been brought into the ship, inn, or stable. The edict is in these terms: "NAUTÆ, CAUPONES, STABULARII, QUOD CUJUSQUE SALVUM FORE RECEPERINT, NISI RESTITUENT, IN EOS JUDICIUM DABO." This rule, from its expediency, has been, with some variations, received into the law of Scotland. Persons of this description are liable for their servants, or even for the acts of guests and passengers; and the extent of the damage may be proved by the oath of the claimant, in litem, as it is termed, although this rule has of late been considerably modified, both by statute and decisions. See Innkeepers. There is no liability for money said to be taken from the pocket of the traveller, though there is for money contained in the pockets of clothes which have been carried off, or in trunks which have been broken open or carried off. The rule extends, by Scotch practice, to vintners and all who carry goods for hire.

By 11 Geo. IV., and 1 Will. IV. c. 68, the liability of the proprietors of vehicles for carriage is placed under certain limitations. Mail-coach contractors, stage-coach proprietors, and other common carriers for hire, are not liable for certain goods (gold or silver coin, gold or silver in a manufactured or unmanufactured state, or precious stones, jewellery, watches, clocks, time-pieces of any description, trinkets, bills, notes of the governor and company of the Banks of England, Scotland, and Ireland, or of any other bank in the kingdom; orders, notes, or securities for payment of money, English or foreign; stamps, maps, writings, title-deeds, paintings, engravings, pictures, gold or silver plate, or plated articles, glass, china, silks in a manufactured or unmanufactured state, whether wrought up with other materials or not, furs or lace), delivered for carriage, above the value of £10, unless delivered as such, and an increased charge, or an engagement to pay an increased charge, accepted. When any such parcel is delivered, an increased rate of charge may be demanded by the coach proprietor or carrier, to be notified in legible characters in some conspicuous part of the office, warehouse, or other receiving-house; and all persons delivering such parcels are bound by this notice, without further proof of their knowledge. The carrier receiving the increased rate must, if required, sign a receipt for the parcel, acknowledging it to have been insured, which receipt is not liable for any stamp-duty; and if this receipt is not given when required, or if the notice above mentioned has not been affixed, the carrier is not entitled to the benefit of the act. The publication of notices does not limit the liability of the carrier for other goods than those mentioned above. Every office used by the carrier or coachmaster is held a receiving-house; and any one of several coach proprietors or carriers is liable to be sued, no action being abated for want of joining in the summons the name of a co-proprietor. The act does not in the least degree affect special contracts. Parties entitled to damages for loss may also recover extra charges. The carrier is liable for articles of the above description and value only when the ordinary legal evidence has been given of the value, and of the amount of damage sustained, which can in no case exceed the declared value. Money may be paid into court by the coachmaster or proprietor with the same effect as in other actions. The act 17 and 18 Vict. c. 31 (1854), provides for the better regulation of the traffic on railways and canals. Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 5; tit. 13, § 18; B. iv. tit. 44, § 4; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, §§ 28-9, Notes by Mr Ivory; Bank. vol. i. p. 378; Bell's Com. i. 465-75, 559-64; Bell's Princ. §§ 235-45; Illust. ib.; *Hutch. Navigation. See River. Sea.

Navigation Acts. This term is applied to those statutes which have been passed with the view of regulating the commercial intercourse of this country and her colonies. According to Professor Bell, the objects of these acts have been the creation of a body of skilful and hardy seamen; the increase of the shipping in the possession of British subjects; and the promotion of English ship-carpentry, by confining the privileges to ships British built; Bell's Com. i. 154. The latest act upon this subject is 12 and 13 Vict. c. 29, 1849, which consolidates the preceding acts. See, on this subject, Bell's Com. i. 152; Bell's Princ. § 1322; Mr Brodie's Sup. to Stair, 948, 985; Swint. Abridg. h. t. See also Ship. Registry Acts.

Navy. The payment of the royal navy is provided for by certain recent acts. These acts regulate the advances made to marines, &c.; the remittance of wages by seamen; the wills of seamen; and other matters connected with the men on board royal ships. See 11 Geo. IV., and 1 Will. IV. c. 20, and 4 and 5 Will. IV. c. 25. See also Seaman. Court-Martial.

Navy Bills. See Exchequer Bills.

Necromancy; or the corresponding with evil spirits, and the practising of witchcraft by their assistance; was formerly held to be a crime cognisable by law. By statute 9 Geo. II. c. 50, however, all prosecutions on account of witchcraft are prohibited; but pretenders to a knowledge of the occult sciences and the telling of fortunes are punishable by imprisonment for a year, and the pillory once in every three months of that year; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 18. See Witchcraft, Egyptians, Pillory.

Negative Prescription. See Prescription.

Negative Servitude. See Servitude.

Negligence. The negligence from which a loss arises will throw that loss on the person guilty of the negligence; but different degrees of negligence are required in different situations to produce this effect. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, §§ 13, 21; B. iv. tit. 4, § 5; Bell's Com. i. 360, 444, 453-9, 462-3, 558, 579; Bell's Princ. §§ 232, 525, 544, 553, 2031; Illust. § 234. See Diligence, Culpa. Damages, Mora.

Negotiation; is the procedure which the holder of a bill must follow to procure acceptance of it, and payment when it falls due. The steps necessary to be taken to preserve recourse against the drawer and indorser, in case of non-acceptance or non-payment, are considered in other articles. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, §§ 32-4; Bell's Com. i. 408-31; Bell's Princ. §§ 331-41; Illust. ib.; Shaw's Digest, p. 82; Thomson on Bills, 163, 407, 458, et seq. See Bill of Exchange, Acceptance, Dis-honour, Protest, Noting a Bill, Indorsation.

Negotiorum Gestor; is one who interferes spontaneously in the management of the affairs of another, without his knowledge and in his absence, and without any formal mandate or warrant from him for whom he acts. A negotiorum gestor is liable for all sums of money which come into his hands in the course of his actings; but he is entitled, on the other hand, not only to repayment of money paid by him for the principal, but to interest on the outlay. He is not entitled, however, to any remuneration for his trouble; neither is he liable for any loss the effects may suffer. The degree of diligence required from him depends upon the circumstances under which he has interfered. In a case of necessity, where immediate attention is required, the gestor is liable only for gross omissions; whereas cases may occur in which he engages him for whom he acts in transactions, as to which the gestor will be liable even for casual misfortunes. In the common case, he is liable in a middle kind of diligence. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, §§ 52, 53; Stair, B. i. tit. 8, § 3; More's Notes, pp. liv. cclxiii; Bank. vol. i. p. 232; iii. 66; Bell's Com. i. 269; Bell's Princ. § 539; Illust. ib.; Tait's Just. of Peace, voce Recompense. Nemo Debet ex Alieno Damno Lucrari.

This is a maxim of the Roman law founded upon natural equity, and the principle of it may be said to be generally adopted in the law of Scotland. An illustration of its application occurs in the case where a person has erected a building on the property of another, in the bona fide belief that he was building upon his own ground. In that case, although the owner of the ground is entitled to take the building, he will be bound, under this maxim, to indemnify the person who built bona fide, to the extent at least of the benefit gained at his expense. Stair, B. i. tit. 6, § 33; tit. 7, § 11; tit. 8, § 6; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 33; Bank. vol. iii. p. 87; Kames' Equity, 92, 215, 317, 411, 440. See Adjunction. Contexture.

Nemo Præsumitur Ludere in Extremis; a maxim which has been sometimes applied in questions as to the construction of ludicrous or jocular bequests, and which imports, that an impossible or absurd condition adjoined to a bequest is not to be held as a proof of want of a serious intention of bequeathing. Bell's Princ. § 1881.

Nemo Tenetur Edere Instrumenta Contra Se. This rule of the Roman law, that no man is bound to produce writings against himself, is so far departed from in civil questions, that where writings in the hands of a defender are requisite to support the plea of the pursuer, the pursuer may specify what those writings are, and the defender will be bound to exhibit them; but the defender is not bound to make a production upon vague allegations. The same rule applies to the pursuer, where he has in his possession writings specially called for by the defender. In the prosecution of crimes, writings may be necessary in proof of the crime; but here the rule is rigidly adhered to, and no man is obliged to produce writings in his custody which may affect his life, estate, or good name. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 52, and tit. 4, § 95. See Exhibition. Diligence.

Nemo Tenetur Jurare in Suam Turpitudinem. The rule, that no one can be forced to give his own oath in evidence of his guilt, is received in all trials of crimes where the punishment may affect the life, limb, liberty, estate or reputation, of the panel; but, in slight offences which are punishable only by a small fine or short imprisonment, the rule does not hold, and the offence may be referred to the oath of the accused, if no other means of proof is to be obtained. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, §§ 94, 95. See Evidence.

Neutrals. During a war between two countries, the ships of neutral states are entitled to trade with both parties, unless when the port to which they are carrying the goods is under blockade. Neutrals are not entitled to carry contraband of war to either of the belligerents, and they are subject to be searched. Stair, B. ii. tit. 2, § 7; Bell's Com. i. 304; Bell's Princ. § 43. See Reprisals. Capture. Blockade.

New Trial. In jury causes, the time allowed to move for a new trial is twenty days after the trial, if there should be that period of the session to run, and if not, six days after the commencement of the next session. In the case of causes tried during the Christmas recess, and where twenty days have not elapsed after the date of the verdict, the application may be made at any time within twenty days after the said date; A. S. 29th Nov. 1825, § 35. It is competent to move for a third, or any number of trials, and the same rules apply to each motion. The first step in the application is, to move the Court for a rule on the opposite party to show cause why a new trial should not be granted. Notice must be given to the opposite agent, and a copy lodged with the clerk. When the motion is founded on averments to be supported by affidavits, they ought to be duly lodged and intimated to the opposite party before the motion is heard. If the party moving succeed in making out a prima facie case, the Court grants a rule ordaining the opposite party to be ready to show cause why a new trial should not be granted; but if he fail in making out a prima facie case, the rule is de plano refused. After the rule has been granted, and previous to hearing counsel against and for the granting a new trial, a report in writing of what passed at the trial must be delivered to the Division of the Court in which the application for the new trial is to be heard, signed by the judge who presided at the trial; A. S. 29th Nov. 1825, § 55. The case is then again put out in the roll, and the counsel for both parties is heard. Every point in the case is open for discussion, so far as relevant to the grounds on which the motion has been rested. If a new trial should not be applied for, or if it should be refused, the verdict of the jury is final and conclusive as to the facts found, and is not liable to be questioned by an appeal to the House of Lords, except in the circumstances mentioned in the articles Appeal, and Exceptions, Bill of; 55 Geo. III. c. 42, § 8; 59 Geo. III. c. 35, § 16. The grounds on which a new trial may be moved for are: the verdict being contrary to evidence; misdirection on the part of the judge; undue admission or rejection of evidence; excess of damages; res noviter veniens ad notitiam; or such other cause as is essential to the justice of the case; 55 Geo. III. c. 42, § 6. This last ground has been found to include cases where it appears doubtful whether justice has been done; where the evidence appears insufficient to support the verdict; where the damages are small and insufficient; where the verdict does not answer the issues; or proceeds on a manifest error, inconsistent with the justice of the case; where the unsuccessful party has been taken by surprise; where there are objections to the jurymen; and where there has been fabrication of evidence, and falsehood and fraud in the procedure. See a full statement of the law on this subject in Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 253, et seq. See also,

Shaw's Digest, 972. See Jury Trial. Exceptions, Bill of Appeal.

Newspapers. When a creditor with an heritable security is vested with a power of sale, under condition of advertising in a newspaper, publication in a paper containing nothing but advertisements is held sufficient compliance with the condition; Dickson, Jan. 15, 1831, 9 S. & D. 282. The good-will of a newspaper is held to be property transmissible inter vivos, or to heirs; and if, on the dissolution of a partnership carrying on a newspaper, by death of one of the partners, the surviving partners who may be desirous to continue the publication refuse to buy it, then, like the other rights of the deceased in the dissolved company, it must be sold for behoof of his representatives; McCormick, July 4, 1822, 1 S. & D. 541.

Nexi; among the Romans, were free-born persons who had been reduced to a state of slavery for debt.

Next of Kin. See Executors.

Night Poaching. By 57 Geo. III. c. 90, any one poaching at night, armed with a gun or other offensive weapon, or knowingly accompanying one so armed, is punishable with transportation for seven years. It is sufficient that the panel is seen on the ground, though he is only apprehended coming out of it. Gamekeepers may apprehend offenders, though not armed. By 9 Geo. IV. c. 69, amended by 7 and 8 Vict. c. 29, 1844, when three or more are found together in the ground, and any of them is armed, they are punishable with transportation for fourteen years. Night commences with the second hour after sunset, and ceases at the beginning of the last hour before sunrise; Alison's Princ. 548; Steele, 171. See Game Laws.

Nisi Prius; an English law judicial writ. The record of every cause in the law courts at Westminster adjourns the trial to a future day at Westminster; nisi prius (according to the old Latin form) justiciarii domini Regis ad assisas capiendas venerint; i. e., unless the judges previously come to the place named to hold the assizes, which they are sure to do. In London and Middlesex, courts of nisi prius are holden in and after every term, called sittings, before the chief or other judge of the several superior courts, to try causes by jury; and the causes tried at these sittings and on the circuits in England are called Nisi Prius cases. Tomlins, h. t.

Nobile Officium. The nobile officium of the Court of Session does not admit of a precise definition. Generally speaking, it may be said to be the equitable power vested in that Court, whereby it interposes to modify or abate the rigour of the law, and, to a certain extent, to give aid where no remedy could be had in a court confined to strict law; Stair, B. iv. tit. 3, § 1; More's Notes, p. cccxliv.; Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 22; Bank. vol. ii. p. 517. See this subject more fully treated under the article Equity. See also Judicial Factor.

Nobility. Under this title are comprehended all degrees of dignity above a knight baronet. Those degrees are duke, marquis, earl, viscount, and baron. But although the scale of dignity is thus graduated, the holders of those dignities are equal in all public acts, and are hence denominated peers of the realm. See Dignities. Peerage.

Nobleman. See Peer.

Nolle Prosequi; in English law, is where a plaintiff in an action does not declare, in a reasonable time; in which case it is usual for the defendant's attorney to enter a rule for the plaintiff to declare, after which a non prosequitur may be entered. Tomlins, h. t.

Nomen Debiti; the right to payment of a debt. Legatim nominis, is a legacy of a right to a debt due to the testator. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 4.

Nominate and Innominate. A nominate right is a right possessing a nomen juris, the use of which defines its boundaries, and settles the consequences to all concerned. Those rights generally receive a nomen juris which are frequently the subjects of contract and of legal discussion; while other rights of infrequent occurrence remain innominate, and must be determined by the application of the law to the circumstances in the particular case. The nominate and innominate contracts illustrate the doctrine. Where two parties enter into a bargain, recognised as a nominate contract, such as sale, the legal rules which regulate its operation are at once understood, and the reciprocal rights of the parties are implied in the mere name of the contract. The law thus supersedes the necessity of special stipulations, and creates an obligation in the one party to perform, and a right in the other to demand, whatever is necessary to the explication of that contract. In the case of the innominate contracts, again, the law supplies nothing beyond the express agreement of the parties; and there are no obligations or rights created, except such as have been matter of special covenant between the parties. In the Roman law, there were twelve nominate contracts; and for each of these there was a particular action, such as the actio mutui, the actiones commodati directa et contraria, the actiones empti et venditi, &c. When it was necessary to bring an action for implement of an innominate contract, the action was in factum, or præscriptis verbis. In the Roman law, innominate contracts could only be constituted ex re—that is, by the delivery of the subject of the contract:

in the law of Scotland, generally speaking, writing is required. In courts of justice, the nominate are more favourably viewed than the innominate contracts; and hence, an irregularity which, in the case of an innominate contract, would release the parties, will not have the same effect where the contract is nominate. The same distinction holds between nominate and innominate servitudes. And although Erskine says that there may be as great a variety of conventional servitudes as there can be ways in which one man's property may be burdened or restricted in favour of another (Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 2), yet it would rather appear to have been the rule of our older law, as laid down by Professor Bell, that only well-established and defined servitudes can be constituted as real burdens effectual against singular successors; Bell's Princ. § 979. Thus, in Jaffray, Feb. 18, 1755, M. 14,517, it was held in the House of Lords, that bleaching is not a servitude acknowledged in the law of Scotland. In a later case, however, the servitude of bleaching and drying linen was held to have been acquired—Sinclair, Feb. 10, 1779, M. 14,519, House of Lords, March 8, 1779. And a servitude of golfing has likewise been admitted; Dempster, May 17, 1805, M. 1614, 2 Dow, 40; Magistrates of Queensferry v. Malcolm, June 12, 1829, 7 S. 755. But although these cases recognise the admissibility of innominate servitudes, yet the law regards them with more distrust, and requires much stronger evidence of their constitution and nature than it does in the case of servitudes possessing a recognised nomen juris. Heinec. Elem. Juris. § 779.

Nominate Tutor. See Tutor.

Nomination. In Scotland, this word is used to signify an appointment to an office. In England, it is applied to the appointment of a clergyman; in which sense it is synonymous with the Scotch term presentation. As to the nomination of candidates for a seat in Parliament, see Reform Act.

Non Compos Mentis; of unsound mind. Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 48; Bell's Com. ii. 568. See Idiot. Furious Person. Brieve. Curatortory. Insanity. Imbecility.

Non Creditur Referenti, Nisi Constet de Relato; a maxim used by Erskine, as implying that reference made in one writing to another is no proof of the existence of that other. Thus, an instrument of sasine does not prove the existence of the charter to which it refers. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 5.

Non Memini. When a party to whose oath a debt or payment is referred swears non memini, it has generally the effect of absolving him; but if the fact is so recent that the swearer cannot be believed ignorant of it, he is held as confessed in the same manner as if he had refused to depone. Non memini is not equivalent to a denial of the fact, and does not shut out the person making the reference from establishing it by other proofs originally competent. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 14; Tait on Evidence, 240.

Non Numeratæ Pecuniæ. In the Roman law, an obligation might be raised ex literis, by granting an acknowledgment of having received a sum of money, although no such money had been actually paid. During two years, however, the debtor was entitled to plead the exception non numeratæ pecuniæ—i.e., to plead that the money had not been received; and in that case the onus lay upon the holder of the bond to prove, by evidence external to the bond, that the money had been paid. But if two years were allowed to elapse, the debt was held constituted by the writing alone, and no proof of the non-existence of the debt could be received. It was formerly believed that this rule of the Roman law had force in Scotland, and hence it was customary to insert a clause in old Scotch bonds, binding the debtor not to avail himself of the exception non numeratæ pecuniæ. But no such law exists in Scotland. Heinec. Elem. Juris. § 888; Stair, B. i. tit. 10, § 11; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 2, § 5; Ross's Lect. i. 53.

Non Officiendi Luminibus. See Light.

Non Valens Agere. See Contra non valentem, &c. Prescription. Interruption.

Nonage; in English law, signifies, in general, all the time that a person continues under the age of twenty-one; but, in a special sense, it corresponds to the Scotch term pupillage, and denotes all the time that a person is under the age of fourteen. Tomlins, h. t. See Minor.

Non-Adherence. See Adherence.

Nonconformists; those who do not conform to the established religion. There were formerly severe statutory regulations against nonconformity; but these have all been repealed. See Nonjurors, and authorities there cited.

Non-Entres; is where a vassal, vest and seised in the fee and property of the lands, deceases, leaving behind an heir, who, being of lawful age, may enter to the lands by taking of sasine thereof, and yet enters not; in which case the lands are in the hands and power of the immediate superior, by reason of non-entresse. Skene, h. t. See next article.

Non-Entry; is the casualty which falls to the superior where the heir of a deceased vassal neglects to obtain himself entered with the superior; or, as it is otherwise expressed, who fails to renew the investiture. In virtue of this casualty, the superior is entitled to the rents of the feu; but in order to favour the vassal, those rents, previous to the period of the superior's raising an action of non-entry, are held to be no more than the retoured duties of the lands; or, where there is no retour, than the valued rent of the lands. But after an action of declarator of non-entry has been raised, then, from the date of citation, the superior is entitled to the full rent. In this action the superior, in the ordinary case, must produce his sasine; the apparent heir (i. e., the unentered heir) is made a party, but the action contains no personal conclusion for payment against him. The superior claims the retoured duties, because it is only after citation that the full rent is due; and there must be a conclusion for pointing the ground, in order to render the claim effectual, as no personal decree is pronounced against the heir. In virtue of the decree in this action, the superior may recover the duties due before citation (which are debita fundi) by a pointing of the ground; but the full rents which became due after citation belong to the superior, as interim proprietor, and are therefore to be recovered, not by a pointing of the ground, but by an action against the tenants for payment of their rents. Where the vassal dies after having disposed, and where the purchaser has not entered with the superior, the superior's usual remedy is an action of reduction-improbation against the purchaser, with a declarator of non-entry; and although it does not appear to be indispensable in such an action to call the heir of the deceased vassal, yet, if the heir choose in such circumstances to enter, to the effect of becoming the mid-superior of the purchaser, the superior must receive him; Magistrates of Dundee, 26th June 1829, 7 S. & D., 801; Piggot, 9th Dec. 1829, 8 S. & D., 213. Non-entry is excluded wherever the fee is held by a corporation, for then the fee is always full. A corporation never dies. The fee is considered as full, and therefore an action of non-entry is excluded, so long as the vassal lives, although he may have made over the feu to another. In the same way, where lands are conveyed to a husband and wife in conjunct fee and liferent, and the infeftment following on the right has been confirmed by the superior, the fee is held to be full so long as either the husband or the wife remains alive. An infeftment on a public right to be held of the vassal's superior, when confirmed by the superior, renders the fee full; and, lastly, non-entry is excluded by the husband's courtesy as to the whole of the lands; and to the extent of one-third by the widow's terce. Non-entry duties cannot be claimed by a superior when the entry is delayed through his own fault; and therefore, from the date of a charge at the instance of an heir, who, at the same time, offers the relief and non-entry duties, non-entry is excluded. It is excluded, also, by a charge at the instance of an adjudger of the vassal's property, who offers a year's rent; further, a superior forfeits the non-entry duties during his life, where he is unentered, and refuses to complete his title. *Ersk. Nonjurors; were those who, from attachment to the Stuart family, refused to take the oaths to the Government as established at the Revolution of 1688. The objection to take the oaths rested on the obligation under which the nonjuror supposed himself to lie to the King de jure, as he was called. In order to exclude from all public employments those who professed opinions unfavourable to the rights of the reigning family, certain oaths were required to be taken by all who held public offices; and as those of the Scottish Episcopal Church were remarkable for their adherence to the exiled royal family, preachers in Episcopal meeting-houses were required to take the oaths, and pray for the King by name—5 Geo. I. c. 28; and where these were neglected, their hearers were punished; 19 Geo. II. c. 39, and 21 Geo. II. c. 34. These statutes are still unrepealed, although the political necessity which required them no longer exists. See Hutch. Just. ii. 318; Tail's Just. voce Nonconformist; Blair's Just. cod. tit.; Swint. Abridg. cod. tit. See Episcopalian.

Non-Obstante; a clause formerly frequent in statutes and letters-patent, importing a license from the King to do a thing which at common law might be lawfully done, but which, being restrained by statute, cannot be done without such license. A non-obstante is now against law. Tomlins, h. t.

Non-Suit; in English law, the dropping or renunciation of a suit or action by the plaintiff. This most commonly happens upon the discovery of some error in the plaintiff's proceedings, when the cause is so far proceeded in that the jury are ready to deliver in their verdict. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Not Guilty and Not Proven. Not guilty, is the general issue or plea of the accused, or panel, in any criminal action. A verdict of not guilty imports the jury's opinion that the panel is innocent. A verdict of not proven only indicates that, in the opinion of the jury, there is a deficiency in the evidence to convict him. Alison's Prac. 363; Steele, 211. See Verdict. Plea of Panel.

Notary-Public. A notary-public has been defined to be a public officer, who, upon examination and trial, being admitted by the Lords of Session, gets power to take instruments in any honest and lawful business, which instruments make faith in law. The candidate for the office must be of good fame, and possessed of a reasonable knowledge of law, and particularly of the law relating to the duties which, in the exercise of his office, he may be called upon to discharge. Where one desires to be admitted a notary, the present form is for the candidate to apply to the clerk to the admission of notaries, who holds his office under the Crown, and by whom a petition for the candidate is presented to the Court of Session, setting forth that the in-trant has been engaged in studying the laws, forms, and practice of Scotland; and that, being now desirous to exercise the office of a notary-public, he prays to be examined as to his qualifications, and, if found qualified, to be admitted; and also, that the Court may grant warrant to the clerk to the admission of notaries, to mark his protocol book, receive his cautioner, &c. An attestation by an advocate and by a writer to the signet, setting forth their knowledge of the petitioner, and of his good fame and qualifications, must be subjoined to the petition; and, on its being moved, the Court remits to the examiners of notaries, who are certain members of the Society of Writers to the Signet, annually elected by the society for that purpose. If the report of the examiners be favourable, the Court admits the petitioner to be a notary-public, and remits to the Lord Ordinary in the Outer-House to administer to the in-trant the oaths of allegiance, abjuration, and de fidei; and grants warrant to the clerk to the admission of notaries to mark his protocol-book. A notary being admitted to his office by royal authority, that authority is interposed in the form of a letter which passes the cachet, addressed to the Court of Session, declaring the King's intention to admit the in-trant as a notary, provided the Court of Session find him qualified. This warrant, which is obtained as a matter of course, is recited in the act of admission of the notary, which is inserted in the register kept by the clerk to the admission of notaries, in which register, also, the sign, motto, and subscription of the notary are inserted for preservation. The clerk to the admission of notaries then gives the in-trant his commission, which recites the procedure above mentioned—the fact that the notary has taken the requisite oaths—that he has found caution for the faithful performance of his office—that he has received a protocol-book, and that he is to use the sign and subscription manual in the form annexed to his commission. This commission bears to be extracted from the records of the admission of notaries, and is signed by the clerk to the admission, and is the authority in virtue of which the notary exercises his duty as a notary. Some law writers have bestowed considerable historical research on the subject of notaries-public. Without citing special authorities on a matter really of no practical importance, the following points may be stated as ascertained:—1. That the office of a notary was known in ancient Rome. 2. That, after the establishment of Christianity, notaries were appointed by the Pope originally for the purpose of preserving the records of the Church, but afterwards for purposes almost entirely secular. 3. That the authority of apostolical notaries was recognised all over Christendom. 4. That after a conflict, the progress of which it is of no consequence to trace, apostolical and all ecclesiastical notaries were abolished in Scotland at the Reformation, and the appointment of notaries vested in the Sovereign, under regulations which, with certain modifications, remain in force at the present day. The statutes of the Scotch Parliaments connected with this subject are, 1469, c. 31; 1503, c. 64; 1540, c. 76; 1540, c. 78; 1551, c. 24; 1555, c. 43; 1563, c. 78 and 79; 1587, c. 45; 1617, c. 22; A. S. 30th July 1691. The protocols mentioned in several of those statutes are still given out to the notaries; but, in practice, they are never called back by the clerk; and it is believed that very few notaries make any use of them. A deed subscribed by notaries, without the mandate of the person by whom it bears to be executed, is held to be forged; the same is the case if a man personates another who cannot write, and thus obtains a false notarial subscription, by imposing on the notaries; Hume, i. 143; Alison's Princ. 381. The duties of notaries in preparing instruments of sasine—in executing deeds—in attesting copies of writings, and the like, and the evidence afforded by those notarial documents respectively, are necessarily treated of under different articles in this Dictionary. See, in particular, Doquet. Evidence. Instruments. Testament. Sasine. Writ. See also, on the subject of this article, Ross's Lect. vol. ii. p. 201, and The Office of a Notary, passim; MacKenzie's Observations on the Statutes, pp. 68, 122, 153, 167, 240, 356; Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 17; B. iii. tit. 8, § 34; B. iv. tit. 42, § 9; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, §§ 9, 23; B. iv. tit. 2, § 5; Bank. vol. ii. p. 500; Bell's Com. i. 460, 675, 323, 366; ii. 17; Bell's Princ. §§ 19, 298, 338, 770–1; Illust. §§ 298, 338; *Kames' Stat. Note of Pleas in Law. See Pleas in Law.

Note, Promissory. See Promissory-Note and Bank Notes.

Notes. In the judicial proceedings of the Court of Session, the most important Notes are Reclaiming notes, and Notes of pleas in law; as to which, see Record; Pleas in Law; Reclaiming Note. Notes of advocacy and suspension are now brought in virtue of 1 and 2 Vict. c. 86, 1838. But the term note is also applied to various incidental applications, the occasions for which it would be difficult to enumerate. In the Inner-House, such incidental notes are usually presented where a prorogation of the term for lodging a paper ordered by the Court is required; where it is necessary to have a remit of a depending cause to a new Lord Ordinary; where circumstances render it necessary to pray the Court to retard or expedite the decision in a particular cause, or the like. These notes are usually in MS., and are addressed to the Lord President of the Division of the Court in which the cause depends. They pray his Lordship to move the Court to the effect required; and they must be regularly intimated to the opposite party, by leaving copies at the office or place of business of his agent; A. S. 9th July 1806. In effect, these notes are mere memoranda, or notices of motion. In the Bill-Chamber, similar notes are presented when the parties wish to be heard by counsel before a bill of suspension and answers is disposed of, or when either party wishes time to reclaim against a Bill-Chamber interlocutor; and here also intimation is necessary to the agent of the opposite party. In the Outer-House, occasionally, although rarely, an application is made to the Lord Ordinary by a note, where, in peculiar circumstances, the requisite motion cannot be otherwise made. See Motions. Old Witnesses. Bill-Chamber.

Noting a Bill. When the debtor in a bill or note refuses acceptance or fails to make payment, the notary presenting the bill makes a minute at the time, on the bill or note, consisting usually of his initials and of the date. This is called noting, and is in effect a mere memorandum by the notary, to assist his memory in extending his protest. Hence noting, as distinguished from the protest, has been said to be "unknown to the law;" although it seems to be now settled, that it is a kind of initial protest, which will be effectual if a formal instrument of protest be afterwards extended. But in the event of the death of the notary before such protest is extended, or in his absence, it would appear that, on the faith of the notary, the protest cannot be lawfully extended by another notary. No action of recourse can be maintained against the drawer or indorsers unless the instrument of protest be regularly extended; and in Scotland there can be no summary diligence on bills or notes, either against the acceptors, drawers, or indorsers, unless the extended protest is registered within six months from the date of the bill, in the case of non-acceptance, or from the term of payment, in case of non-payment. In practice, the bill, when dishonoured, is noted, and usually allowed to lie over for a day or two, so as to admit of a settlement; but if ulterior proceedings for the recovery of the debt become necessary, the protest must be extended; and in order to preserve recourse against the drawer and indorsers, the bill must be noted on the third day of grace, or, if that be a Sunday or a holiday, on the day preceding; Smith v. Payne, 29th June, 1786, Mor. 1612; 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 15. But as against the acceptor of the bill or note, it may be protested at any time within the six months; and hence, where, for example, a bill has been discounted at a bank, and dishonoured and noted by the notary of the bank, and thereupon retired from the bank by the drawer or indorser, it is perfectly competent for him, after the days of grace, and within the six months, to protest the bill, as against the acceptor, by means of another notary, and to record that protest, and expedite summary diligence. In such a case, although it is usual, it is not indispensable, that the notary who noted the bill at the bank should take or extend the protest against the acceptor. Thomson on Bills, 446, et seq., 2d edit.; Glen on Bills, 194. See Bill of Exchange. Protest.

Notoriety. According to Stair, proof by notoriety is when the judge knows that the point to be proved is commonly known or acknowledged to be true, whether it be known to a whole country, or to a whole vicinity. Such proof is not elided by showing that some particular persons are ignorant of the fact; but it may be redargued by stronger positive proof, when proposed in due time. Allegations for husbands, wives, parents or children, are received without proof of their character as such; unless pregnant proof to the contrary be offered, and instantly verified. But such proof to the contrary is competent in an action of reduction. In services of heirs, or of widows to their terces, the fact of relationship being "commonly holden and reputed" in the vicinity is sufficient, without proving the marriage of the father and mother, or of the husband and wife. But proof that such persons could not have been lawfully married, if instantly verified, would stop or annul the service, or would be competent in a reduction. What is done in presence of the judge in judgment is accounted notorious; but this rule does not hold ex intervallo, since a judge deciding upon his individual recollection would be acting the part of a witness. Stair and Erskine consider the judge's knowledge of the notoriety admissible proof of the fact; but Glassford entertains a contrary opinion; Glassford, 602. See also Stair, B. iv. tit. 45, § 4; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 33; Tait on Evidence, 432. Nova Dissasina; recent spulzie or ejection. Skene, h. t.

Nova Debita. Debts newly or recently contracted, in contradistinction to old or prior debts. In questions as to fraudulent preferences given within sixty days of bankruptcy, security or payment granted as a consideration for a debt presently contracted is not reducible as fraudulent. Bell's Com. ii. 202, 220; Thomson on Bills, 686, 704. See Bankrupt.

Novalia; is a term applied to lands newly improved or cultivated, and in particular to those lands which, having lain waste from time immemorial, had been brought into cultivation by the monks. There are certain lands exempted from the payment of stipend, and this exemption has been ascribed to their formerly having been novalia, from which no teinds had ever been drawn. It has, upon a similar principle, been held that lands gained from the sea by embankments, or by the draining of a loch, are not liable to pay teinds to the titular or patron of the parish; though Mr More presumes that such lands would be liable for a proportion of stipend, if all the other teinds of the parish should be exhausted. By the canon law, the prescription of tithes did not extend to those of novalia, or newly improved lands. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 14; More's Notes on Stair, cccxxix.; Bank, B. ii. tit. 8, § 146; Connell on Tithes, 333, et seq. See Teinds. *Decimæ Inclusæ. Novels. An institute of the Roman law was compiled under the direction of Justinian; and the subsequent constitutions of that emperor, and of a few of his successors, were called the Novels. See Roman Law.

Novodamus. A charter of novodamus is the name given to a charter by progress which contains a clause of novodamus. This clause is subjoined to the dispositive clause; and by

it the superior, whether the Crown or a subject, grants de novo the subjects, rights, or privileges therein described. Such a clause is usually inserted where the vassal is sensible of some defect or flaw in the former right, or where he desires, in this manner, to get free of burdens chargeable upon the subject for casualties due to the superior; for a charter of novodamus is accounted in law an original right, which imports a discharge of all prior burdens. It is not necessary that the subjects or rights conveyed by the clause of novodamus (as might be inferred from the term) should have been formerly invested in the vassal; for such a charter may be itself a first grant, as well as a renovation of a former grant; and every subject conveyed by it is held to be effectually conveyed to the vassal, although he may have had no antecedent title thereto in his person. But, on the other hand, a subject which has been formerly granted by the superior to the vassal, and which subject remains in hereditate jacente of the vassal's heir, cannot be conveyed by the superior to any other vassal, by a charter of novodamus or otherwise, to the prejudice of the heir's right; although, no doubt, such a grant, even although ultra vires of the superior, might be the foundation of a prescriptive title. Where the lands hold of the Crown, a signature containing a clause of novodamus will not be passed in Exchequer, unless a complete search of encumbrances for forty years be shown, so that it may appear that the Crown has no unsatisfied claims or pretensions to the lands; and the signature, besides, must have the royal superscription. See Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 23; Jurid. Styles; Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 15; More's Notes, p. clviii.; Bank, vol. i. p. 546; Bell's Illust. § 800. See also Charter.

Nudum Pactum. See Pactum Nudum.

Nuisance; anything noxious or offensive, or which makes life uncomfortable. In England, nuisances are of two kinds—public and private. The former of these is punishable by fine, and the removal of the offensive object; while private nuisances are remedied by a civil action at the instance of the person aggrieved. Public nuisances are such as affect the public generally; they are offences against the order and economy of the State. Among these may be enumerated annoyances in highways, bridges, and public rivers, disorderly inns, gaming-houses, lotteries; and, in general, everything detrimental to the public, which, if injurious to an individual, would be actionable. In Scotland, there is no such recognised distinction between public and private nuisances. Whatever obstructs passage along the public ways; whatever is intolerably offensive to individuals in their dwelling-houses, by stench, noise, or indecency, is a nuisance. But the absolute right which a man has to use his property as he thinks fit will not be limited merely because he causes inconvenience to his neighbours; there must be positive discomfort or danger. Circumstances have always great weight in determining whether an operation is a nuisance or not. It makes a great difference when works are established in a populous neighbourhood, or in a place thinly or not at all inhabited; in a part of the town where similar works already exist; or in a situation where less cause of offence is required to make life uncomfortable. One coming to a nuisance cannot complain of it. In the ordinary case, redress is obtained by presenting a note of suspension and interdict to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, or by means of an ordinary action to have the nuisance removed or put down, if necessary, concluding for the damages which the pursuer has thereby sustained. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 2, § 2, Note 2 by Mr Ivory; Bell's Princ. §§ 973-8; Illust. ib.; Hutch. Justice of Peace, ii. pp. 6, 94; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. iii. p. 93; Kames' Equity, 32; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Damage.

The Nuisance Removal Act is the 19 and 20 Vict. c. 103, 1856, which repeals the previous acts on the subject.

Nulla Sasina, Nulla Terra; a maxim importing that the proper test or evidence of property in land is sasine, or infeftment therein. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 11.

Nuncupative Testament, or Nuncupative Legacies. A nuncupative or verbal nomination of an executor is ineffectual; but a nuncupative legacy is good to the extent of L.100 Scots (L.8, 6s. 8d. sterling). If it exceed that sum, it will be effectual to that extent if the legatee choose so to restrict it, but ineffectual as to the surplus. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 7; Stair, B. iii. tit. 8, § 34; More's Notes, p. cccxxxviii.; Bank. vol. ii. p. 378; Bell's Princ. § 1868; Tait on Evidence, p. 305; Kames' Equity, 203. See Legacy. Evidence. Testament.

Nunquam Concluditur in Falso; a maxim importing that, in actions of reduction-improbation on the head of falsehood or forgery, any relevant defence may be pleaded, or any additional proof brought forward, however late in the proceedings, provided decree has not been extracted. The application of this maxim has been very much limited in civil proceedings by the introduction of the new forms of process. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 85; Bank. vol. i. p. 639.

Nunquam Præscribitur in Falso. This maxim is applied to actions of reduction on the head of falsehood or forgery, the right to pursue which is not lost even by the lapse of the negative prescription of forty years; since this omission on the part of the person entitled to complain can never confer a right on one whose title is founded on a forgery. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 12.

O

Oath; an affirmation, or denial, or promise, attested by the name of God. The judicial oath taken by a witness is in these terms: "I swear by Almighty God, and as I shall answer to God at the great day of judgment, that I will tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, in so far as I know, or as the same shall be asked at me." This is the formula used by a witness when he is put upon his oath; he stands, and, with his right hand held up, repeats those words after the judge, or commissioner empowered to administer the oath. Quakers, and certain other sectarians, on account of their religious scruples, are permitted to affirm, without making oath. See Affirmation. With regard to evidence on oath, see Evidence.

Certain oaths are required to be taken under certain circumstances to Government.

TEST.—The test, as it is called, is in these terms:—"I, A. B., do solemnly and sincerely, in the presence of God, profess, testify, and declare, that I do believe in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and that there is not any transubstantiation of the elements of bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, at or after the consecration thereof by any person whatsoever; and that the invocation or adoration of the Virgin Mary, or any other saint, and the sacrifice of the mass, as they are now used in the Church of Rome, are superstitious and idolatrous. And I do solemnly, in the presence of God, profess, testify, and declare, that I do make this declaration, and every part thereof, in the plain and ordinary sense of the words read unto me, as they are commonly understood by English Protestants, without any evasion, equivocation, or mental reservation whatsoever, and without any dispensation already granted me for this purpose by the Pope, or any other authority or person, or without any hope of any such dispensation from any person or authority whatsoever, or without thinking that I am or can be acquitted before God or man, or absolved of this declaration, or any part thereof, although the Pope, or any other person or persons, or power whatsoever, should dispense with or annul the same, or declare that it was null and void from the beginning."

FORMULA.—The formula is prescribed by the act 1700, c. 3, and is in these words:—"I do sincerely, from my heart, profess and declare before God, who searcheth the heart, that I do deny, disown, and abhor those tenets and doctrines of the Papal Romish Church—viz., the supremacy of the Pope and Bishop of Rome over all pastors of the Catholic Church; his power and authority over kings, princes, and states, and the infallibility that he pretends to, either with or without a general council; his power of dispensing and pardoning; the doctrine of transubstantiation, and the corporal presence, with the communion without the cup in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper; the adoration and sacrifice professed and practised by the Popish Church in the mass; the invocation of angels and saints; the worshipping of images, crosses, and relics; the doctrine of supererogation, indulgences, and purgatory, and the service and worship in an unknown tongue;—all which tenets and doctrines of the said Church I believe to be contrary to, and inconsistent with, the written Word of God. And I do, from my heart, deny, disown, and disclaim the said doctrine and tenets of the Church of Rome, as in the presence of God, without any equivocation or mental reservation, but according to the known and plain meaning of the words, as to me offered and proposed. So help me God."

SUPREMACY.—The oath of supremacy is as follows:—"I, A. B., do swear, that I do from my heart abhor, detest, and abjure, as impious and heretical, that damnable doctrine and position, that princes excommunicated or deprived by the Pope, or any other authority of the see of Rome, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects or any other whatsoever. And I do declare, that no foreign prince, prelate, state or potentate, hath, or ought to have, any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence, or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm. So help me God."

The oath of allegiance and the assurance, according to the form prescribed by the stat. 1693, c. 6, are in these terms. See also 1 Geo. I. c. 13.

OATH OF ALLEGIANCE.—"I do sincerely promise and swear, that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to her Majesty Queen Victoria. So help me God."

THE ASSURANCE.—"I do, in the sincerity of my heart, assert, acknowledge, and declare, that her Majesty Queen Victoria is the only lawful, undoubted Sovereign of this realm, as well de jure, that is of right Queen, as de facto, that is in the possession and exercise of the government. And therefore I do sincerely and faithfully promise and engage, that I will, with heart and hand, life and goods, maintain and defend her Majesty's title and government against the late King James and his adherents, and all other enemies, who, either by open or secret attempts, shall disturb or disquiet her Majesty in the possession and exercise thereof."

As to the abjuration, see Abjuration.

The trust-oath, which a freeholder may be required to take, will be found in the article Reform Act. For the oath taken by justices of the peace to qualify them to act, see Justices of the Peace.

By 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 62, 1835, which repealed a statute previously passed the same session, provision is made for the abolition of unnecessary oaths. The Lords of the Treasury are empowered to substitute a declaration in lieu of an oath, affirmation, or affidavit, in any case where, by acts relating to the customs, or excise, the post-office, office of stamps and taxes, &c., an oath or affidavit is required. The provisions of the act apply to any declaration so substituted after twenty-one days from the date of its publication in the Gazette. It is unlawful to administer an oath in lieu of which a declaration has been directed. A false declaration in matters relating to the customs or excise, stamps and taxes, or post-office, is a misdemeanour. Oaths in courts of justice, or in any proceeding by way of summary conviction before a justice of the peace, and the oath of allegiance, are expressly excepted from the operation of the act. The Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and other bodies authorised to administer oaths, are empowered to substitute declarations. The churchwarden's and sidesman's oath is abolished, and a declaration appointed to be substituted. Declarations are substituted for oaths and affidavits by persons acting in turnpike-trusts, and for oaths and affidavits required on taking out a patent. Declarations are substituted for oaths and affidavits required by the acts relative to pawnbrokers, and the penalties and other enactments as to such oaths are extended to the declaration. It is not lawful for any justice of peace, or other person, to administer, or cause to be administered, any oath, affidavit, or solemn affirmation, touching any matter of which he has no jurisdiction or cognisance by some statute in force at the time being. This provision is declared not to extend to oaths or affidavits touching the preservation of the peace, or the trial of offences, or any proceeding before either

House of Parliament, or a committee, nor to any oath, affidavit, or affirmation, which may be required by the laws of any foreign country to give validity to instruments in writing designed to be used in that country. Declarations are substituted for oaths and affidavits required by the Bank of England on the transfer of stock; and for oaths and affidavits required by 5 Geo. II. c. 7, and 54 Geo. III. c. 15, relative to the recovery of debts in the plantations and colonies in America and New South Wales. It is lawful for any attesting witness to the execution of any will or codicil, deed or instrument in writing, and for any other competent person, to verify and prove, by a declaration in writing, the signing, sealing, publication or delivery thereof; and justices, notaries, and other officers, are empowered to receive such declarations. Suits on behalf of the Crown are directed to be proved by declaration. In cases not specified, in which it may be necessary and proper to require confirmation of any transaction, justices of the peace, notaries-public, or other officers by law authorised to administer an oath, are empowered to receive declarations in the form given in the schedule annexed to the act. Fees formerly payable on making oath are payable on making declaration. Persons making a false declaration are held guilty of a misdemeanour. The form of a declaration is as follows: "I, A. B., do solemnly and sincerely declare, that, &c. &c.; and I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and by virtue of the provisions of an act made and passed in the fifth and sixth years of his late Majesty, William the Fourth, c. 62, intituled, An act for the abolition of unnecessary oaths." See also the act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 105, 1838, and the act 18 Vict. c. 25, 1855.

Oaths, Unlawful. Persons in Great Britain administering any oath, binding the taker to commit treason, murder, or any other capital crime, are declared guilty of felony without benefit of clergy; and persons taking such oaths are declared felons, transportable for life; 37 Geo. III. c. 123; 52 Geo. III. c. 104.

Obediential Obligations; as opposed to conventional obligations, are such as are incumbent on parties in consequence of the situation or relationship in which they are placed. An example of obligations of this class is the obligation upon parents to maintain their children. Stair, B. i. tit. 3, § 3; tit. 9, § 1; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 9.

Oblati; secular persons, who devoted themselves and their estates to some monastery, into which they were admitted as a kind of lay-brothers.

Obligation. An obligation is "a legal tie by which one is bound to pay or perform something to another." The debtor, whom the English term the obligor, is in Scotland termed the obligant or grantor, and the creditor in the obligation (termed in England the obligee), the receiver or grantee. The difference between a real right and an obligation of this kind is, that the former gives a jus in re, or right of possession or recovery of the subject; the latter gives no more than a jus ad rem, or right of action against the person who has become bound; by which he may be compelled to implement his obligation, and, in terms of it, to pay the money, or perform the act to which he has bound himself. Obligations are divided into merely natural, merely civil, and mixed; but mixed obligations only are those recognised by the law. Thus, an obligation granted under the influence of force or fear is an obligation merely civil, but imposes no natural obligation on the grantor, and hence the obligant may get free of his obligation. Thus, an obligation, in order to its being effectual, must be mixed, since he alone is a proper obligant a quo invito aliquid exigi potest. See Natural Obligation. Obligations are—1. Pure. 2. To a certain day. 3. Conditional. (1.) A pure debt is one to which neither day nor condition is adjoined, and which may therefore be instantly demanded. (2.) Obligations in diem—that is, exigible against a certain day—constitute a debt from the first, because it is certain that the day will exist; Dies statim cedit sed non venit. (3.) A conditional obligation, dependent on an event which may never happen, has no obligatory force until the condition be purified. It creates not a debt, but the hope only of a debt. See Conditional Obligation. An obligation may be constituted in favour of persons ignorant of the obligation (see Jus Quæsitum Tertio); and where the obligation is granted for certain uses and purposes, this does not suspend the obligation until performance. When a person has become possessed of property belonging to another, even where he has purchased it from an illegal possessor, he is under an obligation to restore the property to the rightful owner. The only exception to this occurs in the case of property in bank-notes, which is constituted by possession. Bills also are, in this respect, subject to rules peculiar to themselves. An obligation ob turpem causam, is not actionable. See Pactum Illicitum. An obligation to indemnify arises where one person is made richer through the act of another, without the intention of making a donation. Thus, if a person build in bona fide on the ground of another, supposing it his own, the proprietor of the ground claiming the house would be obliged to pay the expense of the building, to the extent, at least, of the benefit conferred. See Adjunction. Contexture. Obligations also arise from delict; since every one who can distinguish between right and wrong incurs an obligation to repair any damage befalling his neighbour from a wrong committed by himself. This wrong may arise from blameable omission or neglect of duty. Where several have been guilty of the wrong, either as principals or accessaries, any one of them may be sued for the whole damage; and the damage being paid by any one of them, the payer seems to have an equitable claim for relief pro rata against the rest. See Delict. Damages. Verbal obligations include all obligations which have no particular name by which they may be distinguished, as—1. Promises, or unilateral engagements. 2. Agreements where two or more different parties contract mutual obligations to one another; and these are binding, with the exception—(1.) Of all obligations relative to heritage, which are ineffectual if not constituted by writing. (2.) This extends even to a lease or other temporary right to lands. (3.) A verbal obligation relative to heritage cannot be competently proved by the oath of the party, or, what is the same thing, would not be effectual though proved; for as long as writing is not adhibited, either party has a right to resile. (4.) An agreement relative to heritage, in the form of mutual missives, requires to be probative, otherwise either party may resile; but payment of part of the price of lands, in terms of a verbal bargain, will bar the locus pœnitentiæ, which would otherwise have been competent to the parties. See Rei Interventus. Homologation. There is also another exception in the case where the agreement, though verbal, is to restrict an universal infestment in security to certain parts of the lands. See Pacta Liberatoria. Writing is required in bargains where it forms part of the agreement, or is pars contractus, as it is expressed, that writing shall intervene; and in such a case, until the agreement be reduced into writing, there is locus pœnitentiæ. Obligations by writing require certain solemnities; and a written deed, in the execution of which these solemnities have been observed, affords complete evidence of the obligation or contract; and if such a deed contain a clause of registration, the obligation thereby contracted may be summarily enforced by legal diligence. See Deeds. Subscription. Notary. Decree of Registration. On the subject of obligations, it may be farther observed—1. That certain things are exempted from commerce by nature, by destination, or by statute, or by having acquired a vitium reale, which renders them unfit objects of commerce, as stolen goods. 2. No person can be legally bound to do what is impossible, or unlawful, or immoral. 3. Conditions may be annexed to obligations; and where these are impossible, the obligation is void, unless the granter lie under a natural tie to the grantee, in which case the obligation is held to be pure. Occupancy; is, by the law of Scotland, a mode of acquiring the property of moveables which have continued in their original state,—as precious stones, wild beasts, fowls or fishes; but where these have been appropriated, the right of occupancy ceases. In no case does it reach to heritage. Though land, therefore, were possessed for ever so long a time, if the possessor has no written title, he can have acquired no property in the land. *Ersk. Ochier; ogetharius; according to Skene, a name of dignity, a freeholder. Skene, h. i.

Œcumenical; general or universal. Œcumenical councils were general councils. Bank. vol. ii. p. 591.

Offence; an act contrary to and punishable by law. Offences are either by commission or omission. See Crime. Misdemeanour.

Offer. See Promise and Offer. Unilateral Contract. Mutual Contract.

Offer; at a public roup or sale. Such offers are usually made with reference to articles of roup, or conditions of sale, which regulate the reciprocal rights of exposor and offerer. And in connection with this subject, the question of chief importance relates to the contingent obligation which, in sales of heritage by articles of roup, the offerer usually undertakes to take the subject, failing the higher offerer. See Clause of Devolution.

Offerers at Auction. See Auction. Articles of Roup.

Office. An office is a right to exercise a public or private employment, and to take the fees and emoluments belonging thereto. In Scotland, all heritable offices may be voluntarily sold, or they may be adjudged for debt; and so also may all patrimonial offices descendible to heirs and assignees. But offices in which there is a personal trust reposed in the functionary are not saleable nor attachable for debt. By the statute 49 Geo. III. c. 126, the sale of offices of public trust, and particularly of those offices connected with the administration of justice, is prohibited in Scotland; and the prohibition to sell offices and deputations is by the same statute extended to all offices in the gift of the Crown, and in the public departments of Government in the United Kingdom, or in the Colonies, or under the East India Company—excepting certain offices in the palace, and also excepting sales of commissions in the army. The right of appointing deputies, upon the same principle, cannot be made a source of gain, or adjudged, or otherwise directly attached by creditors, where the office is of the nature of a public trust, or connected with the administration of justice. But the salary or profits of an office are attachable by creditors, with the exception, perhaps, of such an allowance as may be requisite for the decent discharge of the duties of the office. By the law of Scotland, the salary of a judge, the stipend of a clergyman, and the pay or half-pay of a military officer, are held to be attachable to a certain extent; and the arrears, whether of salary or of pay, are attachable to the whole amount. All arrangements, generally speaking, whereby the salary of a public officer is burdened with the payment of a sum in return for influence exerted in procuring the nomination, or as a consideration to another candidate for withdrawing from the contest, or the like, are pacta illicita, which cannot be enforced in a court of law. But an agreement by an officer in bad health to share the emoluments with an assistant seems to be effectual. Stair, B. i. tit. 12, § 16; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 7; B. iii. tit. 6, § 7; Bell's Princ. § 36; Brown on Sale, pp. 115, 123. See Cautionary. See Pactum Illicitum.

Officers of State. The chief Officers of State in Scotland are the Keepers of the Great and Privy Seal, the Lord Clerk-Register, the Lord Justice-Clerk, the Lord Advocate, and the Gazette Writer. The Officers of State, when called in any process for the interest of the Crown, must be cited as forth of the kingdom, and likewise at the Exchequer Chambers. A proper warrant must be inserted in the summons for that purpose. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 8; Jurid. Styles, iii. 7, 19, 971–5. See Citation. Edictal Citation.

Officers of the Crown. The Officers of the Crown, as they are styled, are the Lord High Constable of Scotland, the Heritable Standard-bearer, the Royal Standard-bearer, the Knight-Marischal, the Vice-Admiral, the Lord Justice-General, the Lord President of the Court of Session, and formerly the Lord Chief Baron.

Offices. See Indemnity.

Official; in the canon law, was an ecclesiastical judge, appointed by a bishop, chapter, or abbot, with charge of the spiritual jurisdiction of the diocese. An official is now a deputy appointed by an archdeacon as his assistant, and who sits as judge in the archdeacon's court. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Officiendi Luminibus. See Light.

Officium Nemini debet esse Damnosum; a maxim importing that one is entitled to be indemnified, or at least that he ought not to be subjected to loss, by the discharge of an office or duty. Thus, a mandatary is entitled to demand from the mandant all reasonable expenses disbursed by him bona fide, and the damage sustained by him in the execution of the mandate, even though the management should not have been prosperous or successful. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 38.

Oker; is the same with usury, or the taking of illegal interest for money. See Usury.

Old and New Extent. See Extent.

Old Witnesses. The depositions of aged witnesses—i.e., who are upwards of seventy years of age—may in certain circumstances be taken in initio litis, to lie in retentis in case of their death before the cause comes to be tried. See the circumstances under which these depositions may be taken, and the course of procedure, explained, voce Evidence, supra, p. 373.

Oleron, Laws of. The laws of King Richard I. of England, relative to maritime affairs, are called the laws of Oleron, because they were made by him when he was at Oleron, which is an island lying in the Bay of Aquitain, at the mouth of the River Charent. These laws are recorded in the Black Book of the Admiralty, and are accounted the most excellent digest of sea-laws in the world. Bell's Com. i. 499; Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Omissa et Male Appretiata. When an executor confirms, and omits in the inventory part of the defunct's effects, he may have the mistake corrected. But if he do not take steps for this purpose, any one interested in the succession may apply, either to have the executor compelled to confirm the omission, or himself to have an edict to confirm it. Ordinary executors ad omisssa et male appretiata ought to call the principal executor to their confirmation, or it will be null; but this rule does not hold in the case of executors-creditors. Every person requiring confirmation is bound, upon oath, to confirm the whole moveable estate known at the time; it being lawful to eik to such confirmation any part of the estate which may afterwards be discovered; 4 Geo. IV. c. 98, § 3. In the case of an innocent omission, an additional inventory may be lodged; but it must specify the amount of the whole succession, and must be written on a stamp corresponding to the whole amount; and the solicitor of stamps is bound to repay the original duty thus twice paid. The distinction which subsists between the omisssa and the male appretiata, and which was formerly of more importance, is, that the former term applies to funds or effects actually omitted in the confirmation, the latter to effects or debts stated at an undervalue. From the precautions now taken to ascertain the value of the known funds, an important case of mal-appretiation is unlikely to occur; and Mr More (in his Notes on Stair, p. ccciv.) holds that confirmation ad male appretiata is now incompetent. See Stair, B. iii. tit. 8, § 62; Bank. ii. 393; Bell's Com. ii. 85; Jurid. Styles, ii. 498. See Executor. Confirmation. Inventory.

Oneris Ferendi; a Roman law urban servitude, importing a right in the dominant proprietor to rest the weight of his house on the servient proprietor's wall or pillar. Bell's Princ. § 1003. See Support. Servitude. Common Interest.

Onerous Deeds; are deeds granted for valuable considerations. See Consideration.

Onus Probandi; the burden of proving. The general rule is, that he who affirms must prove his affirmation. But this rule, in its application, frequently leads to questions of considerable nicety and of great importance, since the throwing the burden of the proof on one party is, generally speaking, tantamount to declaring that the right is established in his adversary. Tait on Evidence, 1; Shaw's Digest, 385, 460. See Evidence.

Open Account. See Book-Debts. Claim. Affidavit. And for the form of the summons for payment of an open account, see Jurid. Styles, 17.

Open Charter; a charter from the Crown, or from a subject, containing a precept of sasine which has not been executed. The advantage of such a charter is, that in the event of a sale the unexecuted precept may be assigned to the purchaser, and the expense of an entry with the superior saved during the purchaser's life, or during the life of the party who first takes infeftment on the precept. See Charter. Base Right. Confirmation. Composition. Non-entry. Disposition.

Open Doors. There are letters passing the signet, called Letters of Open Doors, which are requisite where goods are to be poinded, which are deposited in lockfast places. The messenger returns an execution, setting forth the fact that he cannot obtain admission; and on that an application by bill to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills may be made for a warrant for Letters of Open Doors, which authorise the messenger to break open the doors of those places in which the goods of the debtor are lodged. Where no violence is necessary, as where the removal of some trees which block up the entrance to a woodyard would procure admittance, no letters of open doors are required; Steven, 25th Jan. 1769, Mor. 10,539. Where the messenger or other officer who executes a poinding has got entrance into the house or other premises, he may force open presses or chests contained therein, in order to poind their contents, without any special warrant. A warrant of open doors is included in the warrant subjoined to extract decrees, under the act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114. See Stair, B. iv. tit. 48, § 40; More's Notes, p. cccxxii.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 6, § 25; Bank, vol. iii. pp. 7, 25; Jurid. Styles, iii. 735-6, 770, 992; Ross's Lect. i. 443. See Caption.

Open Policy. In marine insurance, an open policy is a policy where the amount of the interest of the insured is not fixed, but is left to be proved by the insured in the event of a loss; whereas in a valued policy, a specified value is put on the ship or goods insured, to save the necessity of proof, in the case of a total loss. Marshall, 199. See Insurance. Valued Policy. Wager Policy.

Opinion, Oath of. In proving mercantile usage, as affecting the construction of a contract, the witnesses' opinion is not sufficient. It is from a judge only, and in matter of law, that opinion can be received by a jury; other persons speak only to facts. But in some cases, tradesmen or scientific persons are allowed to swear, not to a positive fact, but to what they believe to be a fact. In such cases, perjury is not in general committed by a false oath of opinion, or pure belief, or credulity. But it is committed if it can be shown that the party did not believe what he swore he believed; or if the oath is only in appearance one of opinion. Bell's Com. i. 607; Hume, i. 308; Alison's Princ. 468; Steele, 159. See Perjury.

Ora; metal, such as brass or gold. Skene, h. t.

Orchard. The trees of an orchard fall under the act for preserving planting; 1698, c. 16; Robertson, July 24, 1743, Mor. 10,484. The breaking of orchards is an offence cognisable by the sheriff. Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 4; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, p. 205; Hutch. Justice of Peace, ii. p. 445; Bell on Leases, i. 351. See Planting and Inclosing.

Order of Redemption. A wadset is a conveyance of land or other heritage in return for an advance of money, whereby a temporary exchange is made; the proprietor of the land enjoying the use of the money, and the proprietor of the money the use of the land in return, with power to either party to put an end to the transaction. When the owner of the subject is desirous of repaying the advanced money and redeeming his lands, it is by the order of redemption that it is done—a form explained under the article Wadset. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 8, § 17; tit. 12, § 38.

Ordinary; in England, a bishop, or other person having peculiar or original ecclesiastical jurisdiction in a diocese, in contradistinction to extraordinary or delegated jurisdiction. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Ordinary, Lord. In the Court of Session, the judge before whom a cause depends in the Outer-House is called the Lord Ordinary in that cause. And the judge who officiates in the Bill-Chamber is called the Lord Ordinary on the Bills. See Session, Court of. Inner-House. Outer-House. Bill-Chamber.

Ordinary Endurance. A lease of ordinary endurance is a lease of nineteen or twenty-one years, as contradistinguished from a lease of thirty-eight (twice nineteen), or fifty-seven (thrice nineteen) years, or for any period exceeding nineteen or twenty-one years. Bell on Leases, i. 215.

Ordination. See Minister.

Ordinance, Board of. By 1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. 69, the principal officers of the Board of Ordnance are authorised to hold feudal property in Scotland. Prior to the passing of that act, the government lands of Fort William and Fort George were conveyed in trust to the magistrates of Edinburgh, and vested in them for behoof of the Board. By 3 Geo. IV. c. 108, all estates and property occupied for the barrack-service were vested in the Board of Ordnance, and certain powers conferred upon them in relation to such property. By 2 Will. IV. c. 25, their powers are extended and made more effectual, and provisions are enacted for facilitating the business in the ordnance department. They are empowered to sue as "The Principal Officers of her Majesty's Ordnance," without being named; and it is provided that the suit shall not abate by their being changed. They are not personally liable. See also the act 5 and 6 Vict. c. 94.

Outer-House; the name given to the great hall of the Parliament House in Edinburgh, in which the Lords Ordinary of the Court of Session sit as single judges to hear causes. The term is used colloquially, as expressive of the business done there, in contradistinction to the Inner-House, the name given to the chambers in which the First and Second Divisions of the Court of Session hold their sittings. See Session, Court of. Inner-House. Record. Motions.

Outlawry or Fugitation; is a sentence pronounced in a criminal court in the absence of the panel at the calling of the diet—that is, the day on which he is summoned to appear and stand his trial. The effect of this sentence is a forfeiture of the panel's person in law, so that he cannot bear testimony on any occasion, nor act as a juryman, nor hold any place of trust, nor even pursue or defend in any civil or criminal process, nor claim any benefit of the law. This sentence is a warrant for denouncing him a rebel, the consequence of which is the escheat of his moveable estate; and if he shall remain a rebel for the space of a year, the profits of his heritage become forfeited to his superior for his lifetime. The prosecutor may also obtain letters of caption against the panel, and imprison him if he is to be found within the kingdom; and being thus imprisoned he is not bailable, whatever the nature of the offence may have been; for, as an outlaw, he has no benefit from the law. The outlawed person may appear in the criminal court, and apply to be reponed against the sentence of outlawry. Whether he may be tried on the original libel is not so clear. The case of Macrae v. Macrae, led to a great deal of learned discussion on the effect of a sentence of fugitation upon the civil rights and powers of the person outlawed. In that case criminal letters, containing a charge of murder, were raised against a party who was infest in fee-simple in a land estate. Before citation, he executed a disposition of the estate, ex facie absolute, in favour of a friend who was truly a trustee for his behoof, and who was immediately infest. The party fled, and was afterwards decerned an outlaw, and ordained to be put to the horn, which sentence was followed by denunciation duly recorded. He lived abroad for many years, and died unrelaxed. In the interval, by a formal deed, he directed his trustee to execute a strict entail in favour of his (the outlaw's) only son—whom failing, his only daughter; and he further directed his estate to be burdened with a provision of £5,000 in favour of the daughter. The son of the outlaw having raised a redun-

tion of the whole of these deeds, especially the entail and the application to the Court to record it, the Court of Session decided unanimously that the deeds were unchallengeable at the heir's instance, and that the entail was duly recorded. Macrae v. Macrae, 22d Nov. 1836, 15 D. B. M. 54; Stair, B. iv. tit. 3. § 30; tit. 38, § 27; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 37, Note by Mr Ivory; B. iv. tit. 4, § 83; Bank. vol. ii. p. 250; Hume, ii. 255, 270; Ross's Lect. i. 244, 322; Alison's Prac. 349. See Diet. Fugitation. Denunciation.

In England, in cases of treason and felony, the law interprets the party's absence a sufficient evidence of his guilt, and without requiring further proof accounts him guilty of the fact; upon which ensue corruption of blood and forfeiture of his personal estate. In civil actions, outlawry is putting a man out of the protection of the law, so that he is incapable of suing for the redress of injuries; he may likewise be imprisoned; and he forfeits all his goods and chattels, and the profits of his lands. Outlawry in civil actions is used where the defendant is abroad or keeps out of the way, so that he cannot be arrested or served with process. If there be several defendants in a joint action, and one of them be abroad or keep out of the way, the plaintiff must proceed to outlawry against him before he can go on against the others. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Outsight Plenishing; is the moveables without doors, as horses, cows, oxen, ploughs, harrows, carts, and other implements of husbandry; but fungibles, as corn, hay, &c., do not fall under the description of plenishing. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 18. See Heirship Moveables.

Outsucken Multure; is merely a fair remuneration to the miller for manufacturing the grain, paid by such as are not astricted. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 20; Bell's Princ. § 1018; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 206. See Thirlage. Multure. Astricted Multure. Insucken.

Overseers; in England, are the public officers elected to provide for the poor in every parish. Their duties are, to collect the poor-rate, to remove such persons as the parish is not liable to support, and do other acts incidental to the management of the poor, under the directions of the Poor-Law Commissioners or their assistant commissioner, or according to the provisions of any local act. An overseer may be indicted for not finding immediate relief for a pauper in cases of urgent necessity; but in ordinary cases he is not indictable, unless he have neglected a magistrate's order. He is indictable if he relieve where there is no necessity; Tomlins, h. t. In Scotland, inspectors of the poor are apportioned under the Poor-Law Amendment Act, 8 and 9 Vict. c. 83, 1845. Dunlop's Parish Law, 263. See Poor.

Oversman. An oversman is an umpire appointed by a submission to decide where two arbiters have differed in opinion, or he is named by the arbiters themselves, under powers given them by the submission. In either case, it ought to appear that the arbiters have accepted of the submission, and differed in opinion; and the nomination of an oversman by arbiters ought to be executed according to the statutory solemnities; although the Court have sustained the nomination of an oversman in a case in which the requisites of the stat. 1681, c. 5, were not attended to; Stewart, 8th March 1804, Fac. Coll., Mor. p. 16,911. When an oversman has been appointed, it is he alone who pronounces the decree. But where, without a devolution subscribed by the parties, a person to whom some particular point is referred for his opinion assumes the character of oversman, a decree pronounced solely by him is inept; Telfer, Jan. 31, 1823, 2 S. & D. 167. A decret-arbital pronounced by arbiters themselves is good, where, with powers to name an oversman, they have done so, but before any difference of opinion; Bryson, June 10, 1823, 2 S. & D. 382. It has been found in England, that the appointment of an umpire should be an act of the judgment, and that an appointment by drawing lots or tossing up for the choice is inept; Young, 3 Barn. and Cr. 407; 5 Dowl. and Ry. 263; Cassell, 9 Barn. and Cr. 624. See the forms of a reference to an oversman, and of a decret-arbital pronounced by an oversman, Jurid. Styles, ii. 193-7. See Arbitration. Devolution. Clause of Devolution.

Overt Act; in English law, an open act, which by law must be clearly proved. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Overtures. In church law language, an overture is a proposal to make a new general law, or to repeal an old one; to declare the law; to enjoin the observance of former enactments; or generally, to take any measure falling within the legislative or executive functions of the General Assembly. No new law can be enacted by the General Assembly, nor can an existing one be rescinded, without the consent of a majority of the presbyteries. It is provided, therefore, that any measure intended as a binding rule and constitution for the Church must first be proposed as an overture to the General Assembly; and if approved of by a majority of that court, must be transmitted to the several presbyteries, who are instructed to consider the same, and send up their opinions thereon to the next General Assembly; Act 9, Assembly 1697. When the immediate enactment of the new law proposed in an overture appears essential for the good of the Church, the General Assembly exercises the power of converting the overture into what is usually called an interim act; and such temporary enactments are binding upon all the members of the Church until the meeting of the next Assembly. When overtures transmitted by the Assembly have been received, the presbytery, at an ordinary meeting, appoints the day on which such overtures are to be considered. In expressing an opinion upon an overture, nothing more is necessary than simply to approve or reject it; and those presbyteries only who approve of an overture simpliciter are reckoned by the Assembly among the number favourable to the measure being passed into a law of the Church. It is competent for any member of presbytery to move the transmission of an overture on any particular subject to a superior court. It is usual for him to give notice of his intention to do so at a previous meeting. If the overture is adopted by the presbytery, it is transmitted in the form of an extract from the minute. When an overture is transmitted to the synod, some member of synod is heard in support of it, and he generally makes a motion for its transmission to the Assembly for the disposal of it, or otherwise, as the case may be. Oyer and Terminer; in English law, a commission directed to the judges and other gentlemen of the county to which it is issued, by virtue of which they have power to hear and determine treasons and all kinds of felonies and trespasses; Tomlins' Dict. h t. A commission of Oyer and Terminer may be issued by the Queen for trying treason in Scotland, under the statute 7 Anne, c. 21, provided three of the Lords of Justiciary be in such commission. At the desire of the Lord Advocate, and upon a writ of certiorari under the great seal of the United Kingdom, any indictment of treason depending before justices of Oyer and Terminer, or before the judges in the Circuit Courts, may be removed for trial into the Court of Justiciary. Hume, vol. i. p. 528; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 84. Oyess; the term employed by a messenger-at-arms in denouncing a person rebel, and on the occasion of other proclamations, in order to call the attention of the people. Packing of Goods. In England, packers of goods have a general lien. Bell's Com. i. 108; Bell's Princ. § 166; Bell's Illust. ib. See Stowage.

Paction. In the Roman law, pactio was different from pactum. It was synonymous with conventio, and signified merely an agreement between two or more parties, irrespective of the question whether they were legally bound by that agreement. As a generic term, it embraced both pacts and contracts. Stair, B. i. tit. 10, § 6; Heinec. Elem. Juris. § 773. See Pactum.

Pactis Privatorum Non Derogatur Juri Communi; a Roman law maxim, importing that the consent or private agreement of individuals cannot validate any contravention of the law, or render just, or sufficient, or effectual, that which is unjust or deficient, in what the law declares to be indispensable. Thus, an agreement by a married woman, that she will not object, on the ground of her being a wife, to a personal obligation which she has incurred, will not sustain an action or charge brought upon that personal obligation. This maxim is not of universal application. If what the law commands be merely circumstantial, the agreement of parties may supply the want of it; and there are many things quæ fieri non debent, facta valent. Thus, although the purchase of a lawsuit by a member of the College of Justice is forbidden by the law, under the pain of deprivation, the purchase itself is good, and will sustain action. See Buying of Pleas. Pactum Illicitum. A married woman cannot hold the office of tutory; and a provision in a will, that the tutrix-testamentary shall retain her office notwithstanding her marriage, is invalid; Stewart, 8th March 1636, Mor. 9585; Kerlehill, July 1586, Mor. 9585; — v. — 1585, Brown's Sup. i. 123; Stoddart, June 30, 1812, F. C. So, also, all attempts to dispense with the law of deathbed, or to reserve power of settling heritage in lecto, to the prejudice of the heir-at-law, are ineffectual. In like manner, an agreement between private parties to dispense with the statutory regulations as to cruives, is invalid, though acquiesced in for upwards of forty years; Ful- larton, 7th July 1743, Mor. 9586. But it has been decided, that an obligation by a party, that he shall be satisfied with the evidence of one witness, is lawful and binding in civil matters; June 1665, Brown's Sup. ii. 419; Stair, B. i. tit. 17, § 14; B. ii. tit. 9, § 38; Brown's Synop. voce Pactum Privatum. See Provisio Hominis, &c. Cuique licet, &c.

Pactum. In the Roman law, the word pactum had a peculiar signification, which appears not to have been adopted in any other system of jurisprudence. In that law, a pactum was an agreement between two or more persons to give or perform anything, but which was practically defective, in so far as it did not produce what was called a civil obligation. There were, however, certain agreements, to which, on account of their reasonableness or expediency, either express written law or prætorian equity gave the binding effect of a civil obligation; while there were others which, being adjoined in continenti to a regular contract, were held to constitute part of that contract, and qualify or extend its provisions. Such pacta were styled non nuda, in contradistinction to the pacta nuda which produced no action. Yet a pactum nudum, although it gave no action, created a natural obligation, which furnished, like other natural obligations, a valid exception. The law of Scotland does not recognise the distinction between pacta nuda and non nuda; and the difference between the two systems may be illustrated by the real contracts—e.g., loan, pledge, or deposit. Thus, the contract of loan requires for its completion that the thing shall have been actually given in loan. By the Roman law, the mere agreement to lend a thing was, without delivery, a pactum nudum, which could not be enforced by an action; but by the law of Scotland, one who legally binds himself to lend or impledge a subject, may be judicially compelled either to implement his obligation, or to pay damages for breach of bargain. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 17; Heinec. Elem. Juris. § 774; Bell's Princ. § 8.

There are several agreements to which the general word pactum has been applied, and which may be considered under this head.

Pactum Donationis.—This confers on the donee a jus ad rem, but gives no right to the thing itself, the donor continuing proprietor until delivery. If, therefore, the donor should, even gratuitously, give and deliver it to a second donee, the second donee becomes proprietor. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 90.

Pactum de non petendo; an agreement by which the creditor in an obligation binds himself not to insist for payment or performance. If the agreement be absolute, it is equivalent to a renunciation; but if it is only temporary, it does not exclude a decree; it only supersedes the execution until the lapse of the specified time. The right of a repented rebel to demand payment of a debt cannot be prejudiced by a pactum de non petendo made by the donator of his escheat; Mackieson, 20th March 1624, Mor. 9449. A pactum de non petendo made to a principal, or to one of several co-obligants, does not free the cautioner or the other co-obligants; nor does it free the persons in whose favour it is made from their obligations to relieve. See Mor. Dict. h. t.; Stair, B. i. tit. 18, § 1; B. iv. tit. 40, § 31.

Pactum de retrovendo; is a stipulation that the seller should be entitled to purchase back his property within a stipulated time. There do not seem to be any examples in the law of Scotland of such an agreement being made with regard to the sale of moveable property; but there are instances of rights of reversion being adjoined to a regular sale of lands. Such a stipulation is strictly interpreted; and the seller loses his right of reversion if he allows the time specified to elapse without making payment of the price, because, in a fair and onerous sale, there is no penalty nor loss of property in consequence of such strict interpretation of the clause. This distinction exists between the right of reversion conferred by a pactum de retrovendo, and that to which a wadsetter is entitled; that in the latter case the reverser may redeem even after the lapse of the prescribed term, and at any time before declaration of the irritancy. Stair, B. ii. tit. 10, § 1; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 8, § 2; Bell's Com. i. 239; ii. 290; Brown's Synop. 1532; Brown on Sale, 429. See Redeemable Rights.

Pactum Legis Commissoriæ.—By this agreement, in the Roman law, the sale became void if the price was not paid before a certain day. This condition, when expressly stipulated, does not suspend the sale—the property is transferred to the buyer by the delivery; but, on his failure to pay within the time limited, the sale resolves, and the property (as against the buyer and his representatives) returns to the seller. But where the payment is made a condition of the sale, that condition is suspensive of the sale, which is not perfected until the condition be purified. The pactum legis commissoriæ was intended solely for the benefit of the seller, and could not be enforced against his will by the buyer. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 11; Bell's Com. i. 239; ii. 290; Bank. i. 107; Brown on Sale, 430. See Conditional Obligation. Missives of Sale.

The pactum legis commissoriæ in pignoris was also a Roman law pactum, sometimes adjoined to a redeemable right, whereby it was provided, that, if the subject were not redeemed against a determinate day, the right of reversion should be irritated, and the subject should become the irredeemable property of him to whom it was impledged. Such stipulations were held in the Roman law to be contra bonos mores; but, by the law of Scotland, irritant clauses in contracts, obligations, infestments and the like, are effectual; A. S. 27th Nov. 1592; 1661, c. 62, § 14. Where it happens, however, that the irritancy is penal, the right will not be forfeited by the mere lapse of the time agreed upon. An action of declarator of the irritancy is requisite, in which action the defender may still avoid the forfeiture by redeeming the lands or other subject. By the Scotch law, moveables which have been impledged cannot legally be sold by the creditor without the warrant of a judge, obtained on an application to which the debtor is made a party. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 8, § 14; Stair, B. i. tit. 13, § 14; B. ii. tit. 10, § 6; B. iv. tit. 5, § 7; tit. 18, § 5; Brown's Synop. 1092. See Pledge. Expiry of Legal.

Pacta Liberatoria, in regard to land, are bargains, whereby a real right is either passed from or restricted. Such agreements form an exception to the general rule, that writing must intervene in all that relates to land, in order to bar the locus penitentie, or power of resiling. Accordingly, a mere verbal obligation, followed by no rei interventus, agreeing to restrict an infestment in security, cannot be retracted, and may be proved by reference to the party's oath. Thus, a liberation from a bond by transaction, with regard to a sum in another obligation, was sustained without writing; Hepburn, 12th Dec. 1661, Mor. 4865. So also was a promise to liberate part of the lands burdened with a liferent; Ker, 8th Feb. 1666, Mor. 8465. See Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, § 3; Stair, B. i. tit. 10, § 9; Kames' Equity (1825), 329; Tait on Evidence, 225, 325-6.

Pactum Illicitum; is a general term applied to all contracts opposed to law, either as being contra legem, contra bonos mores, or inconsistent with the principles of sound policy. It is a general rule, that no action can lie for implement of an illegal contract. But in the case where the terms of the contract have been fulfilled, a distinction is taken between the case in which there is turpitude ex parte utriusque, and that in which the turpitude attaches to only one of the parties. In the former case, there can be no action for restitution; the rule is, Potior est conditio possidentis, and the law gives no remedy to either party. In the latter, according to Erskine, the thing given ob turpem causam, must be restored, whether counterpart of the bargain has been performed or not. In the great majority of cases, however, the turpitude necessarily attaches to both parties; and the law does not interfere either to compel implement or restitution. But, although action is refused to one socius against another, for a share in an illegal adventure, he may maintain a claim of accounting and repetition as to advances, which, although resulting consequentially from the adventure, are in themselves tainted by no illegal consideration; Gibson, June 6, 1834, 12 S. & D. 683, and Dec. 16, 1835; 14 D. B. & M. 166. The following are instances of contracts which have most frequently come under the view of courts of justice as pacta illicita:—

Pactum de quota litis; is an agreement between an advocate, or an agent or attorney, and his client, for a proportion of the subject of the suit, in place of his honorary or fees. Such an agreement was void by the Roman law, and the same principle has been adopted in the law of Scotland. The act 1594, c. 216, makes the purchase of the subject of a lawsuit by a member of the College of Justice punishable with deprivation of office. See Buying of Pleas. The course of decisions, however, has been to sustain the sale, and to regard the penalty as the only sanction of the act; Purves, Dec. 20, 1683, M. 9500; Home, Dec. 15, 1713, M. 9502. But a distinction has been recognised, although not very precisely, between such a purchase of a plea which is struck at by the act and the pactum de quota litis, which last seems to be held illegal, not by the express words of the statute, but rather as being at common law a pactum illicitum, and at the same time contrary to the spirit of the statute. Thus, in one case, after the plea that a transaction was a purchase of a lawsuit had been repelled, it was alleged that the right arose ex pacto de quota litis, and was therefore null. To this it was answered, that the statute was intended as a special remedy to supply the place of the Roman law respecting pactum de quota litis. This answer was not sustained; and Fountainhall, in his report of the case, mentions the pactum de quota litis as differing from the buying of a plea; Ruthven, June 23, 1680, Mor. 9499. The course of decisions has been to annul pacta de quota litis; MacKenzie, July 23, 1774, 5 Supp. 528. In this case, the agent was likewise deprived of his office for a limited time. An agreement that a writer was to get half of certain property and rents, to be recovered in an action which he was to carry on, and that, if unsuccessful, he should charge nothing, was found null; although it was pleaded that the statute did not apply, and that, at common law, such agreements are bad only with practitioners, which this writer was not; Johnston, Feb. 1, 831, 9 S. & D. 364. An agreement, by which a country agent became bound to employ an Edinburgh agent in the business of his clients, and to make advances for carrying on his business on condition of receiving a share of the profits, the agreement to be kept secret, was held illegal; A. v. B., May 12, 832, 10 S. & D. 523. See generally, on actum de quota litis, 1594, c. 216; Macenzie's Obs., p. 289; Stair, B. i. tit. 10, § 8; Bank, B. i. tit. 11, § 11; Bell's Illust., 49; Kames' Equity, 12, 335; Glassford, 24th June, 23, 2 S. & D. 417.

Pactum super hereditate viventis; an agreement to sell a right of succession, during the life of the ancestor, was forbidden by the Roman law, as contra bonos mores; but the law of Scotland permits an heir to dispose of his hope of succession during the life of his ancestor. Stair, B. i. tit. 10, § 8; More's Notes, lxiii.; Bank, vol. i., p. 326.

The law of Scotland takes no notice of debts contracted by gaming and betting. See Gaming and Betting. Wager. Agreements incentive to crime, or for compounding a crime, or procuring a pardon, cannot be the foundation of a judicial claim. A bond given as the price of prostitution gives no action; but when the bond is given subsequently to the act of connection, as a reparation for the injury sustained, it is valid. There would seem, however, to be an exception to this rule where the grantee is a prostitute, or where she knew the grantor to be married at the time of their connection; although this has not been authoritatively settled. The claim of the children of the connection to implement of the obligation has been admitted in cases in which that of the mother has been rejected. Obligations contracted on an indecent or mischievous consideration are void. No action can be maintained on a debt for spirituous liquors, unless bona fide contracted at one time to the amount of twenty shillings, or upwards; and the claim is not valid even as an item in an account, where the liquor delivered at one time, and mentioned in the item, is not to the amount of twenty shillings; 24 Geo. II., c. 40. On this statute, action has been refused on a bill granted for the amount of an account for spirits furnished; Russel, 6th July 1808, Fac. Coll. All contracts imposing restraints on marriage are void; but an engagement between two persons to intermarry, fortified by an agreement that if either of them shall marry a third party he or she shall forfeit to the other a stipulated sum, has been said to form an exception to the general rule. Bonds or agreements to pay a sum of money, as a consideration for using influence to bring about a particular marriage, called marriage-rage contracts, are contra bonos mores, and will found no action. Restraints on liberty are void, except in particular instances. A man may enter into a contract of service for wages, which will be binding, however long the stipulated term may be. So a man may bind himself not to exercise a trade or profession within certain limits, as within the same parish with the creditor in the obligation, or within half a mile of him, or within ten miles. But when the restriction extends to a whole country, or when it is manifest that the other party has no legitimate interest in the obligation being so strict, the contract is void. By the act 17 and 18 Vict. c. 102, 1854, if any person give, directly or indirectly, any sum of money, or other consideration, on an engagement to procure the return of any person to serve in Parliament, he is guilty of bribery, and any candidate for any place guilty of bribery by himself or his agents, is incapable of sitting in Parliament for such place during the Parliament then in existence. Contracts for defeating the revenue laws are void, at least in so far as relates to the parties privy to the design; and every native of this country is presumed to be acquainted with the laws against smuggling. A foreigner is presumed to be aware of the design to smuggle if he knows that the goods have been packed so as to escape detection, or assists in preparing false papers, or is active in planning or aiding the scheme for evasion, or in landing the goods in this country. Contracts relative to contraband goods are also void. This rule, however, does not hold when the goods are sold abroad, or when they have been bought bona fide in a market in this country. See Smuggling. It has been repeatedly decided in the English courts, that the sale or assignment of the pay or half-pay of an officer or soldier is void.

At common law the sale of offices of trust is void, except in those cases in which offices are expressly allowed to be sold, and in which the sale takes place under the authority of those who have the power of appointment, as commissions in the army. The common law forbidding the sale of offices has been aided by several statutes. See Offices. See generally, on the subject of this article, Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 10, Notes by Mr Ivory; Stair, B. i. tit. 10, § 8; More's Notes, v., lxiii.; Bell's Com. 298; Bell's Princ. § 36, et seq.; Kames' Equity, 331-4; *Kames' Stat. Painting. Paintings are taken in the civil law, and by our institutional writers, as illustrative of the doctrine of accession. Where the picture is painted on a wall, or other immoveable subject, which it is evidently intended to embellish, the possessor of that subject becomes proprietor of the picture also. Where, again, the picture is painted on a moveable board, the board is accessory to the painting. Paintings are sometimes included in a deed of entail; but may, notwithstanding, be attached by the diligence of the creditors of the heir in possession. Stair, B. ii. tit. 1, § 39; More's Notes, clxxx.; Bank. vol. i. p. 509.

Palinode; a recantation. In actions for damages on account of slander or defamation raised in the Commissary Court, with concurrence of the procurator-fiscal, it was formerly the practice to conclude not only for damages, expenses, and a fine, but also for a judicial recantation or palinode by the defender. In this palinode the defender set forth, that he had been convicted of scandalising, defaming and injuring the pursuer, and therefore, in obedience to an interlocutor of the commissaries, he declared that he had uttered and published what was false, scandalous, and injurious, and begged pardon of the court, of the pursuer, and of all persons for his offence; Boyd's Judicial Proceedings, 117. In more recent practice the conclusion for a palinode has been discountenanced, but it is still held to be a competent conclusion; and since the transference of the jurisdiction of the inferior commissaries to the sheriff, under the act 4 Geo. IV., c. 97, it has been decided, that the sheriff, as commissary, has jurisdiction to entertain an action for slander, concluding, with concurrence of the procurator-fiscal, for damages, fine, and palinode; Turner v. Cuthbert, 21st June 1831, 9 S. & D. 774. In that case it was observed by one of the Judges, that "the conclusion for palinode has for a long time past been generally, if not universally, discountenanced and rejected. It exposes a court to the risk of ordaining a man judicially to retract as false a charge which he may conscientiously believe, or even know to be true, though he had no means of proving it." But a majority of the First Division were of a different opinion, holding palinode to be a part of the law of Scotland; and that the question as to its expediency was one for legislative, and not for judicial determination. See A. S. 21st Feb. 1824, which recognises a palinode. Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 4; Balfour's Prac. 664; Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 30; Bank. vol. ii. p. 548; Bell's Princ. § 2043; and other authorities cited in the case of Turner.

Papist. Many regulations were thought necessary to repress Popery; and they were ratified and revived by the act 1700, c. 3. Papists were disabled from purchasing land by voluntary disposition, either in their own name, or through a trustee. Every grant in breach of the statute was declared void, and the property ordered to remain with the seller, without subjecting the seller to any action for recovery of the price. By the same act, all who profess the Popish religion were declared incapable of succeeding to heritage, if they refused to renounce Popery and sign the formula. And, in such event, the succession is declared to go to the next Protestant heir, who would be entitled to the succession were the Popish heirs naturally dead. The same statute farther enacts, that any person labouring under the repute of being a Jesuit priest, or trafficking priest, and being called upon to purge himself of the suspicion of Popery, according to a form prescribed by the statute, and refusing so to do, may be banished forth of the realm, never to return, under pain of death, while he continues a Papist. These highly penal regulations were repealed by the statute 33 Geo. III., c. 44, which provides a certain form of oath and declaration to be taken by those in Scotland professing the Roman Catholic religion; whereby they are relieved from all pains, penalties, and disabilities imposed, enacted, revived, ratified and confirmed, by the statute 1700, c. 3; and as fully enabled to take by descent, purchase, or otherwise, and to hold, enjoy, alien, settle, and dispose of any real or personal property whatsoever, within that part of Great Britain called Scotland, as any other person or persons whatsoever, anything in the aforesaid act (1700 c. 3), or in any other act or acts of the Parliament of Scotland, contained or implied to the contrary thereof, in any manner, notwithstanding. See also 10 Geo. IV. c. 7, and 7 and 8 Vict. c. 102. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 16, in note. See Roman Catholic.

Paraphernalia; are those moveables which continue the sole property of the wife notwithstanding the marriage. They consist of her body clothes and wearing apparel, with all the ornaments of dress proper to a woman's person, necklace, ear-rings, breast or arm jewels. Those articles are exempted from the jus mariti, and can neither be alienated by the husband, nor attached for his debts. Things of promiscuous use to man and wife, as watches, jewels, medals, plate, and even the repositories for holding paraphernalia, are not paraphernal, unless they have been presented by the husband before or on the marriage-day. The same things presented to the wife after the marriage are not paraphernal,—they are gifts which the husband may revoke; and such things are paraphernal only with respect to the husband who gave them; for, in the event of the wife entering into a second marriage, they are held to be moveables only, and as such fall to the second husband. The present sometimes made by the purchaser to a wife on occasion of her renouncing a life-rent over her husband's lands, commonly called the Lady's Gown, is also, by the custom of Scotland, regarded as paraphernal. See Lady's Gown. A wife may effectually impignorate her paraphernalia, in security of her husband's debts, even without his consent; but she cannot validly impignorate even her paraphernalia, in security of her own debts, without her husband's consent; and, if she do so, the impignoration will be null; Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, §§ 15 and 27. See Jus Mariti. Stair, B. i. tit. 4, § 17; More's Notes, p. xviii.; Bank, i. 129; Bell's Com. i. 632; Bell's Princ. § 1555; Illust. ib.

Parceners; in English law, persons holding land in copartnership, and who may be compelled to make division; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. The corresponding Scotch law term is common proprietors. See Common Property.

Pardon. The Queen, in virtue of her prerogative, has the privilege of extending her royal clemency to those whom penal laws in their strictness may have condemned. This power, however, extends no farther than to liberate the offender from public penalty for his offence; it does not deprive the injured party of his claim of damages; and it is provided by various enactments, that the remission shall not be pleaded until the assything to the private party be paid. See 1457, c. 74; 1528, c. 7; 1592, c. 155; and 1593, c. 174. It is in the case of pardon, or of the offender having fled from justice, that an assything is claimable; and in this last case it will be due from the donor of the offender's escheat; for, where the criminal has suffered the pains of law, no assything is due; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 105; Hume, i. 279, et seq., and ii. 476, et seq.; Bank. vol. ii. p. 275; Swint. Abridg. h. t. See Mercy.

Parent and Child. Children are either lawful or unlawful—that is, are either born in lawful wedlock or legitimated by the subsequent intermarriage of their parents, or they are bastards. See Bastard. Legitimacy. Legitimation. Filiation. The obligations arising from this relationship are reciprocal. They are, 1. The obligations of parents to children; and 2. The obligations of children to parents.

1. The father has the sole and absolute right of directing what relates to the person, education, or improvement of the minds of his lawful children; he is bound to support, clothe, and educate them according to their rank and station in life; and the performance of those duties may be judicially enforced. It is sufficient, however, that the parent receive the child into his own house, unless he behave with too great a degree of harshness; in which case the child may be taken from the father, and the father compelled to give a reasonable sum for the maintenance of the child. The father is likewise entitled to the profits of the labour of his child while he remains in family with him, and not forisfamiliar. See Forisfamiliar. The father is also the administrator for managing any separate estate belonging to his children during their minority, unless (1.) the estate has flowed from a stranger, and the right of management has been given by the donor to another; or (2.) the donor has excluded the management of the father without naming a curator, in which case a curator must be named by the judge. (3.) By the marriage of a daughter she is put under the curatory of her husband; or (4.) when the child has an action to maintain against the father, in which case a curator ad litem will be named by the Court. See Curatory. Judicial Factor. The administration of the father is restricted to such of his children as remain in family with him or live at his expense, though at a distance prosecuting their education, or acquiring a profession. The office of administrator belongs to the father alone; it requires no service; it is not necessary that he should take an oath de fidei; nor is he bound to find caution for his intromissions, unless his circumstances are low or embarrassed; nor is he obliged to make up an inventory. The presumed affection of a parent, and his consequent interest in the welfare of his child, supersedes the necessity of those guarantees which the law requires from stranger guardians. See Administrator. The father is bound by the law of nature to provide for his children after his death, as well as during his lifetime. But this obligation is not enforced by the law, farther than that, where a person leaves heritage, the heir succeeding to him must give an aliment to the younger children, where they are unable to provide for themselves: thus, sons must be maintained till their majority, and daughters till their marriage. See Aliment.

2. Children are morally bound to honour and respect their parents, although that obligation cannot be legally enforced. But the grosser breaches of filial respect and reverence may, under some of the Scotch statutes, be visited with the highest penalty of the law. See Cursing of Parents. Children are under an obligation to support their indigent parents, and this obligation may be enforced by law. *Ersk. Pares Curiae. Curia was the court or place where the superior exercised his power over his vassals; and those vassals, being all equally dependent on their superior, were termed peers, or pares; so that the pares curiae were all the vassals holding of any one superior. They formed his court, and in their presence many things relating to the fee and the entry of heirs were transacted. *Ersk. Pari Passu. In a competition of creditors claiming a common fund, those who are preferred equally, or share and share alike, to the fund, are said to be preferred pari passu. See Adjudication. Poining. Competition. Preference.

Parish. A parish seems anciently to have signified the diocese of a bishop, though now it signifies the territorial bounds connected with a particular church of the established religion, and for the support of which alone the tithes within those bounds can be allocated. The bounds of each parish are precisely fixed. Hence, in the description contained in the title-deeds of lands, there is joined to the name by which the lands are distinguished the name of the county and parish within which they are locally situated. It had been found necessary in many cases to divide some parishes or to unite others; and powers to that effect were given, by different statutes, to commissioners for the plantation of kirks, &c., as by 1617, c. 3,—1621, c. 5,—1633, c. 19,—1661, c. 61,—1693, c. 23. At last the power of all former commissions was transferred, by 1707, c. 9, to the Court of Session as commissioners; and under that act the judges of that Court are empowered, with the consent of three-fourths of the heritors, to erect new churches and to disjoin parishes. But they may annex or unite two parishes into one, on cause shown, without the consent of the heritors. By the act 7 and 8 Vict., c. 44, 1844, the consent of the majority of the heritors is sufficient. *Ersk. Park; in the acceptance of the English law, is a large extent of ground enclosed and privileged for wild beasts of the chase, by royal grant, or by prescription. In Scotland, park has no such signification, the synonymous term being forest, whereby is meant a large tract of enclosed ground where deer are kept. Woods or parks enclosed by private persons for deer are juris privati, and are carried in charters as part of the land disposed, though not expressed. *Ersk. Parliament. The Parliament is the legislative branch of the supreme power of Great Britain. It consists of the Sovereign—the lords spiritual and temporal—and the knights, citizens, and burghesses, representatives of the commons of the realm. The representatives of the commons of the United Kingdom amount in number to 658, distributed in the proportions mentioned in the article Commons, House of. As to the manner of electing the representatives of the Scottish peerage and of the commons of Scotland, see Election Laws. Reform Act.

In the present article will be considered the assembling of Parliament; the laws and customs of Parliament; the method of conducting business; and the adjournment, prorogation, and dissolution of Parliament.

1. Of the manner and time of assembling Parliament.—The Parliament is summoned by a writ from Chancery, in the name of the Sovereign, issued by the advice of the Privy Council. This writ must be issued forty days before the sitting of Parliament; and by practice this writ is extended to fifty days. The calling together of Parliament is part of the royal prerogative, and a power properly and necessarily vested in the Sovereign, as being the only branch of the Legislature which has a separate individual existence. And although there may be instances of Parliaments called without the King's writ, as in the Convention Parliament which restored Charles II., or the Convention of Lords and Commons which called in King William, yet those are exceptions from the rule, justified only by necessity, and beyond the influence of common rules. The Sovreign is, by the law of the realm, bound to convoke a Parliament "every year, or oftener if need be." This has been interpreted by some as if the calling a Parliament every year depended on the necessity of the measure; while, on the other hand, it has been maintained, that it was not the calling of a Parliament annually, but calling it oftener than annually, which was to depend on the state of the times. But, by subsequent statutes, this power has been regulated; and by stat. 6 Will. and Mary, c. 2, it is enacted, that a new Parliament shall be called within three years after the termination of the former one; though, practically, these regulations are of less value, as the Mutiny Act, and Land-tax and Malt-tax Acts, are passed for one year only; in consequence of which the Parliament must necessarily meet for the despatch of business once a year.

2. Of the laws and customs of Parliament as an aggregate body.—The power and jurisdiction of Parliament is, by Sir Edward Coke, said to be so transcendent and absolute that it cannot be confined, either for causes or persons, within any bounds. It has sovereign and uncontrollable authority in the making, confirming, enlarging, restraining, abrogating, repealing, reviving, and expounding of laws, concerning matters of all possible denominations, ecclesiastical or temporal, civil, military, maritime, or criminal—this being, by the British Constitution, the depository of that absolute power which must in all governments reside somewhere. All mischiefs and grievances, operations and remedies, which transcend the ordinary course of law, are within the reach of this tribunal. It can regulate and new-model the succession to the crown; it can alter the established religion; it can change and re-model the constitution of the kingdom, and of Parliament itself. It can, in short, do everything which is not naturally impossible; it is a power uncontrolled by any superior. The High Court of Parliament has its own peculiar law, called the Lex et consuetudo Parliamenti; a law to be learned out of the rolls and records of Parliament, and by precedents and experience. Of this law the great maxim is, "That whatever matter arises concerning either House of Parliament ought to be examined, discussed, and adjudged in that House to which it relates, and not elsewhere." Hence, the Lords will not suffer the Commons to interfere in settling the election of a peer of Scotland. The Commons will not allow the Lords to judge of the election of a member of their House; nor will either branch permit courts of law to examine the merits of such cases. But the maxims on which they proceed rest entirely with Parliament, and are not defined and ascertained by precise regulations.

The House of Lords is a distinct court from the Commons for several purposes, and is the sovereign court of justice and dernier resort. This House tries criminal causes or impeachments of the Commons, and has an original jurisdiction for the trial of peers upon indictments found by a grand jury. It also tries causes upon appeal from the Court of Chancery, or upon writs of error to revise judgments in the King's Bench, or by appeal from the Court of Session. All the decrees of the House of Lords are as judgments, and may be executed in England by the Lord Chancellor—in Scotland by the Court of Session. The House of Commons is also a distinct court for many purposes. It examines the rights of election, is entitled to expel its own members, and to commit them to prison. The book of the clerk of the House is a record. The House is also the grand inquest of the kingdom, to present to the Sovereign or Lords public grievances or delinquents; and any member of the House of Commons has the privilege of impeaching a peer. The High Court of Parliament is the supreme court in the kingdom, not only for the making, but for the executing of the laws; by the trial of great and enormous offenders, whether lords or commons, by parliamentary impeachment. Acts of Parliament to attain particular persons of treason or felony, or to inflict pains and penalties, are new laws made pro re nata, and by no means an execution of those already in existence. But an impeachment before the Lords, by the Commons of Great Britain in Parliament, is a prosecution proceeding on the known and established law, being a presentment to the supreme court of criminal jurisdiction by the solemn grand inquest of the whole kingdom. The Commons, where a peer is impeached for treason, usually address the Crown to appoint a Lord High Steward, for the greater dignity and regularity of the proceedings, although it has been maintained that the House of Lords may proceed without such an appointment. The privileges of Parliament are large and indefinite; and are preserved indefinite, that their powers may meet all the attempts which may at any time be made, by such expedients as the executive power in bad times may devise, for the purpose of violating the privileges of Parliament. There are, however, certain privileges which are completely ascertained. These are the privileges of speech and of person. The privilege of speech is particularly demanded of the Sovereign in person, by the Speaker of the House of Commons, at the opening of every new Parliament.

But if any member, in the course of a debate, use offensive words, he may be called to the bar to receive a reprimand from the Speaker, or, if the offence be great, he may be sent to the Tower. With regard to privilege of person, it is now confined to freedom from arrest or imprisonment in civil matters; in the case of peers constantly, in that of commons during the sitting of Parliament, and for forty days after each prorogation, and for as many days prior to the day to which the Parliament is prorogued; and after a dissolution, the privilege continues for what is termed a reasonable time. All other privileges which obstruct the course of justice are now abolished by stat. 10 Geo. II. c. 50; whereby it is enacted, that any suit may at any time be brought against any peer or member of Parliament, their servants, or any other person entitled to privilege of Parliament, which shall not be impeded or delayed by pretence of any such privilege; except that the person of a member of the House of Commons shall not thereby be subject to any arrest or imprisonment on any such suit or proceedings.

3. Of the laws and customs of the House of Lords.—The Lords are entitled to have the attendance of the Judges of the Courts of Queen's Bench and Common Pleas, and such of the Barons of the Exchequer as are of the degree of the coif, or have been made serjeants-at-law; or likewise of the Queen's counsel, being serjeants, and of the Masters of the Court of Chancery, for their advice in point of law, and for the greater dignity of their proceedings. Every peer may, by license from the Sovereign, appoint any Lord of Parliament his proxy to vote for him in his absence; and even the license seems now to be presumed. A spiritual lord can alone be proxy for a spiritual lord, and a temporal for a temporal lord. These proxies cannot vote in a question of guilty or not guilty; and their authority ceases on the return of the lord by whom they are granted. No peer can hold more than two proxies at the same time. Each peer has a right, by leave of the House, when a vote passes contrary to his sentiments, to enter his dissent, with the grounds thereof, on the journals of the House. This is styled a protest. All bills which, in their consequence, may affect the peerage, by the custom of Parliament originate in the House of Lords, and suffer no changes or amendments in the House of Commons. In its judicial capacity, the House of Lords is the supreme court of judicature in the kingdom. It possesses no original jurisdiction in civil causes, but only by appeal and writ of error, that it may rectify any injustice or mistake committed by the courts of law. It has, however, an original criminal jurisdiction in the case of impeachment by the Commons, and in the trial of peers.

4. Of the laws and customs of the House of Commons.—The Commons, in making and repealing laws, have equal power with the Lords; and it is the ancient indisputable privilege of that House, that all grants of subsidies, or parliamentary aids, shall be first introduced in that House; and all bills imposing taxes on the subject must also originate in the House of Commons, although such bills, in order to their being effectual as acts of Parliament, must have the assent of the other branches of the Legislature. So far is this privilege carried, that the House of Commons will not permit the House of Lords to alter or amend any money-bill; and this extends even to tolls, rates or duties to be collected, or where pecuniary fines are imposed for offences.

5. The method of conducting business.—The mode of making laws is much the same in both Houses of Parliament. In each House there is a Speaker. The Speaker of the House of Lords is the Lord Chancellor; but if the seals are not in commission, the House of Lords, it is said, may elect a Speaker. The Speaker of the House of Commons is chosen by the House, and must be approved of by the Sovereign. In this the usage of the two Houses differs—viz., that the Speaker of the House of Commons does not take part in the debate, nor offer his own opinion on the questions before the House; whereas the Speaker of the House of Lords (if a lord of Parliament) may in all cases speak and argue. In either House the voice of the majority binds the whole, and this majority is declared by votes openly given. In the House of Lords, the Speaker gives his vote as one of the peers, and has no casting-vote; and where the votes of the House are equal, the opinion of the non-contents is the prevailing one. Hence, were the peers equally divided in opinion on an appeal case, the judgment of the Court below would remain unaltered. In the House of Commons, again, the Speaker never votes excepting where there is an equality without his vote, in which case his vote creates a majority in favour of that side to which he gives it. In the House of Commons there is no precedency as in the House of Lords, only the Speaker has, towards the upper end, a seat or chair in the middle of the House; and the clerk, with his assistant, sits near him at the table, just below the chair. The Lords have robes; the members of the House of Commons have none, except the Speaker and clerks, who wear wigs and gowns, as English lawyers do during term-time.

The members of the House of Commons

are not at liberty to depart from Parliament without leave of the Speaker and Commons assembled; and the leave must be entered in the book of the clerk of Parliament. A call of the House is intended for the purpose of discovering what members are absent without leave or just cause. On the calling over the names, such as are absent are marked; and the defaulters being again called over on the same day, or the day after, and not appearing, are summoned by the serjeant-at-arms. Forty members are requisite to constitute a House for despatch of business. All bills, motions, and petitions, whether favourably or unfavourably received, and whether or not the bills pass into statutes, are, by order of Parliament, entered on the Parliament rolls. The Speaker of the House of Commons does not persuade or dissuade in passing a bill; he gives a short account of it, with a view to explanation. If any question is put, he may explain, but he enters into no argument. When he desires to speak, he ought to be heard without interruption; and when any other member stands up to speak at the same time, he ought to give way to the Speaker. When two members stand up to speak, he who is to speak against the bill should be first heard, or he who first caught the eye of the Speaker. No member can be silenced unless by the Speaker; though, if any person speak impertinently, or beside the question, the Speaker may interrupt him, and ask the pleasure of the House, whether he shall be further heard. Whoever hisses or disturbs any person in his speech is answerable at the bar of the House.

In enacting laws and other proceedings in Parliament, the Lords give their voices in their House from puise lord seriatim, by the word content or not content. The manner of voting in the House of Commons is by yea or no; and when there is any difficulty in determining on which side the majority is, the House divides, the ayes going out and the noes staying in; and four tellers are appointed by the Speaker, two on each side, and the tellers report to the Speaker the numbers. When a bill of a private nature is to be brought into the House, a petition must be presented by one of the members of the House of Commons. The petition, if founded on facts, is sent to a committee, who inquire into the facts, and report to the House; and then, or if no investigation be necessary upon the bill, leave is given to bring in the bill. In public matters, the bill is brought in by a motion, and without the necessity of a petition. Formerly, all bills were drawn in the form of petitions, which were entered on the Parliament rolls, with the King's answer subjoined; and at the end of each Parliament the Judges drew them into the form of a statute, which was entered on the Statute Roll. In the reign of Henry VI., bills in the form of acts (according to the modern custom) were first introduced. Any person may move for leave to bring in a bill, except it be for imposing a tax (which can be done only by an order of the House). When the motion is seconded, and leave given, the mover and seconder are ordered to prepare and bring in the bill. When prepared, it is drawn out on paper, with blanks wherever any point is dubious, or where blanks or sums are to be filled up. It is read a first time, and at a convenient distance a second time. After each reading, the Speaker states to the House the substance of the bill, and puts the question, whether it shall proceed any further. The introducing of the bill may be opposed, as the bill itself may be at either of the readings; and if the opposition succeeds, the bill must be dropped for that session. If the bill passes the second reading, it is committed—that is, referred to a committee, which is either selected in matters of little moment, or where the measure is of importance the House resolves itself into a committee of the whole House, which is done by the Speaker quitting the chair, and a member being appointed as chairman. The Speaker, in a committee of the whole House, may speak and vote as any other member. In these committees the bill is debated clause by clause, amendments made, the blanks filled up, and sometimes the bill entirely new-modelled. After the bill has been gone through, the chairman reports it to the House, with such amendments as the committee have made; and then the House reconsiders the whole bill again, and the question is repeatedly put upon every clause and amendment. When the House has come to an opinion on the various points, the bill is ordered to be engrossed, or written in a strong gross hand, on one or more long rolls of parchment sewed together. This being done, the bill is read a third time, and amendments are sometimes made even then; and if a new clause be added, it is done by tacking a new piece of parchment to the bill, which is called a rider . The Speaker then once more states the nature of the bill, and, holding it up in his hands, puts the question, Whether the bill shall pass? If it be agreed to pass the bill, the title of it is settled, and one of the members is commissioned to carry it up to the Lords, and to desire their concurrence. This member, attended by other members of the House, carries the bill to the bar of the House of Lords, and there delivers it to their Speaker, who comes from the woolsock to receive it.

The bill then passes through the same forms in the House of Lords which it has passed in the House of Commons, except the engrossing. If it be rejected, no further notice is taken of it, in order to prevent unbecoming altercations between the two Houses; but, if it be passed by the Lords, they send a message to the Commons by two Masters of Chancery, or, in matters of great moment, by two of the Judges, that they have agreed to the bill; and if no amendment has been made, it remains with them; but if amendments be made, they are sent down with the bill, to receive the concurrence of the Commons. Where the Commons do not agree to the amendments, a conference usually takes place between members chosen from either House, who meet and debate the matter. If, in consequence of this conference, the Commons agree to the amendments, the bill is sent back to the Lords by one of the members, with a message to acquaint them therewith; but should both Houses remain inflexible, the bill is dropped. When the bill originates in the House of Lords, the same form takes place; but when an act of grace or pardon is passed, it is signed by the Sovereign, and then read over in each of the two Houses of Parliament, without any new engrossing or amendment; and where both Houses have agreed to a bill, it is deposited in the House of Lords, there to await the royal assent, unless it be a money-bill, which, after receiving the concurrence of the Lords, is sent back to the House of Commons.

The royal assent may be given in two ways:—1. By the Sovereign in person. In this case the Queen goes to the House of Lords in her royal robes, with the crown on her head; and being seated on the throne, a message is sent to require the presence of the Commons, who appear at the bar. The titles of all the bills which have been passed are then read, and her answer is declared by the clerk of the Parliament in Norman French. In a public bill, where the Sovereign consents, the clerk declares, "La Reigne le veut." The Queen wills it. If it be a private bill, the clerk repeats, "Soit fait comme il est désiré." Be it as it is desired. The refusal of the royal assent is expressed in these terms, "La Reigne s'avisera." The Queen will consider of it. When a bill of supply is granted, it is carried up and presented to the Queen by the Speaker of the House of Commons, and the royal assent is then expressed, "La Reigne remercie ses loyal sujets, accepte leur benevolence et aussi le veut." The Queen thanks her loyal subjects, accepts their benevolence, and wills it to be so. Where it is an act of grace, which originates with the Sovereign, and has the royal assent in its first stage, the clerk of Parliament pronounces the gratitude of the subjects in these terms, "Les Prelats, Seigneurs, et Commons, en ce present Parliament assemblez, au nom de tous vous autres sujets, remercient tres humblement votre Majesté, et prient à Dieu vous donner en santé bonne vie et longue." The Prelates, Lords and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, in the name of all your other subjects, most humbly thank your Majesty, and pray to God to grant you in health and wealth long to live. 2. The royal assent may be given by letters-patent under the great seal, signed with the Sovereign's hand, and notified in her absence to both Houses assembled in the House of Lords. When the bill has received the royal assent in any of those ways, it is then, and not before, a statute or act of Parliament, and is placed amongst the records of the kingdom.

6. Of the adjournment, prorogation, and dissolution of Parliament.—An adjournment is no more than a continuance of the session from one day to another, as the word itself imports; and this is done by the authority of each House separately every day, and sometimes for a fortnight, or even a month together, as at Christmas or Easter, or upon other particular occasions; but the adjournment of one House is no adjournment of the other. It has also been usual, on the suggestion of the Sovereign, for both Houses to adjourn themselves for the time pointed out by her Majesty; and the advantage of an adjournment in place of a prorogation is, that everything remains as it was, and may be taken up on the meeting of Parliament; whereas by a prorogation the session is at an end, and the bills at that time in their progress are lost, and must be begun af new. A prorogation is the continuance of the Parliament from one session to another, and is made by the royal authority, expressed by the Lord Chancellor, or by a commission from the Crown, or by royal proclamation. At the beginning of a new Parliament, when it is not intended that Parliament should meet for the despatch of business, at the return of the writ, the practice is to prorogue Parliament by a writ of prorogation, which is read by the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords on the day of return of the summons: and notice is given by a proclamation when Parliament is to proceed to business on the day to which it stands prorogued. Both Houses are prorogued by these writs, it not being a prorogation of either House, but of Parliament. The session is never understood to be at an end until it is prorogued. All orders of Parliament are determined by prorogation; and a person taken into custody by order of Parliament may, after prorogation, be discharged on a habeas corpus; but impeachments brought up by the Commons, and all cases of appeal and writs of error, continue in the state in which they were at the prorogation or dissolution of Parliament. Dissolution is the civil death of Parliament; and this may be effected in three ways:—1. By the Sovereign's will, expressed in person, or by representation; and this is a branch of the royal prerogative. 2. Parliament may be dissolved by the demise of the Crown; and this dissolution must take place within six months after that event, unless the succeeding Sovereign shall sooner dissolve the Parliament. If, at the time of the demise, Parliament be prorogued, it is ordered instantly to meet; and should Parliament have been dissolved, the last Parliament is instantly to re-assemble, and become again a Parliament for six months, or until dissolved by the Sovereign; stat. 6 Anne, c. 7. 3. Parliament may dissolve by length of time; for, as the matter is now ordered, it must die a natural death at the end of every seventh year, if not sooner dissolved. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See *Amendment. Parricide; the murder of a parent. This is a crime so monstrous and unnatural as to have excited the just indignation of all Legislatures; and by the law of Scotland it is punished with more than ordinary severity. In addition to the punishment of death, it is ordered, by the act 1594, c. 220, that he who has slain "his father or mother, gudschir or gudedame," shall suffer a total corruption of blood, in linea recta, and be "disherished in all time thereafter fra their lands, heritages, tacks, possessions," which are to devolve on the next collateral relation, in the same manner as if the direct line had failed. These terms, however, do not comprehend the offence of killing father or mother by affinity. To have the effect of disinheriting the posterity of a parricide, it has been held necessary that he be convicted by a jury; it not being sufficient that he has been fugitated for non-appearance. In some cases of conviction for this crime, the right-hand of the criminal has been struck off before he was executed. Hume, i. 285; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 47; Stair, B. iii. tit. 5, § 35; Bank. ii. 331; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. h. t.

Parsonage Teinds; were those tithes which belonged to the parson; and they consisted of the tithes of corn, or of wheat, barley, oats, peas, &c. They are termed decimæ rectoriæ in our Latin charters, and sometimes decimæ garbales. Stair, B. iv. tit. 25, § 10; More's Notes, cccxxi.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, §§ 12, 33; Hutch. Justice, ii. 349; Connell on Tithes, i. 125; on Parishes, 303, 359. See Teinds. Decimæ Garbales.

Part and Pertinent. Lands are generally disposed with all parts and pertinents thereto belonging; and the effect of that expression is often very important. Thus, it may import a conveyance of lands, or rights of servitude, which have been possessed for forty years as part and pertinent of the principal subject conveyed. So, also, this expression carries everything which, from its close connection with land, falls properly under the description of part and pertinent; hence, natural fruits, before they are separated, as fruit, natural grass, &c., are deemed part and pertinent. In the same way, woods or deer-parks are juris privati, and are carried as part and pertinent; so is a seat in a church, or a burial-ground. But a steilbow stocking, unless the lands have been sold on a rental, does not accompany the lands as part and pertinent. *Ersk. Partial Counsel; is one of the circumstances which throws discredit upon a witness's testimony. It is no disqualification that the witness has been the informer against the panel, even where he is not the injured party, or that he has endeavoured, by fair means, to support his evidence by that of others. Neither is suspicion thrown upon the testimony of a procurator-fiscal, sheriff, magistrate, police or sheriff officer, because he discharges his duty by making inquiries, or conducting a precognition against the accused. It is a good objection to the credibility of a witness, that he has been guilty of undue and illegal agency against the panel. In civil causes, instructing a witness what to say, or telling him what has been proved by other witnesses, or speaking to him regarding the cause after citation, renders him inadmissible; but the presence of a person in his official capacity, while a witness is under examination, infers no disqualification. Neither will the circumstance of a witness drawing up a written statement of the facts known to him, at the desire of the party, constitute a ground of exclusion. Agency was formerly a ground of exclusion of a witness; but by the act 16 and 17 Vict. c. 20, 1853, this ground was removed, except in consistent causes. Stair, B. iv. tit. 43, § 9; More's

Partial Payment. No one is bound to accept part-payment of a debt; and the offer of part-payment has no effect in interrupting mora. But a creditor in two or more separate debts cannot refuse the payment of any one of those debts, though the debtor should decline to clear off even the interest on the others. It is a general rule, that payment of part of a debt extinguishes the debt to that extent; and the claim of the creditor receiving such payment from his debtor is, in ranking on his bankrupt estate, limited to the balance. This rule holds, whether the partial payment was made by the bankrupt himself, or by a solvent co-obligant. But partial payment, although it may diminish the debt, has no such effect on a real security given for it by way of pledge. Doubts were at one time entertained, whether partial payment to an adjudger did not diminish the security; but it is now settled, that notwithstanding such partial payment, the adjudger is entitled to rank for the undiminished amount of his original claim in a pari passu ranking of adjudgers; Ersk. ii. 12, 67. See also Dalrymple's Trustees v. Cuthbertson, May 18, 1825, 4 S. 16; and 2 Bell's Com. p. 532. A landlord may refuse part-payment of rent. The holder of a bill is not bound to take less than the whole sum contained in the bill; but he is entitled to take a partial payment from the acceptor, without cutting off his claim of recourse against the other parties, provided he protest the bill, in so far as it is not paid, and in other respects negotiate the bill duly. Suing one of the obligants in a promissory-note, and thereby receiving part of the debt in the note, does not discharge the other obligant. Partial payment by an indorser has been held equivalent to a waiver of notice. A partial payment by the acceptor precludes the holder from suing either the drawer or indorsers for more than the balance. And although there was at one time some doubt upon the point, it has been decided, that the payment of part of a bill by the drawer precludes the holder from suing the acceptor for more than the balance; Thomson, 26th Jan. 1819, cited in Thomson on Bills, p. 583. Partial payments made to account of a debt should be noticed in the summons; Jurid. Styles, iii. 26. Partial payments should also be mentioned in letters of harning; ib. pp. 581 and 605, Notes. Partial payments made by the debtor interrupt the long prescription; but none of the short prescriptions of debt are interrupted by partial payments. Yet markings of partial payments to account, made and entered in the debtor's handwriting, after a bill has undergone the sexennial limitation, amount to an acknowledgment by the debtor's writ that the principal sum was due after the six years, and therefore afford evidence that it is still resting-owing, unless he proves the contrary. Partibus; is a note written on the margin of a summons, or of notes of advocacy or suspension, when lodged for calling, containing the name and designation, in plain and legible writing, of the pursuer, advocator, or suspender; or of each pursuer, advocator, or suspender, if there be only two; or if more, the name and designation of the party first named, with the words, "and others." And if the defenders, respondents, or chargers, are not more than three, their names and designations, one or more, are inserted in the partibus; but if there be more, the partibus contains the name of the party first named, with the words, "and others, as per roll," referring to a separate roll of all the defenders, respondents, or chargers. The partibus must also contain the names of the pursuer's, advocator's, or suspender's counsel and agent. As it is from this partibus that all the entries in the calling lists, rolls, and minute-book are made, it is of great consequence that it be perfectly correct. See A. S. 10th March 1772; *A. Twelve inches make a foot. Three feet and an inch make an ell. Six ells make a fall; and six ells long by six broad make a square fall or rood. Skene, h. t.

Passive Titles. By the law of Scotland, the whole property of a deceased person is liable for all the debts he may have contracted; and the heir who takes up the succession of the deceased thereby incurs a personal liability for his debts and obligations. Anciently, it would appear that the responsibility of the heir extended no farther than to the value of the property to which he succeeded. But this gave facilities to the heir for secreting much of the deceased's property, and thereby defrauding creditors; and in order to obviate such frauds, certain acts on the part of the heir are held sufficient in law to render him universally responsible for the debts of the ancestor. This has been termed a passive title, by which the heir, without acquiring an active title, as by service or confirmation, tacitly and by implication subjects himself to the responsibilities belonging to the character of heir. All passive representation was founded on a presumption of fraud on the part of the heir; and therefore, where an heir was desirous of intromitting and fairly accounting for his intromissions to the creditors of the ancestor, he might do so by making an inventory of the heritable estate of the deceased, and serving with reference to such inventory, technically called entry cum beneficio inventarii. The ancient law has been restored by the act 10 and 11 Vict. c. 47, 1847, which limits the responsibility of an heir expeding a special service to the value of the lands embraced by the service. By the same act, the representation under a general service may be limited to the lands specified. With regard to moveables, where the heir chooses to pursue the regular method, he is accountable only for the effects confirmed; and the inclination of the more recent decisions is in every case, whether relating to heritable or to moveable succession, to restrict the responsibility to the value of the succession, wherever fraud is not imputable to the heir. See Beneficium Inventarii.

The passive titles which have been introduced for the security of creditors, are, I. GENERAL: as, 1. Gestio pro hærede; 2. Præceptio hæreditatis; and, 3. Certain statutory or presumptive passive titles. Or, II. PARTIAL: as, 1. By stating a peremptory defence; or, 2. By failing to renounce. The only passive title relating to moveable succession is vitious intromission. A few words will explain, sufficiently for the present purpose, the grounds and nature of those passive titles:—

I. GENERAL PASSIVE TITLES.

1. Gestio pro Hærede.

Gestio pro hærede, or behaviour as an heir, signifies the heir's behaving or conducting himself in such a manner, with respect to his predecessor's heritage, as none but the heir is legally entitled to do. See Behaviour as Heir.

2. Præceptio Hæreditatis.

This passive title may be incurred where the heir-apparent accepts from his ancestor a gratuitous right to the heritage, or any part of it, to which he himself might have succeeded as heir. It is called præceptio hæreditatis, because it is a taking of the succession prematurely, and before it has opened to the heir by his ancestor's death. The effect of this anticipation is to render the heir liable for the debts of his predecessor contracted prior to the date of the gift. But should the disposition to the heir remain latent, and should no infestment be taken upon it, it may be reduced on the head of fraud by posterior creditors of the person in possession. In order to subject the heir in this passive title, the grant must be gratuitous; for there is nothing to prevent a fair sale to the heir for an adequate price, provided evidence of the onerosity of the transaction be preserved, and that there be no room for challenge under the act 1621, c. 18. See Conjunct and Confident. When a right of this kind is given in implement of an obligation under a marriage-contract, its effect, as regards the passive title, depends on the fact whether the contract creates a jus crediti in the heir, or a mere spes successions. Where the marriage-contract vests a jus crediti in the heir, as, for example, when it contains an obligation to infest the heir of the marriage against a certain day, the heir, in that case, incurs no passive title by accepting the conveyance from his father. On the other hand, where the heir has a mere spes, he will incur the passive title by accepting a gratuitous conveyance from his father. This passive title may be incurred by the mediate as well as the immediate apparent heir in the direct line. Thus, a proprietor cannot convey gratuitously to his grandson any more than he can convey to his son, the father of that grandson. But, in the case of a gratuitous right granted to a brother by one who has no issue, the brother, though next in succession at the date of the grant, is not liable præceptione; yet a daughter (though there might have been a male heir at the death of the father) was rendered liable præceptione for accepting of a disposition from her father. The conveyance of heritage, or an assignation to a loan, in the same way with a disposition to lands, falls under this passive title; but a conveyance of moveables to the heir in heritage has not the same effect. The heir who incurs the passive title of præceptio hæreditatis is no farther liable, in consequence of his acceptance, than he would have been had he, of that date, entered heir to the grantor, so as to subject himself to the debts at that time chargeable against the grantor. It may therefore be doubted whether he would now be held liable beyond the value of the subject received from his ancestor. The heir has no concern with posterior contractions; not even with those contracted between the date of the right and the infestment following thereon. Hence, the heir is called successor titulo lucrativo post contractum debitum. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 87, et seq.; Stair, B. iii. tit. 5, §§ 10, 14, and tit. 7; More's Notes, p. cccxxviii.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 87, et seq.; Bank. ii. 374; Bell's Com. i. 660; Bell's Princ. § 1918; Sandford on Heritable Succession, ii. 90-4; Brown's Synop. 1473, 1549; S. & D. xiii. 31.

The passive titles of gestio pro hærede and præceptio hæreditatis agree in this, that neither of them can affect the heir, unless the subjects be such as, on the ancestor's death, he is entitled to take up qua heir. So much is this the case, that when a right is taken by a father, not to himself, but to his son, as the son does not take the property as heir but as donee, he is not liable on either of these passive titles. They farther agree in this, that neither title can be extended beyond the effect which would have been produced by the actual entry of the heir, so as to entitle him to the benefit of discussion and an action of relief against executors, or any other order of heirs, primarily liable in the debts he may have paid; and, lastly, they agree in this, that in both some intromission after the death of the ancestor must appear. These two passive titles differ, however, in so far, that behaviour as heir, as being intromission without the order of law, is a quasi delict; and therefore, unless an action has been raised against the heir during his lifetime, the action cannot be brought against those who may succeed to him; because no action founded on a delinquency is transmitted against heirs, where there has not been litiscontestation while the delinquent was alive. But the præceptio hæreditatis is considered as equivalent to an entry as heir, by which the heir enters into an implied contract with the creditors, and undertakes the burden of the ancestor's debts; and all obligations arising ex contractu are transmissible against heirs. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, §§ 91, 92.

3. Statutory Passive Titles.

1. An adjudication on a trust-bond.—This is an expedient whereby an heir, who is uncertain as to the state in which his ancestor has left his affairs, and of the obligations which he may incur by entering heir, instead of taking up the succession, executes a bond in favour of a confidential friend, acknowledging a debt to him, and at the same time obtaining a back-bond from the confidential person explanatory of the nature of the transaction. The nominal creditor in this trust-bond, as it is called, then charges the heir to enter to his predecessor in the usual form; the heir renounces; and the nominal creditor, as creditor of the heir, obtains a decree of constitution, and thereafter an adjudication against the hæreditas jacens of the deceased. On this the trustee is infest; and then, in implement of the back-bond, he disposes the subject to which he has thus acquired a title to the heir. To prevent the bad consequences resulting to creditors from this device, it was provided, by the act 1695, c. 24, that if an heir, without being served, shall possess any part of his ancestor's estate, or purchase any right, redeemable or irredeemable, or any legal diligence affecting it, otherwise than as highest offerer, without collusion, at a judicial sale, such possession or purchase shall be deemed behaviour as heir. Sandford on Herit. Success. ii. 9, 16, et seq.; Jurid. Styles, 2d. edit. ii. 96; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 72, and Note by Mr Ivory; Bell's Princ. § 834; Sandford on Entails, 349.

2. The passing by an heir three years in possession.—This passive title is established by the act 1695, c. 24, and it arises where an heir, passing by a preceding heir who had possessed as apparent heir for the period of three years, serves to a more remote heir. Thus, if he pass by his father, and enter as heir to his grandfather, or succeed to one more remote, upon an adjudication proceeding on his trust-bond, the effect of this is to render the heir so passing by liable for the debts and deeds of the heir passed by, to the value of the estate to which he enters. In the sense of this act, the obligations come under by a marriage-contract will be effectual against the estate, because they are accounted onerous; but the heir passing by is not bound to give effect to the gratuitous deeds of the interjected apparent heir. Where, however, the heir, without entering, attains possession of the estate, he may continue the possession without falling under the statute, or incurring a passive title. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 94; Bell's Com. i. 664; Bell's Princ. § 1929; Illust. ib.; Kames' Equity, 124.

3. Under the same statute, 1695, c. 24, it is declared to constitute a passive title, that an apparent heir shall possess any part of the ancestor's estate, except upon lawful purchase by public roup, under a title vested in the person of any such near relation as the apparent heir may also succeed to as heir. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 94. See Apparent Heir.

II. PARTIAL PASSIVE TITLES.

1. By stating a peremptory defence.

When an heir is cited as representing his ancestor, he incurs a passive title if he states a peremptory defence. For example, were he to state that the debt has been paid or extinguished, or that the debt is prescribed, he would incur a passive title, because, unless in the character of heir, he has no title to state such a plea. But this extends only to the particular debt, and does not infer a general passive title. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 93.

2. Where the heir neglects to renounce.

Where an heir is charged to enter, if he does not mean to represent the deceased, he ought to renounce the succession; and if he neglects to do so, he incurs a passive title, and may be pursued personally for the debt: this, in the same manner with the former, infers no farther obligation than in regard to the particular debt charged on. This renunciation may be made and produced in the process of constitution at any time before decree is given, or even after decree has been pronounced, if it has been pronounced in absence. Ersk. ib.

VITIOUS INTROMISSION.

Vituous intromission is the only passive title recognised in moveable succession. It signifies an unwarrantable intermeddling with the moveable estate of a defunct without the order of law. This passive title is not, like those relating to heritage, limited to the persons legally entitled to the succession, but may be incurred by any one whose opportunities allow of his intromitting with the deceased's moveable effects; and the mere intermeddling is sufficient, although the article should not be applied to any use by the intromitter. So also, an executor confirmed, intromitting with more than is given up in the inventory in the confirmation, is accounted a vitious intromitter. But this passive title has no place—

1. Where the article intromitted with had ceased to be part of the defunct's estate prior to the intromission. By the stat. 1696, c. 20, the confirmation of an executor-creditor, as being of the nature of a step of diligence, does not screen from the passive title a third party intermeddling, unless he claim through the creditor confirmed, or unless his intromission has been merely with the special subject confirmed. 2. The passive title is excluded by any probable title in the intromitter sufficient to remove the presumption of fraud on which this passive title rests; and necessary intromission by the members of the deceased's family, custodiæ causa, infers no passive title. Lastly, The passive title is excluded by the intromitter's confirmation as executor, whereby he incurs an obligation to account to the extent of the inventory confirmed; and where the intromitter is a relict, or one of the next of kin, her or his confirmation, at any time within a year after the death of the defunct, will exclude the passive title, notwithstanding a prior citation. As this passive title is intended for the benefit of creditors, it cannot be pleaded by legatees; and as it arises ex delicto, it cannot be founded on against the heir of the intromitter; but if the action be restricted to simple restitution, it may be insisted in against the intromitter's representative. It also follows, from this being a delict, that all the vitious intromitters are liable singuli in solidum to the creditors—the intromitter who pays having a claim of relief pro rata against his co-delinquents; and if the creditor sue the intromitters jointly in the same summons, they are liable pro virili—i. e., in equal sums according to their number; not according to the extent of their intromissions; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 49, et seq. The Act of Sederunt 23d Feb. 1692 establishes a presumptive vitious intromission against those who, on the death of a person who is succeeded by a minor, fail to seal up his repositories as soon as he becomes insensible. Where the defunct dies in his own house, this must be done by his nearest relations. Where he dies in the house of another, the duty devolves on the master or mistress of the house, who must deliver the keys of his repositories to the judge-ordinary, for behoof of all concerned. *Ersk. Pasturage; is a known rural servitude, whereby the proprietor of the dominant tenement is entitled to pasture a certain number of his cattle on the grass grounds of the servient tenement. This right may be constituted either by express grant or by prescription. The right of common pasturage is often given generally in the original feu-right, and in that case the extent of the burden will be explained by possession; or the grant specifies the ground over which the servitude is to extend. Where the right extends over a common, and is indefinite as to the number of cattle to be pastured, the right is not unlimited, but will be regulated as to its extent by the number of cattle which each of the dominant proprietors can fodder during the winter on the dominant lands. The action whereby the parties having servitudes of pasturage over a common adjust their rights is called an action of sowming and rowming. Common pasturage may be constituted by prescription—i. e., by the acquirer's uninterrupted exercise of the right for forty years on lands contiguous to his own, under a general clause in his charter cum communi pastura; or even by the common clause of part and pertinent, without a clause of pasturage. The proprietor of the dominant tenement is not entitled to communicate the servitude to cattle and sheep not his own; thus, he cannot let the right of pasturage to drovers or others not actually possessing the dominant lands. The proprietor of the servient tenement may plough portions of the ground over which the servitude extends, provided he leave enough in grass for the use of the dominant tenement. *Ersk. Patents. A letter-patent royal is a grant from the Crown under the great seal. The term patent is, however, generally understood to mean a patent for an invention. Patents for inventions were expressly excepted from the operation of the statute 21 James I. c. 3, against monopolies. See Monopolies. The 6th section declares, that the act shall not extend to letters-patent or grants of privilege for fourteen years, "of the sole working or making of new manufactures within the realm, to the true and first inventor and inventors of such manufactures, which others at the time shall not use, so as also they be not contrary to the law, nor mischievous to the State, by raising prices of commodities at home, or hurt of trade, or generally inconvenient. The said fourteen years to be accounted from the date of the first letters-patent, or grants of such hereafter to be made; but that the same shall be of such force as they should be if this act had not been made, and of none other." The act 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 83 was passed to amend the laws touching letters-patent for inventions, and to afford better protection to the patentees. The following are the provisions of this act:—Any person who, as grantee, assignee, or otherwise, has obtained, or shall obtain, letters-patent, may enter with the clerk of the patents of England, Scotland, or Ireland, having first obtained the leave of the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General in the case of an English patent; of the Lord Advocate or Solicitor-General of Scotland in the case of a Scotch patent; or of the Attorney or Solicitor-General for Ireland in the case of an Irish patent—certified by his fiat and signature—a disclaimer of any part of either the title of the invention or of the specification, stating the reason for such disclaimer; or he may, with the same leave, enter a memorandum of any alteration in the title or specification, provided it be not such a disclaimer or alteration as shall extend the exclusive right granted by the letters-patent. This disclaimer or memorandum of alteration being filed by the clerk of the patents, and enrolled with the specification, is held as part of the letters-patent or specification in all courts whatever.

The specification here mentioned means a description of the invention, which, in terms of an act of Queen Anne, must be given in and enrolled in Chancery. The construction of the words in specifications is very strict. The invention must be fully, fairly, and intelligibly described, and must exactly accord with the patent. The method and effect must be fully detailed, and nothing useful omitted, and the most advantageous mode must be stated. The terms employed are interpreted according to the acceptance of practical men at the time of the enrolment. In order to give time for preparing a proper specification, the application for a patent may be preceded by a caveat to prevent surprise; but this will not prevent disclosure, nor debar other inventors—the preference of the pretensions of competitors being determined on proof of their rights. The act provides, that any person may enter a caveat against a disclaimer or alteration, which gives the party entering it a right to have notice of the application being heard by the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General or Lord Advocate, respectively. No disclaimer or alteration can be received in evidence in any action or suit (except in proceedings by scire facies) pending at the time when such disclaimer or alteration was enrolled; but in such actions the original title and specification alone are received. The Attorney or Solicitor General or Lord Advocate may, before granting his fiat, require the party applying for it to advertise his disclaimer or alteration, as may seem right; and if such advertisement is required, the fiat must certify that it has been duly made. If in any suit it be proved or specially found by the verdict of a jury, that any person who has obtained letters-patent for an invention, or supposed invention, was not the first inventor of it, or of part of it, by reason of some other person having invented or used it, or some part of it, before the date of the letters-patent; or if the patentee or his assignees discover that some other person had, unknown to him, invented it, he, the patentee, or his assignees, may petition her Majesty in Council to confirm the letters-patent, or grant new letters-patent. The matter of this petition is heard before the judicial committee of the Privy Council; and this committee, upon examining the matter, and being satisfied that the patentee believed himself to be the first and original inventor, and that the invention, or part of it, had not been publicly and generally used before the date of the first letters-patent, may report to her Majesty their opinion that the prayer of the petition ought to be complied with, and her Majesty may, if she think fit, grant the prayer. The letters-patent are then available, in her and equity, to give to the petitioner the sole right of using, making, and vending the invention against all persons whatever. Any person opposing the petition is entitled to be heard before the committee; and any party to a former suit or action, touching the first letters-patent, is entitled to have notice of the petition before its being presented. If any action at law, or any suit in equity for an account, be brought for infringement of letters-patent, or any scire facias to repeal them, and if a verdict pass for the patentee or his assignees, or if a final decree or decretal order be made for him or them upon the merits of the suit, the judge before whom the action is tried may certify on the record, or the judge who makes the decree or order may give a certificate under his hand, that the validity of the patent came in question before him. And this record or certificate, given in evidence in any other suit or action touching the patent, entitles the patentee or his assignees, if a verdict pass or a decree be made in his or their favour, to treble costs, to be taxed at three times the taxed costs; unless the judge who tries the second or other action certify that treble costs ought not to be given. Application may be made for prolongation of the term of the patent. The provisions of the act upon this subject are, that if any person who has obtained letters-patent advertise in the London Gazette three times, and in three London papers, and three times in some country paper published in the town where, or near to which, he carried on the manufacture according to the specification, or in which he resides, if he carry on no manufacture, or published in the county, if there be none published in the town, that he intends to apply to her Majesty in Council for a prolongation of his exclusive privilege; and if he petition her Majesty to that effect, any person may enter a caveat at the Council Office. And if her Majesty refer the consideration of the petition to the judicial committee of the Privy Council, and notice be given to the persons entering caveats, the petitioner and persons entering caveats are heard by counsel and witnesses. The committee may then report to her Majesty that an extension of the term in the letters-patent should be granted; and her Majesty is authorized, if she think fit, to grant new letters-patent for a term not exceeding seven years after the expiry of the first term. No extension can be granted if the petition be not made and prosecuted with effect before the expiration of the term originally granted in the letters-patent. In any action brought for the infringement of letters-patent, the defendant, on pleading to the action, must give to the plaintiff, and in any scire facias to repeal letters-patent the plaintiff must file with his declaration, a notice of any objections on which he means to rely at the trial of the action; and no objection is allowed to be made in behalf of such defendant or plaintiff unless he prove the objections stated in the notice. But any judge at chambers may, on summons served by such defendant or plaintiff on his opponent to show cause why he should not be allowed to offer other objections, give leave to offer objections of which notice has not been given. In actions brought for infringement of a letter-patent, the costs of each part of the case are given according as either party has succeeded or failed therein, regard being had to the notice of objections, as well as the counts in the declaration, and without regard to the general result of the trial. If any person put upon goods made or sold by him, without a patent, the name or imitation of the name of a patentee for such goods, or the word "Patent," "Letters-Patent," or such like word, without leave in writing from the patentee or his assignees, he is liable for each offence to a penalty of fifty pounds, to be recovered in any of the Courts of Record at Westminster or in Ireland, or in the Court of Session in Scotland. One half of the penalty goes to the Crown, the other to the person who sues for it.

In the construction of these statutes, it has been found that the subject of a patent must be something vendible. A mere principle or method would not be sufficient; but if the patent were actually for a process or thing produced, it would not be a valid objection that the specification described it as a method. A new process of manufacture, to be carried on by known implements, or elements acting upon known substances, so as to produce some other known substance, may be a lawful subject of patent, provided it be in a cheaper, better, or more expeditious manner. The improvement of an old commodity or manufacture is a fair subject of patent, provided the old part be not described as new. A patent for an entire subject, in which an old is united with a new commodity, is bad, unless the combination be new, and productive of a new result. The improver of a machine under an existing patent cannot, without the consent of the patentee, use his invention till the expiration of the first patent. A discovery or invention imported may be the subject of a patent. But a patent for an invention truly made by the patentee will be good, although a model of a similar machine imported from abroad had been seen before the date of the patent, provided the machine itself have not previously been made and introduced into practice. The patentee may either grant license to certain individuals to use his right, or he may transfer his entire right by one deed of assignation, accompanying the transfer with delivery of the patent; and his creditors may compel him to raise money in this way for their payment. A patentee cannot transfer his right to more than five persons. In Bell's Illustrations, vol. i., § 1350, abstracts are given of several English decisions upon the subject of patents. See also Bell's Com. i. 109, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 1318; More's Notes on Stair, cxli. See Literary Property.

The law concerning letters-patent for inventions was amended by the acts 15 and 16 Vict. c. 83, 1852, and 16 and 17 Vict. c. 115, 1853.

Pater est quem Nuptiæ Demonstrant. See Filiation. Legitimacy.

Paterna paternis, Materna maternis. In the Roman law, where a person died leaving half-brothers, both consanguinean and uterine, a distinction was taken, as to his succession, between what he had derived from his father and what he had derived from his mother. The former went to his brothers-consanguinean, the latter to his brothers-uterine, on the maxim, Paterna paternis, materna maternis. And generally, the principle of the maxim applied to any competition between relations on the father's and mother's side. This rule has no place in the law of Scotland, where the half-blood uterine, and in general all the relations by the mother's side, are excluded from succeeding. Stair, B. iii. tit. 4, §§ 8, 34.

Paternity. See Filiation.

Patria; in old law language, an assize or inquest of countrymen, which is called recognitio patriæ. Skene, h. t. See Bona Patria.

Patria Potestas. A term used to express the singular power of Roman citizens over their offspring. An unemancipated son, possessing in every other relation the high privileges of a Roman citizen, was merely a part of his parent's property. By the laws of the twelve tables, the father had the power of life and death over his children. He could expose them when infants, and their legitimacy depended upon his acceptance of them. He could sell them, or resign them, instead of paying the damages which he had incurred through their fault. He and they were, in matters of private right, held as one person, and there could be neither obligation nor action between them. They could neither contract marriage nor do anything else of importance without his consent. But when he did permit his daughter's marriage, his paternal rights as to her were destroyed, and she became, equally with her own daughters, the filia familias of her husband. A son could acquire no property but with his father's consent; and even when such consent was granted, his acquisitions were called pe-

culum, the term applied to the portion of a slave. See Peculium. The patria potestas yielded to the son's official dignity, but revived when that ceased, extending even to grandchildren and great grandchildren, and ceasing only when extinguished by natural or civil death, or by the ceremony of emancipation. Emancipation was effected per æs et libram—i. e., by selling the son three times, in presence of a competent magistrate, to a pater fiduciarius, who was held bound, after the third sale, to re-sell him to his natural father, who then finally manumitted him, retaining the jus patronatus. Daughters and grandchildren, in their manumission, were sold only once, with the same formalities. But these troublesome ceremonies were gradually abolished; and under Justinian, a father could go before any competent magistrate, and with his son's consent declare him free. The despotic authority here described as exercised by Roman parents was not authorized by the later law. Several emperors had issued constitutions to restrain the cruelty with which fathers abused their trust. First the right of sale, and then the power of life and death were taken away; while that of moderate chastisement was reserved, and, in aggravated crimes committed by the son, the privilege of prescribing his punishment to the judge. L. 3, et ult. C. de pat. ; pot. L. un. C. de emend. propinqu. ; L. un. C. de his qui per. vel lib. occid. ; L. 11, D. de lib. et postum. In Scotland, authority so great has never been recognised; and the relations of parent and child are, directed by the light of nature, viewed through a milder medium. On this subject, see Stair, B. i. tit. 5; Maule v. Maule, 9th July 1823, appealed in 1825, especially Lord Eldon's speech; Wellesley, June 4, 1823. See also Parent and Child. Children. Foris-familiation. Aliment. Adoption. Arrogation.

Patriarch; was the title anciently given to the head of the Christian Church. Thus there was the Patriarch of Jerusalem, of Alexandria, of Antioch, of Rome, and of Constantinople, each of which had primates, archbishops, and bishops under him; though the title bishop was used to express even the patriarch himself. These patriarchs originally were all of equal authority, and continued to be so until the beginning of the seventh century, when, from several favourable incidents, the Patriarch of Rome was acknowledged by almost all the western parts of Christendom as the first and universal bishop of the Church, by the name of papa, or father, an appellation formerly common to all bishops. Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 2.

Patrimony of the Church. The patri-mony of the Church consisted of two branches: 1. Of the property of such lands as had been gifted or devised to the Church, which was called the temporality of benefices. 2. Of the tithes of lands, which got the name of the spirituality of benefices. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 4. See Teinds.

Patronage. A patron is one who enjoys, along with other rights of less importance, the right of presenting a parochial minister to a vacant charge. It would appear that patrons were originally merely the guardians of the temporal property of particular churches; and that the rights afterwards attached to patronage were at first conceded by the Church only to those who endowed particular churches, with a view to encourage the practice. Afterwards, however, similar rights, in reference to other churches, were assumed by persons of influence in the neighbourhood; and while the Roman Catholic religion prevailed, the Pope, and since the Reformation the Crown, have claimed to be considered patrons of all churches in regard to which no right of patronage could be shown by individuals. In addition to the right of presentation, the patron in former times had a pre-eminent seat and a burial-place in the church, and a right of precedency in processions; his name and arms were engraved on the church, bells, &c. He had also the disposal of the fruits of the benefice during a vacancy, and his consent was necessary to the validity of leases or feus by the incumbent. The vacant stipends now go to the Ministers' Widows' Fund. See Vacant Stipend. The statute 1567, c. 7, which abolished Popery and recognised the Reformed religion, reserved "the presentation of laick patronages," by "the just and auncient patrones." And, in still broader terms, the act 1592, c. 110, provided that the presbyteries, to whom all presentations were thereby appointed to be directed, "be bound and astricted to receive and admit quhatsumever qualified minister presented be his Majesty or laick patronis." The act immediately succeeding (c. 117) declared, in reference to benefices rendered vacant by the deposition of the incumbent, that if the presbytery refused a minister presented by the patron, the latter should be entitled to retain the fruits of the benefice. On the establishment of Episcopacy, the principle of these acts was adopted in the act 1612, c. 1, by which presentations were appointed to be directed to the bishop of the diocese; and it was provided that if the bishop should refuse to admit a qualified minister, still undeprived, it should be lawful or the patron to retain the fruits of the benefice; and that if no sufficient reason should be given for refusal, letters of horning should be issued, charging the ordinary (i. e. the bishop) to do his duty in receiving and admitting the presentee. Some time after the re-establishment of Presbytery, patronage was abolished by 1649, c. 23, which empowered presbyteries to settle ministers "on the sute and calling, or with the consent of the congregation, on whom none is to be obtruded against their will." At the Restoration, the act 1649 fell under the Rescissory Act. But patronage was again abolished by 1690, c. 23, and the right of election, for the approval of the congregation, given to the elders, with the heritors, or the magistrates in burghs. As compensation, patrons were to receive 600 merks (L.33, 6s. sterling); on receiving which they were bound to execute a deed of renunciation of the patronage. Only three parishes (Cadder, Old and New Monkland) had obtained effectual renunciations, when the right of patrons to present was again restored by 10 Anne, c. 12, which declared that it should be lawful to all patrons, who had not executed renunciations in terms of the former statute, to present as formerly, and that presbyteries should be bound to admit the qualified presentees as presentees ought to have been admitted before the passing of the act. This act is still in force; and at present, accordingly, the first step in the settlement of a parochial minister is the presentation by the patron. But the presentee must, before he acquires a right to the stipend and other emoluments of his office, be admitted to it according to the rules of the Church. The forms of admission and ordination by the presbytery, after trial and examination, are so far explained in the articles Minister; Admission.

Patronage is an heritable right. But it is naturally a jus incorporale, transferable by disposition without infeftment. It is, however, capable of being feudalized, after which it can be completely conveyed only by infeftment. The usual symbols are a psalm-book and the keys of the church. It was held that patronages were not included in the Act of Annexation 1587. Lords of Erection were held entitled to exercise a right of patronage, by presenting ministers to the several churches attached to the erected benefices. The Crown, as already said, has right to all patronages to which no title can be proved; and hence, in a question with the Crown, the failure of a subject to prove his title establishes the Crown's right. The jus coronæ is a title on which prescription may run. A Crown charter of resignation, containing patronages not previously belonging to the resigner, will not carry these patronages without a clause of novodamus. Titles to patronages, otherwise ineffectual, may be fortified by prescription. But, as in the case of other rights, the prescription will not carry more than is in the title; and it has been held that a grant of the patronages of a lordship, qualified with a declaration that it was not to be prejudicial to the Crown's right of presenting, which was reserved, was not a good title for acquiring patronage by prescription; King's Advocate, 18th May 1830, 8 S. & D. 765. Nor can a title to a right to present alternis vicibus only be a foundation for acquiring by prescription a right to the exclusive patronage; Brodie, July 1777, M. 9937. It is difficult to say precisely what is to be considered as possession of a patronage during the years of prescription; for the possession of the presentee being altogether independent of the patron, cannot be held as the patron's possession. It has been decided, by a majority of the whole Court, that one act of presentation, though followed by an incumbency of the presentee for more than forty years, is not possession which can bestow a prescriptive right; M'Donnell, Feb. 26, 1828, 6 S. & D. 600. But a majority of the judges inclined to the opinion that two acts of presentation were sufficient, if forty years had run from the date of the first, although forty years had not intervened between the two. One judge, however, held that there must be two acts of presentation, the one at or after the interval of forty years from the other. A right of patronage cannot be lost by mere neglect to exercise it. There must be contrary positive prescription. Where two or more parishes, having separate patrons, are united, the commissioners are authorized, by 1617, c. 3, to appoint the right of presenting to be exercised per vices. Even in cases where the rights of the patrons are not regulated by the commissioners, the rule of the statute takes effect. It was first decided that when there were different patrons of the united parishes at the date of the union, the presentation belongs to the patrons per vices, whatever be the inequality in extent of the respective parishes. And in a recent case where two benefices, A. and B., the latter of small value, belonging to the same individual, but held by separate feudal titles flowing from different authors under different superiors, and with different destinations, were united by decree of the Commission 1617, without any mention of the right of presentation—it being thereby declared that B. should be united and annexed to A., as a “part and pendicle of that parish”—and where the proprietor subsequently disposed the two patronages to different disponees, in terms of the titles as they existed before the union, it was held that the disponee to the patronage of A. had not the exclusive right of presentation to the united parish, and that the

disponsee to the patronage of B. had an equal vice therein; Earl of Hopetoun, March 11, 1835, 13 S. & D. 685. The patron of the larger benefice is entitled to the first vice after the union. The Crown, when one of the patrons, is entitled to the first vice. Erskine lays it down, that in the case of heir-portioners, a patronage is not a præcipuum falling to the eldest, but that all in turn are entitled to present, according to seniority; and that other joint patrons would have right to present per vices, and not jointly on each vacancy; Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 1; B. iii. tit. 8, § 13. Where, however, a patronage is conveyed to a class of persons, as the heritors of a parish, each individual has a vote, and the election is determined by the majority. If a new parish be formed out of parts of other parishes, the patrons of these will have right to present per vices to the new parish, without regard to the extent obtained from the several parishes. If a second charge be founded and endowed without reserving the right of patronage, it will belong to the patron, unless he be excluded by immemorial usage in presenting on the part of the founders of the second charge. According to Erskine, the reservation of the right of patronage would be effectual in such a case; Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 15. But it seems to have been considered ineffectual in the case of Cunningham, Feb. 26, 1762, M. 9933. A right of patronage may be made the subject of a liferent provision, by way of locality to a widow, and she will have right to present during her life. The magistrates of a royal burgh cannot alienate the patronage of a church within burgh. Where a patronage is given to one in liferent, and another in fee, the liferenter is entitled to present. Where, however (as may be validly done), the patronage is conveyed to the heritors of a parish, fiars only are understood to be meant. A presentation by a married woman must have the concurrence of her husband. A tutor may present to the churches of which his pupil is patron; and minors may present—their curators, if they have any, giving their consent. A patron cannot present himself to the benefice. For other questions relative to the exercise of patronage, see the article Presentation. The exercise of the right of patronage may sometimes give rise to questions of right; and it may be difficult to determine whether the civil or ecclesiastical courts have jurisdiction in these questions. The judgment of the church courts is absolute in determining the fitness of the presentee for the pastoral office; but the Court of Session has the primary and exclusive jurisdiction in questions relative to the validity of the presentation. Although, however, a presbytery should erroneously reject a valid presentation, or refuse to settle a presentee on grounds not cognisable by them, they cannot be compelled to settle him by civil diligence, which the act 1612, c. 1, empowered a patron to employ against a bishop who refused to collate a qualified presentee. An action of damages, however, will lie against the presbytery; Earl of Kinnoull v. Fergusson, March 5, 1841, 3 D. 778. See *Ersk. Pawnbrokers. A pawnbroker, in the statutory meaning of the word, is one who lends money on pledge, at a higher profit or rate of interest than five per cent. The previous acts upon this subject were consolidated and superseded by 39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 99.

Every taker of pawns must place over his door his name, and the word "Pawnbroker." A pawnbroker must not take pawns on Sunday, Good Friday, Christmas-day, or any fast or thanksgiving appointed by the Queen. He must not buy goods before eight o'clock in the morning, or after seven in the evening, at any time throughout the year. He must not take goods in pawn or exchange, unless between eight o'clock forenoon and eight o'clock afternoon from Michaelmas (September 29) to Lady-day (March 25), or between seven o'clock forenoon and nine o'clock afternoon throughout the rest of the year; the time being, however, extended till eleven o'clock in the evening of all Saturdays and days preceding fasts, on which the taking of pawns is forbidden. A pawnbroker must not employ, as a taker of pawns, any person under sixteen years of age; nor take a pawn from a person under twelve years of age; nor from one who is intoxicated. He must not take in pawn, exchange or purchase, a note of another pawnbroker; nor goods of manufacture in an unfinished state. The act 24 Geo. II. c. 40 provides that a retailer of spirits, receiving a pawn for their price, must re-deliver the article pledged. The pawnbroker must enter in his books the description of each pawn, the number, the date, the pawner's name, the street and number of his residence, with the letter L. for a lodger, or H. for a housekeeper, and the name and residence of the owner of the pawn, as stated by the pawner. On loans not exceeding 5s., this entry may be made within four hours after pawning; but on loans exceeding 5s. it must be made before lending. Pawns for loans above 10s. must be entered in a separate book by themselves; and the entries of such pawns must be numbered seriatim from the beginning of each month. At pawning, the pawnbroker must give, and the pawner receive a note, bearing the description of the pawn, and the name and residence of the pawnbroker—the pawnbroker charging for this note, on a loan under 5s. nothing; under 10s., $\frac{1}{4}$ d.; under 20s., 1d.; under L.5, 2d.; above L.5, 4d. A table of the prices of the notes must be placed conspicuously in the pawnbroker's shop.

The pawner has a right to redeem the thing pledged, which lasts for a year from the pawning. The time is prolonged for three months more, if notice not to sell be given, before or at the end of the year, to the pawnbroker in writing, delivered to him or left at his residence, or verbally, in presence of one witness. The pawnbroker is not bound to re-deliver the pawn without production of the note given at pawning. The producer of this note is entitled to redeem the pawn, unless the pawnbroker has received notice from the true owner, or information from other quarters, that the pawn was stolen, or is suspected to have been so. If the note given at pawning has been lost, or if a new person alleges himself to be the true owner of the pawn, the pawnbroker must give to the party demanding it a second note, being a copy of the first, and a form of an affidavit of the facts stated, receiving for those, in case of a loan under 5s., $\frac{1}{4}$ d.; under 10s., 1d.; above 10s., at the same rate as for the original note. Then the applicant, upon proving his right before a justice of peace of the place of pawning, and swearing to the affidavit, which is certified thereon by the justice, is entitled to redeem the pawn. The act 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 62, relative to oaths, provides, that declarations be substituted for oaths and affidavits required in matters connected with pawnbrokers, and that the penalties and other enactments as to such oaths, be extended to the declarations. Pawnbrokers' legal profits, in full of interest and warehouse-room, are, per calendar month, on sums not exceeding 2s. 6d., $\frac{1}{4}$ d.; not exceeding 40s., 4d. per L.1; not exceeding 42s., 8d. in all; not exceeding L.10, 3d. per L.1. These rates of profits must appear in the pawnbroker's table. On redemption of a pawn, the amount of profits drawn by the pawnbroker must be endorsed by him upon the duplicate, which he must keep by him for the next year. If the owner, wishing to redeem a pledge for not more than L.10, tenders the loan and profits within a year; or three months further, where notice has been given; and the pawnbroker, without just cause, refuses to re-deliver the pawn, the party may apply to a justice of the peace where the pawnbroker resides, who, on oath (declaration) to the facts alleged, and on production of the note, must bring the pawnbroker before him, and examine on oath (declaration) parties and such credible witnesses as appear. On proof of the offer of payment, or on tender and refusal of it in presence of the justice, he must order the pledge to be restored, and in default of delivery or satisfaction, must commit the pawnbroker to the house of correction or prison, till he obtemper the order. A justice finding it proved that a pawn has been sold too soon, or improperly, or embezzled, lost or injured, through the pawnbroker's fault, must award a proper satisfaction, to be allowed or paid by the pawnbroker.

Forfeited pawns—that is, pledges not redeemed within a year, or, when notice has been given, within the three additional months—may be sold. Pawns for sums between 10s. and £10 must be sold by public auction. The salesman must exhibit them, and publish, with the pawnbroker's name and abode, catalogues, in which each article must be entered separately, with the month of pawning, and the number registered in the pawn-book. The sale, and the pawnbroker's name and residence, and the month of pawning, must be advertised, on two days, in a newspaper, not less than two days before the sale. Books, prints, pictures, statues and other similar articles specified in the act, must be sold apart on the first Mondays of January, April, July, and October, and the following days, if not all disposed of. They must be previously exposed to view, catalogues of them published, and the sale and pawnbroker's name advertised on two days, in a newspaper, three days before the sale. An account of all sales of pawns on which more than 10s. has been lent must be entered by the pawnbroker in a book, with the date of pawning, the pawner's name, the date of sale, the price, and the auctioneer's name and abode. The pawner is entitled to have access to this entry on payment of a penny. The surplus of the price beyond the loan, profits and expense, must be paid to the pawner or other person entitled to it, if demanded within three years. A pawnbroker must not buy pawns in his hand, except at public auction, nor allow pawns to be redeemed that he may buy them, nor make any bargain for their purchase till a year after pawning. Any person pawning goods without the owner's consent may be apprehended by warrant of a justice of the peace, and tried summarily before him. If the owner of goods unlawfully pawned or exchanged, by his own or one witness's oath (or declaration), and production of probable grounds of suspicion, satisfy a justice of the bounds that there is reason to suspect a person within his jurisdiction of having received the goods in pawn or in exchange, the justice may grant warrant to search the premises of the suspected party during the hours of business, and to break open doors if refused admittance. Such goods being found on search, and the claimant's right being established before any justice, by confession of the party charged, or by oath (or affirmation) of one witness, the justice must restore them to the owner. If any person offering to sell, exchange, or pawn goods, cannot give a good account of himself, or of the way in which he obtained them, or if he wilfully give the pawnbroker false information as to his property in the goods, or as to his own or the proprietor's residence, or if there be other grounds of suspicion of the goods having been legally obtained, or if any one, not being entitled, attempt to redeem goods, the person to whom the goods are offered, or who holds them in pawn, may detain the party and goods, and deliver them immediately to a peace-officer, to be carried before a justice of the bounds, who, on seeing grounds of suspicion, may commit the person for a reasonable time for inquiry. And whenever he is satisfied of the person's guilt, he must commit him to the jail of the place, to be dealt with according to law, when the offence is of a higher sort, or else penally for any time within certain limits. If any one make or knowingly utter a counterfeit note of a pawnbroker, the person to whom it is offered may detain him, and have him carried by a constable before a justice, who may try him summarily. Provision is made for penalties on account of offences and contravention of the act, and directions are given for the conducting of prosecutions. For these, reference is made to the act itself. In interpretation of this statute, it appears to have been held, that it was intended to enable poor persons to obtain advances not exceeding £10 on any single pledge; Ross v. Equitable Loan Company, Dec. 23, 1826, 5 S. & D. 192. In this case, advances had been made by the company on security of large assortments of haberdashery goods transmitted to them; and although the amount lent was divided into numerous sums of £10 each, with corresponding tickets, to bring the transaction under the Pawnbrokers' Act, yet several of these tickets were frequently given on one unbroken piece of cloth or single package, so that £40 or £50, or even, in some instances, £150 and upwards, were advanced on a single unbroken package. The company having intimated an intention to sell the goods in virtue of the Pawnbrokers'

Act, the trustee on the pawner's bankrupt estate presented a bill of suspension and interdict against the sale, which was passed by the Court. See Tail's Justice, voce Pledge; Blair's Justice, voce Pawn; McGlashan's Digest of the Law of Pawnbroking. See also the General Burgh Police Act for Scotland, 13 and 14 Vict. c. 33.

Payee; the person in whose favour a bill of exchange or a draft is drawn. See Bill of Exchange.

Payment. A creditor is entitled to demand full payment of his debt at once, and cannot be compelled to accept of partial payments, unless, by the original obligation, it has been made payable in parts; for in that case, there are held to be as many obligations as there are terms of payment. By the same rule, a creditor in two or more separate debts cannot refuse to accept payment of any of them, though the debtor should not offer to pay the others, or although he should not pay even the interest then due on the others. See Partial Payment.

Indefinite Payment.—Where there are several debts due, and an indefinite payment is made by the debtor, without specifying to account of which debt he wishes the payment to be applied, the payment is applied according to certain equitable rules which show an equal regard to the interests of the debtor and to those of the creditor; the creditor's interest, however, being chiefly regarded. For these rules, see Indefinite Payment, and authorities there cited.

Payment bona fide.—Where payment has been made bona fide, though to a person not entitled to receive it, the payment may nevertheless be effectual. Where, for example, a payment is made to a person who was formerly factor for the creditor, but whose factory has been withdrawn, without intimation to the debtor; in that case, the debtor who pays bona fide—that is, without having reason to suspect, and without knowledge of the factory having been withdrawn—pays with safety; and the discharge of the person who was formerly factor will be to him an effectual discharge. Bona fides ceases from the time that citation is given by those having an interest in the debt. Payment made to one who never possessed a power of receiving or discharging the debt is not accounted a bona fide payment. Thus, a payment to a messenger-at-arms entrusted with the execution of diligence will not discharge the debt, unless the money is accounted for by the messenger to his employer; for a messenger is not authorized, qua messenger, to do more than merely to execute the diligence. His employer, indeed, may expressly authorize him to receive and discharge the debt; but otherwise his discharge will not be effectual against his employer; and as the debtor is presumed to know this legal doctrine, such a payment to a messenger, not specially authorized to discharge the debt, is not accounted a bona fide payment. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 3; Stair, B. i. tit. 18, § 3; B. iv. tit. 40, § 33; More's Notes, p. cxxiv.; Bank. vol. i. p. 486; iii. 82; Bell's Com. ii. 45; Kames' Principles of Equity (1825), 405; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 732-3; Thomson on Bills, 402.

Collusive Payment.—Rent is payable either at the legal terms of Whitsunday and Martinmas, or at such conventional terms as the parties may have fixed; and where a tenant anticipates the term of payment, and pays his rent beforehand to his landlord, such payment will be accounted collusive, in a question with the creditors of the landlord, who may have arrested before the term of payment, although posterior to the actual payment by the tenant. Hence the tenant will be obliged to pay over again to the arresters. The same happens in the payment of feu-duties; but in common debts, the debtor may safely pay even before the term of payment. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 4; Bell's Com. ii. 219.

Presumed Payment.—The payment of a debt is presumed to have been made wherever the voucher is found in the hands of the proper debtor, or of a cautioner. This holds not in bonds and bills only, but even an heritable bond with sasine, found in the hands of the debtor, will infer payment, unless it can be proved that the voucher of debt came into the hands of the debtor in some other way than on payment. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 5; More's Notes on Stair, pp. cxxiii-v.; Bell's Principles, § 566; Illust. ib.; Thomson on Bills, 400, 625; Blair's Justice, 205. See Chirographum apud debitorem repertum.

Payment by a Third Party.—Payment of a debt by a third party is presumed in dubio to have been made with the proper money of the debtor. Thus, if a discharge or receipt bear the money to have been paid by A. in name of B., the proper debtor, the presumption is, that the money was B.'s, and that A. was merely interposed to make the payment. In an obligation where several are bound, and payment is made, and the money said to have been received from one of the obligants: should that obligant afterwards cancel the ground of debt, the presumption is, that he was the principal debtor from the beginning, or that he had actually received their shares from the other obligants. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 6.

Proof of Payment.—It is a general and established rule, that payment of a debt constituted by writing cannot be proved by witnesses. Where, however, the written obligation binds the party to the performance of special facts, the performance of those facts may be proved by witnesses to the effect of discharging the obligation. Where the debt is not constituted by writing, payment to the extent of L.100 Scots (L.8s. 8d.) may be proved by witnesses. *Ersk. Peculium; in Roman law, was that property which a slave or a filius familias could acquire with his master's or father's consent. A son's peculium was of four kinds: castrense, acquired in war; quasi castrense, acquired in the exercise of public duty, or of some of the liberal arts; adventitium, derived from a stranger; or profectitium, derived from his father. The law as to the property of the peculium varied, according as it was of one or other of these kinds; Stair, B. i. tit. 5, § 11. Professor Bell uses the word peculium for the fund which, in addition to paraphernalia, is, by custom or special gift, appropriated to the wife, such as the "lady's gown," a sum secured by antenuptial contract, or derived from a stranger, or with regard to which the husband has renounced his jus mariti. Bell's Princ. § 1560; Illust. ib.

Pede Pulverosus; a "vagabond, especially a merchant or cremar who has no certain dwelling-place where the dust may be dight from his feet, to whom justice should be summarily ministered within three flowings and ebblings of the sea." Skene, h. t. See Dusty-foot. Piepowder.

Pedellus; according to Skene, the serjeant or beadle of the burgh, who should execute summonses, make attachment, or take poulds. Skene, h. t.

Peer. A peer is an equal; and hence all commoners, or those who are under the rank of nobility, are said to be peers of each other, being subject to the common tribunals and ordinary jurisdiction of the kingdom. But peers of Parliament or of the realm are the nobility of the kingdom, and constitute a branch of the Legislature. It would appear that originally the right of peerage was territorial, but it has gradually become personal. Peers are now created either by writ or by patent; a writ or patent being presumed in the case of those who claim by prescription. The creation by writ, or the Queen's letter, is a summons to attend the House of Peers, by the style and title of that barony which the Queen is pleased to confer. The creation by patent is a royal grant to a subject of any dignity and degree of peerage. Peers are possessed of certain important privileges, among which is that of being judges of each other, and being exempt from the common and ordinary jurisdiction. By the Treaty of Union, art. 23, it is declared that the sixteen peers of Scotland, entitled to sit in the House of Lords, shall have all the privileges of Parliament enjoyed by the British peers, and particularly the right of sitting upon the trial of peers; and that all peers of Scotland, whether representative or not, shall be tried as peers of Great Britain, and shall enjoy all privileges as peers as fully as the British peers, except the right of sitting in the House of Lords, and the privileges depending thereon. The trial of a peer proceeds before the peers assembled in the Court of the Lord High Steward of Britain; towards a trial before which tribunal a true bill must be found by a jury of twelve men, who may be commoners, before a special commission issued for that purpose; 6 Anne, c. 23. This matter, in relation to the peers of Scotland, is now regulated by 6 Geo. IV. c. 66, which enacts that the crimes on account of which such a commission may issue are—all treasons, misprisions of treasons, murders, and other crimes which infer a capital punishment by the law of Scotland; and all felonies and other crimes for which, if committed in England, a peer of the United Kingdom would be tried by his peers. And the statute declares it unlawful for the Court of Justiciary, or any other court in Scotland, to take cognizance of any of the aforesaid crimes when committed by a peer. The law concerning the election of the sixteen peers of Scotland is given at length in the article Election Law. By the statute 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 63, the peers of Scotland are enabled to take and subscribe in Ireland the oaths required for qualifying them to vote in any election of the peers of Scotland. See Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Alison's Prac. 14.

Pejorations; deteriorations; used sometimes, though rarely, in contradistinction to meliorations. In one case the term was characterised in the House of Lords as a convenient one. See Graham v. Jolly, House of Lords, 29th June 1831.

Penal Actions. An action is said to be penal when the conclusions of the summons are of a penal nature; that is, when not merely restitution and real damages, but extraordinary damages and reparation, by way of penalty, are concluded for. In such actions, whether they be of a quasi criminal character, and requiring the concurrence of the public prosecutor, or conclude for payment of heavy pecuniary penalties, great accuracy and precision are required in the summons or complaint. The time and place where the offence was committed must be distinctly libelled, and the persons against whom the charge is made must be clearly pointed out. Indeed, it has been said that, in respect to the precision required, there is little or no distinction between such a summons or complaint, and an indictment in the criminal court. Actions in which the pursuer insists barely for an indemnification of real loss are transmitted against heirs; but actions in which some demand is made by way of penalty die with the delinquent or transgressor, on the maxim, Actio pœnalis in hæredem non datur, nisi ex damno locupletior hæres factus sit. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 15; B. iv. tit. 1, § 14; Bank. vol. iii. p. 67.

Penal Bond. In England, bonds bear to be granted for double the actual debt, on the condition that, if the actual debt be paid, the bond shall be held as discharged. Such bonds are called penal bonds. An adjudication may proceed on an English penal bond without any previous decree of constitution; Bell's Com. i. 740. The form of a summons for payment of such a bond is given in Jurid. Styles, iii. 25.

Penal Irritancies. Irritancies were formerly strictly interpreted. Hence, the Act of Sederunt, Nov. 27, 1592, declared that irritancies were to be explained according to their express words and meaning; and although the act 1661, c. 62, in consideration of the political confusions which had preceded the passing of the act, allows proprietors to redeem wadsets within five years, yet in the statute it is assumed that the penal irritancies which those wadsets may contain are lawful; and, according to our ancient practice, the offer of payment before decree of declarator, in an action of declarator of irritancy, was not competent after the irritancy had been incurred. A distinction, however, is now made between irritancies penal and not penal. Where the irritancy is not penal, as in the irritancy of a sale for a just price, provided payment be not made at a certain term, the condition receives full effect even without declarator. But wherever it is of a penal nature, as in a redeemable right for a sum less than the value of the subject, the Court will soften the rigour of the condition, and allow the reverser a power of redemption, even after the time allowed by the deed; and at any time before declarator, provided the long prescription of forty years has not run after the term of redemption, for, by the lapse of that time, the power to redeem is cut off by the negative prescription. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 8, § 14, and tit. 5, § 25.

Penal Statutes; are strictly interpreted—that is, they are not extended against the offender. Where a thing is prohibited by statute under a penalty, if the penalty, or part of it, be not given to him who sues for it, it goes to the Crown. See Ersk. B. i. tit. 1, § 55; Tomlins' Dict. voce Penal Laws; King's Advocate, 18th March and 23d Dec. 1793, Mor. 4900. As to the limitation of penal statutes, see Prescription of Crimes.

Penalties. Where an obligant fails to perform any act to which he has become bound, he will be liable in damages to the person who suffers by his breach of agreement. But in estimating this damage, where there has been no fraud, consequential or indirect damage is not taken into account. Thus, the failure to pay money at a stipulated time may occasion indirect damage to the creditor, but is not a damage which the law can estimate; and therefore the creditor's demand is limited to the principal sum with interest, and the expenses to which the creditor has been put. In order to cover the damage which may be sustained by failure in performance, penalties are usually adjoined to obligations. Where the penalty relates to the payment of money, it is fixed at a fifth part of the principal sum—probably because this is the extent of the statutory penalty in appraisings and adjudications; but this fifth part is never enforced beyond the amount of the expenses actually incurred by the creditor in endeavouring to recover payment. When, therefore, the debtor offers the principal sum, interest, and the expense of diligence, no more can be demanded out of the penalty. Even where an action has been raised, and decree obtained, the expense of that process cannot be demanded out of the penalty, unless expenses have been awarded by the decree. Where a penalty is annexed to the performance of a fact, it is to be considered more in the nature of a conventional liquidation of the damages, in order to avoid a question in regard to the extent of the damage, than as of the nature of a penalty adjoined to a money obligation. Hence, where a tenant becomes bound to pay a year's rent in case he does not enter, or a certain rent per acre in case he shall labour the ground in a certain way, these are considered as the equivalents to which, ex contractu, the landlord, generally speaking, will be entitled without modification. In one case a tenant had bound himself to pay L.4 of covenanted additional rent for each acre laboured contrary to a certain rotation of crops; and having deviated, the Court held that such a covenant, being of the nature of estimated damage or additional rent, they had no equitable power to interpose; even although the tenant offered to prove that the deviation was necessary, and had been occasioned by the accidental failure of a field of grass, from its having been sown with bad seed, which compelled him partially to change the rotation; Frazer v. Ewart, Feb. 25, 1813, F. C. See also Hunter v. Broadwood, Feb. 2, 1854, 16 D. 441. But although the penalty may in this way be considered as the liquidated damage, still the obligant may be compelled, notwithstanding, to perform his obligation; for he is not entitled to pay the penalty and be free. In general, obligations of this kind bear that the penalty is to be exigible "over and above," or "by and attour performance;" but even without these expressions, the performance of the fact may be enforced by diligence. From this, however, there is an exception, as where a person becomes bound that another shall perform an act under a penalty; for here, as the obligant cannot perform the act himself, the conventional penalty, as to him, must free him from farther diligence. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 86; Bell on Leases, i. 253; Bell's Com. i. 654; Stair, B. i. tit. 10, § 14; B. iii. tit. 2, §§ 32 and 54; B. iv. tit. 3, § 2; tit. 18, § 3; More's Notes, p. lxxi.; Bank. vol. i. p. 473; Bell's Princ. § 34; Illust. ib.; Kames' Princ. of Equity, (1825); *Kames' Stat. Penance; an ecclesiastical punishment, by which a penitent gives satisfaction to the church for the scandal he has occasioned by his ill example. The judicatories of the Church of Scotland judge of and punish gross immorality, heresy, and schism, but with a degree of temper and moderation suited to the state of society in this country, and better calculated than a more rigid exercise of ecclesiastical discipline would be to attain the end in view. When penance is inflicted, it is done by applying the lesser excommunication; which excludes the offender from the ordinances of the church; and time and opportunity are given for reconciliation. It is only in the case of more hardened offenders, and where the offence is of a nature which cannot be overlooked, that the greater excommunication is used. See Excommunication.

Pendente Lite Nihil Innovandum. This maxim of the Roman law is adopted generally in the law of Scotland, and, according to Erskine, has been applied to the case where rights are rendered litigious by an action of ranking and sale for behoof of creditors. According to this rule, no diligence carried on or perfected while the action of sale is pending, and intended to create a new preference to the user, in competition with the other creditors, ought to receive effect. But, in practice, this rule has been disregarded; and Erskine's doctrine, stated as referable to the maxim Pendente lite nihil innovandum, seems to be properly referable to the principle, that wherever the process can be regarded as a general measure, it ought to supersede the diligence of individual creditors. This doctrine is so established by the Bankrupt Statute. See Bell's Com. ii. 155; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 65.

Pension; is defined by Skene to be, a duty, such as an annual rent. Skene, h. t.

Pension; an annual allowance paid for a person's maintenance at the will of another. It is criminal to receive a pension from a foreign prince or state without leave of our Sovereign. No person having any pension from the Crown is capable of being elected member of Parliament, or of sitting or of voting, and a penalty of L.500 is imposed upon pensioners who sit or vote; 6 Ann., c. 7, § 25-29; 1 Geo. I., stat. 2, c. 56. But Chelsea and Greenwich pensioners may vote, and out-pensioners are embodied under the statutes 6 and 7 Vict. c. 95, 1843; 9 and 10 Vict. c. 9, 1846; and 11 and 12 Vict. c. 84, 1848. Pensions from the Sovereign are held as alimentary, although they do not expressly bear a declaration to that effect. It has been repeatedly decided, that a pension granted for services done and to be done is good, although the pensioner should, from circumstances, find it impossible to perform these services for the future. Stair, B. ii. tit. 5, § 16; B. iii. tit. 1, § 37; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 6, § 7; Bank. i. p. 654; ii. 14; Bell's Com. i. 130; Jurid. Styles, ii. 283, 306; Kames' Stat. Law, h. t. See Annuiti.

Penuria Testium. The disqualifications formerly attaching to witnesses, and especially that of relationship, were sometimes disregarded in occult or private facts, where there must, from the nature of the case, be a scarcity of unexceptionable witnesses; but such witnesses were examined cum nota—i.e., reserving consideration of their credibility. It was not enough in this sense, to constitute a penuria testium, to prove that the other evidence was scanty and defective; it must farther have been shown that the penuria was necessarily occasioned by the very nature of the question at issue. Tait on Evidence, 373; Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 92. See Evidence, Domestic Crimes.

Perambulation. Actions upon brieves of perambulation were authorized by the act

1597, c. 79, and were intended to settle the line of march between conterminous properties. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 48; Stair, B. iv. tit. 3, § 14; tit. 28, § 3; Bank. i. 281; Bell's Princ. § 2241; Kames' Stat. Law, h. t.; Jurid. Styles, i. 419.

Periculum; risk. The general rule with regard to risk is, that a subject perishes to its dominus, or to him who has the right of property in it,—Res perit domino. But this rule is frequently modified by the introduction of certain opposite principles; by the rules of particular contracts, and by the effect of culpa or fault in subjecting those to the risk of loss who would not otherwise be liable. The most important exception occurs in the case of a subject sold, but not delivered. The rule of the law of Scotland, adopted from the Roman law, is, that property is not transferred without delivery—Traditionibus dominia rerum transferuntur. Before delivery, the buyer has merely a jus ad rem: he is creditor for the delivery of the thing sold. See Jus ad Rem; Jus Crediti. And yet, if the subject perish undelivered, it perishes to the buyer,—Periculum rei venditæ, nondum traditæ, est emptoris. If the buyer has paid the price, he is not entitled to repetition; if he has not paid it, the seller may sue him for payment. The principle of this rule is, that by completion of the contract of sale, the obligation of each party to implement the bargain is perfected. The seller is bound to deliver the thing sold, the buyer to pay the price; and although the seller's obligation falls in consequence of the extinction of the subject of it, the buyer's still subsists. The rule may also be referred to the maxim, Ejus est periculum, cujus est commodum; since the buyer has the benefit of the accessions, fruits and profits of the subject, from the moment in which the contract is completed. When a commodity is sold as a fungible, not as a corpus—that is, when a certain quantity, by number, weight or measure, has been sold, and is not yet delivered—the loss falls upon the seller, since the buyer did not purchase any specific subject. Thus, when a proprietor sells so many bolls of his farm-grain, of a particular crop, without specifying any particular parcel, and a loss of that year's grain happens, the purchaser is not bound to suffer any part of the loss, as he did not purchase any precise part of the farm-grain. In conditional sales, the rule of the Roman law was, that if the subject perished pendente conditione, it perished to the vendor; but if it was merely deteriorated, without the fault of the vendor, the loss fell upon the vendee.

In alternative sales, if one of two subjects sold perish before the choice has been made, it perishes to the seller; because the remaining subject continues in obligatione, and demandable by the vendee; but if both perish, the loss falls on the buyer. When the seller has been in mora in making delivery, the loss falls upon him. See Mora. A subject likewise perishes to the seller which is lost through his fault, or by his neglecting the obligation under which he lies to attend to the buyer's interest, by taking care of the subject until it is delivered. Where the buyer gives directions for the transmission of the goods, if these directions be not followed, the loss falls upon the seller; Harle, 24th Jan. 1749, Mor. 10,095. If the buyer orders the goods to be sent by a certain mode of conveyance, and they are sent accordingly, it would appear that the seller is freed from the risk. When no particular carrier or ship is named by the buyer, delivery by the seller to any carrier or wharfinger, on account of the buyer, is the same as delivery to the buyer himself, to the effect of freeing the seller from further responsibility for care of the goods; provided he procures them to be delivered to the carrier or wharfinger in the proper and usual manner, and with the usual precautions to ensure the safety of the goods, and the claim of the buyer against the party entrusted with them. It has been held that it is no part of the seller's duty to ascertain the seaworthiness of the ship in which the goods are to be sent, and that he is not responsible for a loss occasioned by the defects of the ship. It is the duty of the seller to give timely notice to the buyer of the shipment of goods sent by sea, in order that he may know when the goods are likely to arrive, and that he may be enabled to insure them; but this rule is subject to certain limitations. The loss of an undelivered subject falls upon the seller, if it perish from a vice of such a nature that the seller would have been liable under his obligation of warranty had the subject perished from the same cause after delivery. Where the seller expressly takes the risk upon himself, or binds himself to deliver the thing sold at a certain place, his engagement makes him liable for the loss before such delivery. The modifications of the rule, that the risk is with the owner, arising from the obligation to a reparation of loss occasioned by fault or carelessness, and from the peculiar doctrines of certain contracts, such as affreightment and carriage by land, are noticed in other articles. See Nautæ, Cauzones. Innkeepers. Public Carriages. Damages. Culpa. Mora. See generally, on the subject of risk, Stair, B. i. tit. 11, § 2; tit. 14, § 7; More's Notes, lxxii.—vii.

Perjury; is the judicial affirmation of a falsehood upon oath. The essence of the crime consists in affirming a plain and obvious falsehood; for, where the oath can in any reasonable way be reconciled with truth, or an innocent intention, there is no perjury. Neither must there be any doubt about the true state of the fact, or the sense in which the panel's words are to be understood; and where it is possible to account for what may have the appearance of a falsehood, on the ground of its being an omission, that will save the panel. To constitute the crime of perjury, the person must have sworn absolutely, and not to the best of his recollection, where the matters are not recent, or of a nature not to call for his particular attention; for, where the matters are recent, or of a nature to which his attention may be supposed to have been specially directed, he will not be allowed to screen himself under the pretext that he had forgotten. The falsehood must be wilfully affirmed by one who knows the truth, and who, for some corrupt purpose, resolves to conceal it. Hence, there can be no prosecution for perjury where the oath is pure matter of opinion and belief, as in the oath of calumny, where his own prejudices may lead the deponent to view the cause in a different light from that in which it will be viewed by any other person. Of the same kind is the oath in lawburrows, where the complainer expresses his apprehensions of danger; which fears may have been genuine in him, though entirely chimerical. The oath, to found the charge of perjury, must be material to the point at issue, in the question where it is given; for where the falsehood extends only to trifling particulars, it will be attributed to inadvertency or oversight, rather than to that dolo, or corrupt intention, which is the essence of this crime. The falsehood must have been affirmed on oath, in contempt of that high adjuration which the witness makes. The most formal written declaration is therefore no ground of prosecution as perjury. To this, however, the word of honour of a peer is an exception; and all affirmations allowed under the statutes are held identical with oaths. It is farther necessary that the oath should be given before a magistrate or other person empowered by law to administer an oath; because, without that, an oath has neither those consequences, in point of interest, to the man himself, nor that prejudice to his neighbour, which are the proofs of that malice which is principally the object of punishment. Neither can falsehood contained in a voluntary affidavit given before a magistrate be the ground of prosecution for perjury. Not only must the oath be taken before a person entitled to administer it, but it must have been given in the due and accustomed form, in the department of business to which it relates; for example, it must have been read over, approved of, and signed, when the person can write. In short, all the requisite forms must have been observed. The crime of perjury may be committed by a party on a reference to oath, as well as by a witness in a cause. The same may happen in taking the oath of bribery, or of trust and possession—the oath to obtain the benefit of the act of grace—a suspender's oath at passing a bill on juratory caution—at obtaining the benefit of the cessio bonorum—or a discharge of debts under the Bankrupt Statute. The evidence of the terms of the oath ought to be the written oath, signed by the panel, or certified by the judge; and where the oath has not been taken down in writing, as in Justiciary trials and trials before the Court of Exchequer, and in jury causes, the terms of the depositions must be established by respectable and intelligent witnesses. The evidence of the falsehood may be by parole proof, or by writing; but it is not enough that the fact actually was contrary to what has been sworn to by the panel; it must further be proved, or sufficiently inferred from circumstances, that the panel actually knew, at the time he was delivering his oath, that the fact was inconsistent with what he was swearing. The punishment of perjury has been directed by statute, the last of which, 1555, c. 47, declares perjury to be punishable by confiscation of moveables, by piercing the tongue, and infamy; to which the judge, in aggravated cases, may add any other penalty that the case seems to require. No person convicted of wilful or corrupt perjury, or subornation of perjury after conviction, is capable of voting in the election of a member of Parliament. But the incapacity does not apply, unless action be commenced within two years after the ground of it occurred; 2 Geo. II. c. 24, §§ 6 and 11. The incapacity of bearing testimony consequent upon a conviction of perjury, or subornation of perjury, formerly could not be removed, as in the case of other crimes, by suffering the punishment; but this appears to be altered by the act 15 and 16 Vict. c. 27, 1852. The trial for perjury is proper to the Court of Justiciary: but it may be tried by the Court of Session, where it occurs in any examination on oath taken in the course of an action before that Court. Subornation of perjury, which consists in tampering with those who are to appear as witnesses, and directing them what to say, without regard to truth, is directed, by the act 1555, c. 47, to be punished with the pains of perjury. See Hume, vol. i. pp. 360-74; Alison's Princ. i. 464; Stair, B. iv. tit. 43, § 6; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 74; Bank. vol. i. p. 299, et seq.; Bell's Com. ii. 343, 389, 390-5; *Kames' Stat. Permissive Laws. A law permitting certain persons to have or enjoy the use of certain things, or to do certain acts, by direct implication prohibits all others from obstructing the exercise of the right so conferred. Ersk. B. i. tit. 1, § 24.

Permit; a license or warrant for persons to pass with and sell goods, on having paid the duties of customs or excise for them. The statutes upon this subject have been consolidated by 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 16. See Excise.

Permutation or Barter; is the exchange of one moveable subject for another; and, by the law of Scotland, the contract is completed by consent alone, so as to enforce the subsequent exchange. By this contract the property is transferred. Stair, B. i. tit. 10, § 14, and tit. 14; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 13. See Barter.

Perpetuity. In the law of England, a perpetuity seems to have been originally equivalent to a Scotch entail; but in that law an entail may be defeated by a common recovery. See Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Sandford on Entails, 25, 31.

Persona Standi in Judicio; the right enjoyed by all, except by those who are deprived of it on account of civil death, nonage, or other disability, to pursue for and defend their rights in a court of justice. What persona standi is, may be more easily learned by considering the loss of it by civil death or outlawry. The outlaw is said amittere legem terre, to be repelled ab agendo et defendendo, to be incapable of pursuing or defending in any process, civil or criminal. But there are others besides outlaws who have no persona standi. A pupil cannot pursue or defend; that must be done by his tutor in his name. And companies, as such, have not a persona standi. See Firm. Persona standi is different from title to pursue. Persona standi applies to the status of the person, as qualified to pursue or defend in actions generally; title to pursue applies to particular actions, and requires, in addition to a persona standi, that the party have a proper legal interest in the particular action pursued or defended. Thus, although a superior possess a persona standi, he cannot pursue a declarator of non-entry unless he produce an infeftment in the lands. See Title to Pursue. Interest.

Personal Execution. See Caption. Diligence. Imprisonment. Liberation. Act of Grace. Act of Warding.

Personal Objection or Exception. When a party is, by his own act, or by the peculiar circumstances in which he is placed, incapacitated from maintaining a certain plea in an action or in a defence, he is said to be barred from maintaining that plea personalis exceptione. Thus, one is barred personalis exceptione or objectione from redarguing his own judicial assertion; from objecting to a deed to which he has already consented; from pleading the defect of his own or his author's title; from taking benefit by his own fault or neglect. It was even held in the Court of Session, that a woman who had been privately married, and who had connived at a second marriage which her husband entered into, was barred, personalis exceptione, from challenging the second marriage. But this was reversed in the House of Lords; Campbell v. Cochrane, 28th July 1747, and Jan. 31, 1753, M. 10,456; Cr. and Stewart, 519. For illustrations of the cases in which personal objection is or is not inferred, see Brown's Synop. h. t.; Shaw's Digest, h. t.

Personal Protection. A warrant of protection to the bankrupt may be granted by the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, until the meeting of the creditors for the election of trustee; and the protection may be renewed on the application of the trustee, authorized to do so by the creditors. 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, §§ 44 and 77, 1856.

Personal Rights. A real right, or jus in re, entitles the person vested with it to possess the subject of the right as his own, and to reclaim or vindicate it from others; whereas the creditor in a personal right or obligation has no more than a jus ad rem, or a right of action against the debtor or his representatives, whereby they may be compelled to implement the obligation, by transferring the subject to the creditor, or by paying or performing in terms of the obligation. See Obligation. Heritable rights in the persons either of heirs or of disponees, not completed by infeftment,—such, for example, as the right of one who has obtained a disposition to an heritable subject on which he has not taken infeftment,—are also termed personal rights. In such a case, the donee, before taking infeftment, may sell the subject, and may assign to the purchaser the unexecuted procuratory of resignation and precept of sasine, in virtue of which the purchaser may complete his right by infeftment; or the first donee, as if he were actually infeft, may himself grant to the purchaser a precept of sasine, on which the purchaser may obtain himself infeft; and although such infestment will be ineffectual so long as the first disponee remains uninfest, yet, as soon as he completes his title, the prior sasine of the purchaser and the feudal right will be perfected by accretion. But the holder of a personal right is not so divested by a first conveyance as to prevent him, if fraudulently inclined, from granting a second conveyance to another disponee, which second conveyance, if first perfected by infestment, will exclude the first conveyance—and that although up to the date of the competition the original disponee's right should remain personal. *Ersk. Personal Services. It was anciently the custom in feu-rights to bind the vassal to attend the superior at huntings and hostings, with many other personal services peculiar to a rude and warlike period. But after the Rebellion 1715, by 1 Geo. I. stat. 2, c. 54, those personal services, whether due by charter or custom, were abolished. Notwithstanding this statute, however, there is nothing to prevent the superior from stipulating in the charter, that the vassal shall perform certain specified agricultural services. Thus, in the case of the Duke of Argyle, Feb. 5, 1762, Mor. p. 14,495, the vassal was taken bound to keep the castle of Tarbert, and to defend it against the enemies of the family of Argyle, as well as to keep a boat with six oars and a steersman for the use of the Duke in going from one place of the coast to another. All that related to the military part of this obligation was held to fall under the statute; but the keeping of the boat was held to be a legal obligation on the vassal. Where the personal obligations consist in annual agricultural services, the vassal is free unless they are demanded within the year. *Ersk. Personalty and Realty. In the law of England, the distinction between real and personal property is almost but not entirely the same as the distinction between heritable and moveable property in the law of Scotland. Things real are described by Blackstone to be such as are permanent, fixed and immoveable, which cannot be carried out of their place, as lands and tenements; while things personal include all sorts of things moveable, which may attend a man's person wherever he goes. Things personal, however, include something in addition to things moveable; they comprehend every thing which wants the two requisites of a real estate—duration as to time, and immobility as to place. Whatever, therefore, is not a real estate, is a personal estate or chattel. There is also a subordinate division of personal estate or chattels into chattels real and chattels personal. Chattels personal are, properly and strictly speaking, things moveable, such as animals, household stuff, money, jewels, &c. Chattels real are interests issuing out of or annexed to real estates, such as terms for years of land, the next presentation to a church, &c. The essential distinction between a chattel real and a real estate is, that the duration of the former is limited to a time certain, beyond which it cannot subsist. Chattels real are not conveyed by sasine or corporal investiture; the possession of them is gained simply by the entry of the tenant. Two of the most important points in which the personalty of England does not coincide with the moveable property of Scotland are leases and securities affecting land. By the law of England, leases, of whatever duration, are chattels real, and of the nature of personal estate, and upon the lessee's death go to the personal representative. By the law of Scotland, they are heritable as to succession, but moveable as to the fisc. Mortgages and securities for money affecting lands or real estate in England, and bonds of all kinds, are of the nature of personal estate, and go to the personal representative; while in Scotland, all securities for money, affecting lands or heritable property, are themselves heritable, and descend to the heir. Blackst. ii. 16, 384; Robertson on Personal Succession, 307. See Heritable and Moveable. Bond. Chattels. Succession.

Pertinent. This term is used in our charters and dispositions in conjunction with parts. Thus, lands are disposed with parts and pertinents; and that expression may carry various rights and servitudes connected with the lands. See Parts and Pertinents. Bounding Charter. Commonly.

Petaria, Turbaria. The clause, Cum peditariis, turbariis, &c., gives the privilege of taking fuel, by peats and turfs, in mosses and muirs. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 76.

Petitory Actions; are actions by which something is sought to be decreed by the judge, in consequence of a right of property or a right of credit in the pursuer. Thus, all actions on personal contracts, by which the grantor has become bound to pay or to perform, are petitory actions. *Ersk. Petition and Complaint. In the judicial procedure of the Court of Session, a petition and complaint is the form in which certain matters of summary and extraordinary jurisdiction are brought under the cognisance of the Court. Petitions and complaints are addressed to one or other of the Divisions of the Inner-House. The petition sets forth the matter of complaint, generally in an argumentative detail of the facts, and concludes with a prayer, first for a warrant of service on the adverse party, and an appointment on him to answer; and then, that on resuming consideration of the petition and complaint, with or without answers, the Court may grant the appropriate remedy, the nature of which is specified; or such other redress as to them may seem proper in the circumstances. The petition and complaint is prepared and signed by counsel, and the occasions on which redress may be sought in this form are various. Thus, under the old parliamentary election law, this was the form of bringing the proceedings of freeholders and of magistrates of royal burghs, at their Michaelmas head-courts and election meetings, under the review of the Court. This branch of the jurisdiction of the Court of Session has been taken away by the Reform Act; but petitions and complaints are still competent in the following cases—viz., against magistrates and officers of the law, or against members of the College of Justice, or judicial factors, or other managers appointed by the Court, for malversation in office,—against parties guilty of breach of interdict, or of contempts of Court of all kinds,—and, in general, against all parties, officially or otherwise, summarily amenable, for irregularities or misconduct, to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session. When such petitions and complaints are presented, they are enrolled in the Single Bill Roll; and when moved in the course of that roll, an interlocutor is pronounced, granting warrant for service, and ordering answers to the petition within a certain number of days, varying in ordinary cases from eight to fifteen. By the same interlocutor, the case is sometimes remitted de plano to the Junior Lord Ordinary, although the Court have power, if they please, to remit to any of the other Lords Ordinary. But such a remit is not uniformly made, it being competent to the Court to order answers to themselves, and to hear and decide according as the circumstances of the case may require, without a remit to the Lord Ordinary. When a remit is made to the Lord Ordinary, he proceeds as soon as the answers are put in with the preparation of the cause, agreeably to the form in other processes; that is, he superintends the making up and closing of the record; with this proviso, that in the event of no answers being lodged to the petition, or on the failure of either party to obtemper any of the orders of the Lord Ordinary, it is competent to him to report the cause to the Court, in order that judgment may be pronounced in absence, or by default. After the case has been prepared, and the record closed before the Lord Ordinary, he reports the case to the Inner-House. All proceedings in petitions and complaints are summary, both before the Lord Ordinary and the Inner-House. See A. S. 11th July 1828, §§ 83 to 96 inclusive. Physicians' Fees; may be pursued for, but are presumed to be paid, unless inconsistent with the practice of the place, and excepting where the patient is on deathbed. Pickery; is the stealing of trifles, which has never been punished in any other way than by an arbitrary punishment. The breaking into gardens and orchards, and the stealing of green wood, are punishable by a pecuniary fine, which rises in proportion as the crime is repeated; and it would appear that, when frequently committed, even a capital punishment has been inflicted. Hume, i. 85, et seq.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 59; Tait's Justice, voce Theft.

Pigeon. It is enacted by several of the Scotch acts of Parliament, that the shooting of pigeons, without the consent of the owner, shall be reckoned theft. The breaking into dovecots is not only reckoned theft, but, under an old statute, might, on a third offence, where the offender had no effects, have been punished with death; 1579, c. 84. This offence may be tried before the sheriff. Justices of the peace may execute the acts against breakers of dovecots, but cannot judge in complaints for shooting or killing pigeons. The statute 2 Geo. III. c. 29, for the protection of pigeons, does not extend to Scotland. It has been held not relevant to justify a tenant in shooting his landlord's pigeons, to allege that they are destructive to his farm; Easton, 18th May 1832, 10 S. and D. 542. See Hutch. Just. i. 117, 557; Tait's Just. h. t.; Blair's Just. h. t. See Dovecot.

Pillory; an instrument by which an offender is fastened to the market-cross or other public place, and exposed in modum pœnæ to the contempt and derision of the public; to whom he is thus, as it were, introduced as a base and infamous person; Hume, ii. 470. By the stat. 56 Geo. III. c. 138, the punishment of the pillory was abolished, except in cases of perjury—fine or imprisonment, or both, being substituted in lieu of the pillory, as the punishment for those offences of which the pillory, prior to the date of that statute, had formed the whole or part of the punishment; and by the act 1 Vict. c. 23 (1837), it was absolutely abolished. Stair, B. iv. tit. 36, § 8; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 102; Hutch. Just. i. 198; Tait's Just. voce Punishment.

Pilots; persons licensed to offer themselves as guides for navigating ships through narrow firths and rivers, or into ports, or through any place where the navigation is difficult. In England, pilots are established at several ports, under the appointment of certain incorporations regulated by statute. The statutes on this subject were consolidated by the act 6 Geo. IV. c. 125; but none of the statutes extend to Scotland. In Scotland, this matter has been left to common law, and the regulations and usages of the several ports, firths, and rivers. By royal charter, the Trinity House of Leith has authority to examine and appoint pilots for the Firth of Forth, and for the seas and firths, and along the coasts and islands, of the Northern and German Oceans. The town of Edinburgh has a right to appoint pilots for the navigation of the port, harbour, and roads of Leith. But the magistrates are not liable for damage suffered by ships under the guidance of those whom they appoint; Ogilvie, May 22, 1821, 1 S. & D. 24. In contracts of affreightment and insurance, the obligation of the owners to have the ship provided with persons sufficient to navigate her implies the obligation to have a pilot on board, wherever a pilot is, by regulation or usage, held to be necessary. Where a pilot cannot be had, the aid of persons locally acquainted with the navigation must be taken. It is a sufficient compliance with this condition if the master take a person authorized by the regular custom of the port, or the law of the place, to act as a pilot, provided he be at the time fit to act, and not manifestly incapable through intoxication or otherwise. A pilot employed to bring the ship into harbour is not entitled to salvage; The Juliana, 2 Dods (Adm.), 504. It has likewise been decided in the English Admiralty Court, that where towing is necessary, pilots are bound to perform it, having a claim of compensation for any damage to their boats, and for extra labour; they are also bound to offer their services in all weathers; General Palmer, 1 Hagg. (Adm.) 176. See Bell's Com. 551, 594; Brodie's Supp. to Stair, 985–9, 1004.

Pimp-Tenure. As a matter of historical curiosity, and as indicative of the manners of that age, it may be mentioned that Willielmus Hoppeshor tenet dimidium virgatum terre in Rockhampton de domino rege per servitium custodiendi sex demissellas, scil. meretrices, ad usum Dom. Reg. 12 Edw. I.—viz., by Pimp-tenure. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Piracy; is hostility committed at sea by an individual without license or commission from any acknowledged state or government. Any adventurer, therefore, who sails on a voluntary unlicensed warfare, and who disposes of his prizes at sea or elsewhere by his own authority, is properly a pirate. Even where a person engaged in an adventure of this kind holds a commission, if he take the ships of his own nation, or of a nation not at war with his own, or if he act contrary to the terms of his commission, he is guilty of piracy. It is piracy in the captain or crew to run away with the ship or cargo. The trial of this crime formerly belonged to the High Admiral or his deputy; but the sentence of that Court was liable to review by the Court of Justiciary, in the form of suspension. Since the abolition of the Admiralty Court, the only competent court is the Court of Justiciary. The punishment of this crime is death. Place of Payment. If the place at which an obligation is to be performed be previously stipulated, the agreement must be adhered to, unless access to that place be unsafe or impossible, in which case the rule is the same as if no place had been named. Where no place is named, and if the thing to be performed is delivery of a certain species or corpus, the place where the subject is is understood; but if it be a quantity, the place of contract, or where the debtor resides, is understood; Stair, B. i. tit. 17, § 19. Whether or not this rule, as laid down by Stair, be still the law, is doubtful; but it seems to be held in England, that where no place of payment is specified, the debtor is bound to seek out his creditor; and that the creditor, when the debt becomes due, may raise an action without giving him notice; Chitty on Bills, 391. It is not indispensable to specify the place of payment in a bill or note. When no place of payment is specified, it has been questioned whether the acceptor or grantor is bound to seek out the creditor, and make payment, or whether the creditor ought to apply for it. The general rule laid down by Chitty applies to the case of bills and notes, where no summary diligence is to be used; presentment and protest being in all cases necessary to authorize summary diligence. Mr Thomson holds that there is an exception to the rule that the debtor must seek out the creditor, in the case of bills payable on demand, and at or after sight; Thomson on Bills, 384. To preserve recourse against the drawer and indorsers, it is indispensably necessary to present the bill for payment to the debtor personally, or at his residence, unless he has himself, in his acceptance, specified some other place of presentment. The question, whether the specification of a place of payment, in the body of a bill or note, makes the presentment of it at that place a condition of the contract, is discussed by Mr Thomson, p. 420. See also Bell's Princ. § 337; Illust. ib.; Bell's Com. i. 412; Jurid. Styles, ii. 12, 16.

Place of Subscription. The insertion in the testing clause of the place where a deed was subscribed is not a statutory requisite, and is not essential to the legal authentication of the deed. But it is the invariable custom to insert the place of subscription; and in a doubtful or suspicious case, the omission would be a very unfavourable circumstance. Ross's Lect. i. 141; Stair, B. iv. tit. 42, § 19; Ersk. B. iii. 2, § 18.

Plagii Crimen; or the stealing of adult living human creatures; is a crime not known in the present state of society in this country; but in former times, under the notion that it was a treasonable usurpation of the royal authority in detaining the King's free lieges, it was punishable with death. The same punishment has been applied to the stealing of children; for which offence there are recent instances of capital sentences. Hume, i. 81 and 83, in Notes; Alison's Princ. 280; *Kames' Stat. Plan. A particular plan of building may be enforced, provided it be clearly made a condition of the feu-contract. The plan of Charlotte Square of Edinburgh, which the feuars were called upon to sign and adhere to, was held binding; Dirom, June 5, 1812,

F. C. But the mere exhibition of a plan of a new street, at the time of the sale of a piece of ground for building a house in the intended line of the street, does not of itself amount to a warranty or engagement that all that is exhibited on the plan shall be done; Heriot's Hospital, May 4, 1814, 2 Dow, 301; Gordon, Feb. 9, 1819, 5 Dow, 87. In a subsequent case, however, the feuars, having proceeded on the plan of the New Town of Edinburgh in taking their feus, were held entitled to prevent any building deviating in an inconvenient or material degree from that plan; Young, Nov. 17, 1814, F. C. In a judicial sale, plans of the estate ought to be prepared, in which the lots may be distinguished as they are exposed to sale. Plans are allowed to be founded on as evidence, when distinctly authenticated and sworn to. They are not, however, properly evidence of themselves; they are rather adminicles, explanatory and illustrative of other and proper evidence. All plans, maps, models, or other such productions, proposed to be used at a jury trial, must be lodged eight days before the trial; if the trial is to be at Edinburgh, with the jury-clerk, at the office in the Register-house; if on circuit, either with the jury-clerk, or with the sheriff-clerk of the county; *A. Planting and Inclosing. Various acts of the Scotch Parliaments were passed for the encouragement of planting and inclosing, and for the punishment of those guilty of injuring or destroying growing trees and plantations; and with regard both to planting and inclosing, justices of the peace have a statutory jurisdiction. At common law, injuries done to trees and inclosures are also punishable as malicious mischief. The general act, 1661, c. 38, directs justices to enforce the older laws for the protection and encouragement of planting, with a modification in the punishment—the penalties being thereby made pecuniary. The older statutes for the encouragement of planting are in desuetude; but injuries to existing plantations are still punishable, and may be punished by two justices, on proof of the facts: such are, setting fire to trees; cutting, breaking, or pulling them up, or peeling them; the penalty in these last cases being L.10 Scots for each tree less than ten years old, and L.20 Scots for each older tree. The haver or user of such trees is liable in the same penalties, unless he produce the party who brought him the trees. And in default of payment, the party convicted must, for each half merk of penalty, work one day for the party injured, on receiving meat and drink only; 1685, c. 39. Tenants and cottars are likewise liable in the same pecuniary penalties, if the injury be proved to have been done by their families, servants, or others living with them; although it has been thought that these statutory penalties are subject to mitigation. Sundry British statutes make offences of this description punishable by fine, and even with transportation for seven years; but in this last case, the trial, of course, cannot proceed before the justices. See on this subject, and also as to inclosing, the acts 1 Geo. I. c. 48; 1 Geo. I. sess. ii. 18; 6 Geo. III. c. 36; 13 Geo. III. c. 33; 9 Geo. III. c. 41; although certain of these statutes have not been acted on in Scotland. The Scotch statutes on the same subject which may consulted are—1457, c. 80, and c. 83; 1424, c. 33; 1503, c. 71 and 74; 1535, c. 10 and 11; 1579, c. 84; 1661, c. 41; 1685, c. 39; 1669, c. 17; 1503, c. 71; 1535, c. 11; 1587, c. 83; 1607, c. 3; 1641, c. 45; 1686, c. 11; 1689, c. 16. The statutes regarding inclosures and the protection of fences may be executed by sheriffs and other judges, and also by justices of the peace. Such are the statutes concerning mutual and march fences. See Marches. Runrig. And the statute 1685, c. 39, imposes penalties on parties injuring ordinary inclosures, or allowing animals to go over them; giving one-half of the penalty to the owner of the fence, and the other to the fund for repairing roads and bridges in the parish. A stranger found within a broken inclosure will be presumed to be the breaker; 1661, c. 41. By 1686, c. 11, the herding of cattle is enjoined under certain penalties, directed against the owner of the animals found trespassing; and in order to enforce payment, the heritor or possessor who has been injured may detain or pound the trespassing animals, until payment of half a merk of penalty (i. e. about 1s. 3½d. sterling); together with the expense of keeping the animals, and the damages. But the party seizing the cattle must give immediate intimation of the seizure to the owner, and must place the cattle where they can have fodder and water; nor can he make any use of them, except at the risk of being held liable in a spulzie. *Ersk. Pleas in Law. Pleas in law, as a distinct portion of a record, were introduced by the Judicature Act, 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 9, in which they are defined as “a short and concise note, drawn and signed by counsel, of the

pleas in law on which the action or defence is to be maintained; and in such note the matter of law so to be stated shall be set forth in distinct and separate propositions without argument, but accompanied by a reference to the authorities relied on.” At first these pleas were put into process as a separate paper, but are now subjoined to the paper to which they relate; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 49. It is the statutory duty of the Lord Ordinary, in adjusting the record prior to closing it, to suggest any new plea which may appear to him to be necessary for exhausting the disputable matter; and the pleas in law stated on the record are to be held as the sole grounds of action or defence, to which the future arguments of the parties are to be confined; with power, however, to the parties, with the leave of the Lord Ordinary, or of the Court, to add to the record any additional plea which may have been suggested by the Lord Ordinary or the Court, or by the party, as fit to be discussed in relation to the facts already set forth; stat. § 11. If, after closing the record, either party wishes a new plea or ground in law to be stated on the record, he must enrol the cause and furnish the new plea to the opposite party forty-eight hours before the enrolment; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 59. It would be an obvious absurdity to deprive a party of the benefit of any plea in law which the facts of his case may warrant, merely because such plea had been omitted in the record; and hence it has happened in practice, that pleas in law are not prepared with that circumspection and care which the statute seems to have contemplated. The pleas are in general so framed as to ground any legal argument which the facts may warrant; but the statutory injunction as to the citation of authorities is not in very strict observance; and hence, and from other causes, it not unfrequently happens that, when a case comes to be more carefully considered and argued, either orally or in a written argument, it is necessary either to obtain leave of the Court to add farther pleas, or to maintain an argument which the pleas on the record barely cover. In the Court of Session, the pleadings to which pleas in law are subjoined are defences, revised condescendences, revised answers to condescendences, reasons of suspension, reasons of advocacy, condescendences and claims in multiplepointings, and other analogous pleadings in the less ordinary processes. In inferior courts, pleas in law are subjoined to the defences and to the replies in ordinary processes, and to no other; in summary applications, to the answers to the original petition and to the replies; and in multiplepointings, to the condescendence and claim. See 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, §§ 2, 9, 10, 11; A. S. 11th July 1828,

Plea of Panel. The panel's plea must either be guilty or not guilty. When it is guilty, sentence is forthwith pronounced by the Court. In pleading not guilty, the panel is not always to be understood to deny the whole allegations of the libel. Thus, to a charge of murder he may plead not guilty, and yet admit the homicide. The panel may plead guilty to certain charges, and deny the rest; or he may admit the crime and deny the aggravations; in which case the prosecutor may either rest satisfied with the plea of guilty, so far as it goes, or proceed to prove the charges which are denied. The panel cannot plead guilty of the aggravations and not guilty of the crime. The particulars of a special defence intended to be maintained ought to be stated to the Court immediately after the plea of not guilty has been entered; and where a written defence has been given in, the clerk of Court reads it at the same stage of the proceedings. This statement of the panel has sometimes a considerable effect on the charge as set forth in the libel. 9 Geo. IV. c. 29, § 14; Hume, ii. 282; Alison's Prac. 357; Steele, 197. See Not Guilty Libel. Amendment of Libel.

Pledge; is a moveable subject put into the hand of a creditor by his debtor in security of a debt, or of an advance of money; which subject the creditor is to re-deliver on receiving repayment. The creditor is liable in a middle degree of diligence for preserving the pledge (præstat culpam levem); and should it perish without any fault imputable to the creditor, beyond what is implied in this degree of diligence, it perishes to the debtor, as being the proprietor; and the creditor is entitled to the expense profitably disbursed on the subject while in his hands. The pledge cannot be sold without judicial authority; and therefore, where a sale becomes necessary, the proper course is to apply to the judge-ordinary for a warrant to sell the subject by public sale—the pledger being called as a party. *Ersk. Plegius; “a pledge, borgh, or cautioner. Dimittere terras ad plegium, to let lands to borgh, is when, any controversy being for the possession of lands, the same are, after inquisition and trial taken thereanent, given and committed to their last lawful possessor, under borgh and caution that he shall restore them to him who shall be found to have right thereto.” Skene, h. t.

Plough-Goods.—By the act 1503, c. 98, horses, oxen, and other goods pertaining to the plough, are forbidden to be pointed at the time of labouring the ground, when the debtor has other goods. The time of labouring in this statute is understood to be the time at which the individual is engaged in labouring, whether he be earlier or later than the rest of the country. This labouring does not extend to summer fallowing, but only to the labour necessary for raising the crop of the season, so that the land may not lie waste. Where there are not enough of other moveables to answer the debt, the messenger may point even the plough-goods. If the messenger has been shown other pointable effects equal to the debt, exclusive of the plough-goods, and has notwithstanding pointed the latter, it amounts to a spulzie. If, on the other hand, the messenger has pointed plough-goods in consequence of not having made a sufficient search for others, the debtor is entitled to restitution merely. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 6, § 22; Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 29; B. iv. tit. 30, § 5; tit. 47, § 34; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 41-2, 816; Tait's Just. voce Pointing. By the act 1587, c. 82, the offence of destroying plough-graith in time of tillage is punishable as theft; the offence may be tried before the judge-ordinary, and without a jury. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, §§ 39, 62.

Ploughgate of Land. According to Balfour, “ane pleuch sould contene viii oxengang, the oxengang sould contene xii aikers, the aiker sould contene iiiii rudis,” &c.; Balfour's Prac. voce Brieve of Division, c. 98, p. 441. But although this may have been a rule in measuring land anciently, it will not be found to correspond with the measurements specified in charters. A ploughgate of land is the property qualification to hunt under the game-laws. See Acre.

Plumper. If there be more seats vacant than one in the same county or burgh, and a voter chooses to vote for only one of the candidates, he can give him but a single vote, which is then called a plumper. See Reform Act.

Pluris Petitio; is the asking more judicially than is truly due. Where an adjudication is led for a larger sum than what is actually due to the adjudging creditor, it is said to be a pluris petitio, which, where it is material, or where there has been culpable neglect, or fraud, will have the effect of annulling the adjudication. Where the pluris petitio is slighter, its only effect is to reduce the adjudication to a security for principal and interest, without expenses or penalties. Pluris petitio in the libel is immaterial, if decree be taken only for the sums really due. Bell's Com. i. 745; Kames' Equity, 296. See Adjudication. Articulate Adjudication.

Poin ding; is the Scotch law diligence, whereby the property of the debtor's moveables is transferred to the creditor using the diligence. Poin ding is either real or personal: Real poin ding proceeds on debita fundi, and it affects the moveables on the lands to which the debt attaches; personal poin ding, on the other hand, is used by creditors in ordinary personal obligations, and affects the debtor's moveable goods and effects. There is a third description of attachment which has also been termed poin ding, whereby cattle found trespassing on the grounds of another are detained until the owner of the cattle make satisfaction for the injury. These several attachments will be shortly considered in their order.

I. REAL POINDING, OR POINDING OF THE GROUND.

This species of poin ding commences with an action, and proceeds on an heritable security, or such other debitum fundi as may be the warrant of the action; which is of the nature of a real diligence or execution for poin ding all the goods on the lands over which the security extends. This action is competent to a superior for his feu-duties, to an annual-renter for the arrears of his interest, or to an heritable creditor, and, in general, to all creditors in debts which constitute a real burden or lien on lands. An assignee and disponee to an heritable bond on which sasine had been taken, though not himself infeft on the conveyance in his favour, was found entitled to pursue a poin ding of the ground; Tweedie, Jan. 22, 1836, 14 S. & D. 337. But it is not competent to proprietors, or even to creditors or others in possession of the ground; for it is incompetent to poind the grounds of the lands possessed by the poinder himself—an action of maills and duties being the proper action for recovering what is due to such possessors by the tenants in the natural possession. This rule of law has given rise to the question how far it is competent to an heritable creditor who has taken his security in the form of an absolute disposition, qualified by a back-bond, to poind the ground. The principle recognised in one old case is, that the absolute disponee cannot competently poind the ground; because, in virtue of his absolute title, he may enter into the natural possession. In that case, a person had wadset his lands and taken a back-tack of them, binding himself to pay to the wadsetter a yearly rent, equal to the interest of the sum borrowed. The wadsetter, considering himself a creditor, brought an action for payment of the back tack-duty, and added a conclusion for poin ding the ground in time coming. This was refused, "because the pursuer, being infeft in the property, could not ask his own ground to be poinded for any sum due to him out of the said lands;" L. Garthland, March 2, 1632, M. 10,545; Ross's Lect. ii. 430. The effect of this diligence is to give the user of it a right to the rents; but he cannot, in virtue of it, assume the natural possession of the lands. And not only the tenants, but the proprietors must be made parties in the action. There is no personal conclusion against the defender, the object being to make the goods on the ground subject to the diligence. Hence, when decree is given, and letters of poin ding issued, they are executed without any previous charge against the tenants to make payment: for there being no decree against the tenants, there can be no warrant for a charge. Hence, also, after letters of poin ding are once granted, they may be put in execution as long as the pursuer lives, though the original defender be dead or removed. The goods falling under this diligence must be the goods of the owner or of the tenants; other goods on the land are not subject to the diligence. But by the act 1469, c. 36, the goods of tenants cannot be poinded for their landlord's debt to any greater extent than the amount of the term's rent due by the tenant, or the arrears which he may be due at the time. In a competition of poin dings of this nature, the superior poin ding the ground for unpaid feu-duties and casualties will be preferred. Where there is no such ground of preference, the process having the first citation is preferred. The sheriff's jurisdiction is cumulative with that of the Court of Session in poin dings of the ground. It has been questioned whether a poin ding of the ground is to be considered of the nature of a diligence or an action. In one case it was laid down that it is a "process of execution;" Thomson, Feb. 12, 1828, 6 S. & D. 526. In a more recent case it was contended by an heritable creditor, that the raising and executing a summons of poin ding the ground was sufficient to give him a right to the moveables, preferable to that of a trustee subsequently confirmed, on the ground that the creditor's infeftment in the land gives him a real though accessory right in the moveables on the lands. To this the Lord Ordinary, in his note, objected—1st, That the creditor had not, in virtue of his infeftment alone, a right to the moveables preferable to that of a confirmed trustee; and, 2d, That if it required diligence to complete the preference, that diligence must be complete, and inchoate merely. The Court concurred with the Lord Ordinary on the first point; but with respect to the second, they held that the accessory real right which a debitum fundi confers, is sufficiently preserved by its being exercised tempestive; and that the mere executing a summons of pointing the ground was such a timeous exercise. And this step having been taken before the confirmation of the trustee, they held it to constitute a right preferable to that of the trustee. One of the judges stated it as his opinion, that a pointing of the ground is "not so much a diligence as a declaratory real action;" Campbell's Trustees, Jan. 13, 1835, 13 S. & D. 237; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, §§ 11-13; Bell's Com. ii. 58; Ross's Lect. vol. ii. p. 392, et seq.; Stair, B. iv. tit. 23; tit. 47, § 26, et seq.; More's Notes, pp. ccv.-xi.; Bank. vol. i. p. 648; Bell's Princ. §§ 699, 2369; Illust. § 699; *Kames' Stat. 2. PERSONAL POINTING.

Personal pointing—that is, the pointing of moveables for debt—may proceed either in virtue of the ordinary letters of horning issuing from the signet, or on the decrees of inferior courts as to moveables within the inferior judge's jurisdiction. The first step is to charge the debtor to pay the debt; and the days of the charge being elapsed, the pointing may proceed. The necessity of this previous charge was enacted by the statute 1669, c. 4. But there is an exception in the statute in favour of landlords, who are entitled not only to point for bygone rents, on a decree of their own baron-court, without a charge, but even to point instantly after pronouncing the decree. There is also an exception in the statute in favour of superiors pointing the effects of their vassals for feu-duties. A debtor's goods may be pointed by one creditor, though previously arrested by another creditor. Growing corn may be pointed; but it has been found that pointing of a growing crop only braided, and of clover-grass, is ineffectual; Elders, July 5, 1833, 11 S. & D. 902. The goods of tenants cannot be farther pointed than to the extent and in the manner pointed out in the preceding article; neither can plough-goods (where the debtor has other effects) be pointed during the period of tillage. See Plough-Goods. With those exceptions, all moveable goods and effects belonging to the debtor may be affected by this diligence. It is not necessary that the execution of pointing be written on a stamp, or signed by the appraiser. A pointing was held to be inept as to certain trunks containing a variety of articles, where the appraisement was of the trunk and its contents in a lump sum, without a valuation of the several articles; M'Knight, Jan. 27, 1835, 13 S. & D. 342. The goods were formerly adjudged to the creditor by the messenger on appraisements by two valutors chosen by himself, once at the place where they were pointed, and once at the market-cross, whereby great injustice was done to the debtor. But now, in place of the two appraisements, only one is necessary. The goods remain in the hands of the debtor, and a schedule of them, with their appraised values, is also left with him. The messenger then reports his execution of the letters to the sheriff or other judge-ordinary, who grants warrant to sell the goods by public roup, at such time and place, and after such previous advertisements, as circumstances may require. Should any person carry off the pointed goods, or any part thereof, he is declared by the statute liable in double the value of the articles abstracted. The net amount of the sales is directed to be paid over to the creditor; or, if no purchaser appear, the goods are to be delivered at their appraised value. A minute of the transaction is kept by the clerk of court, open to the inspection of all concerned for the fee of one shilling. An erroneous notion prevails, that if a party has betaken himself to the diligence of pointing, he is not also entitled at the same time to follow out personal diligence against his debtor, and to incarcerate him. But there is no foundation in law for this notion. A creditor may point, arrest, inhibit, incarcerate, and adjudge, unico contextu, for one and the same debt; the only exception being in the case of a special adjudication, as to which the rule is, that the creditor, after he has attained possession under that diligence, shall have no farther execution against his debtor, by arrestment, caption, or otherwise. The special adjudication, however, is never resorted to in practice, and there is no other restraint on the simultaneous use of every legal form of diligence. See Adjudication for Debt. In a pointing under letters of horning, the sheriff's powers are merely ministerial, and he cannot inquire into the justness of the debt; Clerk, June 15, 1824, 3 S. & D. 143. See Ersk. B. iii. tit. 6, § 20, et seq.; Bell's Com. ii. 60, et seq.; Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 21; B. iv. tit. 30; tit. 47, § 29, et seq.; More's Notes, pp. cccxxx.-i.; Bank. vol. iii. p. 23, et seq.; Bell's Princ. p. 673; Kames' Princ. of Equity; Bell on Leases, ii. 313; Ross's Lect. i. 385, et seq.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 667; MacLaurin's Sheriff-Court Process; *Jurid. 3. POINTING OF STRAY CATTLE.

The pointing of cattle found trespassing on inclosures, or committing depredations on corn, grass, or plantations, is of a different description from the above-mentioned poindings. Such a poinding does not transfer the property, but merely gives a right of detention to the person who seizes the cattle on his grounds, until satisfaction is made to him for the damage. Where the parties do not agree about the amount of the damage, it may be ascertained by the appraisers of the barony, with the expense of keeping the cattle. The statute 1686, c. 11, which confirms this right in the proprietor, gives a penalty of half a merk toties quoties for each of the cattle found trespassing, over and above the damage; and for these claims—viz., the damage, penalty, and expense of keeping the cattle—the proprietor is understood to have right. The poinder must take care that the cattle poinded be put into a proper place, where they may have fodder and water. Such poindings may be made brevi manu, and without judicial warrant. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 6, § 28; Bank. vol. iii. p. 27; Hutch. Justice, ii. 513; Tail's Justice, voce Planting. See Brevi Manu.

Poison. By the act 1450, c. 30 and 31, the importers of poison, by which bodily harm may be taken, are, over and above death, to forfeit lands and goods. But this law is in desuetude. Death by poisoning is the most difficult to distinguish from natural death. The best proof is the existence of poison in the body of the deceased; but this is by no means essential, and there have been many convictions of murder by poisoning without such proof. See Burnett, 546; Alison's Princ. 75, 167; Steele, 89–90. In Mr Steele's excellent work, a description will be found of the symptoms which the various kinds of poison exhibit.

The sale of arsenic is regulated by the act 14 Vict. c. 13, 1851.

Police. This term, in a large acceptance, has been applied to the due regulation and domestic order of the kingdom, though it is more generally applied to the internal regulations for watching, lighting, cleaning, and also for punishing minor delinquencies in great cities. A system of police has been established both in Edinburgh and Glasgow, and in other considerable towns in Scotland, by special statutes, the details of which are foreign to a work like the present. And in 1833 (3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 46) a general statute was passed, enabling burghs in Scotland to establish a general system of police, which however was superseded by the act 13 and 14 Vict. c. 33, 1850. The object of the particular statutes referred to, generally speaking, is to secure the watching, lighting, and cleaning of the streets, and the summary conviction and punishment of minor offences. The expense of those establishments, where introduced in Scotland, is provided for by an assessment on the inhabitants; and the superintendence of the whole system of expenditure and management is entrusted to certain commissioners chosen by the inhabitants paying assessment. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 38, et seq.; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825), 341; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. h. t.

Policy of Insurance; is an obligation in writing, specifying the nature of the risk insured against, and the premium of insurance; and in marine insurance the underwriters oblige themselves to warrant the ship and cargo, to the extent of the sums annexed to their names, against all dangers arising from the sea, enemies' ships, pirates, or other misfortunes whatsoever. Those who undertake this obligation put down their names, and the sum for which they respectively become bound; and it is from thus underwriting the obligation that they are called underwriters. Bell's Com. i. 599, et seq.; Bell's Princ. 124; Kames' Princ. of Equity. See Insurance. Open Policy. Wager Policy. Valued Policy.

Poll. See Deed Poll.

Poll; is the taking of the votes of the electors per capita, or individually. For the regulations regarding the polling of electors, see Reform Act.

Poor; those destitute persons who are able but unwilling to labour, or those who, by reason of age and infirmity, have become a burden on society.

1. Idle Poor.—Several acts have been made for the punishment of sturdy beggars and vagabonds—e. g., 1424, c. 42; 1535, c. 22; 1579, c. 74, all of which are ratified by the act 1698, c. 21. Under the descriptions in those acts are comprehended all who pretend to tell fortunes, jugglers, minstrels, and all who can give no good account of the manner in which they gain their subsistence, and who, though able-bodied, are idle, and shun labour; those also are included, who, without any sufficient testimonials, allege that they have been shipwrecked, burned out of their houses, or herried. The punishment provided for them by those statutes is whipping and burning in the ear; and by 1579, c. 74, a repetition of the crime is made punishable with death. The execution of those acts is entrusted to magistrates of burghs, and sheriffs, and to justices of the peace; 1661, c. 38; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 39. But, except as to some minor penalties kept up against vagabonds, those statutes may be considered in total desuetude. See Vagabonds.

2. Infirm Poor.—Those who, from age or infirmities, are unable to maintain themselves, are ordered to be maintained by levied on the parish (1535, c. 22); and by an act, 1663, c. 16, a power is given to the landholders in landward parishes to assess themselves for the maintenance of such of the poor as cannot fully maintain themselves, and to demand relief of one-half of the sum from their tenants. The acts 1695, c. 43, 1696, c. 29, and 1698, c. 21, which relate to the same subject, ratify the former acts, give directions for carrying them into execution, grant power for that purpose to the Privy Council, and ratify their proclamations. Under this authority, four proclamations were issued by the Privy Council, on August 11, 1692; August 29, 1693; July 31, 1694; and March 3, 1698.

The relief of the poor is now administered under the act 8 and 9 Vict. c. 83, 1848. A general Board of Supervision is established, and assessments are imposed by the parochial boards of the several parishes respectively, according to one or other of the three modes authorised by the statute. By one mode, one-half of the assessment is imposed upon the owner, and the other half upon the tenants or occupants of all lands and heritages within the parish, according to the annual value of the lands and heritages. In estimating the annual value of lands and heritages, the value is taken to be the rent at which, one year with another, the lands and heritages may in their actual state be reasonably expected to let for from year to year, under deduction (1.) of the probable annual average cost of the repairs, insurance, and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain the lands and heritages in their actual state; and (2.) all rates, taxes, and public charges payable in respect of the lands and heritages. By another mode of assessment, one-half of the assessment is imposed upon the owners of the lands and heritages in the parish, and the other half is imposed upon the whole inhabitants of the parish, according to their means and substance other than lands and heritages situated in Great Britain or Ireland. By a third mode of assessment, the assessment is imposed as an equal per-centage upon the annual value of all lands and heritages within the parish, and upon the estimated annual income of the whole inhabitants of the parish from means and substance other than lands and heritages situated in Great Britain or Ireland. When the parochial board of any parish has resolved on the manner in which the assessment is to be imposed, the resolution is reported to the Board of Supervision for approval; and if approved of, is adopted and acted upon, and cannot be altered or departed from without the sanction of the Board of Supervision. If the mode of assessment resolved on shall not be approved of by the Board of Supervision, the parochial board must meet and resolve upon another of the three modes; and the mode so resolved on is reported to the Board of Supervision, and cannot be altered or departed from without the sanction of the board. The property formerly vested in the heritors and kirk-session for behoof of the poor of a parish is now administered by the parochial board of the parish; but church collections continue to be disposed of by the kirk-session of each parish in the same manner as formerly. The assessments may be applied to the relief of the occasional as well as of the permanent poor; but able-bodied persons out of employment have no right to demand relief.

In Petrie v. Meek, March 4, 1859, 21 D. 1612, it was found that a parochial board were not entitled to give relief to an able-bodied man out of employment, and that such a person receiving relief was not thereby prevented from acquiring an industrial residence.

It is the parish within which a man has been born, unless he shall have formed a new settlement for himself by residence, which is bound to support him; but where a man has resided five years in another parish, it is the parish within which he has resided for the five years preceding his application for charity which is bound to support him. A woman, by marriage, immediately acquires the settlement of her husband; and she cannot, during the subsistence of her marriage, acquire a settlement independent of him. Children under fourteen years of age cannot acquire a settlement by residence. It is sufficient residence in a parish if the pauper has had his most common resort there, although he may have been absent for a considerable part of each year, and even although he has never had a house in the parish. Where a settlement has once been acquired, it formerly could not be lost but by the acquisition of a new settlement; but now a person loses his acquired settlement if, during any subsequent period of five years, he shall not have resided continuously for at least one year. The settlement of children not forisfamiated does not depend upon the place of their birth, but upon the settlement of their parents. Lawful children follow their father's, natural children their mother's settlement. This settlement is lost as soon as the child acquires a settlement by residence or marriage, and it never revives. Paupers cannot come upon the parish of their birth if they have acquired a settlement by residence, or during the subsistence of a settlement by marriage or by parentage.

The subject of poor-laws has been ably treated by Mr Dunlop in his Treatise on Parochial Law, p. 161, et seq. See also Mony- penny (Lord Pitmilley) on Poor-Law; Caird's Poor-Law Manual; Guthrie Smith's Digest of the Poor-Law; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 61, et seq., and Notes by Mr Ivory; Stair, B. ii. tit. 1, § 6; Bank. i. p. 61; Bell's Princ. p. 304; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. voce Vagrant.

In England, the poor-law is principally regulated by 4 and 5 Will. IV. c. 76, commonly called the Poor-Law Amendment Act. This statute authorises the appointment of commissioners (who form a central board of control) and assistant-commissioners, to carry the act into effect. The details of the system are managed by guardians of the poor, churchwardens, and overseers. See Overseers. By 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 40, altered, amended, and continued by 7 Will. IV. c. 10, provision is made for the removal of poor persons born in Scotland and Ireland, and chargeable to parishes in England.

Poor's-Roll; the roll of litigants who, by reason of poverty, are privileged to sue or defend in forma pauperis. This privilege is conferred by the Court, on being satisfied of the poverty of the applicant, and that he has probabilis causa litigandi; and the advantage of being admitted to the benefit of the poor's-roll is, that the party has his cause thereafter conducted gratuitously by the counsel and agents for the poor, and is relieved from the fee-fund and enrolment fees, and from all other Court fees and charges. This being a privilege which exposes the adverse party in the suit to the hardship of litigating with a pauper opponent, the Court has guarded against the abuse of conferring the privilege except upon good grounds. With that view, the A. S. 16th June 1819 provides that the Faculty of Advocates shall appoint six of their number annually to be advocates for the poor; and that the writers to the signet, and agents and solicitors, shall each nominate, in the month of December annually, four of their number respectively to be writers and agents for the poor; and shall immediately after such nomination give in to the senior clerk of each Division of the Court a list of the persons so appointed; which list is entered in the books of Sederunt. No person is entitled to the benefit of the poor's roll, unless he produce a certificate, under the hands of the minister and two elders of the parish where he resides, setting forth his circumstances, according to a formula annexed to the act. The formula states the applicant's age, whether he (or she) be married or not, the number of his children, the length of his residence in the parish, the property of which he is possessed, his trade and earnings, and whether he have any other lawsuit. If the party's health admit of it, he must appear personally before the minister and elders, to be examined as to the facts required by the formula; and the minister and elders must then certify how far the statement of the party consists with their own knowledge, or that of any one of them, or whether its credit rests solely on the statement of the applicant; in which case they must certify whether he or she be of good character and worthy of credit. Where the clergyman or elders refuse to give a certificate to a party applying for the benefit of the poor's-roll, the Court will cite them to give evidence at the bar as to the applicant's condition; Craigie, Feb. 10, 1832, 10 S. & D. 315; Glass, March 7, 1833, 11 S. & D. 543; Smith, July 8, 1834, 12 S. & D. 890. In several former instances, the Court, on the minister's refusal to give a certificate, remitted to the sheriff of the county to inquire and report; Rattray, July 8, 1824, 3 S. & D. 232. See also 7 S. & D. 301; 9 S. & D. 308. This was done in a more recent case, where there were no elders in the parish; A. B., June 30, 1836, 14 D. B. M. 1040. In such cases, the sheriff may remit to the procurators for the poor to inquire into the poverty of the party. Where a kirk-session obstinately refuse to take the declaration of an applicant for the poor's-roll, in terms of the Act of Sederunt, and thereby occasion unusual delay and expense to the pauper, the Court will subject them in expenses to him; Morris, July 10, 1835, 13 S. & D. 1092. A certificate by the minister and elders of a dissenting congregation is not sufficient to support an application for the benefit of the poor's-roll; Elphinstone, Feb. 11, 1836, 14 S. & D. 463. The subscription of the minister implies his attestation, that the other subscribers designing themselves elders are really so; and a petition was ordered to be remitted to the lawyers for the poor, notwithstanding an allegation that these parties never had been ordained elders; A. B., Nov. 26, 1833, 12 S. & D. 127. The kirk-session has nothing to do with the merits of the action; Smith, July 8, 1834, 12 S. & D. 890. Ten days' previous intimation must be given to the adverse party of the time and place fixed for making the declaration or statement before the minister and elders; and evidence of the intimation must be produced to the minister, under the hands of a notary-public, messenger-at-arms, sheriff or town officer, or other officer of the law. The declaration of the party, and certificate of the minister and elders, and of intimation to the opposite party, are the warrant for a petition to the Court for the benefit of the poor's-roll. The petition need be in writing only, and must be boxed to the Lord President of the Division. A copy of the declaration of the party, and certificate by the minister and elders, must be appended to the copy so boxed. On moving this petition, if the above requisites have been complied with, the Court pronounce an interlocutor, ordering intimation in the Minute-book, and on the walls for ten days; after which the petition is again moved by the Lord President, and remitted to the lawyers and agents for the poor, to report whether the petitioner has a probabilis causa litigandi. It is the exclusive privilege of the counsel for the poor to judge whether there be probabilis causa, although the agents may differ from them; Clark, July 6, 1833, 11 S. & D. 908. And it is incompetent for the Court to review the judgment of the counsel for the poor as to the probabilis causa; Currie, Jan. 21, 1829, 7 S. & D. 302; A. B. Nov. 19, 1833, 12 S. & D. 58. It is no objection to effect being given to a report by the lawyers and agents for the poor, as to probabilis causa, that the Lord Ordinary before whom the cause depended had decided against the applicant; Gibb, June 15, 1833, 11 S. & D. 132. After a remit to the lawyers for the poor, and a report that there was probabilis causa, it was held too late to object that the certificate of poverty was informal, in respect of the ministers and elders omitting to state whether any of the applicant's allegations were within their own knowledge; and that objection was not allowed to be stated; Oat, July 9, 1836, 14 S. & D. 1120. Besides considering the causa litigandi, the counsel and agents to whom the remit is made must hear all objections offered by the adverse party to the truth of the statements contained in the declaration and certificate of poverty, and are entitled to demand additional evidence in regard to any particular which they may require to be proved, and to report thereon to the Court. If the Court find the petitioner entitled to the benefit of the poor's-roll, the counsel and agent who have made the report are appointed to conduct the petitioner's cause, and must continue to do so till its conclusion, or as long as the petitioner remains on the poor's-roll, although they may have ceased to be advocates and agents for the poor. No warrant for the benefit of the poor's-roll remains in force longer than two years from its date, except to the effect of entitling the poor person to a gratis extract of any decree which may have been pronounced; and the subsequent renewal, after an interval from the date of expiration, will not draw back in its effects to the intervening period; A. S. Aug. 10, 1784, § 5; Murdoch, June 3, 1825, 4 S. & D. 68. An application for a renewal must be made by note to the Lord President of the Division, accompanied by a report from the counsel in the cause, stating whether it appears that the petitioner has still a probabilis causa litigandi, and giving a concise detail of the steps which have been taken for bringing the process to a conclusion, and the cause which appears to have prevented a final determination. This note must be duly intimated to the agent for the adverse party in common form, before boxing it for the Lord President. On or before the sixth sederunt-day of each winter session, the advocates and agents for the poor must box a report to the Lord President of each Division of the state of the poor's-roll of that Division; the number and names of the persons enjoying the benefit of it, with the dates of their several warrants of admission or renewal, and any special matter relating to that roll generally, or to any particular case, which they may think the Court ought to know. The principal clerks of each Division must, on or before the sixth sederunt-day in each winter session, make up and report to the Lord President of each Division an abstract of the number of applications which have been presented for the benefit of the poor's-roll during the year preceding, with the manner in which they have been disposed of. When the Court remit a petition to the advocates and agents for the poor to consider, it is the duty of the writer to the signet, or agent named in the remit, to procure from the petitioner, or his former agent, information as to the circumstances of the case, and to draw up a full memorial thereof, and lay the same before the advocates and agents named in the remit, for enabling them to make their report; and if further evidence or explanation appear necessary, such agent must direct and assist the petitioner in procuring it. The names of the advocates and agents to whom the cause is remitted must be marked on the margin of the summons or defences, or letters of advocacy or suspension, and on the back of every subsequent paper given in for that party in the cause. No enrolment can be made except by the agent appointed as above, nor in the name of any advocate except of the counsel so appointed. The word "Poor" must be prefixed to the name of the party on every paper given into Court. No other advocate or agent than those appointed as above can be employed, or allow their names to be used in any stage of the cause; unless, on application to the Lord Ordinary or the Court, by a note signed by the advocate and agent already appointed, the assistance of one of the other advocates or writers for the poor is specially authorised; in which case, those first appointed, and those so added, shall thereafter act conjunctly in the cause. Notwithstanding this provision, it has been decided, that senior counsel is entitled, on application by the counsel for the poor, to act in the poor's cause without the special authority of the Court; Bell, Dec. 7, 1833, 12 S. & D. 187. In case of neglect or failure in any of the particulars above specified, the Court, on the application of the adverse party, open up and set aside the previous proceedings in the cause, and deprive the party of the benefit of the poor's-roll, or apply such other remedy as the circumstances of the case require. If a party on the poor's-roll gain his cause with expenses generally, this will be held to include the expense of getting on the roll; Cameron, June 25, 1814, F. C. But if this expense be not charged at the time, and the accounts be audited and decerned for, it cannot be afterwards claimed; Gentles, Nov. 15, 1827, 6 S. & D. 50. A party on the poor's-roll is liable to be subjected in expenses of process like other litigants. But a party on the poor's-roll residing beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, is not bound to sist a mandatory who shall be liable for expenses. See Mandatory. A party on the poor's-roll is equally liable with other litigants to suffer the penalties imposed in consequence of the neglect of agents. Thus, a party on the poor's-roll cannot be reponed against a decree in absence without payment of previous expenses like other litigants, unless it appear, upon investigation, that the decree so pronounced has gone out from the inability of the party to furnish information, and not from any fault or neglect of the agent in the cause, or the wilful neglect of the pauper himself; A. S. Dec. 23, 1825, and 11th July 1828, § 73. The Court exercise the same discretion in awarding expenses in regard to the causes of parties on the poor's-roll as to those of other litigants.

A further Act of Sederunt concerning the poor's-roll was passed 21st December 1842, by which the procedure is now regulated. By this act, in addition to the counsel and agents appointed for conducting the causes of the poor, two advocates, one writer to the signet, and one solicitor, are directed to be appointed each year to act exclusively as reporters on the probabilis causa of the pauper applicants for the benefit of the poor's-roll. This Act of Sederunt also regulates the mode of recovering and accounting for the dues of Court and professional charges, where the adverse party has been found liable in expenses.

The poor's-roll in the Sheriff Court is regulated by the A. S. 12th Nov. 1825, part 1, c. 21, which directs the procurators of court annually to appoint one or more of their number to act as procurators for the poor gratis, and that the appointment be approved of by the sheriff. Application for the benefit of the poor's-roll is made by petition, along with which there must be produced a certificate, signed by the minister of the parish, or by the heritor on whose lands the pauper resides, or by two elders, bearing that it consists with their personal knowledge that the person prosecuted, or who means to bring the action, is not possessed of funds for paying the expense thereof. This petition is remitted to the procurators for the poor, who must intimate it to the other party; and after hearing both parties, or inquiring into the case, report their opinion specially to the sheriff, whether the petitioner has a probabilis causa litigandi. On considering this report, the sheriff either refuses the petition, or remits to one or more of the procurators for the poor, who must attend to and conduct the cause to its final issue. The pauper is not liable in payment of any of the dues of court, or fees to the procurator, or to the officer, except actual outlay, unless expenses are awarded to him in the process. The Act of Sederunt of the same date (12th Nov. 1825,) relative to Burgh Courts, makes the same provisions with regard to the poor's-roll in such courts. See on the subject of the poor's-roll generally, 1424, c. 45; A. S. March 2, 1534; April 27, 1535; Nov. 20, 1686; June 9, 1710; June 16, 1742; Aug. 10, 1784; July 11, 1800; June 16, 1819; and Nov. 12, 1825; Bank. ii. 489; Frsk. Princ. 593-6; Kames' Stat. Law, h. t.; Mac-laurin's Sheriff Prac. 295; Dunlop's Parish Law, 279.

In the House of Lords parties are admitted to plead in forma pauperis, upon a petition setting forth their poverty, accompanied by an affidavit thereof, and a certificate from the minister and two elders of the parish where they reside; and if the prayer of the petition be granted, the cause proceeds in all other respects like any other cause, except that the fees of office and all other fees are avoided. See the forms of such petition and affidavit, Smith's Procedure upon Scotch Appeals, p. 82, et seq.

Pope. The Pope, before the abolition of Popery in Scotland, exercised an absolute jurisdiction over churchmen, independently altogether of the civil magistrate. In order to check a disposition on the part of the Protestant clergy to claim a similar independence of the Crown, the stat. 1584, c. 129, posterior to the Reformation, declared that the King's authority extended over all the estates, and that he, by himself and his council, should be judge competent to all persons, spiritual and temporal, in all matters on which they might be charged. Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 6; Dunl. i. 12; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. h. t.

Popular Action. In the Roman law there were certain actions which might have been insisted in by any person. Hence, an action of this description was termed an actio popularis; but in Scotland there is no such civil action, unless the actions competent to the nearest of kin of a minor be so, where the next of kin may pursue in the action of suspect tutory, or in the reduction of such deeds as a minor may have ratified by his oath; 1681, c. 19. There are other actions arising ex delicto, where statutory penalties are incurred, which, under special statutes, may be prosecuted by any person, the person availing himself of that privilege being usually called a common informer; to whom a certain share of the penalty is generally allowed by the statute under which the action is laid. Hume, ii. 115; *Bank. Porteous Roll. This was a roll of the names of offenders, which, by the old practice of the Justiciary Court, was prepared by the Justice-Clerk from the informations of crimes furnished to him or his deputies, by the local authorities, in the different districts comprehended within the circuits. The Justice-Clerk in former times seems also to have prepared the indictments, and to have taken the other steps necessary for bringing offenders to justice. See 1487, c. 99. This practice was altered by the statute 8 Anne, c. 16, §§ 3, 4. See Hume, ii. 24, et seq.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 86; *Kames' Stat. Porteur of a Bill; the payee or holder of a bill of exchange. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, § 25. See Bill of Exchange.

Portioner; is the proprietor of a small feu or portion of land.

Portioners, Heirs. See Heirs-Portioners.

Ports and Harbours. Free ports are inter regalia, or in patrimonio principis. The sole right of erecting or of holding public ports and harbours is vested in the Crown; unless when this right is limited by royal or parliamentary grants to communities or subjects. One who obtains a grant of a harbour is bound to keep it in sufficient repair, and is entitled to levy harbour-dues for that purpose. Such dues are leviable as are warranted by immemorial usage. The grantee is not bound to repair or improve the harbour out of his own means; neither is he entitled, without authority of Parliament, to exact additional dues, in order to indemnify himself for any extraordinary expenditure or improvements. The public are entitled to insist that the harbour shall be kept up so far as the means afforded by the dues extend. *Ersk. Positive Prescription. See Prescription Positive Servitude. See Servitude.

Posse Comitatus; the power or force of the county, which the sheriff has a right to call out for the enforcement of the diligence of the law.

Possession; is accounted the chief test of property; but there is a distinction between the effect of possession in heritable and in moveable property. The title to heritable property must be instructed scripto, and regularly by charter and sasine. Without such evidence, possession of heritage will not confer property; neither will the want of possession deprive a person of his property, whose title is founded on charter and sasine; unless prescriptive possession on an adverse title has taken place. Mere possession without a written title confers no right in heritage. The possession of moveables, again, is regulated by a different rule; for where things have never belonged to any one, (e. g., pearls or pebbles found on the sea-shore, or wild fowl, or beasts of the chase,) the possession or occupancy of them creates property. In things, again, which have had an owner, possession has the effect of raising a presumption in favour of the holder, which will require from the former proprietor not only evidence that they were his, but also of the manner in which he came to lose his possession. Hence, where a disputed article has been taken out of the possession of the holder vi aut clam—that is, by force or fraud—the judge will first of all restore it to the person who was in possession of it, before he decides the point of right. On this subject, see Bona Fides and Mala Fides. Possession is divided into natural and civil. Natural possession is where the proprietor is himself actually in possession, as of lands by cultivation, and by sowing and reaping the crops; of a house, by inhabiting it; of moveables, by having them in his hand or in his custody. Civil possession, on the other hand, is possession not by the owner, but by another in his name, or for his behoof, as of lands by a tenant, the rents of which are drawn by the proprietor or his factor, or of property by a trustee or by a liferenter, or of a pledge by the creditor. There is a further division of possession, into that which is acquired lawfully and that which is acquired vi aut clam. But a distinction is taken between force and fraud. Possession attempted to be acquired by force may be resisted by force; but possession, being once obtained in this way, must be reclaimed by the true owner judicially; the party who has ceased to possess being bound to trust to the protection of the law for restitution, and not to the strength of his own arm.

In the case of fraud, there can be no appeal to force; and where possession has been acquired by either of these means, it is the duty of the judge to restore it to him from whom it has been taken, without waiting to settle the question of right; *Ersk. Possessory Action. A possessory action is one in which the point of right is not directly concerned, but barely that of possession. Such actions are competent either for attaining, retaining, or recovering possession. An action of molestation, by which a proprietor of heritage complains of being disturbed in his possession, is an instance of this form of action. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 47; Stair, B. iv. tit. 26; Bank. ii. 619; Bell's Princ. § 2249; Ross's Lect. ii. 279. See Ejection and Intrusion. Molestation.

Possessory Judgment. A possessory judgment is one which entitles a person, who has been in uninterrupted possession for seven years, to continue his possession until the question of right shall be decided in due course of law. Thus, for example, a tenant who has been in the peaceable possession of lands for seven years under a written lease of a longer endurance than seven years, is entitled to the benefit of a possessory judgment, whereby he will be maintained in possession until his title, if it be defective, is regularly reduced and set aside in the proper action. It has been held that a party may be entitled to the benefit of a possessory judgment regarding a servitude of ish and entry to a plot of ground, though he held the ground under a bounding charter making no reference to such servitude, and containing no clause of parts and pertinents; Liston, Dec. 3, 1836, 14 S. & D. 97. But a party who possessed a piece of ground from 1821 to 1828, under a disposition reserving a servitude of road in favour of a third party, having then got a new disposition from his author (whom he guaranteed against the consequences) omitting the clause of servitude, and having burnt the prior disposition, was found not entitled, in 1831, to a possessory judgment, in a question with the party in whose favour the servitude was reserved; Ross, Feb. 28, 1833, 11 S. & D. 467. The origin of this right, according to Erskine, is supposed to have been, that where there are subaltern rights of the same lands granted to vassals, and by them to sub-vassals, the vassal or sub-vassal not being master of the original title-deeds, which commonly remain with the highest superior, might be turned out of his possession by one who, though he had no good right at bottom, might yet produce a title prior to any in the hands of the possessor himself. This remedy relieves the proprietor from all risk of being deprived of his possession by one who has no title to his property. If he is dispossessed, it must be by one who, in law, is truly vested with a preferable right. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 50, and B. ii. tit. 6, § 28; Stair, B. ii. tit. 1, § 25; tit. 3, § 73; tit. 8, § 29; B. iv. tit. 23, § 16; Bank. vol. i. p. 513; Bell's Princ. § 2251; Bell on Leases, i. 89; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 481, 557.

Post Proximum Terminum Minime Valiturus. Precepts from Chancery for infesting the heir of a deceased Crown vassal must be executed before the lapse of the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the date of the precept; under the sanction of nullity. Such precepts were formerly directed to the sheriff of the county; and the sheriff-clerk only (except under special circumstances) could officiate as notary at giving infestment. The limitation of the precept in point of time is thus expressed: "Post proximum terminum minime valiturus." The reason assigned for this limitation is, that the casualties are not calculated beyond the term preceding the special service of the heir; and if another term were suffered to elapse before executing the precept, a new precept and an additional calculation of the casualties would be necessary. 1540, c. 77; 1606, c. 15; *A. By the act 8 and 9 Vict. c. 35, 1845, precepts from Chancery may be addressed to any notary-public; and by the Titles to Lands Act, 1858, the precept may be recorded in the Register of Sasines, in place of expeding infestment on the warrant of sasine or the precept. See Titles to Land.

Posthumous Child; is a child born after the death of the father. This does not make any difference in the legal rights of the child. A posthumous child cannot be charged to enter heir till a year after his birth; Livingston, 28th Feb. 1628, M. 6870, Brown's Supp. i. 375. A bond of provision in favour of two daughters, as the grantor's younger children, and executed in virtue of a power given by an entail to provide for younger children, was extended to a posthumous child; Chapman, 10th Dec. 1794; Bell's Cases, 15;

Postliminii Jus. By the Roman law, when one was taken in war, and made a slave, his rights as a freeman were not entirely destroyed: they were only suspended—and if he made his escape, they eo ipso revived; so that he could not be reclaimed, unless again enslaved in the regular way. This right which such slaves enjoyed was called jus postliminii; and the term has been employed, in modern times, in questions respecting the right to retake a ship which has been captured and made its escape. *Inst. of Just. Power of Attorney; is a power given by one man to another to act for him. This is properly an English term: the Scotch deed is called a factory or commission. For the form of a power of attorney, see Jurid. Styles, ii. 293, et seq. See Agent. Factor. Procurator. Mandate.

Power of Sale. In heritable securities for debt, whether in the form of heritable bonds, or of bonds and dispositions in security, it is now almost the invariable practice, to insert a clause conferring on the creditor a power to sell the heritable subject of the security, in the event of the debt not being paid within a certain time (commonly six months) after a formal demand of payment. This clause formerly took the creditor bound to make the demand of payment on the debtor personally, or at his dwelling-house, if he were in Scotland, or edictally if he were furth of Scotland. If, after such requisition, and the lapse of the limited time, the debt was not repaid, the creditor was then empowered to sell the subject of the security by public roup, after due advertisement (generally for two months) in certain specified newspapers. The clause conferring this power farther authorised the creditor, in name of the debtor, to enter into articles of roup, and to grant a disposition or dispositions to the purchasers, containing the usual clauses, and binding the debtor and his heirs in absolute warrandice, as also obliging him and them to corroborate and confirm the sale, and to grant all deeds requisite for rendering it effectual. There was then a declaration, that the sale should be equally good to the purchaser as if the debtor himself had made it—a power to adjourn the roup—to fix the upset price, and so forth; and finally, the debtor bound himself, and his heirs and successors, to ratify and confirm the sale, and to execute and deliver to the purchaser, if necessary, all requisite deeds. As to the purchaser, it was declared that he was to have no concern with the application of the price; while, on the other hand, the creditor, in the event of making a sale, was taken bound to account to the debtor for the surplus of the price, after repayment of the debt, with interest and the necessary expenses of the sale.

In virtue of the act 10 and 11 Vict. c. 50, 1847, the clause is now in these terms—"And on default in payment, I grant power of sale;" and the clause so framed has the effect specified in the third section of the act, and which is the same as that authorised by the clause in the old form.

The power of sale is held to be so far of the nature of a mandate; but quoad the creditor, he is, as it were, procurator in rem suam; and hence the mandate is not revocable by the debtor, nor does it expire either by his death or bankruptcy. Neither can the creditor, when exercising a power of sale regularly and fairly, be interrupted by a process of ranking and sale at the instance of the other creditors of the debtor, or by a mercantile sequestration of his estates. Simson v. Graham, 25th Nov. 1831, 10 S. & D. 66. But the precautions which are necessary to secure a fair sale, at an adequate price, must be punctually observed; and the Court of Session, at the suit of any party having interest, will interpose and order all reasonable precautions to be taken. It is held, however, that the creditor with a power of sale is, to a certain extent, a trustee for the debtor, bound to act with due regard to his reversionary interest; and hence the Court holds that it can competently interfere ex aequitate, where the creditor is proceeding nimiously, or with undue selfishness, in the exercise of the power of sale. See the case of Beveridge v. Wilson, 17th Jan. 1829, 7 S. 27. It has been decided, that advertisement of the sale in a newspaper containing advertisements only is sufficient compliance with a general obligation on the creditor to advertise in a newspaper; Dickson, 15th Jan. 1831, 9 S. & D. 282.

By the act 10 and 11 Vict. c. 50, 1847, a creditor who exercises a power of sale is bound to count and reckon for the surplus of the price, and to consign it in bank in the joint names of himself and the purchaser. On this being done, the disposition by the creditor to the purchaser has the effect of completely disencumbering the lands of all securities and diligences posterior to the security of the creditor, as well as of his own security and diligence. Bell's Princ. § 891; Illust. ib.; *Jurid. Prædial Servitudes; are real servitudes, affecting heritage, and taking the name from prædium, a tenement of land or houses. See Servitudes.

Prædial Tithes; are tithes arising from land, in contradistinction to the tithes arising from animals. See Tiends.

Præmunire; is the forfeiture of lands and tenements, goods and chattels, and imprisonment during the Sovereign's pleasure. The term is derived from præmunire, an ancient English writ, introduced for the purpose of repressing the papal encroachments on the power of the Crown. It was authorised by statutes passed with a view to extinguish that power; and from the first words of the writ, præmunire facias, both the writ and the punishment received the name of a præmunire. Persons who, by preaching, teaching, or advisedly speaking, maintain that any person has right to the Crown of these realms, otherwise than according to the Act of Settlement, or that the King (or Queen) of this realm, with the authority of Parliament, is not competent to make laws to bind the Crown and the descent thereof, subject themselves to the penalties of præmunire; 6 Anne, c. 7. And by c. 23, it is declared to be a præmunire for the Peers of Scotland, assembled to elect their representatives, to presume to treat of any matter but the election. It is more than a century since there was an instance of a prosecution for a præmunire. Hume, i. 523. See Election Laws; also Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Præpositor. See Institutor.

Præpositura of a Wife. Where a wife is præposita negotiis by her husband—that is, intrusted with the management either of a particular branch, or of his whole affairs—all the contracts she enters into, and even the debts due by her for goods, though not constituted by writing, but arising from furnishings made to her, are effectual against the husband, though not against herself; for she acts for her husband. This power given to the wife may be constituted either by a written faculty, or tacitly by use, where the husband has seen and approved of her acting. The wife, in domestic matters, is presumed, while she resides with her husband, to be præposita negotiis domesticis—that is, invested with the management of the family—in which character she may purchase whatever the family requires; and the husband will be liable for the price, though the article may have been otherwise applied, although the husband may have given his wife money for the purchase. When money is borrowed by the wife in the character of præposita negotiis, the lender must show that it was needed at the time, and expended on necessary furnishings. The wife's presumed right to superintend her husband's family ceases if she abandon her family, and may be put an end to at the pleasure of the husband by inhibition. *Ersk. Præpositus; was the head of a collegiate church, under whom were canons or prebendaries, so called because they had a stipendium or præbenda, each according to his degree in the church. Ersk. B. i. tit. 5. § 3.

Prævento Termino; an obsolete form of action, formerly in use in the Court of Session, and resorted to by a charger against whom a bill of suspension had been presented. The object of this action was to defeat a device sometimes fallen upon by the suspender, who, in order to obtain delay, got distant day of compearance assigned in the deliverance on the bill of suspension; and as the suspender could not insist to get the reasons of suspension discussed until the day of compearance specified in the deliverance had arrived, the object of the action prævento termino was to accelerate the term for discussing the suspension or advocacy, by getting an earlier day fixed. The present forms of the Bill-Chamber supersede the necessity of such an action, and it has been long disused. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3. § 21; Bank. ii. 623. See Suspension.

Preamble of Statutes. The preamble of the statute is the narrative, which recites the inconveniences which it is the object of the new enactment to remedy. In questions of construction of the enacting clauses, inferences drawn from the preamble are exceedingly liable to error. Ersk. B. i. tit. 1. § 49; Stair, B. iv. tit. 45. § 13. See Statute.

Prebend; in the Episcopal Church, is a benefice appropriated for the maintenance of a clerk, or member of a collegiate or cathedral church. The prebendary is the clerk or clergyman, and is one of the chapter or council of the dean who enjoys the benefice. Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, § 15; Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 3; Bank. i. 558; ii. 6.

Precarise; were agreements by which proprietors yielded up their lands to the Church, and received them back on payment of a rent, which varied according to circumstances. The form of a precaria is given in Bell on Leases, i. 7. See also Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 14.

Precarium. The contract of precarium is a gratuitous loan, in which the lender gives the use of the subject in express words, revocable at pleasure. In such a loan, the lender is entitled to demand back the subject lent at any time; and as the borrower is thus at all times bound to redeliver it, he is liable for its preservation only de dolo et culpa lata—that is, for gross omissions or culpable negligence. But if, after the subject has been demanded, the borrower delays to return it, he must make it good, should it be destroyed even by accident. On the death of the borrower the loan terminates, and his heir must account for the profits while the subject of the loan continues in his possession. But the death of the lender does not put an end to the loan, nor does it terminate until the article is demanded by the heir of the lender. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 25; Stair, B. i. tit. 11, § 10; Bank. i. 327; Bell's Princ. § 196. See Loan. Mutuum. Commodate.

Precentor; in the Presbyterian Church, is the person whose duty it is to lead the congregation in the singing of psalms. He is, in the ordinary case, appointed by the kirk-session; but this rule may be altered by circumstances conferring the patronage on an individual or a corporation; or it may be otherwise provided by the decree of erection of the parish. Precentors are removeable at pleasure. Although in country parishes, the same individual is frequently precentor, schoolmaster, and session-clerk, there is no necessary connection between these offices; and a party holding one of them cannot be compelled to do the duties of any of the others, unless by special engagement. There is no general provision for the precentor's remuneration, but in practice he usually receives certain fees. As preparatory to a process of augmentation, the precentor must furnish a certificate, that on three several Sundays he announced the minister's intention to raise the process. The form of the certificate is given in Jurid. Styles, iii. 488. See Dunlop's Parochial Law. See Church Officers. Augmentation.

Precept of Arrestment; is a warrant issued by the judge of an inferior court, authorising the officers of court to arrest for the amount of the debt contained in the decree to which the precept refers, in the hand of any person residing within the jurisdiction of the judge. See Arrestment.

Precept of Poinding. See Poinding.

Precept of Sasine. A precept of sasine is the order of a superior to his bailie to give infeftment of certain lands to his vassal. Prior to the act 1672, c. 7, the precept of sasine was a separate deed from the grant or charter; but that act required, that in all Crown charters, the precept should be inserted before the conclusion of the charter; and thenceforward the practice prevailed, of inserting the precept immediately before the testing clause of the charter or other deed in which the grant or conveyance is made. The precept is in the form of a mandate authorising a mandatary, whose name is left blank, and who is appointed bailie in that part, to give infeftment to the vassal in the lands described in the deed. But, as such mandates fell by the death of either the granter or receiver, that great practical inconvenience was removed by the act 1693, c. 35, which declares a precept of sasine to be a sufficient warrant for giving sasine as well after as before the death either of the granter or grantee, or both, provided the sasine taken after the death of either party deduce the title of those in whose favour the sasine is given. The unexecuted precept of sasine may be assigned. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 33. Precepts of sasine are contained not only in original charters and charters by progress, but in dispositions by sellers to purchasers, even though it is not meant that the purchaser should be the vassal of the seller; but this peculiarity in our practice has been explained under the articles, Disposition; Charter; Confirmation; Consolidation. There is also another precept of sasine, called a precept of clare constat, which is a warrant granted by a superior authorising his bailies, whose names are also left blank, to give infeftment to the heir of his vassal. This precept cannot be transferred or assigned like the precept in a charter or disposition. It necessarily is, by its nature and express terms, a warrant for a sasine in favour of the heir in whose favour it is given, and of no one else. Hence, precepts of clare constat are excepted from the act 1693, c. 35. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 71. See Clare Constat. See generally, on precept of sasine, Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 33; Stair, App. § 1; Bell's Com. i. 674-5, 696-7; Bell's Princ. §§ 764, 876; Illust. 876; *Kames' Stat. Precognition; in criminal law, is an examination by the judge-ordinary or justices of peace, usually conducted under the superintendence of the procurator-fiscal, where any crime has been committed, in order that the facts connected with the offence may be ascertained, and full and perfect information given to the public prosecutor, to enable him to prepare the libel and carry on the prosecution. In this investigation, which is entirely ex parte, the witnesses are not usually put upon oath, and they must be examined separately; nor is the accused, or any person on his behalf, admitted to be present when the precognition is taken. It is competent, however, to put the witnesses on oath in their precognition, with the exception of the party accused, or one to whose testimony there is a legal objection. Neither is the accused allowed to cite witnesses in exculpation, or to see a copy of the precognition after it is taken. Those who know anything of the fact may be compelled to come forward; and, for this purpose, the magistrate officiating at the precognition grants a warrant to summon them, which, should they disobey, will be followed by a warrant of imprisonment until they comply. The precognition must be taken prior to the service of the indictment or criminal letters; for after that, communications between the prosecutor and the witnesses are improper. But although this inquiry is ex parte, and for the use of the public prosecutor, yet, if the accused make a reasonable suggestion as to the propriety of precognosing any particular individual, the judge-examiner, in the ordinary case, attends to that suggestion, and cites and examines such persons as may be named by the accused as likely to establish his innocence. The precognition should be reduced into writing, and signed by the witnesses, according to their usual mode of spelling; and their correct and full designation should be inserted at the commencement of their declaration. The duty of conducting precognitions now belongs to sheriffs, magistrates of burghs, and justices of peace. Their responsibility is limited by special statute, and they are liable in damages only where they can be proved to have acted maliciously and without probable cause. Hume, ii. 78 et seq., and 365; Alison's Prac. 134; *Ersk. In precognosing witnesses preparatory to a proof in a jury trial in a civil cause, the agent ought to avoid everything likely to raise objections against their admissibility. He should confine himself to the asking of questions, and ought not to give or read to the proposed witnesses any parts of the process, or communicate to them any version of facts of his own, or state to them the nature of the action, the views of it favourable to his client, or the respective pleas of the parties. If the precognition is reduced into writing, it should not be subscribed by or read to the witness, or given him to read. Affidavits should not be taken from witnesses, nor should they be precognosed upon oath. Neither ought one witness to be present at the precognition of another. But it was held not to be a good objection to a witness, that she had been precognosed in presence of her husband, who was also a witness, it having appeared that her presence was accidental. By the act 15 and 16 Viet. c. 27, 1852, no person can be excluded from giving evidence by reason of having appeared without citation, or by reason of having been precognosed after the date of citation. Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 114; MacLaurin's Sheriff Prac. 158. Pregnancy. A woman who conceals her pregnancy, and does not call for help in the birth, and whose child is amissing, is held, under the act 1690, c. 21, to be guilty of murder. See Concealment of Pregnancy. Where a pregnant woman is convicted of a capital crime, sentence will be delayed; or, if sentence have been pronounced, the execution of it may be suspended until after the birth of the child; Hume, ii. 452, et seq. Pregnancy, where the child, if born, would be the heir to an estate, will stop a service by a remoter heir; and the child in utero will not only be presumed to be in life, but will be presumed to be a male. But the mere possibility that a nearer heir may be begotten will not have this effect: the service of the nearest heir for the time will proceed, though a nearer heir under the destination may possibly come to exist. *Ersk. Premises; is properly an English law term, and is said to be "that part in the beginning of a deed the office of which is to express the grantor and grantee, and the land or thing granted." It is further said, that no person not named in the premises can take any "thing by the deed, though he be afterward named in the habendum." This term has no such acceptation in the law of Scotland; but, with us, the term premises is applied generally to the subject-matter of the deed, and sometimes it is used to signify the lands or houses which are the subject of the right or conveyance. See Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Ross's Lect. ii. 141, 231, 344.

Premium of Insurance. See Insurance.

Premonition; is the first step in the order of redemption against a wadsetter or heritable creditor. The premonition is an act of the law, whereby the reverser or his procurator gives notice to the wadsetter, under form of instrument, to appear at the time and place pointed out by the clause of redemption, and then and there to receive payment of the debt. If, on this premonition, the wadsetter accepts of the money and renounces the right, the redemption is said to be voluntary. If he refuse to receive the money, or if he be abroad or incapacitated from acting, it must be consigned in the hands of the consignee pointed out by the clause of redemption; and if no consignee be named, then in the hands of a responsible person; and, in evidence of what takes place, a notarial instrument, setting forth the procedure, called an instrument of consignment, is executed. This stops the currency of interest on the heritable debt against the reverser, and renders the wadsetter or heritable creditor accountable for the rents from the time the order was used, and becomes the foundation of a declarator of redemption of the lands. *Ersk. Prerogative. The royal prerogative, in a large acceptation, includes all those rights of which, by law, the Sovereign (as exercising the executive powers of government) is possessed. The Sovereign, by virtue of the prerogative, is exempted from all taxes collected personally from the subject, and not mingled with the price of the commodity before it is known by whom it is to be used. Hence, an express sent on Government service is not liable to pay post-horse duty. In like manner, in virtue of the royal prerogative, royal palaces are privileged against the intrusion of the officers of the law, to execute civil process against the effects of persons having the use of apartments therein. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Bank. ii. 666. See King. Government. Sanctuary.

Prerogative Process. See Crown Debt. Extent.

Prerogative Court; is the court in England wherein all wills are proved, and all administrations taken, which belong to the Archbishop of Canterbury by his prerogative; that is, in the case where the deceased had goods of any considerable value out of the diocese wherein he died. The Archbishop of York has also a similar court, termed his Exchequer, but inferior to the other in power and profit. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Executor. Confirmation.

Presbytery; one of the judicatories of the Church of Scotland. A presbytery includes a number of parishes, the number varying according to circumstances; in some cases there being no less than thirty, in others no more than four parishes in a presbytery. The General Assembly has power to disjoin and erect presbyteries at pleasure. In order to get a new presbytery erected, or to have one or more parishes disjoined from one presbytery and annexed to another, a petition is presented to the General Assembly, or a representation is made to it, setting forth the circumstances which make these objects desirable. The Assembly makes the necessary inquiries, and judges accordingly. There are at present eighty-two presbyteries in the Church of Scotland. Each parish within a presbytery sends a minister and a lay elder to the Presbytery; and the professors of divinity (if ministers) in any university within the bounds of the presbytery, are also members. A moderator of the presbytery, who must be a minister, is chosen twice a year, at which times the roll is made up. The functions of the presbytery are, to judge in the references for advice, the complaints and appeals which come from the kirk-sessions within the bounds, to examine schoolmasters on their appointments, to provide for the annual examination of the parochial and other schools of the district, and to make an annual report on this subject to the General Assembly. It belongs to presbyteries to grant licenses to preach the gospel, and to judge of the qualifications of those who apply for them. It also belongs to presbyteries to receive and investigate charges against the characters of ministers. See Fama Clamosa. Presbyteries have the power of meeting when they please; but it is necessary, before the meeting is closed, to resolve when the next meeting is to be held, to enter this resolution in the minutes, and to cause it to be publicly intimated by the officer, otherwise the presbytery is defunct, and, without the intervention of the superior court, has no power to reassemble for business. A pro re nata meeting of presbytery is called by the moderator, either ex proprio motu, when anything has occurred which appears to him to require the assembling of the presbytery before the time of the ordinary meeting, or on application made to him by some of the members of presbytery, with a statement of the grounds on which the application is made. No other business but that for which the pro re nata meeting has been called can be transacted at such meeting. The clerk and officer of the presbytery are of its own appointment. Prescription. Prescription has been said by lawyers to be a method both of acquiring and of losing a right. Hence it has been divided into positive and negative; the former being the mode of acquiring property, or rather of protecting the right from farther challenge, by reason of the possessor's having continued his possession for the legal period: the latter, which is the converse of the former, is the loss of a right by neglecting to follow it forth, or use it during the whole time limited by law. In the article Limitation, the distinction drawn by some writers between the loss of rights by prescription, properly so called, and the loss by limitation, has been adverted to. In the present article it will be sufficient, with reference to each particular prescription, to state whether it is classed as a prescription proper or a limitation. The subject will be briefly considered here under the following arrangement:—

I. OF THE POSITIVE PRESCRIPTION.

II. OF THE NEGATIVE PRESCRIPTION.

III. OF THE LESSER PRESCRIPTIONS; as,

1. Of the Vicennial Prescription.
2. Of the Decennial Prescription.
3. Of the Septennial Prescription.
4. Of the Sexennial Prescription.
5. Of the Quinquennial Prescription.
6. Of the Triennial Prescription.
7. Of Prescription of Crimes.

IV. OF THE CURRENCY OF PRESCRIPTION, AND OF ITS INTERRUPTION.

I. OF THE POSITIVE PRESCRIPTION.

The positive prescription was introduced by the act 1617, c. 12, which, on the preamble of the inconveniences arising from the loss of titles, and the danger of forgery, after the means of improbation are lost by the lapse of time, and the numerous lawsuits which are thus engendered, enacts that, whatever heritages the lieges, their predecessors and authors, have possessed by themselves, or others in their names, lands, annualrents, or other heritages, peaceably, in virtue of infeftments, for the space of forty years, continually and together, from the date of their said infeftments, and without any lawful interruption therein, during the said space, that such persons, their heirs and successors, shall never be troubled, pursued, nor inquieted in the heritable right and property of the said heritages, by their superiors or others pretending right to the same by virtue of prior infeftments, or any other ground except forgery; provided they be able to show a charter of the said lands preceding the said forty years, with the instrument of sasine following thereon; or, where there is no charter extant, that they show instruments of sasine, one or more, continued and standing together for the said space of forty years, either proceeding upon retour, or upon precepts of clars constat; which rights (being clad with forty years' continual and peaceable possession without interruption) shall be valid and sufficient rights for enjoying the said heritages. Such is the nature of the enactment on which the positive prescription is founded. It extends to all heritable subjects, even to tacks and servitudes, which do not require nor admit of sasine; and as to those rights which do not require sasine, forty years' possession is by itself sufficient. There are certain peculiarities in prescription of the right of patronage, as to which see Patronage. The possession must, by the words of the statute, be continued from the date of the infeftments; but practice has explained this to mean possession as far back as memory can go; for where there is evidence of possession, consistently with the terms of a sasine, as far back as memory goes, without evidence of any interruption, the presumption of law is, that it must have reached to the date of the sasine. See Immemorial. In this question, the possession of the liferenter is that of the fiar; Neilson, Feb. 26, 1823, 2 S. d. D. 247. It seems to have been the idea at one time, that the possession must have stood during the whole space of the forty years on infeftments; but that has been explained more consistently with the expressions of the statute in the case of Caitcheon, Jan. 22, 1791, Mor. 10810, in which it was held that possession by an apparent heir uninfeft was possession under the sasine of the ancestor, within the meaning of the statute, and therefore was to be computed as part of the forty years, contrary to the former opinion on that point; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, § 4

5. The possession must be uninterrupted; there must be neither an instrument of protest nor an attempt on the part of those claiming the subject to enter into possession; this is expressly required by the act. With regard to the titles to be produced, a distinction is made between the case of an heir and of a purchaser. The purchaser must produce not only a sasine, but the disposition in his own favour, or in favour of his author, on which it proceeds, dated previously to the forty years' possession; the heir is required to produce only sasines, one or more. The forty years being elapsed, it is only requisite that the charter and sasine, or, in the case of an heir, the sasine alone, shall be regular and valid deeds. Whether the title of the grantor was good, or whether a preferable title is not now in competition, are questions which will not be entertained. It is sufficient that the title of possession is ex facie regular, and that it has been followed by forty years' possession, to silence all possible objections, save that of fraud in the titles; for where the titles have been forged or fabricated, they cannot be the ground of prescription. An adjudication with sasine is a good title to ground prescription; and if followed by forty years' possession, it confers an effectual and irredeemable right. It is not competent, after forty years' possession has followed upon a title ex facie absolute, to allege that the right originally flowed from a title qualified with a power of redemption. See Adjudication. A clause of part and pertinent may form a prescriptive title to a subject not specially named in the charter. And titles to a barony form a sufficient title on which to acquire by prescription a right of property in an island situated in a river opposite to it, as part and pertinent, though the island be included per expressum as a separate tenement in the titles of a third party; Magistrates of Perth, Nov. 19, 1829, 8 S. & D. 82. See also E. of Fife's Trustees, Jan. 16, 1830, 8 S. & D. 326, and Jan. 25, 1831, 9 S. & D. 336. See Part and Pertinent. Possession on apparency may go to make up the years of prescription: thus, if a party has, by himself and his authors, possessed an estate on a retour, with sasine prior and posterior to a possession on apparency, for a period, including the apparency, of more than forty years, but not so exclusive of the apparency, he has a good prescriptive possession; Neilson, Feb. 26, 1823, 2 S. & D. 247. When one has more than one title in his person, it is sometimes of importance to determine on which title he is to be held as having possessed during the years of prescription. This question depends very much upon the circumstances of the case, as whether the holder of two titles is under any obligation to adopt either of them in preference to the other,—whether he has shown an obvious intention to possess upon one title rather than upon the other,—which of the titles is more beneficial, &c. No invariable rule, therefore, can be laid down upon the point. Cases in which this question has occurred are cited in Bell's Princ. § 2020, and Illust. ib. See also Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 6. A person having more than one title in his person is to be held as possessing on them all, to the effect of preserving his own right. It has been already observed that prescription runs in favour of heritable rights, though not feudal. A party holding a fee-simple assignation of a lease in his own favour, and being also institute under an entailed assignation, granted by the same party of the same lease, and having enjoyed possession of the subjects for forty years, and done certain acts, referring his possession to the fee-simple assignation, was held to have acquired a prescriptive fee-simple right, the entailed assignation being held extinguished. The same party having right in fee-simple, as heir of his father, to the lease of another subject, and also as institute under an entailed assignation made by his father, and having possessed for more than forty years, his possession was imputed to the entailed assignation, and he was held not to have acquired a prescriptive right under the fee-simple title; Maule, March 4, 1829, 7 S. & D. 527, and App. On the subject of the positive prescription generally, consult the following authorities: Ersk. Macneall, March 4, 1858, 20 D. 735; Sandford's Heritable Succession, ii. 124-74.

II. OF THE NEGATIVE PRESCRIPTION.

The negative prescription of obligations, by the lapse of forty years, was first introduced by the statute 1469, c. 29, which declares that the person having interest in an obligation shall follow the same within the space of forty years, and take document thereupon; and if he does not, that it shall prescribe and be of no avail. This enactment was repeated and enforced by the act 1474, c. 55. These acts were at first confined to simple obligations. Practice, however, extended this prescription to mutual obligations; and the act 1617, c. 12, included heritable bonds and other heritable rights.

The act 1617, c. 12, ordains "that all actions competent by law upon heritable bonds, reversions, contracts, or others whatsoever, either already made or to be made, after the date hereof, shall be pursued within the space of forty years after the date of the same, except the said reversions be incorporate within the body of the infeftments produced by the possessor of the lands, for his title of the same, or registered in the Clerk Registrar's books; in which case, seeing all suspicion of falsehood ceases, the actions on the said reversions should be perpetual, excepting actions of warrandice, which shall not prescribe from the date of the bond or infeftment, but only from the date of the eviction, from which date the forty years shall run." And it is further declared, "That in the course of the forty years' prescription, the years of minority and less-age shall in no-wise be counted, but only the years during which the parties against whom the prescription is used and objected were majors, and past twenty-one years of age." The principle of this prescription is grounded on the same salutary reasons on which the positive prescription is founded; and the object of both is to free parties from the effect of rights which may evict property; and from claims of debt, after such a lapse of time as, from the age of the title or of the voucher, may be likely to introduce fraud or forgery; or where, although the debt may have once existed, yet it may have been discharged, and all traces of the discharge of it lost. The negative prescription does even more; for it not only presumes the debt to have been extinguished, but considers the silence for forty years as a dereliction of the debt on the part of the creditor, and refuses to raise it up, even were the debtor to acknowledge that it never had been paid; or that he did not know whether it had been paid or not. The lapse of the forty years, in short, raises a præsumptio juris et de jure against the existence of the debt tantamount to the most formal discharge. The act declares, that the years of prescription shall commence from the date of the obligation; but on the principle that the loss of the debt is the penalty of the creditor's negligence, practice has made the currency of the prescription commence from the term of payment as the period at which the negligence of the creditor commences; and the payment of interest, or even a partial payment of the debt, interrupts this prescription. See Partial Payment. In the case of obligations, this produces no difficulty; the debtor is entitled to plead the negative prescription. But as this prescription has been extended so as to strike against actions competent on heritable securities, and other claims on heritage not sued within the forty years, questions of nicety have arisen as to what persons are entitled to plead the prescription. On more occasions than one, it has been held that actions founded on rights of property in land cannot be lost by the negative prescription, unless they be excluded by a positive right in the person who pleads the prescription; because, as the negative prescription confers no right on him who pleads it, but merely extinguishes his adversary's right, so no one but he who has himself acquired a positive right of property in the lands can have an interest to plead that his adversary has lost his right, since that fact is not of itself sufficient to transfer the right to the person pleading it; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 8. This point was again discussed in a recent case respecting a right of patronage; and it was found that the right of patronage could not be lost by the negative prescription unless another acquired it by the positive; Macdonell, Feb. 26, 1828, 6 S. & D. 600. The right of setting aside a deed upon objections not appearing on the face of the deed, as a reduction ex capite lecti, is lost if not used within forty years. Improbation on the head of forgery is not lost by the negative prescription—neither is the right of blood or title as an heir lost by not using it; and the heir may enter heir forty years after the right has opened to him. See Jus Sanguinis. The right to exact feu-duties and casualties of superiority cannot be lost, though all arrears beyond forty years may be lost by silence during that time. A servitude may be lost by the lapse of the forty years. With regard to tithes, vicarage and parsonage tithes are not in similar circumstances; the smaller vicarage tithes are not universally due; the right to exact them is established by usage, and may be lost by contrary usage; and therefore they fall under the negative prescription. But patronage tithes, which are due by law, cannot be lost by a neglect to demand them for any length of time, though the demand, when it is made, cannot extend to arrears beyond the forty years. In the same way, the right to an annuity, whether for life or for a certain period, will not be lost by the negative prescription, though each year's annuity will run the course of the negative prescription. of Barns v. Barns' Trustees, March 5, 1857, 19 D. 626.

The case of Paterson v. Wilson, Jan. 25, 1859, 21 D. 322, was an action of exhibition of an alleged disposition in favour of the pursuer's grandfather, and of declarator of property founded on the alleged disposition. The action was met by the plea of negative prescription. The pursuer pleaded in reply, that the negative prescription could not exclude a claim of property in an heritable subject. The plea of prescription was sustained. LORD PRESIDENT observed:—"I see no answer to the plea of negative prescription. The action is brought for the purpose of compelling production of an alleged deed, and then for declarator that a certain property belongs to the pursuer. The plea of prescription seems to me a complete answer to the demand for exhibition." LORD IVORY observed:—"The first conclusion is for exhibition of an alleged title. I have no doubt that the personal obligation to make any title forthcoming falls under the negative prescription. I am not so clear as to the declaratory conclusion; but as no title is produced entitling the pursuer to call for production of the document said to exist, I fear the declaratory conclusion, without a title, must fall to the ground as completely as the conclusion for exhibition."

III. OF THE LESSER PRESCRIPTIONS.

One distinction between the positive and negative prescriptions of forty years and the lesser prescriptions is, that the long prescription is intended to give stability to heritable rights, and to put an end to all questions resulting from obscure and antiquated claims, as well as to sopite all claims which have been neglected for such a length of time; and therefore the principle on which those prescriptions rest is perfectly reconcileable with the idea of a better claim existing in the claimant than in the possessor. The long negative prescription operates as an extinction of the claim, without regard to any offer of proof that the claim is still undischarged. But, in the shorter prescriptions, a different rule prevails; and where the existence of the debt or claim can be proved by the writ or by the oath of the debtor, the debtor will be bound. The object of the shorter prescriptions, in truth, is, generally speaking, to protect parties against the consequences of negligence in the preservation of vouchers; and, after the expiration of the period of the prescription, to change the onus probandi, and to restrict the mode of proof. But in no case has this been carried so far as to sopite a debt justly due, provided the prescribed mode of proof is followed.

1. Of the Vicennial Prescription.

(1.) Of Retours.—By the act 1617, c. 13, a vicennial prescription of retours was introduced. Previous to that period, in consequence of the act 1449, c. 57, the right of an heir to reduce an erroneous retour was foreclosed by the lapse of three years; but, by this act (1617), the lawful heir is allowed to bring an action for setting aside an erroneous retour at any time within twenty years after the date of the retour. The words of the act are, "If the saids summonds of reduction be not intended, executed and pursued, before the expiring of the saids twenty years, that the said action of reduction of the said retour and service shall prescribe in the selfe, and no party to be heard thereafter to pursue the same reduction." The previous act 1494 is continued by 1617, c. 13, in so far as it affects the inquest, it being declared, that "hereafter it shall noways be lawful to pursue the persons of inquest for wilful error, except they be sued therefor within the space of three years next after the date of the said retour and service." It would appear that the lapse of the vicennial prescription does not protect the true heir against irregularities which may have occurred in his service; Drummond, 17th May 1793, M. 6936. If the person served heir be styled the second son, the prescription can be of no avail, since the retour is itself a mere nullity, proving ex facie that the person retoured cannot be the right heir; Fullerton, 12th Feb. 1824, F. C., 2 S. & D. 698; affirmed June 20, 1825, 1 W. S. 410. The vicennial prescription will not free one retoured as heir from his obligation to denude in favour of a nearer heir who subsequently comes into existence; MacKinnons, 14th Feb. 1765, M. 5279. In a recent case, it was pleaded, that the vicennial prescription is no bar to a reduction by a nearer heir, even although he was in existence at the time of the service; but it was found that the act establishes an absolute protection of retours against challenge by parties alleging themselves to be the true heirs, after the lapse of twenty years; Neilson v. Cochran's Representatives, Jan. 17, 1837, 15 S. & D. 365; affirmed March 19, 1840, 1 Rob. 82. See also Wallace, Feb. 26, 1835, 13 S. & D. 564. This prescription has no operation against the heir himself; for when he finds it necessary to reduce his own retour, on the head of minority and lesion, he may insist in the reduction after the expiration of the twenty years; Edinglassy, 27th July 1700, M. 10989.

In the Bargany cause, Fullerton v. Hamilton, in the opinion delivered by the consulted judges, they observed: "We are further of opinion that a retour, though correct and unexceptionable ex facie, and therefore sufficient to protect the person served as heir after the vicennial prescription, is only of a personal nature; and though it may protect himself personally, cannot, after his death, affect the right of the true heir, for such was not the meaning of the statute." There is nothing, however, in the statute to sanction such a doctrine. The words of the statute are, "And if the saids summons of reduction be not intended, executed, and pursued, before the expiry of the saids twenty years, that the said action of reduction of the said retour and service shall prescribe in the selfe, and no party be heard thereafter to pursue the said reduction." The dictum of the judges in the Bargany cause was merely obiter; the ground on which the plea of vicennial prescription was repelled in that case being, that ex facie of the retour, the party served was not the heir. In the case of Neilson v. Cochrane's Representatives, Jan. 17, 1837, the service of a deceased person was sought to be reduced which had been expedited upwards of twenty years prior to the date of the action of reduction; and founding upon the opinion of the consulted judges in the Bargany cause, the pursuer contended that the vicennial prescription was inapplicable. The plea of prescription, however, was sustained, and the judgment affirmed on appeal; House of Lords, 19th March 1840; 1 Robinson, 82. See also the subsequent case of Campbell v. Campbell, Jan. 26, 1848; 10 D. 461, in which also the service sought to be reduced was that of a deceased person, expedited upwards of twenty years prior to the action. See also Ross's Leading Cases, vol. iii. p. 583, et seq.

(2.) Of Holograph Writings.—This is properly a limitation. By the act 1669, c. 9, bonds or other deeds in the handwriting of the obligant, to which no witnesses are adhibited, as also holograph missives, or books of accounts, prescribe in twenty years from their dates. But, under this statute, the pursuer may competently refer to the debtor's oath, in order to prove that the writing is holograph, and the subscription genuine; and, on his swearing in the affirmative, the obligation will be declared effectual, unless the debtor can prove that it was discharged. The verity of the handwriting may be referred even to the heir of the grantor; but the oath of the debtor is the only mode of proof admissible. This prescription runs from the date of the writing, and does not run against minors. Some lawyers extend the vicennial prescription to obligations without witnesses below L.100 Scots. Actions raised within the twenty years are, by 1685, c. 14, declared to fall, if not awakened within five years from the time of their falling asleep; and these awakenings must be renewed every five years thereafter. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, §§ 26, 27.

(3.) Of Crimes.—Where no sentence of fugitation has been pronounced, and no step has been taken to bring the offender to trial within twenty years after the commission of the crime, it would appear that the right to prosecute falls. See Hume, ii. 133. See further, as to the prescription of crimes, Ara VI. and VII., infra.

On the subject of vicennial prescription generally, see Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, §§ 19 and 41; Mackenzie's Observ. p. 350; Stair, B. ii. tit. 12, § 35; More's Notes, p. cclxx.; Bank vol. ii. p. 171; Bell's Com. i. 330; Bell's Princ. §§ 590, 2024; Napier on the Law of Prescription; Sandford's Heritable Succession, ii. 37; Ross's Leading Cases, vol. iii. p. 583.

2. Of Decennial Prescription.

By the act 1696, c. 9, prescription of ten years was introduced in favour of tutors and curators by which act it is declared, that all actions competent to minors against their tutors and curators, or to them against the minor, shall fall if not prosecuted within ten years from the expiration of the office, whether it be terminated by the majority or by the death of the minor. A curator neglecting to make up inventories does not forfeit the benefit of the decennial prescription; and an extrajudicial consent, after the years of prescription, to afford information respecting the affairs of a curatory, does not bar the plea of prescription; Gowans, Dec. 6, 1831, 10 S. & D. 144. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 25; Stair, B. ii. tit. 12, § 34; More's Notes, xlv. cclxxii.; Bell's Princ. § 635.

3. Of Septennial Prescription.

This prescription applies—1. To the case of cautioners; and, 2. to the interruption of prescription.

(1.) Of Cautionary Engagements.—A septennial limitation was introduced for the benefit of cautioners by the act 1695, c. 5, whereby it is enacted that no person binding, conjunctly and severally, with or for another in any bond or contract for a sum of money, shall be bound for longer time than seven years after the date of the obligation; and whosoever is bound for another, either as express cautioner or as co-principal, shall have the benefit of the act, provided he has either a clause of relief intimated to the creditor at his receiving the bond. These, however, are not required where the cautioner is described in the bond as a cautioner. The intimation here spoken of must be a formal regular intimation made to the creditor. See this prescription fully treated of under the article Cautionary.

(2.) Of the Interruptions of Prescriptions.—By the act 1669, c. 10, it is declared that all citations which may in future be used for the purpose of interrupting the prescription, either of real or of personal rights, must be renewed every seven years, otherwise they shall prescribe. This applies to mere citations; for, where the action is called in court and parties appear, the action continues in force for forty years, unless it be otherwise ordered by act of Parliament. The executions for interrupting prescription must be made by a messenger-at-arms; and by act 1696, c. 19, it is declared, that all summonses for interrupting the prescription of real rights shall pass on a bill, stating all the grounds on which they proceed, and be registered within sixty days in a register kept at Edinburgh; and that no interruption of the prescription of real rights via facti shall be of force unless an instrument be taken on it, and the same be recorded in the same register, and within the same period.

On the subject of septennial prescription generally, see Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 44; Stair, B. ii. tit. 12, § 33; B. iv. tit. 35, § 15; More's Notes, pp. cxv. cclxxii.; Bank. vol. ii. p. 170; Bell's Com. i. 356; Bell's Princ. § 600; Ross's Lect. i. 81, 172.

4. Of Sexennial Prescription.

This, which is properly a limitation, extends to bills and promissory-notes only, and was introduced by the act 12 Geo. III. c. 72, rendered perpetual by 23 Geo. III. c. 18, § 55. By those statutes it is declared that bills and promissory-notes shall not be effectual to produce diligence or even action, unless the same shall have commenced or been executed within six years from and after the term of payment of the bills or notes. From this enactment there is an exception of bank-notes and post-bills; and after the expiration of the six years the creditor is permitted to prove the existence of the debt by the writ or oath of the debtor. The years of the minority of the creditors are not computed in the six years. The six years of prescription run from the date at which the bill or note is exigible; that is, when the bill is payable at a fixed term, the last day of grace. When the bill is payable on demand, the prescription runs from its date. In a bill or note payable at sight, the bill is not exigible till presentment, and if, as has been thought to be the rule, days of grace are allowed on such bills, it would appear that the prescription cannot begin till the last day of grace. This is undoubtedly the rule in the case of bills or notes payable at a certain time after sight or presentment. See Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 29, and notes; More's Notes to

5. Of the Quinquennial Prescription.

This prescription is extended to the following cases:—

(1.) Arrears of rent in an agricultural lease prescribe within five years from the time of the tenant's removal from the lands; multures prescribe in five years after they become due; so do ministers' stipends; and the same rule is extended to the case of vacant stipend. All bargains concerning moveables, which may be proved by witnesses, as sales, locations, and other consensual contracts, to the constitution of which writing is not necessary, prescribe in five years. But these, even after the five years, may be proved by the writ or oath of the party. In the same manner, arrestments prescribe in five years from the date of the arrestment, unless it has been used on a depending action; in which case the five years begin to run from the date of the decree in the action. All of these prescriptions were introduced by the act 1669, c. 9. See Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 20; Stair, B. ii. tit. 12, § 32; More's Notes, p. cclxxiii.; Bank. vol. ii. p. 170; Bell's Com. i. 330; Bell's Princ. pp. 152 and 164; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 752–4; Bell on Leases, ii. 48, 51; Ross's Lect. ii. 549; Napier on the Law of Prescription. See Arrestment.

(2.) The right of appeal to the House of Lords, formerly prescribed in five years from the time of signing, enrolling, or extracting of the decree, and the end of fourteen days, to be computed from the first day of the meeting of Parliament next ensuing the said five years. This is founded on a standing order of the House of Lords, of date March 24, 1725. But, by the stat. 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 25, the time within which an appeal to the House of Lords may be entered is limited to two years from the day of signing the last interlocutor appealed from, and fourteen days as above. See Appeal.

6. Of the Triennial Prescription.

This prescription extends to several cases, as—(1.) The act 1579, c. 81, has introduced a triennial prescription in actions of spuilzie, which is restricted to the violent profits proveable by the oath of the pursuer; for, in so far as the action concludes for mere restitution, it may be brought at any time within the forty years. By this act, actions of ejection at the instance of the person violently dispossessed, and other actions founded on acts of violence, where the damages may be proved by the pur-suer's oath in litem, are subjected to the same short prescription. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 16.

(2.) By the act 1579, c. 83, a triennial prescription is introduced in all claims for merchants' accounts, servants' fees, house-rents (where the lease is verbal), and men's ordinaries, and such-like debts, under which are comprehended debts due to artificers or tradesmen for their work or wages, accounts to writers, agents, surgeons. But a distinction arises between house-rents, &c. and accounts. Each year's rent runs a separate course of prescription; but, in accounts, the prescription does not begin to run till the date of the last article of the account. Those debts may be proved at any time after the expiration of the three years, by the oath of the debtor, or by any writing signed by him, acknowledging the debt, but not by partial payments. Proof is required, not only of the constitution, but also of the subsistence of the debt.

At one time a distinction was taken between the case of a debtor dying before and that of his dying after the expiration of the three years. In the former case, proof of the constitution of the debt, with the heir's oath, negative of payment, was held sufficient to support the action; in the latter, the heir's oath, negative of payment, did not overturn the presumption that the debt was paid. In the case of Auld v. Aikman, July 7, 1842, where a debtor had died within three years of the last article of an open account, it was held that prescription did not apply so as to render it necessary to prove the constitution by the writ or oath of his representative. This case, however, was overruled by the whole Court, in the case of Cullen v. Smeal, July 12, 1853, 15 D. 868; and it was decided that the rule by which it was necessary to prove, not merely the constitution, but the resting-owing of the debt, by the writ or oath of the debtor, was applicable to the case of the debtor's representatives as well as to that of the debtor himself.

(3.) By the act 1573, c. 82, actions of removing prescribe within three years from the term at which the tenant has been warned to remove.

(4.) By the act 1663, c. 6, it is declared, that where houses within a royal burgh have gone to ruin, and been uninhabited for three years, the magistrates may warn the proprietors to rebuild or repair them within a year; and on failure, the magistrates may value them by sworn appraisers, sell them by public roup, and deliver the price to the proprietors.

(5.) By the act 1701, c. 6, no person can be prosecuted for wrongous imprisonment after three years, computed from the last day of the prisoner's confinement. Hume, ii. 113.

(6.) By 7 Will. III. c. 3, § 5, high treason committed within the Queen's dominions suffers a triennial prescription, if indictment be not found against the offender by a grand jury within that time; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 110.

On the subject of triennial prescription generally, see Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 16; Bell's Com. i. 331; Stair, B. ii. tit. 12, § 30; More's Notes, p. cclxxiv.; Bank. ii. p. 169; Bell's Princ. p. 162; Kames' Princ. of Equity: Napier on the Law of Prescription (1825), 254; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, pp. 751-2. See also the case of Alcock v. Easson, Dec. 20, 1842, 5 D. 356.

7. Of the Prescription of Crimes.

All actions upon penal statutes, where the penalty is appropriated to the Crown, must be brought within two years from the time of committing the offence; and where the penalty goes to the Crown or other prosecutor, the prosecutor must pursue within one year, and the Crown within two more; 31 Eliz. c. 5, § 5. This limitation has been held to apply, in so far as regards the treble penalties, to prosecutions for usury, but not to the action for setting aside the usurious transaction; Hume, i. 499. See also Paul, Jan 20, 1824, 2 S. & D. 626. Prosecutions on the Riot Act cannot be prosecuted after the lapse of one year; 1 Geo. I. c. 5, § 8. Treason inferred by statute from making certain instruments employed in coining, must be prosecuted within six months; 7 Anne, c. 25, § 2. To maintain, by advised speaking, that the Pretender has any right to the Crown of these realms, is an offence which must be prosecuted within three months; 6 Anne, c. 7, § 3; Ersk. ib. By an old law, now obsolete, the crimes of rape, robbery, or hamesucken were not heard after a silence of twenty-four hours; Hume, i. 304, et seq. See Rape. Petty riots and slighter delinquencies, when not prosecuted immediately, must, at the discretion of the judge, be held to prescribe; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 110. See Penal Actions.

IV. OF THE CURRENCY OF PRESCRIPTION, AND OF ITS INTERRUPTION.

Prescription runs continually from its commencement to its close, disregarding holidays and times when there is no court sitting. Even those times when, from public disorder, there is a total surcease of justice, will not be deducted from the years of prescription, unless under the authority of a particular statute. The whole period of the prescription must have elapsed in order to give it effect. Hence, an interruption on the last day of the forty years will be effectual. From the currency of the long positive and negative prescriptions, the years of minority are deducted; but, with regard to the instant prescriptions, the years of minority form no exception, unless where this is expressed in the act constituting the prescription. A remote heir-substitute under an entail is not entitled to have his minority deducted during the part of the prescriptive period during which he had no immediate right to the estate; Mauie, March 4, 1829, 7 S. & D. 527, and App. As the loss arising from the currency of prescription is considered as the penalty of negligence, the period of prescription does not run against one under a legal incapacity to sue, neither can prescription have its course against one who can, at the time, have no benefit by the suit. The currency of prescription may be interrupted in various ways; as by any act by which a proprietor asserts his right to property in the possession of another, or by which a creditor prosecutes for payment of a debt due to him, or where the debtor promises payment. It is interrupted by citation on an action, or by a charge on letters of horning, and by every diligence used on the debt. In the same manner partial payments interrupt the long prescription, which proceeds on a presumed dereliction of the debt, which is not reconcileable with a partial payment. But partial payments strengthen the shorter prescriptions, which proceed on a presumption of payment, which is strengthened instead of being weakened by the partial payment; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 39. Independently of these interruptions, there is an interruption termed civil interruption, because it is attended with no violence. It is also called interruption via facti, because founded on the extrajudicial deed of him who interrupts. This interruption is made by a protest or notarial instrument, where the person protests that the possession shall not hurt the interest of the protestor. But prescription is not interrupted by the registration of an obligation, nor by its transmission from one hand to another: even intimation does not interrupt the prescription. Where possession has been abandoned by the person claiming on a prescriptive title, or where possession has been taken from him, although he has a second time acquired possession, he cannot connect the two periods; his prescriptive possession must run a new course. Formerly, all citations on actions had the effect of interrupting the course of prescription; but, by the act 1669, c. 10, citations for this purpose must be renewed every seven years; and, by 1676, c. 19, they must be recorded. This applies to citations only; for where the parties have appeared in court, or where any judicial act has been performed, the process becomes a depending action, which may be awakened at any time within forty years, if the particular action be not otherwise limited. A submission applicable to the claim in question will operate as an interruption; Vans, 14th June 1816, Fac. Coll. The septennial limitation of cautionary engagements is not affected by a mere citation. See Citation. Cautionary. Production of the ground of debt or certified account, with the oath of verity as required by the Bankrupt Statute, in the hands of the interim factor, sheriff-clerk, or trustee, or in the Court of Session, has the same effect in interrupting prescription of every kind, from the period of such production, as if a proper action had been raised against the bankrupt and against the trustee. The same effect is given to the lodging of a claim in a process of ranking and sale. The effect of an interruption of prescription is to make it begin a new course, commencing from the date of the interruption in the negative prescription, and from that of the recovering of possession in the positive. Where diligence is done within the forty years against one of two co-obligants, that is, where two or more are bound jointly and severally, or as co-obligants, it saves the obligation against the whole. But where the right of the creditor is divided, either by succession or assignation, the obligation may be prescribed as to one part of the debt in the person of the one creditor, while it may be effectual as to the other part of the debt in the person of the other creditor. See Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 38, et seq., and the authorities cited in the article Interruption. See also Napier on the Law of Prescription, and the case of M'Neill v. Macneal, Mar. 4, 1858, 20 D. 735.

Presentation; the act by which the patron of a church appoints the minister, and presents him to the presbytery for induction. Patrons are required by statute, at or before signing a presentation, to take the oaths appointed to be taken by persons in public trust; and those suspected of Popery must purge themselves, by subscribing the formula introduced by 1700, c. 3 (see Oath); otherwise the presentation is void, and the right of patronage devolves for that vice upon the Crown; and failing the Crown's presenting within six months, from the neglect or refusal of the patron, on the presbytery jure devoluto; 10 Ann. c. 12; 5 Geo. I. c. 29. See Roman Catholics. It is not the law, as the terms of the act seem to import, that the granting a presentation, without having taken the necessary oaths, implies an absolute forfeiture to the Crown of the right of presentation for that vice. In one case, the Court overruled the objection to the exercise of the right of patronage, that the patron had granted and lodged a prior presentation without taking the necessary oaths; Presbytery of Paisley, August 10, 1770, M. 9966. A patron may delegate the power of presentation to a commissioner; and in a late case, the General Assembly sustained a presentation by a commissioner, where only the commissioner had qualified, and not the patron himself. The soundness of this determination has been doubted, on the ground that it would open a way of evading the enactments against presentations by unqualified patrons; and the matter has never been decided in the civil court. A presentation to a church, of which the Crown is patron, is obtained by a letter passing under the Privy Seal, in consequence of a warrant superscribed by her Majesty, and subscribed by the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Along with the presentation, there should be laid before the presbytery a certificate of the patron's having qualified by taking the oaths to Government; an extract of the presentee's license, unless already an ordained minister of another parish; a certificate of his having taken the necessary oaths; and his letter of acceptance. As to the requisite qualifications of a presentee, see the articles Minister. Admission. License to Preach. According to Erskine, no patron can present to the expectancy of a benefice; his power of presentation depending on the vacancy, whether that be produced by the death, translation, deprivation, or resignation of the former incumbent; Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 11. A practice has, however, long subsisted, of presenting assistants and successors to incumbents who are incapable, on account of old age, or of permanent ill health, of discharging all the duties of their office. The legality of this practice, and the validity of such presentations, have been sustained by a decision of the Court of Session, affirmed on appeal; Luke, Feb. 10, 1832, 10 S. & D. 307, affirmed August 14, 1832. The patron must present within six months from the vacancy, otherwise the presbytery, on the expiration of the six months, may, in virtue of the jus devolutum, supply the vacancy by presenting to the charge. If the patron, within the six months, present a person qualified in terms of 5 Geo. I. c. 29, who accepts the presentation, but is afterwards rejected on good grounds by the church courts, the time occupied in judging of his eligibility is not reckoned, and the patron is allowed a period equal to that part of the six months which was unexpired at the time of the presentation. *Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, § 27; More's Notes, cxxli.; Ersk. Preses of Meeting. The business of a meeting of creditors cannot proceed without a preses; and although the person first elected cannot dissolve the meeting by leaving the chair, the creditors must elect another preses, to make their further proceedings valid; Anderson, 12th Dec. 1827, 6 S. & D. 235. The preses has no power beyond that of constituting the meeting, and preserving order in it. His vote is only that of a single creditor. This rule is not confined to meetings of creditors; it has been held to be a general rule, that the preses of an ordinary meeting is not entitled to a double vote; Campbell, March 4, 1813, F. C., affirmed on appeal. He superintends the making out of the minutes, and his veracity is pledged for the truth of the record. It is his duty to see whether the advertisements have been duly published, in terms of the statute; Bell's Com. ii. 352, 365. See Majority.

Presumption of Death. Human life is presumed in law to last until the age of 100 years; to the effect of laying the burden of proving the death on him who alleges it. The onus probandi is transferred to the other party where the alleged deceased, if alive, must be upwards of 100 years of age. In one case, a petition, proceeding upon the assumption that a party abroad was dead, was refused, it being observed by the Court, that where an absent party of middle age is shown to have been alive in 1819, and to have then had two sons, the mere lapse of time and want of further intelligence concerning them will not afford a presumption per se, either that the party or his children are dead; and that a service being an ex parte proceeding, does not raise the presumption of death in these circumstances; Reid, Jan. 14, 1834, 12 S. & D. 278. A sailor, in the prime of life, who suddenly disappeared at a seaport-town in England, about four months prior to his father's death, was presumed to have survived his father; Bruce, Feb. 25, 1834, 12 S. & D. 486. See also Lapsley v. Grierson, Nov. 19, 1845, 8 D. 34. See, for circumstances held to amount to a proof of death, Campbell's Trustees, Feb. 1, 1834, 12 S. & D. 382. See also Life, and authorities there cited.

Presumption of Survivorship. When two or more persons have died within a very short period of each other, and no witnesses have been present to note the exact instant of dissolution, it is necessary to have recourse to presumptions, in order to determine which of them survived the others. Writers on medical jurisprudence lay it down, that the pro-

sumption of survivorship is with the mother, where she dies in childbed, and her child is also found dead. By the Roman law, where two persons above the age of puberty perished by the same accident or fatality, the younger was presumed to have been the survivor; but if one was under the age of puberty, the other was presumed to have been the survivor; Digest, B. 34, tit. 5, §§ 9, 22, and 23. The rules of the Code Napoleon (now the civil code), which have been considered very equitable, are, 1. "If those who perished together were under fifteen years of age, the eldest shall be presumed to have been survivor. 2. If they were all above sixty years, the youngest shall be presumed to have been survivor. 3. If some were under fifteen, and others above sixty, the former shall be presumed to have been the survivors. 4. If those who have perished together had completed the age of fifteen, and were under sixty, the male shall be presumed to have been the survivor, where the ages are equal, or where the difference does not exceed one year. 5. If they were of the same sex, that presumption shall be admitted which opens the succession in the order of nature—of course, the younger shall be considered to have survived the elder;" Civil Code, §§ 720–1–2. To these rules, although in general founded on correct physiological principles, two objections have been made: 1st, That the third is imperfect, since a man, even although above sixty years of age, must be held to have survived a mere infant; and, 2d, That no provision is made for the case of persons under fifteen years of age, and under sixty, perishing together. See Beck's Medical Jurisprudence, p. 208, and authorities there cited. See Evidence.

Presumptions. Presumptions are either juris et de jure, or juris, or hominis vel judicis. The præsumptio juris et de jure is that where law or custom assumes the fact to be so, on a presumption which cannot be traversed by contrary evidence. Thus, a minor, with curators, cannot legally act without their consent, on a presumption of incapacity, which cannot be traversed by proof of his ability. So also the law of deathbed rests on a presumed incapacity in the deceased, which cannot be redargued by proof that he was of a disposing mind. The præsumptio juris is a presumption established in law, until the contrary be proved; as the presumption that possession of moveables proves property in them—that he who pays interest is due a capital corresponding to it, and the like. These, and every presumption of the same kind, of which there are many, may be elided by contrary proof. The præsumptio hominis vel judicis is that conviction which arises from the circumstances of a case; and it is sometimes of sufficient force to overcome the præsumptio juris. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 35, et seq.; Stair, B. iv. tit. 45, § 9, et seq.; Bank ii. pp. 667–9; Bell's Princ. p. 656; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. h. t.; Tait on Evidence, 3d edit., 447 to 491. See Evidence.

Pretium Affectionis; is the imaginary value put upon a subject by the fancy of the owner, or by the regard in which he held it. Damage is never estimated by this standard, when the injury has been done without fraud or dole. Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 4; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 14; Bank, i. 408; Kames' Equity, 65. See Evidence. Price.

Prevarication. Prevarication upon oath is the wilful concealment or misrepresentation of truth, by giving evasive and equivocating evidence. It is in practice dealt with as a contempt of court, and is cognisable summarily by any judge before whom it is committed. The proper punishment is imprisonment. Stair, B. iv. tit. 86, § 8; Hume, i. 374; Blair's Justice, h. t.; Alison's Princ. 484; Prac. 549.

Price; the equivalent paid for a thing purchased. A price is an essential of the contract of sale; sine pretio nulla venditio est. The price must be an onerous price, and not merely elusory. If the buyer is, by the contract of sale itself, discharged from paying the price, it is no sale. The same rule holds if the price bear no reasonable proportion to the value of the thing sold, as if a valuable estate should be sold for a crown. But it is not necessary, by the law of Scotland, as it was by the Roman law, that the price should be just, that is, that it should correspond with the value of the thing sold. Where the form of a sale has been gone through, without a price being exigible, or with a merely elusory price, the contract resolves into a donation. The price must be certain—i.e., it must either be fixed at a certain sum, or it must be referred to a certain standard, or to the judgment of referees, so that it may be capable of being ascertained; certum est quod certum reddi potest. The price must consist of current money. The price of land sold may be retained until the seller is ready to give a good title. Stair, B. i. tit. 9, §§ 11; tit. 14, § 1, et seq.; More's Notes, lxxxiv.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 4; Bank, i. 407; Bell's Com. i. 169, 222, 437; Bell's Princ. §§ 11, 92, 100, 103, 127; Brown on Sale, 147; Bell on Completing Titles. Primate. During the times of Episcopacy there were two Archbishops: the Archbishop of St Andrews, who had the title of the Primate of all Scotland; and the Archbishop of Glasgow, who was styled the Primate of Scotland. Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 7.

Primogeniture; is the name given to the rule of law, whereby the eldest son is preferred to the younger ones in the succession to heritage. This rule was introduced by the feudal law. It does not appear to have been the rule in soccage land; neither does it take place in female succession to heritage, nor in the succession to moveables. In all of those the rule of the Roman law prevails, and an equal succession amongst those in an equal degree of relationship takes place. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 6; Stair, B. iii. tit. 4, § 22; Bank. ii. 4293; Sandford on Entails, 18. See Succession. Executors. Heir.

Primus Actus Judicii est Judicis Approbatorius; a maxim importing, that if one take any judicial proceeding before a judge, such as proposing defences, he will not afterwards be entitled to decline the jurisdiction of the judge. If, however, the declinature be proposed simultaneously with other defences (which, under the Judicature Act, is now required), the judge's jurisdiction will not be thereby prorogated. Stair, B. iv. tit. 37, § 12. See Defences.

Prince of Scotland; was the title given to the eldest son of the King of Scotland. Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 12.

Principal and Accessory. See Accessory.

Principal and Agent. Under this title are classed the various questions which occur between mercantile agents and their employers, as to the extent of their duties and responsibilities. Indeed, all cases of delegated powers, as well in mercantile as in other matters, may be included under this general head; and hence, any summary even of the general doctrines would exceed the proper limits of an article in this work. Besides, the details of the subject have been considered in a variety of separate articles, and therefore it is enough here to refer to those articles, and to the following list of authorities:—*Ersk. Principality. The principality or appanage of the Prince of Scotland consisted of lands in the shires of Ayr, Renfrew, and Ross, which had been erected into a principality so early as the reign of Robert III. Lands holding of the Prince afforded, under the old election law, a freehold qualification, in the same manner with lands held of the Crown; and as the right of the Prince, on his succession to the Crown, continues to be vested in him until the birth of a son, the vassals during those intervals may be said to hold of the Crown; and the rents of the principality are then levied for the use of the Sovereign. Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 12; Bank. i. 539; ii. 430; Bell's Princ. § 674; Swint. Abridg. h. t.; Kames' Stat. Law, h. t.

Printers. A printer has no right to publish a work in his hands. He has, however, a lien on the printed sheets for the price of his labour, and on the last sheets undelivered for the price of the whole. It has even been decided in England, that his lien extends over subsequent volumes or numbers for the price of those which have already been printed and delivered. Bell's Com. i. 118; ii. 104. In order to repress seditious publications, the statute 39 Geo. III. c. 79, § 25, provides that every typefounder and printing-press maker must, under a penalty of L.20, before commencing business, give notice to the clerk of peace, who grants him a certificate. Such persons must also, under the same penalty, keep and produce to any justice, on his written demand, an account in writing of the buyers of their types or presses. Any person (except the Queen's printers) who gets a printing-press or types, must, under like penalty, give similar notice, and must use the press or types only in the place named in the notice. The printer must, under a penalty of L.20, print his name and residence on every paper or book, and on both the first and last leaf, if there be more than one: he must write upon one copy of every paper he prints the name and residence of his employer; and keep that copy for six months, to be shown to any justice of peace requiring it. The same penalty is incurred by persons dispersing papers not having the printer's name and residence. Whoever sees any paper offered for sale, or gratis, or exposed to view, with no printer's name, or with a false one, may seize the offender, and carry him, or deliver him to a constable to be carried, before a justice, who may determine respecting him. The same person is not liable in above twenty-five forfeitures on account of the same paper or book, printed or dispersed without the printer's name; 51 Geo. III. c. 65, § 1. Certain papers are exempted from the operation of the act, such as papers printed for the use of Parliament, by their authority; or by authority of any public board or officer; or law proceedings, bankrupts' bills, receipts, securities for money, policies of insurance, letters of attorney, deeds of agreement, bills of lading, impressions of engravings, advertisements of tradesmen, or of sales, &c. On cases of suspicion, from sworn information, that any press or types are illegally used, being shown to any one justice, he may issue a warrant to search the premises in the day-time, and seize such press, types, and furniture, with all printed papers found in the premises. There are directions for prosecution, the levying of penalties, &c., for which reference is made to the act itself. Abstracts are given of the act in Tait's Justice, p. 343; Blair's Justice, p. 293.

Prior. The prior under the Popish system had the charge of the monastery in the absence of the abbot (who was the head or governor), or while the office of the abbot was vacant. Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 4.

Prior Tempore, Potior Jure; a maxim, importing generally, that priority in time or in date affords the criterion of preference in competitions. Stair, B. iv. tit. 35, § 8; Bank. iii. 37.

Prisae; a French word, signifying caption, pawning, distress, or moveable goods taken for execution of a decret. Skene, h. t.

Prison. Formerly, it was the duty of the magistrates of a burgh to render the prison for the reception of debtors sufficient for its purpose; and if a debtor escaped from the insufficiency of the prison, the magistrates were held liable for the debt. In case of an escape, the burden of proving security and vigilance lay upon the magistrates. They were not liable where the prison was opened by superior external force, and the debtor made his escape. *Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, § 14, and B. i. tit. 4, § 28; Bell's Com. ii. 545; Swint. By act 2 and 3 Vict. c. 42, the management of prisons was transferred to a "General Board of Directors of Prisons for Scotland;" and this act was extended and amended by two subsequent acts—7 and 8 Vict. c. 34, 1844, and 14 and 15 Vict. c. 27, 1851. By these acts it is provided, that the general board shall have "full power of administration and management of all prisons in Scotland;" but all rules made by them must be submitted to, and approved by, the Secretary of State, to whom also the board must render annual reports of all their proceedings. It is further enacted that, with the exception of the general prison at Perth, each prison shall be under the immediate superintendence and management of a county board, to be appointed annually by the commissioners of supply for the county, but subject to the control of the general board. The obligations on magistrates, in respect of prisons and prisoners, are now removed; and all fees payable to keepers or officers of prisons are abolished. The expense of building and maintaining prisons is defrayed by assessment on counties and burghs in manner provided by the before-recited statutes.

Private Acts of Parliament. The private acts of the Scotch Parliament were not, properly speaking, laws; but might have been reduced in the Court of Session at the instance of any third party whose interest suffered from them. Indeed, posterior to the year 1606, there was passed at the end of each session of Parliament an act, salvo jure cujuslibet, for the purpose of saving third parties against the effect of these private acts of Parliament. Ersk. B. i. tit. 1, § 39.

Private Bills, or Acts of Parliament. Under this title are comprehended those measures in their progress through Parliament which relate to private and personal interests, such as naturalisation, restitution of honours, change of a family name and arms, exchange or sale of entailed property, and the like; or to private or public local interests, such as making, maintaining, or repairing roads, bridges, canals, railways, gaols, harbours, and similar objects of a public, local, or municipal nature. Of the bills for these objects, some originate in the House of Lords, and some in the House of Commons, exclusively. The Lords claim the introduction of those in any way partaking of a judicial character. Hence, bills for restitution of honours or blood, estate bills, and (in England) divorce bills, originate in the Lords, while all bills which in any way can be construed as imposing a pecuniary tax, of whatever description, or in whatever shape, originate exclusively in the Commons. Those partaking of neither of these characters originate indiscriminately in either House, at the option of applicants. All private bills must be introduced upon petition, "truly stating the case," and the reasons of the application, signed by the parties who are suitors for the bill. [Lords' Standing Orders, 7th December 1669; Commons' do. No. 2. "Private Bills in general."] Petitions for estate bills (almost the only private personal bills now required in Scotland), are referred to two of the judges of the Court of Session, who are forthwith to summon before them all parties concerned in the bill, and, after hearing them, are to report to the House the state of the case, and their opinion thereon, under their hands, and to sign the proposed bill. [Lords' Standing Orders, 16th May 1792, and amendments.] The consent of all persons concerned in the consequences of such private bills is required to be given in person, by signing a copy either before the judges in Scotland, or the committee on the bill; but such consents shall be sufficient in the following proportions, in the cases specified, viz.—"Four-fifths of the ten next in succession to the person or persons applying for such private bill, provided it is satisfactorily proved to the committee that those of this, the first ten, whose consent has not been obtained, are absent, abroad, or cannot be found in the kingdom of Great Britain; two-thirds of the next twenty in succession after the said ten; one-half of the twenty next in succession after the said twenty; and one-third of all the other persons concerned in the said bill, without prejudice, nevertheless, as heretofore, to every person concerned to petition against the said bill, and to be heard for his interest therein." [Lords' Standing Orders, 5th May 1818.] The report of the judges being returned, and a copy of it and of the petition delivered to the Chairman of the Lords' Committees, the bill is read a first time, and thereafter proceeds as other bills through both Houses. See also additional Standing Orders made by the House of Lords, 6th July 1837. Evidence of compliance with the whole orders applicable to the particular case is given by production of such documents as are producible, and parole testimony (except in some few stated instances, where written affidavits will suffice) is required of fulfilment of the other requisites, such as lodging papers, affixing notices, or seeing them affixed, application to owners and occupiers, &c. The allegations of the petition must also be proved by a witness or witnesses; and upon satisfactory proof, the committee reports that the Standing Orders have been complied with, and the petition proved. Upon such report, leave is given to bring in the bill, which has, of course, been previously prepared in MS. according to the forms of the House; and it must now be printed and delivered to members (unless a naturalisation or name bill), and it may be read a first time on the following day. It is then taken to the Private Bill Office, where it remains till the second reading, seven clear days afterwards, if a bill for navigations, railways, tunnels, ferries, or docks, and three clear days if any other bill. But no private bill can be read a second time until the expiration of two calendar months from the day of the last notice given in the newspapers. The bill, if unopposed, is read a second time on the appointed day, and referred to a committee similar to that upon the petition. Seven clear days must intervene between the second reading and the meeting of the committee on the bill. At this committee, proofs of compliance with such Standing Orders as have not been necessarily exhausted in the committee on the petition, of consents not yet signified, and of allegations of the preamble of the bill, are given, and, if satisfactory, the committee discuss its provisions, and make any amendments, or listen to any opposition that may be offered by counsel or otherwise.

One clear day must intervene between the last day of sitting of the committee, and the report being made; and, when relating to navigations, railways, tunnels, ferries, and docks, seven clear days must intervene between its being presented and being taken into consideration. The bill, as amended, is printed and delivered to members as before; and upon the report being agreed to, the bill is ordered to be engrossed on parchment and examined, and it may be read a third time as soon as ready. It is immediately afterwards passed, and carried by the member who has conducted it to the House of Lords. The procedure in the House of Lords, as well upon bills originating there as in those sent from the Commons, is very nearly similar to that above described, with some difference as to intervening periods. Notices in newspapers, application to owners and occupiers, plans, &c., and perhaps a little more security of ultimate completion of the undertaking, and evidence of amounts subscribed, where subscribers are contemplated, are required by the Standing Orders, compliance with which, and the truth of the allegations of the bill, must be proved in committee by witnesses upon oath. Amendments made by the Lords must be returned to the Commons for assent or dissent; and in the event of non-agreement, a rare occurrence in a private bill, the proposed measure is either entirely abandoned or renewed, upon permission, in a way that can be agreed to by both Houses. It is competent to any person having interest to offer opposition to any private bill in whole or in part, and at any stage of the procedure; but as Parliament does not admit private parties to oppose in committee on the petition, and as the merits of the measure cannot fairly be judged of in the first stage, it is usual to defer opposition till the motion for second reading, and generally till the committee on the bill; when, under due restriction as to grounds and principles, every opponent is heard, and, if possible, consistently with good policy, his objections removed, or his interests reconciled with the declared purposes of the bill. The royal assent, from the date of which the act commences, unless otherwise provided in the act itself, is the concluding ceremony of private, as of all other legislation.

Privateers; private ships of war commissioned by the Admiralty, and fitted out by the owners at their own expense. Instead of receiving pay, the owners are allowed to keep what they take from the enemy, giving the Admiral his share. Privateers must find caution for good behaviour to the amount of £1500, or £3000 if the crew exceed fifty men. Besides these private commissions, there are special commissions for privateers, granted to commanders of ships, who take pay, and are under marine discipline. Stair, B. ii. tit. 2, § 4; Bank. i. 524; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Prize-Law. Letters of Marque.

Privative Jurisdiction. A court is said to have privative jurisdiction in a particular class of causes, when it is the only court entitled to adjudicate in such causes. Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 7.

Privies; in English law, those who partake or have an interest in any action or thing: thus, every heir in tail is privy to recover the land entailed. There are five kinds of privies: of blood, as the heir to the ancestor; in representation, as executors or administrators to the deceased; in estate, between donor and donee, lessor or lessee; in respect of contract; and on account of estate and contract. There is another division—into privies in estate, in blood, and in law. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Privilege, Personal; against imprisonment for civil debt. Minors within the years of pupilarity are not liable to imprisonment for debt; 1696, c. 41. Lunatics, idiots, and all who are incapable of acting for themselves, have a similar exemption; Bell's Com. ii. 567. The privilege of Parliament protects all peers of the realm and all members of the House of Commons from arrest for debt. Members of the House of Commons are free from arrest during the sitting of Parliament, and for forty days after every prorogation, and forty days before the next appointed meeting. Formerly, the domestics, lands, and goods of the members enjoyed a similar exemption; but this was abolished; 10 Geo. III. c. 50. See Parliament. A married woman not being capable, in the ordinary case, of contracting a personal obligation, cannot be subjected to personal diligence, unless her husband has abandoned the country, and left her in a state of constructive widowhood. See Husband and Wife. Persons who have been sequestered, under the Bankrupt Statute, may obtain a personal protection, renewable during the subsistence of the sequestration, by consent of the creditors. And, finally, immunity from personal diligence may be obtained by taking refuge within the precincts of the sanctuary of Holyroodhouse. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, §§ 24, 25; Brown's Synop. pp. 1547, 1557. Privilege of Speech. See Libel. Defamation.

Privileged Debts; are those which humanity has rendered preferable on the funds of a deceased person, and which an executor may pay without decree; as—1. Sickbed and funeral expenses, consisting of physicians' fees, medicines, and surgeons' accounts, with the expense of such decorations and state in the funeral as the rank and circumstances of the deceased warrant. 2. Mournings for the widow and such of the children as are present at the funeral. 3. A year's rent of the house, and servants' wages since the last term. See Executor. Mournings. Funeral Expenses. On the death of a clergyman of the Church of Scotland, the sums due by him to the Widows' Fund form a privileged and preferable debt; 19 Geo. III. c. 20. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 43; Bank. ii. p. 399; Bell's Com. ii. 156–9; Bell's Princ. p. 386; Illust. i. 445; *Kames' Stat. Privileged Deeds. A legal deed requires certain statutory solemnities; but from this rule exceptions have been made in favour of certain deeds and writings on grounds of necessity or expediency. Of these exceptions the following are examples:—(1.) Holograph deeds, which are deeds in the handwriting of the grantor, do not require witnesses, on account of the difficulty in forging the handwriting of a whole deed. But such deeds do not prove their own dates; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, § 22. See Holograph Deeds. (2.) A deed subscribed by a number of persons has been sustained, though wanting witnesses. But if this decision be an authoritative precedent, it ought to apply only in the case where all the parties have signed the deed at one and the same time, and in presence of each other; Ersk. ib. § 23. (3.) Testaments. Where the testator cannot himself execute the deed, one notary and two witnesses are sufficient to authenticate it, whatever extent of property may be conveyed by it, although the general rule is, in all deeds of importance where notarial subscription is resorted to, to require two notaries and four witnesses. See Testing Clause. (4.) Receipts and discharges to tenants for rent need not be signed in the presence of witnesses. See Discharge. (5.) Missive letters in re mercatoria are valid though not holograph; and mercantile commissions are effectual though they want witnesses. See Letters. (6.) Accounts amongst merchants may be effectually docketed, though neither the writer's name be mentioned, nor witnesses adhibited; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, § 24. (7.) Bills and promissory notes neither require witnesses nor that they should be holograph; Ersk. ib. See Bill of Exchange. Deed. Evidence. See generally, Ersk. ut supra; More's Notes on Stair, p. ccccv.; Bell's Princ. § 21.

Privileged Summonses. This name is given to a class of summonses in which, from the nature of the cause of action, the ordinary inducia are shortened. Such summonses formerly required a bill to be passed in the Bill-Chamber, but this was altered by the act 13 and 14 Vict. c. 36, 1850. The privileged summonses formerly were sum-

monses of removing, recent spuilzies, and recent ejections (where the summons was executed within fifteen days after committing the deed), intrusions, and succeeding in the vice, causes alimentary, exhibitions, summonses for making arrested goods furthcoming, transferences, poindings of the ground, wakenings, special declarators, suspensions, preventors, and transumps. Of those, recent spuilzies, ejections, intrusions, and succeeding in the vice, were directed, by an old Act of Sederunt, to be executed on a diet of fifteen days, and all others upon two diets of six days each: A. S. 21st June 1672. Besides the summonses above enumerated, summonses of multiplepoinding and of cessio bonorum may, by practice, be executed on one diet of six days, as also wakenings, where not combined with a transference. Where the defender resides in Orkney or Shetland, or where he is furth of the kingdom, the privilege does not apply; Ivory's Form of Process, vol. i. p. 167, et seq. By the stat. 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 53, it is enacted, that after the 11th November 1825, the practice of citing defenders on two diets shall in all cases cease; and that privileged summonses against defenders within Scotland shall proceed on one diet of six days; other summonses against defenders residing in Orkney and Shetland, on a diet of forty days; and for all other persons within Scotland, a diet of twenty-seven days; and for defenders out of Scotland, one diet of sixty days. By the act 13 and 14 Vict. c. 36, 1850, all summonses may proceed on fourteen days' warning where the defender is within Scotland, unless in Orkney and Shetland; and on twenty-one days when in either of these places, or furth of Scotland. But privileged summonses, which formerly proceeded on shorter inducitæ than these, continue to do so. Stair, B. iv. tit. 3, §§ 4 and 32; *Ersk. Privy Council. The Privy Council of Scotland was so termed, in contradistinction to the Parliament, which was the King's Great Council. The Privy Council consisted of persons chosen by the King to advise with in matters of government and police. They had also a supreme jurisdiction in all questions of wrong which were found to be beyond the cognisance of the courts of common law, and in all cases where the public peace was concerned. These powers remained with the Scotch Privy Council until, by the act 6 Anne, c. 6, that council was absorbed in the British Privy Council, who are by that act declared to have no other or higher powers than were possessed by the English Privy Council at the time of the Union. Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 9; Kames' Stat. Law, h. t.

Privy Council of Great Britain; the principal council of the Queen, the members of which are chosen at her pleasure. It is from them that the Ministers of State forming the Cabinet are selected. They hold their offices for life, but are subject to removal at the Queen's pleasure. The Privy Council has power to inquire into all offences against the Government, and to commit the offenders to prison, to be dealt with according to law. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Privy Seal. This seal is used in authenticating royal grants of assignable or personal rights. The rights which a subject transmits by assignation, the Sovereign transmits by the Privy Seal. The writs which pass the Privy Seal are of two classes: such as pass by warrants superscribed by the Sovereign, and such as pass by warrants signed by the Baron of Exchequer. Of the first kind are all gifts of pensions, presentations to churches and professorships of which the Crown is patron, commissions to inferior officers, and the like. Of the second kind are precepts directed to the Keeper of the Great Seal for expediting tacks of teinds belonging to the Crown. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, § 84; Jurid. Styles, i. 430; Muirhead, 16th May 1809, F. C.; Brown's Synop. p. 386.

Prize-Law. The jurisdiction of all matters relative to prize and capture in war is now vested exclusively in the High Court of Admiralty of England. (See Capture.) The rules of proceeding in prize causes, as stated in a report by Sir Geo. Lee to the King in 1753, are as follow: Before the ship or goods can be disposed of by the captor, there must be a regular judicial proceeding, in which both parties may be heard, and condemnation may follow thereupon as a prize, in a Court of Admiralty. The proper court for these condemnations is the court of that state to which the captor belongs. Every ship ought to be provided with complete and genuine papers, and the master at least should be privy to the truth of the transaction. And if there be false or colourable papers—if any papers be thrown overboard—if the master and officers examined in preparatorio grossly prevaricate—or if there be other suspicious circumstances, the law of nations allows, according to the different degrees of misbehaviour or suspicion, costs to be paid, or not to be received by the claimant, in case of acquittal and restitution. But if a seizure is made without probable cause, the captor must pay costs and damages, for which purpose privateers are obliged to find caution.

See Privateers. If the sentence of the Court of Admiralty is thought to be erroneous, there is in every maritime country a superior court of review, to which the parties who think themselves aggrieved may apply. Stair, B. ii. tit. 2; More's Notes, clii., where the report of Sir Geo. Lee is quoted at length; Bank. i. 520-3; Bell's Princ. § 1295; Brown's Synop. h. t., and 483. See Capture. Letters of Marque. Privateers.

Prize-Money. The payment of army prize-money has been the subject of several statutory enactments. These are consolidated and amended by 2 Will. IV. c. 53. It is provided that all captures made by the army shall be disposed of as the Sovereign thinks fit. Deserters are not entitled to prize-money. Provision is made for the sale of prizes, for the assignment of shares, &c., for the details of which reference is made to the act itself. See Soldier.

Pro Confesso. Where a party in a cause is cited to appear and give his oath on the reference of his adversary, or where the judge, ex officio, has required his oath, it is under certification that, if he fail to appear and depone, he will be held as confessed, and decree pronounced as if he had admitted the fact referred to his oath. But a summons, containing a reference to oath, and on which decree in absence was pronounced, was not held to be a judicial reference on which the party could be held conclusively as confessed; Nicolson, 23d Nov. 1810, F. C. Against this certification the party will be reponed, upon his showing good reason why he did not appear. If there was any irregularity in the citation, the party is said to be reponed ex justitia, and the effect of the holding as confessed is then as completely at an end as if it never had been pronounced. But where the party is reponed ex gratia, and dies without having deponed on the reference, his heir will not be relieved from the holding as confessed. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 17; Thomson on Bills, 658. Shand's Prac. 388. Probabilis Causa. See Poor's Roll.

Probable Cause. In actions of defamation, the justification, or plea in defence, that the defender had probable cause for what he stated, is founded on the necessity which sometimes exists, that persons should, in the exercise of official, professional, or personal duty, give information, or state facts not yet absolutely certain. In such circumstances it will be a sufficient justification if the defender be able to show that he had probable cause for believing and making his accusation. This defence is not competent in cases of ordinary or popular scandal, where nothing short of veritas convicii, and sometimes not even that, affords a defence. See Veritas Convicii. But a statement made by an advocate at the bar, by a master in giving the character of a servant, or by any one in the performance of a duty in a like privileged situation, may be justified by the defence of probable cause. Probable cause is auxiliary to the defence of privilege. Even in a privileged situation, if the accusation turn out to be false, malice will be presumed, or, at all events, the defence of privilege will be neutralised, and the malice will be doubtful. But the allegation and proof of probable cause removes the presumption of an intention to defame. Probable cause may be proved either upon a separate issue taken by the defender, or upon the general issue. In practice, a separate issue is seldom taken. Borthwick on Libel, 311; Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 222. See Defamation. Damages. Injuries. Libel. Veritas Convicii.

Probatio Probata; proof which is not permitted to be impugned or redargued. The verdict of a jury is in some cases not liable to review, and it is then called probatio probata. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 33.

Process. Stair defines a process to be "an action sustained by a judge, that thereupon either an act or definitive sentence may follow;" and he adds, that an action not sustained is no process. (Stair, B. iv. tit. 3, § 21.) But under this term, in a larger acceptance, may be comprehended all those writs, forms, and pleadings, whereby an action or a prosecution, whether criminal or civil, is brought under judicial cognisance, including all that takes place from the first step down to the final decree in a civil action, and to the conviction or acquittal in a criminal prosecution. Bank. ii. 598; *Kames' Stat. Thus, under the articles Criminal Prosecution—Criminal Letters—Indictment—Concourse—King's Advocate—Justiciary Court—Circuit Court—Dittay—Bail—and some others, all that relates to criminal process, in so far as thought

Prochein Ami; in English law, the next friend; a term used for the next of kin who sues for an infant in any suit affecting the infant's rights. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Procurator to Subscribe Bills. A party is said to draw, indorse, or accept a bill by procurator, when it is done by his agent acting under his authority. Procurator may be constituted by a written mandate, and in England by a verbal mandate; or by delivering to any person a blank bill-stamp subscribed, which may be considered as a mandate to fill up the blank in any way he pleases; or rebus ipsis et factis, as it is expressed—that is, by acts of the principal, implying his authority, such as allowing a person to sign instruments habitually for him, or in his name, though his approbation should not be directly proved; or by subsequent assent to the agent's subscription. Procurator may also be conferred by an express faculty, either general, or implying the power of signing bills. The procurator does not bind his principal, unless he write his principal's name per his procurator, or sign his name as agent for the principal, or in some other way indicate his character of agent. When the principal is bound, the agent is not personally liable; but he may be liable when the principal is not bound. Thus, one who subscribes per procurator, without authority from the principal, is personally liable. Policies of insurance are sometimes subscribed by procurator. Bell's Com. i. 399, 479, 600; Bell's Princ. §§ 321, 357; Thomson on Bills, 220; Davidson, 19th April and 4th July 1815, 3 Dow, 218.

Procurator; a general term for a person who acts for or instead of another, and under his authority. Thus, the person whom the vassal directs to make resignation in the hands of the superior is termed his procurator. Agents practising before the inferior courts are also called procurators. When the Admiralty Court was abolished, the Admiralty procurators were allowed, during their respective lives, to conduct, as agents, before the Court of Session, any causes competent to that Court; 1 Will. IV. c. 69, § 28. In cases under the Small Debt Act, no professional man is allowed to appear for a party. Ordinary procurators may be suspended or struck off the list for improper conduct. Stair, B. i. tit. 12, § 12; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 33; Maclean's Sheriff Prac. 73; Bank. ii. 492; Blair's Justice, h. t.; Ross's Lect. ii. 136, 245; Brown's Synop. h. t. See Agent.

Procurator-Fiscal; is the officer appointed by the sheriff, magistrates of burghs, or justices of peace, at whose instance criminal proceedings before such judges are carried on. The procurator-fiscal may prosecute in his own name, and for the public interest, all crimes which such tribunals may competently try; but where he has reason to suspect that any complaint made to him tends more to vindicate the private than the public interest, his duty is to decline giving his instance, and to offer his concurrence. This last he is bound to give to all applications or libels, at the instance of the private party aggrieved; every party being, by the law of Scotland, entitled to sue not only for his private interest, whether to the effect of restitution of his stolen property or reparation of damage sustained by any crime committed against him, but also for the public interest, to repress crime by punishment of the delinquent. And to this effect the procurator-fiscal's concurrence must be given, if the complaint be regularly drawn. Where the procurator-fiscal gives his concurrence, and even acts as the informer's agent, he is not liable to an action for malicious prosecution; Arbuckle, 27th April 1815, 3 Dow, 160. All preconvictions as to persons accused of crimes are now taken by the procurator-fiscal, either before the sheriffs or sheriff-substitute, or the magistrates of the different counties. But when declarations of accused parties are taken before the justices of peace, the proceedings should be remitted to the sheriff, and completed by the procurator-fiscal in that judge's court. By the Jurisdiction Act, which abolishes the mode of taking preconvictions by the Porteous Roll clerk, sheriffs, exclusively, are required to exercise the duty, when crimes are committed, or reported to them. The sheriff and his procurator-fiscal, therefore, should immediately, or as soon as the exigency of the case permits, take and report preconvic-tions. In all cases where information as to any crime has been lodged with the procurator-fiscal, it is his duty immediately to ascertain the truth or falsehood of the information given; to obtain correct evidence; to secure the accused; to prevent the oppression of the innocent, and the escape of the guilty; to preserve from corruption the sources of evidence, and to make a true report to the judge; and the officers of the Crown. There being no coroner in Scotland, it is the duty of the sheriff and his procurator-fiscal, in cases where there is reason to suspect that any individual has met his death by violence, or from other than natural causes, immediately to have the body examined by medical men, and to take a precognition regarding the circumstances of the case. And where murder, fire-raising, or any of the greater crimes have been committed, these officers frequently repair to the spot, for the purpose of better ascertaining, and of being able to report upon the different circumstances and appearances which the case may exhibit. Of late, it has been the practice of Crown counsel to send many cases of a description which were formerly tried in the Court of Justiciary to be tried before the sheriff with a jury; and in these cases the procurator-fiscal is the prosecutor. Although appointed by the sheriffs, the procurators-fiscal of counties, from their cumulative and extensive jurisdiction over the whole county, are accountable to the Crown counsel for the proper discharge of the criminal duties; and in all cases of difficulty, it is their duty to communicate with the Crown-agent, for the advice of the Crown counsel; all the correspondences of the fiscals being through the Crown-agent. The procurators-fiscal are now paid by salaries. To sustain an action of damages against a procurator-fiscal, malice must be averred. Munro v. Taylor, Feb. 25, 1845, 7 D. 500. All the fines imposed by the court as punishments are payable to the fiscal, who is bound to account for them to the Exchequer in cases which have been reported to the Crown counsel; and to the county and sheriff in other cases. Bank, ii. 492; Hutch. Justice, i. 96; Tait's Justice, voce Parties; Tait on Evidence, 272. McGlashan's Prac. 88.

Procuratory of Resignation. A procuratory of resignation is a written mandate or authority, granted by a vassal, whereby he authorises his feu to be returned to his superior, either to remain with the superior as his property—in which case it is said to be a resignation ad remanentiam—or for the purpose of the superior's giving out the feu to a new vassal, or to the former vassal, and a new series of heirs; which is termed a resignation in favorem. The procuratory of resignation is usually inserted as a clause in the deed of conveyance; or, with the addition of a testing clause, a procuratory of resignation may constitute the entire deed. The procuratory authorises a certain person or persons (the name being left blank) to appear in presence of the superior or of his commissioners, authorised to receive resignations, and there, as procurators for the granter of the procuratory, to resign the subject into the hands of the superior, by delivery of staff and baton, and that either ad remanentiam or in favorem; and for new infeftments to be given in favour of the dispositive or of the vassal himself, and a new series of heirs. Hence, entails are frequently executed in the form of procuratories of resignation. The procuratory of resignation is the warrant to the superior to give out of new the property of the vassal. On the death of the vassal, the superior may voluntarily renew the right in favour of the heir of investiture by a precept of clare constat; or, under statutory authority, he may be required to grant a charter of adjudication, or a charter of sale. But, with those exceptions, the resignation made under authority of the procuratory of resignation is the only form by which the superior is vested with any title to give out a new right. Prior to the passing of the act 1693, c. 35, procuratories of resignation, as being mandates to the procurators of the vassal, fell by the death either of the granter or receiver. But by that statute, it was declared that the procuratory of resignation might be the warrant of resignation, after the death either of the granter or of the receiver. The procuratory of resignation necessarily forms part of the disposition of sale, because it is requisite that the purchaser should be enabled to enter with the seller's superior by resignation. It is inserted also in a disposition by a superior to his vassal; and in a disposition of the feu by a vassal in favour of his superior, the procuratory of resignation is the regular form by which the restoration of the property to the superior is authorised. See Ersk. B. ii. tit. 7, § 17, et seq., and B. iii. tit. 3, § 42; Bell's Princ. p. 288, et seq.; Bell on Purchaser's Title, 35, 42; Jurid. Styles, i. 211; Ross's Lect. ii. 223, 234, 245. See Resignation. Charter. Disposition.

By the act 10 and 11 Vict. c. 48, 1847, the procuratory of resignation in a disposition is now framed in these terms: "And I resign the said lands and others for new infeftment;" and the clause so framed is equivalent to a procuratory of resignation in the old form, and, in the case of conveyances by a vassal to his superior, is equivalent to a procuratory of resignation ad remanentiam. See Titles to Land.

Prodigals; are those of a profuse and facile disposition—the fit subjects of voluntary, or of legal interdiction. See Interdiction. Curatory.

Production. In judicial proceedings, written documents produced in process, in modum probationis, or in support of the action or defence, are technically called productions. So also in an action of reduction, the writ, or deed, or decree, called for, in order to its being judicially set aside or reduced, is called the production; which, unless the defender have a good objection to the pursuer's title, or some other valid preliminary defence, he must satisfy (as it is expressed), that is, judicially produce. See the practical rules on this point explained, voce Reduction.

Documents intended to be founded on by a party must be produced before the record is closed, if in his possession, or within his power. This rule, however, does not apply to productions at a jury trial. See the case of Cameron v. Cameron's Trustees, Dec. 21, 1850, 13 D. 412.

Production of articles at criminal trial. Writings and other articles, such as the prisoner's declaration, the forged writings, the stolen goods, the instruments of murder, &c. produced at a trial, do not constitute evidence, unless authenticated by the testimony of witnesses. In theft, the goods stolen ought to be described by the owner before being put into his hands to be sworn to by him; and he must state his reasons for certain knowledge, if he identify the goods absolutely. It must likewise be proved that the goods produced were found upon the prisoner. Where the articles are of such a nature that they cannot be produced, the question of identity must rest on the description given by the owner and witnesses, of the property said to have been stolen, and of that found on the prisoner. In forgery, the forged writing must be produced, if in existence. If destroyed by the panel, the trial may proceed, proof, of course, being rendered more difficult. If lost or destroyed, but not by the panel's fault, it is a question undecided, whether the trial may proceed; but it is settled, that the trial cannot proceed if the non-production is in any way owing to the prosecutor. Notice must be given to the panel of the articles to be produced, that he may examine them. Sometimes a particular description is necessary, which, if erroneous, bars their production. Sometimes, as in the case of stolen goods, general mention is sufficient. A witness, to illustrate his evidence, may produce an article unnoticed in the libel; but such an article cannot be left to become part of the process, and to be sworn to by the other witnesses. Hume, i. 164; ii. 349, 388, 535; Burnett, 200, 506, 558; Steele, 21-6, 128, 150; Alison's Prac. 588.

Profanity. The profanation of the Sabbath by any occupation of labour, business, or sport, or other secular employment, has been prohibited by several statutes, from 1503, c. 83, to 1672, c. 22. Justices of the peace are charged with the execution of these laws, and any person may prosecute. Blair's Justice, h. t.; Tait's Justice, h. t. See Blasphemy. Sunday.

Progress of Titles. A progress of titles, in its most ordinary acceptation, signifies such a series of the title-deeds of a landed estate, or other heritable subject, as is sufficient in law to constitute a valid and effectual feudal title thereto. In the case of a sale at a full price, the seller is bound, unless it be otherwise stipulated, to give the purchaser not only a disposition, or other effectual deed of conveyance, but also to give him a sufficient progress of titles. And in practice, the seller usually comes under an express obligation to that effect; the legal import of which is, that he must deliver to the purchaser, along with his disposition, a progress of deeds, showing that the seller has in his person, by inheritance or otherwise, an unimpeachable feudal title. But where the seller is able to show an unencumbered title complete in his person, and that of his predecessors or authors, extending backwards for forty years, and standing on charter, or disposition and sasine, the purchaser is bound to accept of this as a sufficient progress, unless he can point out specific objections. Where, however, the title rests mainly on mere possession for forty years, such a progress will not amount to implement of the seller's objection. Thus, where a seller had possessed during the long prescription, but there were the following objections to his title:—that a charter confirmed by the superior was wanting in the progress; that some charters had no sasines following on them; while the warrants of certain sasines were wanting; it was held that this was a title which a purchaser was not bound to accept; Nesim, June 13, 1676, M. 14, 169. Where the expositor in articles of roup has taken the purchaser bound to satisfy himself with the progress, but, at the same time, has bound himself to give a “valid disposition,” it seems to be settled that the purchaser is not barred from pleading that the title offered is legally objectionable. See Waddell v. Pollock, 19th June 1828, 6 S. & D. 999. But, on the other hand, and in connection with the same subject, see also Rowand, 24th Nov. 1768, Mor. 14, 178; Hay, 10th July 1783, Nor. 14, 183; Anderson, 4th Dec. 1818, F. G.; Curriers, 26th May 1825, 4 S. & D. 34; Bell, 12th Dec. 1826, 2 W. & S. 523. Questions frequently arise on the effect of wharby, and other interruptions, of prescription on a progress of titles. Stair, B. iv. tit. 38, § 19; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 20; Bank. ii. 218, 688; Bell on Completing Titles, 154; Ross's Lect. ii. 296. See Disposition. Sale. Search of Incumbrances.

Promise and Offer. An offer is a proposal made by the offeror to the person to whom the offer is addressed, to give or to do something, either gratuitously, or on an onerous consideration. A promise is an offer, with this addition, that the promiser, from the nature of his proposal, thinks it unnecessary to wait for the other party's assent, which he takes it for granted will be given as soon as the offer is known. In the case of an offer, therefore, there is no consensus in idem placitum until the offer is expressly agreed to. But as soon as a promise is made, there is consensus in idem placitum implied, although not expressed. An offeror is not bound until his offer is accepted. A promiser is bound as soon as the promise reaches the party to whom it is made. According to Stair, the necessity of acceptance in the one case and not in the other is to be accounted for in this way—that an offer accepted is the deed of two, while a promise is but the deed of one, and has not implied in it, “as a condition,” the acceptance of another; Stair, B. i. tit. 10, §§ 3 and 4. Whatever supposition is adopted, the practical result is the same; but it seems more in accordance with the general doctrine of agreements to hold, that obligation can only spring from consent; and that this consent exists in the case of a promise, as well as of an accepted offer. The presumption does not always hold, that a person in whose favour a proposal is made to give or to do something gratuitously, is willing to accede to that proposal. And when the proposer expresses any doubt upon this point, he is not bound, unless by the express acceptance of the other party. Thus, a person offered by letter to become debtor for a sum due by his mother, but requested to know whether the creditor agreed to this. The creditor did not expressly accept the offer, and the offerer was held, after his mother's death, not bound to implement it; Allan v. Colzier, June 25, 1664, M. 9428. But a letter, in which a brother promised to give a bond of provision in favour of his sisters, and two bonds for £250 each in favour of his brother, was held binding; MacLachlan, June 1, 1821, 1 S. & D. 45. A promise does not require writing for its constitution: it may be either verbal or by letter. It cannot, however, be proved by witnesses: the writ or oath of the debtor is necessary. Formerly, a promise might be proved by witnesses, if it was of the nature of a cautionary engagement, and was entered into at the same time with a principal obligation, proveable by parole testimony; but by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, 1856, all guarantees and cautionary obligations must now be in writing.

A simple offer may, in ordinary cases, be accepted at any time, if not withdrawn. But in mercantile transactions, on account of the danger of delay, and the risk that the market may alter, there is an implied condition in an offer to buy or sell that it be accepted immediately, or at least without undue delay, and while there is no change injurious to the offerer. If a time be fixed within which acceptance must be made, it must be attended to. An offer, bearing that an answer is expected in course of post, is not binding after the arrival of that post without an acceptance. A letter by the first mail-packet from abroad is held to be in course of post, though private ships may have sailed previously. An acceptance making a change upon the proposed bargain is equivalent to a new offer, and must, in its turn, be agreed to by the offerer. An order for goods must either be complied with, or rejected without delay; but in this case, a formal acceptance is not necessary to bind the person sending the order. A lady wrote to another to engage a servant, and thereafter not to do so; the two letters were delivered through the post-office simultaneously to the servant. It was held that there was no completed contract, and that the servant was not entitled to wages; Countess of Dunmore, Dec. 15, 1830, 9 S. & D. 490. Where the acceptance of an offer and the retraction of an offer are posted on the same day, and both letters are delivered on the following day, there is a completed contract. See the case of Thomson v. James, July 12, 1855, 1 D. 1. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, § 1; tit. 3, § 88; Stair, B. i. tit. 3, § 9; tit. 10, §§ 3-6; More's Notes, p. lxxii.; Brodie's Sup. 907; Bank. vol. i. pp. 98, 323-5; Bell's Com. i. 326, 397; Bell's Princ. §§ 73-82; Illust. ib.; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825), 127, 316-8, 53; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 276, 327, 444; Bell on Leases, ii. 115-7; Thomson on Bills, 6, 336, 524. Promissory-Note. A promissory-note is a written obligation by one person to pay to another a certain sum of money on demand, or at a specified time after the date of the note.

“£100 sterling. Edinburgh, (date).
Three months after date, I promise to pay C. D. or order, at (specify a place) the sum of One Hundred Pounds sterling, value received."

(Signed) "A. B."

Such a note must be written on the proper stamp, any error in that respect not being suppliable afterwards; and the note, when completed, possesses all the privileges of a bill of exchange as regards authentication, negotiation, and diligence; 23 Geo. III. c. 18, § 55. See Bill of Exchange. An acknowledgment for the receipt of money, "for which I shall account," is not a promissory-note. See on this subject generally, Pirie v. Smith, 28th Feb. 1833, 9 S. & D. 473; Thomson on Bills, p. 35, 2d edit.; Ross's L. C. C., p. 52.

Promulgation. The acts of the Scottish Parliament were promulgated by proclamation in all the county towns in the kingdom. They were afterwards ordered to be printed; 1540, c. 127; and the proclamation of them fell into disuse. But, by the act 1581, c. 128, they were ordered to be published at the market-cross of Edinburgh. British statutes come into operation from the date of their receiving the royal assent, unless it be otherwise provided in the act. Ersk. B. i. tit. 1, § 37; and stat. 33 Geo. III. c. 13. See Assent, Royal.

Promutuum. One is said to have a quasi loan, or promutuum, of a sum which has been paid to him when it was not due, and which he is therefore bound to restore. Stair, B. i. tit. 7, § 9; tit. 2, § 5. See Condictio Indebiti.

Proof. See Evidence.

Proper Jurisdiction. Proper jurisdiction, as contradistinguished from delegated jurisdiction, is that which belongs to the judge or magistrate himself, in virtue of his office; whereas delegated jurisdiction is that which is communicated by a judge to another who acts in his name, called a depute or deputy; Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 13. See Delegated Jurisdiction.

Property; is the exclusive right of using and disposing of a subject as one's own. Hence, the proprietor of a subject, whether heritable or moveable, may give it away, or sell, or burden, or pledge it, or create a servitude over it. So also the same subject may belong to two equally, which is termed joint property, or common property. Moveable property once vested in a person must remain his until it ceases to be so by his voluntary act, by delinquency, or by dereliction. But heritable property is not lost by dereliction alone. In order to give effect to the dereliction of heritage, there must be a title in another founded in the positive prescription. See Dereliction. Prescription. Occupancy is admitted by the law of Scotland as a mode of acquiring property as to those subjects only which have continued in their original state unappropriated, whether the subject be animate or inanimate, as precious stones which never have had an owner, wild beasts, fowls, or fishes. But with this exception, property, both heritable and moveable, is regulated by the rules of law in its constitution and transmission. Difficult questions sometimes occur as to the right of conterminous proprietors to make alterations upon their own property, which may affect the property of their neighbours. Some of these questions have been already considered under the articles Common Property, and Common Interest. A proprietor has the exclusive right to the occupation and use of his property, a cuiusque ad centrum. He may therefore prevent any encroachment, however inoffensive, and on whatever pretence. Contrivances have been employed for the purpose of preventing encroachments, as to the legality of which see Spring-guns. Every proprietor may do what he likes with his own, provided that he does not thereby injure the property of another; the remedy to the sufferer being damages for an injury inflicted, and interdict against any injury threatened. Neither is a proprietor entitled to exercise his right of property solely for the purpose of incommoding his neighbour. See Emulatio vicini. But one cannot be restrained in the beneficial or legal use of his property, merely because inconvenience may result to a neighbour. A proprietor may build to the very verge of his ground, even though he should stop all his neighbour's lights. See Light. Land locally inferior must receive the water of the superior land; but the inferior proprietor is not entitled to dam up the water so as to send it back upon the higher ground. A proprietor may dig his ground and remove the earth to the very verge of his property; but if his operations injure a neighbouring property, or remove the support from a neighbouring tenement so as to cause it to fall, or put it in danger of falling, he may be interdicted from proceeding, or made liable for the loss. This matter must necessarily depend upon the circumstances of each particular case. A proprietor who, in digging up an old wall, went lower than the foundation of his neighbour's house, which was thereby injured, was found liable for damages; Robertson, May 12, 1825, 4 S. & D. 6. Damages were awarded in the Jury Court for injury done to a house by improperly excavating the foundation of an adjoining one; Callender, July 18, 1828, 4 Mur. 108; and Douglas, Sept. 19, 1828, 4 Mur. 130. A person who had purchased a building-stance adjoining a tenement which had no sunk storey, intimated his intention of excavating his ground for the purpose of having a sunk storey. This was resisted, and interdict against it granted by the Lord Ordinary, and his judgment adhered to by the Court, on the ground that the excavation would endanger the safety of the neighbouring tenement, and that the buildings in that street all wanted sunk areas; Murray, Dec. 4, 1834, 13 S. & D. 119; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1. § 1, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 938; Illust. 940; Bank. vol. i. pp. 10, 84, 504, 529; iii. 51; Brown's Synop. h. t. and p. 357; Shaw's Digest, h. t. Property Tax. The income or property tax was first imposed by 39 Geo. III. c. 13 (9th January 1799); and after having been the subject of various statutes, it finally expired on 5th April 1816. See 56 Geo. III. c. 65. An income tax was again introduced by the act 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, and still continues. The last act on the subject is 22 and 23 Vict. c. 18, 1859.

Proposed and Repelled. Pleas proposed and repelled are those pleas which have been stated in a court and repelled previous to decree being given; and in the Court of Session no reduction of a decree on such grounds will be allowed. Stair, B. iii. tit. 1, § 46; tit. 52, § 7; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, § 3; Bank. vol. ii. p. 679; Bell's Princ. p. 665. Prorogation. In judicial proceedings, a prorogation is a prolongation of the time appointed for reporting a diligence, lodging a paper, or obtempering any other judicial order. By the act 13 and 14 Vict. c. 36, 1850, prorogations may always take place by the written consent of parties, either before or after the lapse of the period appointed for lodging any paper. A prorogation may also be granted by the Lord Ordinary once without the consent of parties, on special cause shown, and the nature of the cause must be set forth in the interlocutor granting the prorogation; but the Lord Ordinary cannot grant prorogation oftener than once, even upon cause shown, unless such course shall have been allowed by the Inner House on the report of the Lord Ordinary.

Prorogation of Jurisdiction; is that jurisdiction which is, by the consent of the parties, conferred on a judge otherwise incompetent. The consent may be either express or implied, as by proposing defences in causa, or the like. But a clause consenting to registration in a particular judge's court-books, does not imply a prorogation of that judge's authority as to questions afterwards arising concerning the legal import of the writing so registered; and in general, in order to render prorogation effectual, the judge must have a jurisdiction susceptible of prorogation. Thus, it is inadmissible where his jurisdiction is excluded by statute; or when the judge's judicial commission is vacated or has expired; or where he is acting extra territorium. A defender, however, whose domicile is beyond a particular judge's territory, may, if cited within that territory, subject himself to the jurisdiction by appearing in court and offering peremptory defences. Prorogation of jurisdiction from causes of one description to those of a totally different description is inadmissible. Yet, where the cause is of the same nature with those to which the judge is competent, prorogation is admitted. Thus, where the proper jurisdiction of the judge is confined to causes amounting to a certain value, parties may prorogate the jurisdiction to causes above that value, unless the statute conferring the jurisdiction prohibits it, or expressly limits the jurisdiction. Prorogation is not admitted in the Queen's causes, lest the Crown should suffer by the negligence of its officers. Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 27, et seq.; see Ivory's Notes; Bank. ii. 471. See also Declinature. Justices of Peace.

Prorogation of a Lease; is the extension of it. In strict phraseology, a prorogation has been said to differ from a renewal in this, that the former is simply an extension of a lease which has expired, and which it ought to recite; while a renewal commences prior to the expiration of the old lease, and makes some alteration on it. This distinction has not been observed in practice; and prorogation and renewal are used indiscriminately. The same legal requisites are necessary to constitute a prorogation as to constitute the original lease. Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, § 12; More's Notes, p. ccxlv.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 25, Note; Bank. ii. 52, 64, 72; Bell's Com. i. 68; Ross's Lect. ii. 500; Bell on Leases, i. 55, 60, 88, 117, 284; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 341, 391. See Lease.

Prorogue. The Parliament is said to stand prorogued when it is continued from one session to another. The prorogation is made by the royal authority, either by royal commissioners, who, in the Sovereign's name, prorogue the Parliament, or the prorogation may be made by royal proclamation. See Parliament.

Protection against Personal Diligence. This is given by the law in the following cases:—1. The persons of peers, and of the widows of peers, are exempted from diligence. 2. Members of Parliament are protected against personal execution by privilege of Parliament. 3. Married women for civil debts. 4. Minors under the age of pupillarity. The Palace of Holyrood House and its precincts afford a sanctuary to debtors. Besides the protection against arrest for civil debt thus obtained, the execution of a caption may be stayed by the judge, whenever it is necessary to call the person against whom such a diligence has issued or may issue to give his evidence in a cause. For this purpose the judge may, under the acts 1663, c. 4, and 1681, c. 9, grant a personal protection for such time as may be requisite—the same not exceeding a month; and as a safeguard against fraud, the party calling the witness must, by the act 1681, c. 9, make oath that he believes the witness to be a material one, and the creditor must also be called to object to the protection if he sees proper. Under the Bankrupt Statute, a personal protection may be given by the Court on awarding sequestration until a meeting of creditors, and a majority in number and value of the creditors may afterwards renew the protection. Lastly, Decree in an action of cessio bonorum may be regarded as a protection to the debtor who has made the cessio, until his circumstances improve. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, §§ 24–25; Ross's Lect. i. 329. See Cessio Bonorum. Privilege. Personal Protection. Sanctuary.

Protest, Notarial. Requisitions and intimations are often made under form of notarial instrument; in which the notary protests that the party against whom it is directed shall be liable to certain effects set forth in the instrument; but all those notarial instruments which are not held in law to be requisite as legal solemnities require to be supported by the parole evidence of the notary and witnesses present. See Evidence.

Protestation. Where a pursuer, advocator or suspender, after having raised an action, fails to insist in it, his opponent, by means of protestation, may compel him either to proceed or to suffer the action to fall. After the lapse of the inducit of a summons, if the pursuer does not proceed to call and enrol it, the defender, if he pleases, may put up protestation, which is done by delivering to one of the Outer-House clerks a note for insertion in the Minute-book of the Court of Session, specifying the names of the parties and the date of the summons, with the names of the defender's counsel and agent. This note, which is called a protestation, and which must be dated on a sederunt-day, is then inserted in the Minute-book by the keeper, and thus published or notified to the profession. If, within nine free days after its date, a certificate is produced to the Minute-book Keeper, from a depute-clerk of Session or his assistant, that the summons, suspension, or advocacy in question (as the case may be), has been duly lodged with him for calling, the Minute-book Keeper is bound to score the protestation, as it is expressed, and the clerk issuing the certificate is bound to call the summons, &c., regularly and immediately. But if no such certificate is produced within the nine days, the Minute-book Keeper, on the application of the party putting up the protestation, will give it out to be extracted, after which it cannot be scored. When the extract is signed, unless the defender chooses voluntarily to pass from his protestation, the action is at an end, and the defender cannot be called on to answer till cited on a new summons, or until a new advocacy or suspension has been raised. The same course may be followed when the pursuer, after calling the summons, fails to enrol it. Where the summons has not been called, the protestation must be put up within year and day of the diet of comparance; for after that period the instance falls, and protestation is unnecessary. But where the summons has been called and not enrolled, the protestation may be put up at anytime within forty years;—attending to this, however, that after the lapse of one year from the date of the calling the process is asleep, and before putting up protestation a summons of wakening must be raised against the pursuer, the protestation in that case being called a “protestation upon a wakening.” The difference in this respect between a summons and a suspension or advocacy is, that, until called, a summons, although it may fall, cannot fall asleep; whereas letters of suspension or of advocacy, whether executed or called or not, within a year after the date of signing or comparance, may fall asleep. There were formerly technical differences between protestations in ordinary actions and in suspensions and advocations; but now the procedure in both cases is very much alike. See the subject learnedly expounded by Mr Beveridge, Form of Process, i. 270–81. See also A. S. 11th July 1828, §§ 30, 24; A. S. 8th July 1831, and Skand's Prac. i. 172, et seq.

By the act 13 and 14 Vict. c. 36, 1850, the extract protestation contains a decree for £3, 3s. of protestation-money, if it is a protestation for not calling. If it is a protestation for not enrolling, but after the calling and return of the summons or other initial writ, with or without defences or answers, as the case may require, the defender or respondent is entitled to his just expenses as between party and party. A pursuer may be opposed against a protestation for not calling at any time not later than ten days after the date has been given out for extract, ~~whether~~ tract has been issued or not, by lodging with the clerk, in order to calling, the summons or other writ, with the relative documents, accompanied by the receipt of the agent for the defender for the sum of L.3, 3s. of protestation-money, or consigning the money itself in the hands of the clerk for the use of the agent, and payable to him on demand. A pursuer may also be reponed for not enrolling and insisting, by enrolling his summons and other writ in the Outer-House Roll, and forthwith lodging the writ, with the enrolling clerk's certificate of enrolment annexed, in the hands of the clerk, accompanied by the receipt of the agent for the defender for the total amount of the protestation-money and expense of extract, or consigning the money itself in the hands of the clerk for the use of the agent. Whenever a summons or other writ shall have been duly enrolled by the pursuer in the Outer-House Roll, whether protestation shall have been put up or not, it becomes to all intents and purposes a depending process, under control of the Lord Ordinary and of the Court, until finally disposed of by interlocutor. In the inferior courts, the defender, on the day of comparance, or on any subsequent court-day within the year, may produce the copy summons and citation served on him, and, by motion minuted in the roll-book of the court, crave protestation. On this, the inferior judge admits the protestation, and assoliszes the defender with a certain sum in name of costs; and after the lapse of seven free days (or of forty-eight hours, where arrestments have been used), the defender may extract the protestation, and the action falls. But, at any time before extract, the pursuer may produce the summons, and get it called, on payment of the expenses decerned or; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825; Maclaurin's Form of Process, p. 109. Protesting of Bills. The protest of a bill is the notarial evidence of a demand for payment having been made, by a notary, in presence of witnesses, at the place where the bill is payable. In order to preserve recourse against the drawer and indorsers, this protest must be taken on the last day of grace. See Days of Grace. Noting a Bill. But as against the acceptor, the bill may be protested at any time within six months of the term of payment, to the effect of recording such protest, and expediting summary diligence against the acceptor. Where there is no place of payment, the demand must be made in presence of the acceptor, or at his dwelling-house. A bill may also be protested for non-acceptance.

A copy of the bill is prefixed to the protest; and the notary, in his instrument, states the proceedings, and the protest against the acceptor, and all concerned, for payment, damages, &c. This protest may be recorded within six months, and become the warrant of letters of horning, &c. *Ersk. Protocol. On the admission of a notary, he receives from the clerk-register a book, marked by the clerk, called a protocol, in which the notary is directed to insert copies of all the instruments he may have occasion to execute, to be there preserved as in a record. These protocols were at one time attempted to be made serviceable as records of sasines; but this, from many causes, failed, and their principal use was to supply the loss of any instrument, which they were allowed to do where the protocol had been regularly kept; but the protocol was seldom regularly kept, and is now entirely in disuse. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 39, et seq.; Ross's Lect. vol. ii. p. 201, et seq.; Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 25; Bank. ii. 501; Tait on Evidence, 35. See Notary-Public.

Pro-Tutor. Pro-tutors and pro-curators are those who act as tutors or curators to a minor without having a regular title to the office. By Act of Sederunt, June 10, 1665, such persons are declared liable not only for their actual intromissions as tutors or curators, but for what they ought to have intromitted with; and they may at any time be called to account by the minor. Those acting with them, or making payment to them, of the minor's money, do so at their peril, and are not released by such payment, unless in so far as the money has been in rem versum of the minor—i. e. profitably expended for his use. And the same principle regulates the claim of a pro-tutor or pro-curator against the minor for reimbursement of money expended for the minor. It must have been profitably expended, otherwise no action lies for reimbursement. Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 28; Stair, B. i. tit. 6, § 12; More's Notes, xlv.; Bank. vol. i. p. 168; Bell's Princ. 584. See Curatory.

Prout de Jure. A proof prout de jure is a proof by all the legal means of probation—viz., writ, witnesses, and oath of party; although, in practice, the phrase is usually applied to a proof of facts and circumstances by parole, in contradistinction to a proof limited to writ or oath of party. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 1; Maclaurin's Sheriff Prac. 157. See Evidence.

Proven Rental. When the heritors, in a process of augmentation, do not admit the accuracy of the minister's rental, and take a commission for deponing on the actual rental of their several lands, the scheme of the rental, prepared under a judicial remit from the Lord Ordinary, according to the proof which has been led, and the certificates of rental and decrees of valuation produced, is called the proven rental. A. S. 5th July, 1809, § 4. See Augmentation. So also the rental of the subjects of a judicial sale, proved in the manner explained under the article Ranking and Sale, is called the proven rental.

Proving of the Tenor. The terms of a deed which has been lost or destroyed may be proved in an action peculiar to the Court of Session, called an action of proving the tenor. In this action it is necessary to prove the accident by which the deed was lost, or the casus amissionis, as it is termed; and this is more requisite in such deeds as remain private, or where the destruction of the deed is usually relied on as a discharge. The tenor of the deed must be proved to the Court by writing, or by the oath of the granter, or by witnesses; but where parole proof is resorted to, there must be adminicles in the general case—that is, relative writings. Where, from the circumstances of the case, no adminicle is to be expected, the Court will give to the evidence that degree of credit to which it may appear to be entitled. As drafts or scrolls are received as adminicles, it is proper for every man of business to preserve the drafts of the deeds he may have prepared, as well as to mark on the draft the date of the execution of the deed, and the circumstances attending it. He ought also to fill up the testing clause in the draft as it is actually filled up in the engrossed deed. The carelessness of practitioners in this respect, and where they make copies of deeds, cannot be too severely reprobated. A very common practice, in copying a deed, is to stop short at the testing clause, and thereby, in the event of the loss or accidental destruction of the principal deed, to deprive the party of very valuable evidence, in case a proving of the tenor should become necessary. This action is chiefly necessary where the deed to be proved is part of a progress of title-deeds; Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 19, and B. iv. tit. 1, § 54. As to the action of proving the tenor of a lost bill or note, see the article Lost. Bank. vol. ii. p. 641; Bell's Princ. § 883; Thomson on Bills, 319; Darling's Prac. 505; Tait on Evidence, 203 to 214; Jurid Styles, 2d edit. iii. 207–8, 521. See Casus Amissionis.

Proxy. Members of the House of Lords, and the electors of the sixteen representative peers of Scotland, may vote by proxy. See Election Laws, 343–4; Parliament, 704. Neither members of the House of Commons nor their electors can vote by proxy.

Puberty; is the interval between the age of fourteen years in males, and of twelve years in females, and majority. In questions as to crime, the age of puberty in females as well as males is fourteen; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 1. See Infants. Minor. Crime.

Public Burdens. Public burdens affecting land may be defined generally as all taxations or assessments imposed in respect of the property or possession of land, including the land tax or cess, minister's stipend, manse and glebe assessments, schoolmaster's salary, poor-rates, rogue-money, road and bridge assessments, and others the like public and county burdens. Feu and blench duties, though sometimes erroneously so described, are not public burdens. In the disposition to a purchaser, a clause is usually inserted, binding the seller to pay the feu-duty and the public burdens up to a certain date (generally the term of entry), and the purchaser to pay them thenceforward. Independently of stipulation, public burdens fall upon the landlord, and not upon the tenant, except in the case of the schoolmaster's salary, which is payable one-half by the landlord and the other half by the tenant. A stipulation is sometimes introduced into a lease, declaring the lessor or the lessee liable for the public burdens. If the landlord be bound to pay them, and if the tenant pay them in the first instance, he may claim a corresponding deduction from the rent. The tenant ought to deliver the receipts; and the discharge for the rent ought to specify that so much was paid in money, and so much accounted for by those receipts. Under an agreement between a landlord and tenant, that the latter should pay public burdens, the income-tax, as having been a personal tax, was held not to be included; Wilson, Feb. 15, 1828, 6 S. & D. 551. A general clause of exemption from taxations in favour of heritors does not embrace an exemption from the burden of manse and glebe; Nicol, Feb. 27, 1829, 7 S. & D. 479. A public burden must be compensated either by a statute or an uninterrupted uniform practice for a sufficient time; Scott, Feb. 4, 1829, 5 Mur. 57. It is provided by statute, that no one shall, in virtue of any diligence, take away the goods of another, unless he pay, or see paid, all the public taxes to which the proprietor of the goods is liable; 43 Geo. III. c. 150. Conveyancers usually employ the expression public and parochial burdens, but the general expression "public burdens" is sufficient to cover local as well as general taxes and assessments; although it does not follow that the expression "parochial burdens" includes general or national taxation and assessments. Stair, B. ii. tit. 6, § 20; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 42; Bank. i. 666; ii. 576; Bell's Com. i. 700; ii. 40; *Kames' Stat. See Land-Tax.

By the act 10 and 11 Vict. c. 48, 1847, a clause binding the disponent to relieve the disponent of all feu-duties, casualties, and public burdens, imports a relief of duties payable to the superior, and of all public, parochial, and local burdens due from or on account of the lands disposed, prior to the date of entry.

Public Carriages. The responsibility of persons engaging to carry goods for hire is treated of under the articles Carrier; and Nautæ, Caupones. Under the present article will be considered the obligations of such as engage to convey passengers by land or water. The proprietors of stage-coaches, hackney-coaches, or post-chaises, and all masters and owners of ships, ferrymen, bargemen, and other carriers by water, are liable for any injury which passengers sustain from the insufficiency of the vehicle, or the carelessness or unskilfulness of the driver or other person employed. With regard to the vehicle, it will exonerate the owner if it can be proved to have been sufficient, so far as the human eye could discover. Yet in one English case, where an iron axletree was so imbedded in wood that it could not be inspected without removing certain iron clamps, the proprietor was held liable, the axletree having been defective in the part which was hidden, and having broken on the journey. By the nature of the contract, ordinary care must be bestowed by those employed. But in the case of stage-coaches, the responsibility extends to accidents arising even from the slightest fault—culpa levissima; neglect of the rules of the road (see Furious Driving); going too near any obstruction, or the edge of the road; want of skill in driving; racing against other coaches; taking up more passengers than the law allows, where the injury arises from overloading; will all make the principals responsible for injury sustained by any accident thereby occasioned. But, strict as the responsibility is, it differs from the liability of carriers of goods under the edict Nautæ, Caupones, in not being absolute. It requires some fault, however slight; and an accident which human care and foresight could not have prevented will not subject the owner. In England, when injury is occasioned, neglect is presumed; and it is necessary for the owner to redargue this presumption, by proving that it was a mere accident. A passenger getting alarmed and leaping from the coach when truly there was no danger, has no claim for damages against the coach proprietor. But if such a step was a natural and prudent precaution against real danger, the owner is liable. A shipmaster has been found to have a lien for passage-money, not on the passenger or his wearing apparel, but on his luggage; and it is thought that a similar lien would be admitted for the fare of a land passenger. Bell's Com. i. 462; ii. 102; Bell's Princ. § 170; Illust. ib.; *Hutch. Publication of Inhibition. The publication of an inhibition is the intimation made to all and sundry by the messenger, prohibiting them from dealing with the inhibited person. This execution or intimation must be made by a messenger at the head borough of the debtor's domicile. It is from the date of the publication that the litigiousness of the inhibition commences. Bell's Com. ii. 142; Ross's Lect. i. 478. See Inhibition. Litigiousness.

Publication of Interdiction. An interdiction, to have full effect against the lieges, must be duly published; which is done by letters of publication, proceeding on a bill, the warrant of which is the decree pronounced in the action in the case of a judicial interdiction; or the registered bond, in the case of a voluntary interdiction. For the styles of these letters, see Jurid. Styles, iii. 544. See Interdiction.

Punishment. The punishment of crimes is intended not only as a penalty on the transgressor, but to operate so as to deter others from committing the like crimes. Punishment is either capital, which reaches the life of the criminal, or it consists in imprisonment, transportation, whipping, or fine. The extent of the punishment is sometimes regulated by statute; at other times the punishment is what is termed arbitrary—that is, in the discretion of the judge. But an arbitrary punishment can never reach the life of the criminal—it is in no case a capital punishment. It is a necessary consequence of a capital conviction and sentence, that the single escheat of the criminal falls. See Escheat. See Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 2, et seq.; Alison's Prac. 664. et seq.; Bank. i. 242; Kames' Equity, 40, 227, 302, 491. See Criminal Prosecution.

Pupillarity; is the interval between the birth and the age of fourteen in males and twelve in females. See Tutor. Minor. Curator.

Pupillary Substitution. See Substitution.

Pupils' Protection Act. The act 12 and 13 Vict. c. 51, 1849, was passed for the better protection of the property of pupils, absent persons, and persons under mental incapacity. By this act, every judicial factor must find caution for his duly accounting for his intromissions, and for the proper performance of every duty incumbent on him as factor. He must also, within six months at farthest from the date of his appointment, lodge with the Accountant of Court a distinct rental of all lands committed to his management, and a list of all moneys and funds belonging and debts due to the estate, and also an inventory of all moveables forming part of the estate. He must close his account of charge and discharge once in every year, and must lodge his account in the office of the Accountant, with the vouchers, mentioned and referred to in the accounts by number. He must lodge the moneys in his hands in some one of the banks of Scotland established by act of Parliament or royal charter, in a separate account or on deposit, the account or deposit being in his own name as judicial factor on the estate committed to him. The duty of the Accountant of Court is to superintend generally the conduct of all judicial factors, and tutors and curators, coming under the provisions of the act, and to see that they duly observe all rules and regulations affecting them for the time. His duty also is to audit the accounts of factors on the general principles of good ordinary management for the real benefit of the estate and of those interested therein, and to consider the investments of the estate and the sufficiency thereof. The provisions of the act relating to judicial factors, except as to the mode of appointment and caution, or relating to the office, powers, and duties of the Accountant, apply, in so far as they can be applied, to every person who after the passing of the act shall be served tutor of law to any pupil, or appointed tutor-dative to any pupil or insane person or idiot, or served curator to any insane person or idiot. Tutors and curators served or appointed before the passing of the act may place themselves under the provisions of the act. The rental, list, and inventory lodged with the Accountant in terms of the act by any tutor or curator is equivalent to the tutorial or curatorial inventory directed to be given up by the act 1672 concerning pupils and minors, and their tutors and curators. The Court is empowered to remove or accept the resignation of any tutor or curator coming under the provisions of the act, and to appoint a factor loco tutoris or curator bonis in his room.

Purchaser; the buyer or onerous acquirer of a subject, whether heritable or moveable. See Sale. Singular Successor.

Pure Obligation; an unconditional obligation. A condition is said to be purged when it is fulfilled. See Obligation. Conditional Obligation.

Purging an Irritancy. Where a penal irritancy is incurred by the performance of a prohibited act, or by the failure to perform some act which is enjoined, an action of declarator of the irritancy must be raised; and when the action comes into Court, the defender may appear at the bar, and pay or perform, in terms of his obligation, whereby he will avoid the irritancy. This is called purging the irritancy. Stair, B. i. tit. 17, § 16; Mor's Notes, exc.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, § 27; tit. 6, § 44; Ivory's Notes; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 524; Ross's Lect. ii. 497. See Irritancy. Clauses Irritant.

Purpresture; is a feudal delinquency, inferring a total forfeiture of the fee. It was incurred by the vassal encroaching on the streets, highways, or commonies belonging to the superior. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, § 52, and tit. 6, § 17; Stair, B. ii. tit. 11, § 30; Bank. vol. ii. p. 149; Bell's Princ. § 730; Kames' Stat. Law, h. t.; Brown's Synop. h. t.

Purpresture, or purpersion; according to Skene, is the wrongous usurpation, taking, or occupation of another man's lands. There are three kinds. The first affects the King—as unjustly occupying any part of his dominions, stopping the highway or King's coming, diverting the course of a running stream, &c.;

the second kind affects the interest of the offender's superior; and the third, those of any other besides the King or the superior. Skene, h. t.

Pursuer; the party who institutes and insists in an ordinary action. Except in the case of copartnerships, the general rule is, that two or more persons cannot sue in the same summons for enforcement or vindication of their separate rights, or for sums due to them severally. But they may sue jointly, when they have been injured by the same act, or have a joint interest in the matter libelled. Where an action has been improperly raised by several pursuers, it is not funditus void, but may be held good as the summons of one of them, for his particular interest. In jury trials, the party ordered by the Court to condescend is held to be pursuer; A. S. 29th Nov. 1825, § 1. Where both parties have been ordered to condescend, the Court has a discretion in the matter; §§ 12 and 13. But it is the party on whom the onus probandi at the trial is laid who is made to stand as pursuer in the issues. Sometimes it is necessary to declare a party pursuer in one, and defender in another issue, or set of issues. The Court may decide this matter at any time before the trial; and the mode of having it settled is by a motion on behalf of either party. Shand's Prac. 124; Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 100, 281; MacLaurin's Sheriff Prac. 77; Tait's Justice, voce Parties in an Action. See Defender. Title to Pursue.

Pursuivants; are officers under the Lyon King-at-Arms, by whose authority they are appointed. Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 32. See Arms. Lyon Court.

Purview; the body, or that part of an act of Parliament which begins with "Be it enacted." Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Put Away; in deeds of entail is equivalent to "alienate." Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, p. 76, and authorities there cited. See Tailzie.

Quadriennium Utile; are the four years allowed after majority, within which an action of reduction of any deed done to the prejudice of a minor may be instituted. Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 35; Stair, B. i. tit. 6, § 44; B. ii. tit. 12, § 31; More's Notes, p. xlvii; Bank. i. 184; Bell's Com. i. 135; Bell's Princ. § 2099. See Minor.

Quæquidem. In charters by progress, the clause which immediately follows the dispositive clause is called the quæquidem, from the words with which it commences. This clause deduces the fee from the vassal who stood last publicly infeft, specially mentioning the progress by which it came into the person of the present vassal, whether by resignation or by whatever form of conveyance. The progress ought to be distinctly set forth, so as to show that the charter has been properly expedite, and that the progress is complete. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 24; Jurid. Styles, vol. i. p. 438; Bell's Princ. § 799; Bell on Completing Titles, 278; Ross's Lect. ii. 288. See Charter. Progress.

Quakers. Quakers, in consequence of religious scruples, are permitted, when examined as witnesses in civil or criminal cases, instead of taking an oath, to make a solemn affirmation in these terms: "I do solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm." See Affirmation. A quaker wilfully making a false affirmation incurs the pains of perjury. See the act 22 Vict. c. 10, 1859.

Qualification to Vote. See Reform Act.

Qualified Oath; is the oath of a party on reference, where circumstances are stated which must necessarily be taken as part of the oath, and which therefore qualify the admission or denial. Stair, B. iv. tit. 44, § 14; More's Notes, p. ccccxviii; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 11; Bank. ii. 659; Tait's Justice of Peace, voce Proof. See Evidence. Extrinsic.

Quanti Minoris Actio; was a Roman law action, by which, when the buyer discovered a shortcoming of no great importance in the subject purchased, he sued for repetition of as much of the price as exceeded what he might have reasonably given for the subject, had he been previously aware of the deficiency. It would appear that the actio quanti minoris is not admitted in the law of Scotland. At all events, where there has been no fraud on the part of the seller, and where the purchaser receives all the land which he actually purchased, it has been found that he can claim no abatement because the number of acres is found to fall short of what was stated in the description; Hannay, 26th Jan. 1785, M. 13334; Inglis, June 27, 1788, M. 13335; Gray, 23d Jan. 1801, M. voce Sale, App. No. 2. Where, however, he does not receive all that he actually purchased, he is entitled either to have abatement or to have the contract reduced; and generally, wherever there is error in essentialibus, the sale may be reduced. See Error in Essentialibus. It may be doubted, supposing land were sold as containing so many acres, at so much per acre, and it turned out that there were not as many acres as had been stated, whether the purchaser would not be entitled to refuse payment beyond the price of the actual number of acres at the specified price per acre. A case something similar to this, but in which the advertised fell short of the actual measurement, has been decided. In that case, which was a judicial sale by an apparent heir, the lands exposed were limited by a specification of their proven rental to $2\frac{1}{2}$ acres, and the upset price was fixed accordingly. After the sale, however, it having been discovered that the lands specially enumerated extended to 7 acres, it was held that no more was sold than $2\frac{1}{2}$ acres, but that the purchaser might either hold or reject the sale; Hepburn, 4th July 1781, M. 14168. In another case, where lands formerly burdened with a feu-duty, but which feu-duty had been redeemed, were sold as if still burdened, the purchaser claimed to possess the lands free of the feu-duty. It was held that the purchaser must either give up the purchase of the lands, or pay an additional price, corresponding to the value of the feu-duty; Blair, 16th July 1790; Bell's Com. ii. 283. This question was again discussed in another case. There a tenant took a lease of a farm, which was represented as containing a few acres more than it actually contained. He brought a reduction of the lease on the ground of fraud, which he failed to prove. The case was appealed, and the Lord Chancellor (Brougham) was inclined to restrict the lease to the actual number of acres; but finding some difficulties from the objection that this would sanction the actio quanti minoris, he recommended a settlement, which was accordingly effected on the principle suggested by the Lord-Chancellor; the counsel for the parties having directed an abatement proportioned to the deficiency. See Balmer v. Hogarth, 11th March 1830, 8 S. & D. 715; 10 S. & D. 862. See also the case of Gordon v. Hughes, June 15, 1815, F. C.; reversed, March 25, 1819, 1 Bligh, 287. See Measurement. The cases already noticed refer only to land; and the question does not seem to have occurred, whether the actio quanti minoris is recognised in the law of Scotland in the case of moveables; an article of merchandise for instance, sold as of a certain weight or measure, and discovered to be less. Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 10; tit. 10, § 14; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 10, Ivory's Notes; Bank. B. i. tit. 19, § 3; Brown on Sale, 316, et seq.; Kames' Equity, 175. Quantum Meruit. If one employs another to do work for him, without any certain agreement, there is an implied obligation on the employer to pay the person who has performed the work as much as he deserves, or can reasonably ask for his services. See Tomlins' Dict. h. l.

Quarantine; the term of forty days, during which persons coming from parts infected with the plague are not permitted to land or come on shore. The regulations on this subject in former acts have been superseded by those of 6 Geo. IV. c. 78.

Quarantena Viduarum; according to Skene, a space of forty days, during which a widow might tarry and remain in the chief dwelling-place of her husband, and be sustained upon the profits of the heritage until her dowry be assigned to her. Skene, A. i.

Quarry. See Mines. Minerals.

Quarter Seal. The seal is kept by the director of the Scottish Chancery. It is in shape and impression the fourth part of the great seal, and is in the older statutes called the testimonial of the great seal. Commissions of tutory and brevies issuing from the Chancery, pass by the quarter seal; so do all gifts and presentations to land, of bastardy, forfeiture or ultimus hæres, where the lands hold of a subject. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, § 85; Brown's Synop. 2649. See Seals.

Quarter Sessions of Justices of the Peace. By the act 1661, c. 38, the justices of the peace are directed to meet four times in the year, at the county town,—that is, on the first Tuesdays of May, August, and March, and the last Tuesday of October; with power to adjourn these quarterly meetings to any other day or place they may judge proper. At these quarterly courts the justices have the power of reviewing the sentences pronounced at the occasional meetings of justices, called special or petty sessions, when the sentence is of a nature subject to review. Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, §§ 15, 18; Tait's Justice, locus Sessionis, Review; Dunlop's Parochial Law, 305, 317, 321, 332. See Justice of Peace.

Quasi-Contract. A quasi-contract differs from a proper contract in this, that it is not constituted by express consent, but ex re—that is, by one of the parties doing deeds which import an obligation on him in favour of the other party, or vice versa. Thus, a person contracts a quasi-contract, which infers an obligation to account, by entering on the office of tutory; from serving heir; from negotiorum gestio; jactus mercium, and the like. A quasi-delict is a term applied to that degree of culpable negligence, amounting almost to crime, and inferring an obligation to repair the injury, although there may be no ground for a criminal prosecution. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 51; Bell's Princ. §§ 525, 531-2-3. See Delict. Damages.

Queen. The Queen of England is either

Queen-Regnant, Queen-Consort, or Queen-Dowager. The Queen Regnant is she who holds the Crown in her own right, and with the same powers, prerogatives, rights, dignities, and duties which belong to the Sovereign. The Queen-Consort is the wife of the reigning King; and, by virtue of her marriage, she possesses various prerogatives. Thus, she is a public person, distinct from the King, with power to acquire land by purchase, and to convey it, and the like, without her husband's concurrence. She has a separate court, and officers distinct from the King's. She may sue and be sued alone; and, in England, her Attorney and Solicitor General (there are no such officers in Scotland) are entitled to places within the bar, as King's counsel. The Queen-Consort has also some minor immunities. Thus, she pays no toll; nor is she liable to any amerçement in any court. But, in general, unless where expressly exempted, she is on the same footing with other subjects of the King; for she is to all intents and purposes the King's subject, and not his equal. Yet it is high treason to compass or imagine her death. The husband of a Queen-Regnant is her subject, and may be guilty of high treason against her. See Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Dowager, Queen.

Queen's Bench. See King's Bench.

Querela Inofficiosi Testamenti; an action given by the Roman law to such as were disinherited on just grounds, falsely alleged. This action was given on the assumption that the testator was of unsound mind at the date of the testament. Inst. of Just. B. ii. tit. 18; Heinec. Elem. § 579; Stair, B. iii. tit. 4, § 15; B. iii. tit. 8, § 10; Bank. ii. pp. 301, 384.

Quhatous; a kind of bread. Skene, h. t.

Qui Tacet, Consentire Videtur; silence implies consent. See Taciturnity.

Qui Tam. In England, the plaintiff in a penal action describes himself as one who sues as well for himself as for the Queen, for any penalty half of which is given to the Crown and half to the informer. Hence such actions are called qui tam; scil. "Qui tam pro seipso quam pro Dom. Reg." &c. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Tait's Justice, vocibus Excise; Parties. Game.

Quia Emptores. The English statute, West. 3, 18 Ed. I. st. 1, is so called from the introductory words. Its intention was to put a stop to subinfeudations, by declaring that a vassal might sell his lands, provided he sold them to be held of his superior by the tenure and services due. This statute was at one time thought to have been introduced into Scotland by Robert I. stat. 2, c. 24, § 2; and here have been speculations as to the causes of its not having produced the same effect in Scotland as in England, where feudal forms were, by the statute, rendered no longer necessary. But it is very doubtful whether the statute ever was really enacted or in observance in Scotland—the general understanding of modern lawyers being, that the Regiam Majestatem is not an authentic collection of our ancient laws. See Regiam Majestatem. A quotation, however, of part of the Regiam Majestatem, containing a verbatim transcript of the English statute, will be found in Bell on Purchaser's Title, p. 282. See also pp. 8 and 377 of the same work. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Bell's Princ. § 676.

Quinquennial Prescription. See Prescription, Quinquennial.

Quo Warranto; in English law, a writ brought against any person, or corporation, usurping a franchise or liberty against the Sovereign, calling on the usurper to show by what right or title he holds or claims such franchise or liberty. This writ has now fallen into disuse; but its purpose is served by the Attorney-General filing an information in the nature of a quo warranto. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Quod Fieri Non Debet, Quandoque Factum, Valet. In a few instances in the law of Scotland, contrary to the rule of the Roman law, an act done contrary to law has been found not to be null. See Pactis Privatorum.

Quorum. A quorum, strictly speaking, is that number of the judges of a court, consisting of a plurality of judges, before whom the judicial business may be competently transacted. But the term is also applied to that number of a nomination of persons (e. g. tutors or curators, or interdictors or trustees, or the like) who are authorised, by the deed of nomination, to exercise the functions vested generally in the nominees. The quorum of the Court of Session, in all cases where meetings of the judges are necessary for passing Acts of Sederunt or the like, or where they sit as Commissioners of Teinds, consists of nine judges; 1587, c. 44. The quorum of each Division of the Court is three—50 Geo. III. c. 112, § 32; and it seems to be settled, that if the quorum be present, the judgment of the Court will be valid, although some of the judges composing the quorum should decline to vote; Robertson, 21st June 1809, Fac. Coll. In the Court of Justiciary, three judges constitute a quorum; 1681, c. 22; 23 Geo. III. c. 45. Two justices of the peace are a quorum, both under the small-debt acts and for ordinary judicial business; Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, §§ 16, 26, and tit. 4, § 18; Hutch. Justice, i. 40; Darling's Prac. 34. In every case where the performance of a duty or the exercise of a power is committed to several persons, a quorum consisting of a majority ought to be nominated, in order to prevent the possibility of a subdivision into two parties, each claiming the power of the whole nomination. Where a quorum is named, the concurrence of the quorum is necessary; and in no case ought a quorum to be appointed consisting of a smaller number than the majority of the nominees, unless where one is declared sine quo non, otherwise it might be in the power of the majority not concurring to overrule the former proceedings of the minority. Generally speaking, where the quorum fails by death or otherwise, the nomination falls. Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 15; Bank. B. i. tit. 7, §§ 21, 63, 132; Stair, B. iv. tit. 20, § 31; Kames' Equity, 468; Brown's Synop. 2282, 2292. See Curatory. Tutor. Interdiction. Justice of Peace. Small Debt. Sine quo non.

Quot; was the proportion of the moveable estate of a deceased person due to the bishop of the diocese within which the person resided. This quot was a twentieth part of the moveables without deducting the debts, even where the effects were not more than sufficient to answer the debts, and consequently the quot was paid to the injury of the creditors. This injustice was remedied by 1669, c. 19, which gave the quot from the free estate only; and at last, by the act 1701, c. 14, the quot was prohibited. Still, however, certain compositions continued to be exacted by the commissaries, varying according to the extent of the sums confirmed. But by the stat. 4 Geo. IV. c. 97, § 1, all compositions in respect of confirmation, and all fees termed consignment and fee and sentence money, were abolished, and certain other regulations substituted. See Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 28; Bank. ii. 388; Res's Lect. i. 185; Kames' Stat. Law, h. t. See Confirmation. Executor.

Rabbits. It is usual in charters of landed estates to convey to the vassal the right of rabbits and rabbit-warrens. Craig is of opinion that warrens require to be enclosed, in order to protect the fields of neighbouring proprietors; but Erskine maintains a contrary doctrine, founding on the act 1503, c. 74, which enjoins proprietors to make warrens; although cases may easily be figured in which this power would require to be exercised with some degree of caution; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 7. Under special statutes of the Scotch Parliament, it is accounted theft to take rabbits from a warren, or to shoot them without the proprietor's consent; Hume, i. 80. In a farm where rabbits were numerous, the tenant was found entitled to destroy them in order to preserve the crops, and an interdict was refused to the landlord, rabbits not being game; Moncrieff, 13th Feb. 1828, 6 S. & D. 530. Devastation committed by rabbits, encouraged by the landlord, has been held relevant to entitle the tenant to abandon his farm, where he alleged that in consequence the crop did not yield sufficient to pay seed and labour; Richmond, May 27, 1829, 7 S. & D. 664. This case was subsequently settled extrajudicially, the landlord allowing the tenant to give up the farm. Some proprietors, with the view of protecting their game, are in the custom of inserting a clause in the lease, prohibiting their tenants to kill rabbits. See Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 554, 745, 831; Hutch. Justice, ii. 537, 546; Tail's Justice, vocibus Pigeons, Theft; Blair's Justice, h. t.

Rachetum; "from the French, ransom." Skene, h. t.

Rack-Rent; is a term of English law, and means the full yearly value of land let on lease. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Rag-Faugh; applied to cropping under a lease; signifies ploughing the ground twice or thrice after cutting hay. Wood's Parish of Cramond, p. 102.

Railway. Railways are generally projected and executed by joint-stock companies; and in order to incorporate the company and to enable it to acquire, if necessary by compulsory purchases, the requisite ground along the line of the railway, and otherwise to facilitate the progress of the work, as well as to provide for the management of the railway and the levying of dues after its completion, a private act of Parliament is required. The details of the act will depend on the special circumstances of the particular case; but as to private acts of Parliament generally, see Private Bills. See Joint-Stock Companies.

Railways are regulated by the acts 3 and 4 Vict. c. 99, 1840, and 5 and 6 Vict. c. 55, 1842. The act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 85, 1844, attaches certain conditions to the construction of future railways. The Companies Clauses Consolidation Act is 8 Vict. c. 17, 1845; the Banks Clauses Consolidation Act is 8 Vict. c. 29, 1845; and the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act is 8 and 9 Vict. c. 33, 1845.

Ranking and Sale. The action of ranking and sale is the process whereby the husband's property of an insolvent person is judicially sold, and the price divided among his creditors, according to their several rights and preferences. This is the most complex and comprehensive process known in the law of Scotland; and both in libelling the summons and in following out the action, much professional circumspection and vigilance are indispensable. The following practical directions deserve attention: The pursuer of the action must be either a creditor holding a real security over the debtor's estate, or the debtor's apparent heir; 1695, c. 24. See Apparent Heir. But the security of the real creditor need not have been actually completed by infeftment. A decree of adjudication against the debtor is a sufficient title to pursue the action, although the decree has not been followed by a charge against superiors, or a charter and sasine, or other step to make the adjudication complete or effectual. It is further requisite that the pursuer or some other of the creditors should be in possession of the debtor's heritage or of some part of it; 1681, c. 17. But real or natural possession is not necessary: civil possession is enough. The right to possess, along with possession of a part, will do. So a decree of mails and duties without actual intromission, or a sequestration of the rents by the Court of Session, and the appointment of a judicial factor, will warrant the process; and it would seem, on the same principle, that a pouncing of the ground by a real creditor will have the same effect. Another preliminary requisite is, that the debtor (except in the case of a ranking and sale by an apparent heir) should be bankrupt; the test being, that the interest of the debts and the other annual burdens exceed the yearly income of the subject under sale. The whole heritable estate of the debtor must be included in the summons, whether it be held by a complete title in his own person, or on apparence merely; and so strictly was this rule followed at one time, that an omission of any portion of the estate was fatal to the proceedings; although now the difficulty is obviated by specifying the property in the summons, so far as known, and adding a general clause, under which, any property belonging to the debtor which may be afterwards discovered may be brought (in the manner afterwards explained) within the operation of the process. The debtor, and all his real creditors in the known actual possession of his estate, by labouring the ground or uplifting the rents, must be called in the action; and where two or more creditors are conjunctly and severally bound in one bond or bill, the estates of all the co-obligants who are insolvent may be brought to sale under one and the same summons. But this is not competent where the grounds of debt are separate and the obligations distinct. It is no bar to the action that the debtor has executed a trust-deed conveying his heritage for behoof of his creditors—that is, provided the pursuer is a non-acceding creditor. If, however, the trustee has been in the undisturbed management, he will have a preference on the price for the sums beneficially expended by him; nor is it necessary, in such a case, to reduce the trust-deed; Cruttenden, 2d Dec. 1824, 3 S. & D. 347. In addition to calling the debtor and all his real creditors, there must also be an edictal citation of all the creditors, and of all others having or pretending interest, and this edictal citation required to be at the market-cross of Edinburgh and the pier and shore of Leith, as well as by copies left at the Record Office; because the edictal citation sanctioned by the Judicature Act was limited to the case of parties furth of Scotland, whereas the edictal citation in a ranking and sale is intended for parties whether within or furth of Scotland; 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 51. See Edictal Citation. Hence, both forms of edictal citation, or one or other, were formerly observed in this process. This, however, was altered by 13 and 14 Vict. c. 36, § 22, 1850.

The process itself, as now known in practice, is a concentration of various actions. At one time, a summons of sale was required to warrant the sale; a multiplepounding for dividing the price amongst the creditors and claimants; a reduction-improbation to reduce the securities and diligences of creditors having or pretending claims on the estate, the grounds of which they had failed to produce; and an adjudication by each individual creditor, to entitle him to his share of the price. All these objects are now embraced by the summons, the purposes of which, generally speaking, are—1st, To declare the bankruptcy of the debtor; 2d, To rank the creditors; 3d, To sell the debtor's heritage; 4th, To reduce all securities which are either objectionable or which have not been produced; and, lastly, The decree of sale operates as a decree of adjudication in favour of all the creditors included in the ranking. In furtherance of these objects, the conclusions of the summons, which are not arranged very consistently or with much logical precision, are, that a proof be led of the value of the whole lands and heritages belonging to the debtor; of the holding thereof; of the rental and deductions; and that all persons possessed of writs or titles necessary for instructing these facts shall produce them; that all persons having claims against the debtor's estate shall lodge them along with the vouchers, first and second diets for this purpose being assigned; with certification that the writs not produced shall be held as false and feigned as in a reduction-improbation, quoad the debtor's estate and his creditors; that a term be assigned to the creditors for deponing as to the verity of their debts, with certification that no one shall be ranked until he has deponed; that the creditors be ranked on the price and rents according to their several rights and preferences, with certification to those who shall not be ranked that they shall not be afterwards entitled to call the ranking in question; that on any other lands or heritages belonging to the debtor being discovered, they may be included in the proceedings; that the debtor be found bankrupt; that the upset price be judicially fixed, and the subjects sold by public roup, and warrant granted for letters of publication to intimate the sale; that the subjects be adjudged to the purchaser on payment or consignment of the price; and that the decree of sale may be as effectual to the purchaser as a disposition signed by the debtor and the creditors would be; that it be declared that the purchaser, on making payment or consignment of the price, be discharged thereof, and his bond of caution delivered up, and the lands declared free of all incumbrances; that the purchaser be infeft, and warrant granted for letters of horning against superiors for that purpose; and that the real creditors, on receiving payment of their several shares of the price, shall convey their debts to the purchaser, in farther security of his purchase, alienarily, with warrandice to the amount of the sums received. The summons formerly required a bill; and in respect of the conclusion for reduction-improbation, the concurrence of the Lord Advocate is necessary. The inducia against all parties called nominatim as defenders, if resident within Scotland, is the ordinary inducia of fourteen days; if in Orkney or Shetland, or forth of Scotland, twenty-one days. The edictal citation against all parties interested is also twenty-one days. A short copy is sufficient for service; but a full copy is occasionally used. If appearance be made for the defender, the summons must be printed; although this is clearly one of the summonses which ought to have been excepted from the regulation as to printing. The statutes and Acts of Sederunt regulating the form of the summons are, 1681, c. 17; 1690, c. 20; 1695, c. 6; 26 Art. of Regulations, 29th April 1695; 54 Geo. III. c. 137; A. S. 31st March 1685; A. S. 23d Nov. 1711; A. S. 10th Aug. 1754; A. S. 17th Jan. 1756; A. S. 13th Nov. 1793; A. S. 11th July 1794. See also Jurid. Styles, iii. 435; Shand's Prac. ii. 964, et seq. See Judicial Sale.

The action comes into Court in the usual way; but being what is technically called an Inner-House process, the power of the Lord

Ordinary, before whom the action is called in the course of the Outer-House Roll, is so far limited. Thus, he may judge of the pursuer's title, and of the competency and relevancy of the action; as also whether the parties have been properly brought into Court. But all questions as to the bankruptcy, the value, the possession and the holding, are proper for the consideration of the Inner-House after probation. As to the procedure in the action generally, the Act of Sederunt 11th July 1828, § 103, directs that it shall be accommodated as far as practicable to the new forms of process; but that, in so far as compliance with the new forms shall not be specially required, the old forms shall continue, except as to the power and mode of review of interlocutors, as to which the new regulations are to be the rule. All the requisite forms, however, must be rigidly observed; because the slightest deviation (e.g., the omission of a single advertisement) may be fatal to the whole proceedings.

If there be no objection to the citations, the relevancy, or competency, and no other dilatory defence, the first interlocutor is an interlocutor by the Lord Ordinary sustaining the libel, and allowing a proof of the bankruptcy, of possession by the creditors, of the holding, rental, and deductions, of the value of the property, and of the number of years' purchase at which it may be sold; and for taking this proof, commission and diligence is granted. The same interlocutor assigns a first term at the distance of five or six weeks for the creditors to lodge their grounds of debt, and grants commission to the judge-ordinary, or any justice of the peace within the bounds, to take the deposition of the creditor; and if, during the currency of this term, any creditor requires a diligence for the recovery of his grounds of debt, it will be granted by the Lord Ordinary on application; A. S. 17th Jan. 1756, § 1. The interlocutor must be inserted once a week, for three successive weeks, in the Edinburgh Gazette—A. S. 11th July 1794; and also published in the Minute-book. On the action coming into Court, it is usual to apply to the Court for the appointment of a judicial factor to manage the estate.

The limits of this work do not admit of anything more than the following summary of practical points connected with this important process:—(1.) Under the commission and diligence a proof of the rental of the subjects under sale is led, by examining the tenants, and by recovering their leases; or if there be no leases, by the examination of farmers or land-valuators acquainted with the property. Servitudes, thirlages, services, &c., are valued and deducted, also liferents and tacks, according to rules to be found in all practical books;

vide Beveridge, ii. 533, et seq.; Shand's Prac. ii. 871, et seq. (2.) The title-deeds of the subjects may be recovered under the diligence; and if hypothecated in the hands of a law-agent, they are usually delivered under a reservation of his hypothec, in virtue of which he will be ranked primo loco on the price, or may obtain a warrant on the judicial factor. If the title-deeds be in the repositories of a deceased person, warrant will be granted by the Court for opening such repositories at the sight of the judge-ordinary of the bounds. The title-deeds will show the holding and the state of the teinds and feu-duties, and the valued rent will be proved by a certificate from the clerk to the commissioners of supply. (3.) The deductions and annual burdens may be proved by the factor on the estate, or the agent or other person who has been accustomed to pay them, and the teind, minister's stipend, schoolmaster's salary, cess, poor's-rates, &c., will be sufficiently proved by the receipts for these payments. (4.) It may be necessary to prove the bankruptcy by a search of the records; but in general the claims lodged prior to the expiration of the first term will be sufficient for this purpose. (5.) No farther proof can be led under the commission; the proof of the value must be taken before the Lord Ordinary, the usual witnesses being professional men, or land-valuators in Edinburgh, who in general depone as to the number of years' purchase of the proven rental which they consider the lands to be worth. This proof is conducted by the common agent, who is appointed immediately after the lapse of the first term assigned for lodging claims. See Common Agent. (6.) The next step in the process is to have a second term assigned to the creditors for lodging their claims and grounds of debt; which is done by an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, intimated in the Minute-book, and once every week, for three weeks, in the Edinburgh Gazette. All claims must be accompanied by an oath of verity, if the creditor be in Great Britain, or by an oath of credulity by his agent or factor, if he be abroad; and the grounds of debt must also be produced—the effect of such production being to interrupt prescription. (7.) On the lapse of the second term for lodging claims, the case may be enrolled and decree of certification pronounced, as in a reduction-improbation for reducing all claims not produced. This decree, however, is qualified with the condition that claims lodged within ten days thereafter will be received, and sometimes a longer period is allowed—e.g., the box-day in a vacation then ensuing. The effect of such a decree of certification is to cut down all claims against the estate in questions between the claimant against whom the decree strikes and the purchaser at the judicial sale; but without prejudice to the creditor's claim against the separate estate, if any (e.g., the moveable estate), of the common debtor; or against the other creditors who may have received their share of the price, for repetition of a rateable proportion; 1695, c. 6. (8.) Where a creditor has omitted to lodge his claim until the lapse of the time allowed by the interlocutor, he may apply to the Court to be reponed on cause shown, but only on condition of paying the expense occasioned by the delay, and by the production of his claim. Such an application to be reponed may be made at any time prior to the final division of the funds, even although the debt of the claimant should have arisen after the action came into Court. (9.) After the decree of certification has been pronounced, the Lord Ordinary remits to the common agent to prepare a state of the interests and a scheme of ranking. This state contains a complete vidimus, embracing the extent of the lands or other subjects under sale, the amount of the funds in the hands of the factor, and an enumeration of the claims and vouchers, with the objections. See the form of such a state in Bell's Styles, vii. 229. The state is signed by the common agent, and allowed to be seen by all concerned, and objected to if they see cause; and if questions arise in the competition, they will be discussed with reference to the common agent's state by the several creditors inter se, and determined by the Lord Ordinary. The state is then ordered to be printed and boxed for the Inner-House, and also distributed among the creditors or their agents, except in cases of small importance, and where there are few creditors, when the state is lodged in MS. and intimated to the agents of the creditors, who may borrow it, or see it in the clerk's hands. (10.) After all objections to the state have been decided, the common agent prepares the draft of an interlocutor of ranking, which is usually circulated or allowed to be seen for eight days, before being written out and signed by the Lord Ordinary. (11.) It was formerly necessary that the ranking should be concluded by a decree, before the lands were exposed to sale; but by 54 Geo. III. c. 137, § 6, the sale proceeded whether the ranking is concluded or not. Hence, while the ranking is in progress, the sale may also go on; and in that view, the common agent, as soon as the proof is concluded, may enrol the cause for circumduction and great avizandum. A memorial and abstract of the proof is then prepared, printed, and boxed by the common agent, and thereafter remitted by the Court to the Lord Ordinary to revise; who, after having obtained the necessary explanations from the common agent, and from the clerk of the process, reports it to the Court as correct. The Court then grants warrant for letters of publication and sale, which being extracted, are executed by a messenger-at-arms at the Record Office, and also at the market-cross of Edinburgh, and pier and shore of Leith. (12.) When a warrant of sale has been obtained, the creditors are entitled to proceed with the sale, unless the whole of their debts are paid off, and even although the price of the property should exceed the amount of the debts. In practice the sale is advertised in the newspapers; and due care must be taken to procure evidence, that all the statutory and necessary notices have been given, which will be done by producing in process the Gazettes and letters of publication, and the executions by the messenger. (13.) The day of sale is always a Wednesday (the market-day in Edinburgh), during the sitting of the Court of Session; and the letters of publication must be executed edictally at least twenty-one days before the day of sale. The articles of roup and the inventory of the title-deeds ought to be prepared by the clerk to the process, and are always authenticated by the signature of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, who officiates as judge of the roup. But if any unusual conditions are to be inserted in the articles of roup, or any alteration made thereon, after they have been signed by the Lord Ordinary, this must be done by the authority of the Court, as the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, who acts merely ministerially in carrying through the sale, has no power. The sale must take place in the Parliament House at Edinburgh, between the hours of two and four P.M. The clerk to the process acts as clerk to the sale, and one of the macers acts as auctioneer. It seems to have been thought that the Court have power to authorise the sale to take place elsewhere than in Edinburgh; but in the only instances in which such applications were made they were refused; and in the last case on the subject, it was expressly held to be incompetent to authorise a sale at Glasgow; Renny and Cruttenden & Co. 22d Feb. 1834, 12 S. & D. 479; and 17th May 1834, 12 S. & D. 602. (14.) The Lord Ordinary officiating at the sale has power to adjourn it, without exposing the subjects; and neither the common agent, nor the judicial factor, nor the Lord Ordinary to the process, nor the Lord Ordinary officiating at the sale, is entitled to purchase; although the mere signing of petitions or other papers in the cause as counsel will not bar the counsel from purchasing. The leading case on this subject is that of The York Buildings Company v. Mackenzie, 8th March 1793, Mor. 13367; reversed on appeal, 4 Dow, 379. See also The Earl of Wemyss, 25th Feb. 1824, 2 Show's Appeals, p. 1. (15.) If no offerers appear, the sale will be adjourned; and instead of the former practice of then allocating the property among the creditors, the Court now lowers the upset price, upon a petition duly intimated to the agents of all the creditors who have claimed; and the property is afterwards re-exposed at a reduced upset price, after advertisements in the newspapers, and the necessary alterations on the articles of roup. As to the clause of devolution in the articles, see Clause of Devolution. (16.) The offerer who is preferred must find caution, the bond of caution being prepared by the assistant of the Inner-House clerk to the process; and it is the duty of the principal clerks of Session to satisfy themselves as to the sufficiency of the caution. The common agent is not bound to express any opinion on this point; and if the principal clerks accept of insufficient caution, they will be personally liable. Where the purchaser, after finding caution, and before decree of sale, has sold to another, the new purchaser must apply to the Court by petition, for authority to the clerk to receive a new bond of caution, and to deliver up the former one, and also that the decree of sale may be issued in favour of the new purchaser. (16.) After caution has been found, the sale is reported to the Court, and decree of sale pronounced, which may be extracted, and the extract delivered to the purchaser, in order that he may complete his title; and after such extract, that part of the process which relates to the sale is sent to the general record, while the ranking remains in the hands of the clerk—a severance of the process which is attended with some practical inconveniences. (17.) The next step in the procedure is a remit by the Lord Ordinary to the common agent, or to an accountant, to prepare a scheme of division, showing the rule according to which the purchaser and the judicial factor are to pay the funds in their hands; which scheme, having been prepared and lodged, and allowed to be seen for eight days, will be approved of if not objected to, and decree of division and for payment against the purchaser pronounced. It is now settled that claims ranked, principal and interest, are to be accumulated into a capital as at the date of the payment of the price. (18.) The original rule as to the expenses of the process was, that they were to be borne by the postponed creditors. Afterwards it was held, that as the process was a procedure in which the whole creditors were interested, each ought to pay in proportion to the sum he drew; A. S. 23d Nov. 1722. But it being plainly ultra vires of the Court to make such a rule, that Act of Sederunt was repealed by A. S. 10th August 1754; and now the whole expense is paid out of the funds in the hands of the factor, or out of the price, and thus falls exclusively on the postponed creditors. This expense includes that of extracting the decree of sale in favour of the purchaser, and also the expense of the dispositions and assignments by the creditors in his favour. (19.) When there has been a judicial factor appointed, it is necessary, before preparing a scheme of division, to apply to the Court by petition for his discharge. This petition is intimated to the agents of the creditors, and also in the minute-book, and on the walls of the Parliament House, and thereafter remitted to the Lord Ordinary in the ranking, who in his turn remits to the clerk to the process, or in complicated cases to an accountant, to audit the factor's accounts. Avizandum with the report thus obtained is made to the Lord Ordinary, who makes a report to the Court, and decree of exoneration is then pronounced by the Inner-House. Sometimes the common agent concurs in the factor's petition, and also prays for a remit to audit his accounts. But in the ordinary case, a simple remit to the auditor to tax the common agent's accounts is made on a motion to the Lord Ordinary, and the auditor's report, when returned, approved of in common form. (20.) If, in the course of the process, the pursuer should die, or cease to insist, or if his debt should be extinguished, the judicial factor, or any real creditor, may, on special warrant from the Court, take up the process where it was left, and carry it on till its final issue. So also, if the common debtor or any of the creditors die, the process only stops until their apparent heirs are cited on a diligence, without waiting the lapse of the tempus deliberandi, or transferring the process against them; and whether the heir appear or not, the process proceeds; A. S. 23d Nov. 1711, §§ 4 and 5. And any creditor who is in a situation to adjudge is entitled to carry on the action of sale to a conclusion, although deserted or abandoned by the original pursuer; 54 Geo. III. c. 137, § 10. (21.) If any lands not specially described in the summons be discovered, in the course of the process, to belong to the bankrupt, the rental and value of such lands may be proved, and the lands themselves included in the sale, in virtue of the general clause in the summons above referred to. On such discovery, an application is made to the Lord Ordinary, in the form of a minute, who directs notice of the fact to be given in the Edinburgh Gazette, after which the proof of the rental and value, and the sale, proceed precisely as if the subjects so discovered had been specially described in the summons. It is too late, however, to include a discovery of this kind in the process after the lands specially libelled on have been sold, and the decrees of sale and division extracted. See Rennie, 5th Feb. 1828, 6 S. & D. 488. (22.) Where, again, subjects have been included in the summons which do not belong to the bankrupt, the course is for the proprietor of such subjects to apply to the Court by petition, to have them struck out of the sale; which petition will be either advised by the Court on answers by the creditors, or remitted to the Lord Ordinary to be disposed of. See Cruttenden, Mackillop, and Company, 17th May 1834, 12 S. & D. 602. (23.) When the price is paid, or consigned in the manner explained voce Consignation, the purchaser may apply to the Court by petition for delivery of his bond of caution. If there be several purchasers, a separate application from each is necessary; and the petition, which must be previously intimated to the agents of the creditors who have lodged claims, is also intimated upon the walls and in the Minute-book for eight days; after which it is remitted to the Lord Ordinary in the ranking, or to the Junior Lord Ordinary, to ascertain whether the price has been paid or consigned. On ascertaining the fact, by a remit to the clerk or otherwise, the Lord Ordinary makes a report to the Court, and the prayer of the petition will then be granted by the Inner-House. (24.) It is competent to the creditors or their agents, at the election of the common agent, to nominate three of their number as a committee, to watch the progress of the proceedings; and if they are not terminated within two years after their commencement, to inquire the reason. And it is the duty of the common agent, after the lapse of two years, to print and give in to the Court a minute explanatory of the situation of the process, and of the cause of delay; and a similar minute must be lodged yearly thereafter, unless dispensed with by the Court; A. S. 11th July 1794, § 14. (25.) It is competent to preferable creditors to apply for interim warrants on the judicial factor, or on the purchaser, or on the bank where the money is consigned. But before drawing any sum out of the common funds by interim warrant, sufficient cause must be shown to the Court. Nor will any such warrant be granted, except as to interest or annuities, before decree of certification is pronounced; and no petition for a warrant of this kind will be received after 20th Feb. for the winter session, or 25th June for the summer session; or during the five sederunt-days preceding the rising of the Court for the Christmas recess; A. S. 17th July 1764; 21st Dec. 1765; 5th June 1790; 11th July 1794.

The common agent is also entitled to an interim warrant on the judicial factor to account for the expenses of the process. See Interim Warrant. (26.) Sometimes, where a class of creditors are preferable on a particular subject which has been sold, and where the remainder of the property remains unsold, an interim scheme of division among these preferable creditors is prepared. But the expense of interim warrants, as well as interim schemes, must be borne by the creditors benefited thereby. See, however, Wood's Trustee and Others, 7th March 1835, 13 S. & D. 645. (27.) The rule as to imputing such interim payments, in questions among the creditors, is, that the debt due to the creditor receiving the interim payment is to be stated as accumulated as at the term of payment of the price by the purchaser, and that the partial payments are to be deducted from this accumulated sum. In this way all the creditors stand on an equal footing; and the difficulties about imputing partial payments to account of interest, and not of principal, are avoided. The rule now uniformly observed is, that principal and interest are to be accumulated as at the term of payment of the price. (28.) Adjudications, during the dependence of a process of ranking and sale, which were at one time thought necessary in order to secure the benefit of the pari passu ranking, are prohibited by 54 Geo. III. c. 437, § 10; whereby it is enacted, that the decree of sale is to be held as a general decree of adjudication in favour of every creditor who shall afterwards be included in the decree of division; and the effect of such general decree, in all competitions or questions of ranking and preference, is declared to be the same as if it had been pronounced and extracted of the date of the first calling of the process of sale, before the Lord Ordinary in the Outer-House; and no "separate adjudication shall be allowed to proceed during the dependence of a judicial sale;" the process not being held in dependence until it is called in Court. The statutory rule, however, does not apply to adjudications in implement, which may proceed notwithstanding the dependence of the ranking and sale:— See Bell's Com. ii. 262; Mackintosh, 26th May 1829, 7 S. & D. 649; Hutchison, 26th June 1830, 8 S. & D. 982; Wood, 5th Feb. 1833, 11 S. & D. 355. (29.) In rankings and sales at the instance of apparent heirs, it has been the practice to require creditors whose debts are illiquid to constitute them before drawing their shares of the price; and in one case the same rule was extended to an illiquid debt, in a judicial sale at the instance of creditors. But this decision has been thought extremely questionable, and certainly is not easily reconcileable with sound principle:— See, on this subject, Scott Moncrieff, 16th June 1821, 1 S. & D. 73; Bell's Com. i. 740, and ii. 277 and 281; and Shand's Prac. ii. 566, et seq. (30.) The production of the grounds of a moveable debt, as the foundation of a claim on a ranking and sale, does not make the personal debt heritable, or liable to be affected by inhibition. It is still arrestable; Henderson, 14th Dec. 1796, Mor. 1534. (31.) Notwithstanding the clause in the articles of roup binding the purchaser to accept of the title as it is, the purchaser cannot be forced to pay the price if it turns out that the bankrupt had no title whatever to the subjects sold. See Progress, and authorities there cited. But it will obviate any objection to the title if it be possible to complete a title in the bankrupt's person; see Shand's Prac. ii. 571. (32.) In order to strengthen the purchaser's title, the creditors who receive any part of the price are bound to assign their debts, rights, and diligences to the purchaser, with absolute warrandice to the extent of the sums received. Hence, in case of eviction, the creditors are bound to refund what they have received, with interest from the date of the decree evicting the subjects from the purchaser, provided intimation of the action of eviction be made to the creditors before litiscontestation. These assignments, which are paid for by the creditors, being merely corroborative of the purchaser's right, cannot be assigned by the purchaser, or made a separate fund of credit, but, except in so far as corroborative of his title, are extinguished. (33.) If there be any reversion of the price after satisfying the claims of the creditors, the common debtor is entitled to it without making up any title. But in the event of his death, his heir must make up a real title to the heritage, in order to entitle him to discharge the reversion; in which respect there is a difference between an ordinary process of ranking and sale and a process when pursued by an apparent heir. In this last case the apparent heir does not require to make up any title in order to entitle him to receive the reversion. The preceding analysis of the procedure in the process of ranking and sale has been abridged from the following practical works: Jurid. Styles, iii. 435–55; Ivory's Form of Process, i. 317–43; Beveridge's Form of Process, ii. 513–48; and Shand's Prac. ii. 528–73, in which work, in particular, there is a valuable digest of the rules of practice in this important process, accompanied by a very able commentary on the adjudged cases. See also Bell's Com. ii. 262; Stair, B. iii. tit. 2, § 55; B. iv. tit. 25, § 26; tit. 36, § 2; tit. 51, § 4; Mor's Notes, et seq.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 59, et seq.; Shand, vol. iii.

Ranking and Sale, by an Apparent Heir.

This action, which is in almost all respects analogous to the action of ranking and sale at the instance of creditors, is founded on the act 1695, c. 24, which declares that an apparent heir may bring the estate of his ancestor to roup, whether it be bankrupt or not. It is no good objection to the heir's title to sue this action that he has behaved as heir, and thereby incurred a passive title, or even that he has been served heir in general, cum beneficio inventarii; provided that his title has not been feudally completed. Neither is it any objection that the heir has renounced, in an action of constitution. Where the apparent heir dies during the dependence of the action, the next apparent heir, without making up any title, or the purchaser, if the lands have been sold, may carry on the sale. In this proceeding, the apparent heir is held to be acting for behoof of all the creditors; and therefore, the decree of sale, if pronounced within year and day of the first effectual adjudication, brings in all the creditors pari passu, whether they have adjudged or not. And it seems to be thought, that no adjudication can be proceeded with after the summons at the heir's instance has been called in Court. As to the form of the summons, it differs very slightly from that in a judicial sale by creditors, and must be executed in the same manner against the real creditors in possession, and edictally against all concerned. It is not necessary, however, to prove bankruptcy, or that the creditors are in possession. If there be any reversion, the expenses of the process must be paid from it; but if not, then from the price; and if the proceeds of one or more lots be sufficient to satisfy the debts claimed, the sale of the remainder will be stopped. If the pursuer himself desires to purchase any part of the lands, he may do so by means of a trustee, who will find caution in the ordinary form. And although it is usual in this particular process to allow the pursuer's agent to conduct it without naming a common agent, yet, if there be any improper delay, the Lord Ordinary, on the application of any creditor, will appoint a meeting to be held for choosing a common agent. If there be any reversion, the heir is entitled to it, and may validly discharge it without making up any title, the decree of sale being a sufficient title for the heir to receive the reversion. The heir incurs no passive title by pursuing such a sale; and this seems to be one of the reasons why he is entitled to receive the reversion without making up a title; since, by so doing, he might incur a universal liability for his predecessor's debts. The summons by the heir sometimes contains a conclusion for cognosing the amount of the personal property of the predecessor, especially where the heir-apparent is a pupil. The object of this is to preserve evidence of the necessity of the sale; and hence, in such cases, it is proper to have a tutor-at-law or a tutor-dative appointed before raising the action. In all other respects, the procedure in this process resembles that which has been explained in the immediately preceding article. See Shand's Prac. ii. 864; Ivory's Form of Process, i. 343; Beveridge, ii. 548-51. See Cognition and Sale. Apparent Heir.

Ransom; a sum of money paid for redeeming any capture. Average is leviable on the goods in a ransomed ship, for the sum paid as ransom; and if any one belonging to the ship be detained as a hostage for payment of the ransom, he must be set free at the joint expense of the owners of the ship and cargo. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 55; Kames' Equity, 99, 120; Brown's Synop. 319, 2082. See Captive. Average.

Rape; one of the four pleas of the Crown. It consists in carnal knowledge of a woman's person against her will, and by force. Forcible abduction is no longer, as it once was, essential to the crime. The crime is the same whatever the age of the female may be, and whether she be maid, wife, or widow. A rape may even be committed on a strumpet; though, in such a case, the presumption of the woman's assent will require to be overcome by very clear proof of violence. The crime may be completed by penetration without emission. See the case of Robertson, March 12, 1836, 1 Swinton 93. The crime is not altered although the woman's resistance has ceased through violence, threats, or the effects of stupifying drugs. In the case of females under twelve years of age, rape is committed though actual violence has not been used. All those who assist in subduing the sufferer, or who are present at the time, and approve of the deed, are held equally guilty with the principal perpetrator. The chief witness in such cases, usually, is the injured female herself; but her testimony must in all cases be corroborated as to the using of violence, which will be best done by the signs of injury on her person; the circumstances and situation in which the alleged offence took place; the testimony of those who heard her cries for help; and evidence of her subsequent disclosure of the crime to her relations, or to the public authorities. It is not now, as formerly, the law, that the prosecution cannot be carried on unless the complaint is made the same day on which the crime is committed. See Raptus. The punishment of rape is death, unless the woman shall acquiesce in her condition, and declare that she went off with the panel of her own free will; in which case the woman's kinsfolk may insist for an arbitrary punishment to the extent of fine, imprisonment, or escheat of moveables. Hume, i. 297; *Ersk. Raptus; rape, ravishing or deforcing of women, one of the four pleas of the Crown. Ravishing is a crime of which a woman accuses a man, alleging she is oppressed or defiled by him against the King's peace. "The quhilk complaint sulde be maid the samin day and night in the quhilk the crime is committed—quia lapsu dici hoc crimen præscribitur," Skene, h. t. See Rape. Some authors believe that the crime of raptus, in the Roman law, was not rape, but abduction.

Ratification by a Minor. A ratification by a minor, made after majority, has the effect of discharging all claim of restitution on lesion; but ratification during minority has no such effect, and the act 1681, c. 19, declares those who persuade minors to ratify their engagements by oath infamous. Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 39; Bell's Com. i. 143; Bank. vol. i. p. 182.

Ratification by an Heir; bars him from challenging his ancestor's settlement, on the ground of its being reducible ex capite lecti or otherwise, provided the heir be of age, and in such circumstances that the ratification cannot be ascribed to his peculiar situation. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 8, § 39; Bell's Com. i. 148.

Ratification by a Wife. This is a declaration on oath, made by a wife, in presence of a judge (her husband being absent), that the deed she has executed has been made freely, and that she has not been induced to make it by her husband through force or fear. There are also present a notary-public and two witnesses; instruments are taken on what passes by the attorney of the person receiving the right; and the whole is reduced to the form of a notarial act, and attested by the subscription of the wife, the judge, the notary and witnesses. It is indorsed on the deed. The use of this ratification is, to bar actions of reduction at the instance of the wife, on the pretence that she had been compelled by her husband to execute the deed. But the want of a ratification by the wife does not render the deed null, although, where it has not been ratified, it may be reduced on special proof of force or fear, or of undue influence on the part of the husband; Buchan v. Risk, 1st March 1834, 12 S. & D. 511, and authorities there cited. See also the case of Priest v. Hutchison, 20th Feb. 1851, 19 D. 495. By special statute, ratifications by married women are excepted from the operation of the statute cited in the article Oath, which substitutes declarations for oaths and affidavits; and it is provided, that such ratifications be taken on oath as heretofore; but all ratifications taken by declaration instead of oath, since the passing of that act, are declared to be valid, and of the same force and effect as if they had been taken on oath; 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 43. Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 33; Bank. i. 132; Bell's Com. i. 142; Bell's Princ. § 1615; Tait's Justice, voce Marriage; Jurid. Styles, i. 103.

Ratio Decidendi; the reason or ground on which a judgment is rested. Every sheriff ought to give his rationes decidendi, except in the case of mere interlocutory orders. Inglourin's Sheriff Prac. 132. See Judgment.

Ro Mercatoria, writings in; are privileged in so far as that they do not require to be authenticated with all the solemnities of a formal deed. Bell's Com. i. 324. See Deed Evidence, Privileged Deeds.

Reading of Deeds. A deed ought to be read over in the presence of the grantor, &c. at all events, some means should be taken to make him acquainted with its contents before he subscribes it. If, however, the deed be regularly subscribed and executed, it will not in the ordinary case, be necessary for the party maintaining the validity of the deed to show that it was read over, or that the subscriber was acquainted with its contents. The onus, on the contrary, will lie upon the opposite party, to show that the subscriber was ignorant of the contents, and was deceived in the execution of the writing which he signed. As it is not a necessary solemnity that the deed should be read over to the grantor at all, neither is it indispensable that the witnesses should be present when it is read; but if it can conveniently be done, it would be prudent to have them present, as they will then be ready, in case fraud be alleged, to prove that the subscriber knew what was in the deed. In reducing a will, it is frequently an important element in the proof of fraud that the testament was not read to the testator. Slair, B. i. tit. 9, § 11; More's Notes, p. cccxl.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 2, § 8; Ivory's Notes; Tait on Evidence, Ross's Lect. i. 150, 201, 488; ii. 183; Purson on Evidence. See Deed. Testing Clause.

Real Action. A real action is founded on a right of property in a subject, the object of the action being the recovery of the property. It is so termed in contradistinction to a personal action, which is founded only on a personal obligation, and the object of which is to enforce implement of the obligation. Slair, B. iii. tit. 4, § 32; tit. 5, § 24; B. iv. tit. 5.

Real Burden. See Burdens. Incumbrances. Search of Incumbrances.

Real Right; means a right of property in a subject, or, as it is termed, a jus in re, in virtue of which the person vested with the real right may pursue for possession of the subject; whereas a personal right, or jus ad rem, entitles the person merely to an action for performance of the obligation. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 2. See Real Action. Jus in Re, and authorities there cited.

Realty. See Personality and Realty.

Reapers. Even though hired by the day or week, reapers, like other farm-servants, have a preference for their wages over the crop raised or secured by their labour. Their claim is preferable to the hypothec of the landlord. Hutch. Justice, ii. 174; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant. See Farm Servant. Hypothec.

Reasonable Cause. A reasonable cause for granting a deed, according to Erskine, is one which is a good ground for executing the deed, though not one which could have been used to compel the grantor to execute it. See Consideration.

Reasons of Advocation. In every advocacy where the record had not been made up in the inferior court, or where the advocacy was of an interlocutory judgment, or where it had been brought on the ground of contingency, or on some other of the statutory grounds (with the exception of advocations under 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 40, which are in this respect analogous to advocations against final judgments); and in general, wherever the record in the inferior court was not to be held as the record in the Court of Session, reasons of advocacy were lodged at the lodgment of the letters for calling. These reasons of advocacy, like reasons of suspension, resembled a condescendence in an ordinary action, with a note of pleas in law subjoined; and this pleading having been followed by answers, and both papers having been revised, the record was closed, and the case disposed of in the usual way. The form of advocations is now regulated by the act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 86, 1838, and relative Act of Sederunt, 24th Dec. 1838. See Advocation.

Reasons of Suspension. In every suspension in which the letters had been expedite, at the lodgment of the letters for calling, reasons of suspension were lodged therewith; which, so far as depending on matter of fact, were stated in an articulate form, with a note of pleas in law subjoined; and if not so lodged, the letters could not be called. This pleading was substantially a condescendence; and in framing it, the correct practice was to assimilate it as far as possible to a condescendence in an ordinary action. The reasons of suspension were followed by answers in a corresponding form; and these papers having been revised, the record was closed, and the cause disposed of in the usual manner. A. S. 11th July 1828, §§ 25, 49, 56, 57; Stair, B. iv. tit. 52, § 4, et seq.; Bank. vol. iii. p. 11; Ross's Lect. i. 373. The form of suspensions is now regulated by the act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 86, 1838, and relative Act of Sederunt. See Suspension.

Rebellion; a levying of war, or forcible opposition made by a subject against his Sovereign. A debtor who disobeys a charge on letters of horning, to pay or perform in terms of his obligation, is accounted in law a rebel, in respect of his disobedience to the Sovereign's command, contained in the will of the letters; and it is upon this basis that imprisonment for civil debt in Scotland chiefly rests—the act of warding in royal burghs, and the statutory authority given to justices under the small-debt acts, being the only exceptions. This disobedience to the royal command is termed civil rebellion; and denunciation on letters of horning was formerly followed with the penal consequences of actual rebellion. Thus, the debtor's single escheat fell, burdened, however, with the debt on which the horning proceeded; and the rebel was in many other respects put beyond the protection of the law. These highly penal consequences were taken away by the act abolishing wardholding (20 Geo. II. c. 50). Ersk. B. ii. tit. 15, § 60; Bank. ii. 260; Bell's Princ. § 730; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. iii. 569; Ross's Lect. i. 242, 273–9, 323. See Denunciation. Escheat. As to the effect of denunciation on account of crimes, see Fugitation. See also *Act of Warding. Receipt. See Discharge. Evidence. And as to the effect of a receipt for the premium in a policy, see Insurance, p. 508.

Receiving Stolen Goods; the English term for reset of theft. It is punishable with transportation for not more than fourteen nor less than seven years, or imprisonment not exceeding three years. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Reset of Theft.

Reclaiming Bill. See Petition.

Reclaiming Days. The period within which all interlocutors of a Lord Ordinary might formerly be submitted to review of the Inner-House was twenty-one days; or where these days expired in the vacation or Christmas recess, until the first box-day in either vacation; and if the twenty-one days had expired before the box-day in the recess, they ran until the box-day; if they expired after the box-day, they ran to the first sederunt-day in January; 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 18;

A. S. 11th July 1828, § 79. By the act 13 and 14 Vict. c. 36, § 11, 1850, the reclaiming days are limited to ten days, except in the case of interlocutors disposing in whole or in part of the merits of the cause, and also in the case of decrees in absence. A decree on failure to lodge any paper ordered by the Lord Ordinary is a decree disposing of the merits. See the cases, Falla v. Graham, Jan. 14, 1851, 13 D. 482; Thomson v. Innes, July 1, 1851, 13 D. 1266; Arnold v. Winton, March 11, 1852, 14 D. 768; also the same case, May 25, 1852, 14 D. 769; and Anderson v. Brown, Jan. 20, 1854, 16 D. 367. In the Bill-Chamber, interlocutors passing or refusing bills take effect as soon as the clerk of the bills delivers up the passed bill to have the letters expedite, or issues a certificate of refusal. But the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, either in his interlocutor passing or refusing, or subsequently on cause shown in a note, may prohibit the delivery of the bill, or the issue of a certificate, during such a time as he may think reasonable, to enable the party to submit the interlocutor to review. Fourteen days is the period allowed in the Bill-Chamber for reclaiming; Beveridge on Bill-Chamber, 113. See also Bill-Chamber. In the inferior courts, the reclaiming days in ordinary actions are fourteen, and in actions of removing and aliment, and in all summary cases, six; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825. The reclaiming days cannot be competently prorogated even of consent of parties. See Reclaiming Note. Reclaiming Petition.

Reclaiming Note. The judgment of a Lord Ordinary in the Court of Session, either in the preparation or final decision of a cause, has all the efficacy of a judgment of either Division of the Court. But the Lord Ordinary's judgments or interlocutors are subject to the review of the Division of the Court to which the cause belongs; and such review is prayed for by a reclaiming note, the requisites of which are partly statutory and partly regulated by Act of Sederunt. The statutory rule is, that when either of the parties is dissatisfied, he may apply for review of the interlocutor, provided that, within twenty-one days from the date of the interlocutor, he prints and puts into the boxes for receiving the papers, to be perused by the Judges, a note reciting the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and praying the Court to alter the same in whole or in part. If the interlocutor has been pronounced on cases, the reclaimer, along with his note, must print and box not only the closed record, but also the cases which have been before the Lord Ordinary; if without cases, the closed record must be printed and boxed. And notice of this application for review must be given, by delivery of six copies of the reclaiming note to the known agent of the opposite party; 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 18. In addition to the above statutory requisites, the Act of Sederunt 11th July 1828 provides—1st, That where the twenty-one days allowed for reclaiming against an interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary in the Outer-House expire during vacation or Christmas recess, they shall continue open till the first box-day in the vacation or recess; and if they expire after the box-day in the recess, they shall continue open until the first sederunt-day after the recess; A. S. § 79. 2d, That the interlocutor complained of shall be prefixed to, and not embodied in, the note; and that in addition to the record and cases (if any), copies of the summons and defences, letters of suspension or advocacy (excepting summonses of multiplepoinding, adjudication, and the like), shall be appended to the note; the respondent being entitled, at the moving of the note in Court, to ask leave to print such additional documents as he may think necessary, provided those documents are in process, and have been before the Lord Ordinary; A. S. §§ 77, 110. 3d, That where the reclaiming note is against an interlocutor pronounced in absence or by default, it must have the summons appended, and must be accompanied by defences, or with the paper ordered, the failure to lodge which led to the interlocutor; A. S. §§ 74, 69, 112. And other regulations of minor importance will be found in the Act of Sederunt. As to Bill-Chamber interlocutors, the statute (§ 46) enacts that they may be reviewed, in like manner, by a reclaiming note; and the Act of Sederunt requires the reclaimer to append to his note a copy of the bill, or of the bill and answers, which have been before the Lord Ordinary on the Bills; A. S. § 75. But where the Lord Ordinary on the Bills reports the case to the Court, the interlocutor pronounced on such report is to be held as the judgment of the Inner-House, not of the Lord Ordinary; A. S. § 76. So also an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, pronounced on a remit from the Inner-House, after considering a reclaiming note, and directing him to pass or refuse a bill, is final; A. S. § 46. See Bill-Chamber. Reclaiming Days. Reclaiming notes, after being boxed, are set down and moved in what is called the roll of Single Bills of the Division of the Court to which they are presented; and (except in the case of notes praying to be reponed against decrees in absence, or by default, which are disposed of in that roll) are forthwith ordered to the Long or to the Summer Roll, as the case may be. And when they afterwards appear in this roll, the counsel for the reclaimer and respondent must be mutually prepared to argue the case, after which it will be disposed of by the Court, either by affirming or altering the interlocutor reclaimed against, or by ordering cases or minutes of debate, or making such other order as the justice of the case requires; 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, §§ 18 and 46; A. S. §§ 77, 78. A simple remit to the jury-roll, unaccompanied by findings, cannot be brought under review by reclaiming note, nor even by appeal to the House of Lords; 59 Geo. III. c. 35, § 15. See, on the subject of this article, Shand's Prac. i. 192; ii. 585, et seq.; Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 39, et seq. The reclaiming days are now limited to ten days, except in cases disposing in whole or in part of the merits, and in decrees of absence. See Process. Inner-House. Reclaiming Days.

Reclaiming Petition. Reclaiming petitions were, prior to the Judicature Act, 1825, a well-known mode of submitting the interlocutors of Lords Ordinary to the review of the Inner-House, and also of submitting the interlocutors of the Inner-House to their own review. In the Court of Session, this form of process is now unknown; but it still prevails in the sheriff and other inferior courts. Any interlocutor pronounced in a sheriff-court may be brought under review by a reclaiming petition, except interlocutors simply repelling dilatory defences, or disposing of objections stated in the course of leading a proof or ordering papers. The reclaiming petition recites verbatim the interlocutor reclaimed against, and, after a written argument, concludes with a prayer for the recall or alteration of the interlocutor in whole or in part. In ordinary actions, these petitions must be presented within fourteen days (exclusive of the day on which the interlocutor is dated) after the date of the interlocutor; and in actions of removing and aliment, and where against interlocutory orders, and in all summary cases, the reclaiming petition must be lodged within six free days. These reclaiming days cannot be prorogated of consent of parties. When answers are ordered, they are usually ordered to be lodged within corresponding period; and the interlocutor pronounced on considering the reclaiming petition, with or without answers, is not subject to farther review in the inferior court, except that where such interlocutor has been pronounced by the sheriff-substitute, an appeal to the sheriff may be made within six days. See Appeal. No reclaiming petition competent against the judgment of the sheriff pronounced on appeal, whether he affirms or alters that of his substitute; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825; Dick, 14th Dec. 1836, 15 & D. 256. Petitions against decrees in absence may be received at any time before extract, but only on consignment of the previous expenses, and on being accompanied with defences. No new production can be received with a reclaiming petition, except in the case of res noviter veniens ad notitiam. Similar regulations are in force in other inferior courts. See A. S. 12th Nov. 1825, as to inferior courts. See also MacLaurin's Form of Process, p. 229, and Barclay's Notes on A. S. p. 48, et seq.

Recognition; according to Skene, derives its name from the superior, who is presumed formerly to have been proprietor of the lands, recognising them once more as his property, when they fall to him by the fault of the vassal. In this sense, recognition may be taken generally for any return of the feu, from whatever ground of eviction that has happened. But the term was formerly applied specially to a casualty abolished along with wardholding, by which, when any vassal or free tenant, holding his lands by the tenure of ward, sold and "annallied all and haild his landes, with their pertinents, or the maist part thereof, without license, consent, or confirmation of his overlord," the lands, both those which had been alienated and those which the vassal had retained, fell to the superior as a satisfaction for the contempt shown him, and to prevent vassals from impoverishing themselves, and so rendering themselves unfit to perform their feudal services. Skene, h. t.; Stair, B. ii. tit. 11, § 10; B. iv. tit. 14; *Ersk. Recognisance; is an English law term signifying a judicial bond, whereby one or more persons become bound to forfeit a certain sum, on failure to perform a specified act or deed. See Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Blair's Justice, h. t.; Tait's Justice, h. t. For the form of a recognisance, see Appendix to Blair's Justice. See also Bail.

Recommendation, Letters of; letters recommending a third party to the favour or notice of the party addressed. Amongst merchants such letters may be attended with serious consequences to the writer. Thus, if a man spontaneously give letters of recommendation to another, and if in them he convey any assurance of pecuniary safety to his correspondent in his mercantile dealings with the party recommended, he thereby incurs an obligation of the nature of guarantee. But if one's opinion of another be asked, and if in reply a mere bona fide recommendation for general respectability and good conduct be given, this is no letter of credit, and infers no responsibility against the writer. Bell's Com. l. 371, et seq.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 61, Ivory's

Recompense; equivalent remuneration. This is due by one who has been made richer by another, without the purpose of donation. Thus, where one builds upon another's ground in the belief that it is his own, the property of the builder goes to the proprietor of the ground; but he is liable in recompense so far as lucratus. One possessing a subject temporarily is presumed to improve it for his own convenience, and is not entitled to recompense. Stair, B. i. tit. 8; More's Notes, p. liv.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 19; Bank. i. 226, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 538, et seq.; Illust. ib.; Kames' Equity (1825), 113-4-7. See Negotiorum Gestor. Contribution. Adjunction. Commixtion.

Recompensation. Where one pursues for a debt and the defender pleads compensation, to which the pursuer replies by pleading compensation also, this is termed recompensation. The different conditions under which recompensation may occur have been stated and resolved by Stair. He says,—1. Where A. contracts a debt to B., and subsequently at different times B. contracts two debts to A.: If B. pursue for the second of these two, and is answered by the plea of compensation with the debt which he owes, he is entitled to plead recompensation with the first debt due to himself. But, on the other hand, if he pursue for the first debt, he is not entitled to answer the plea of compensation by pleading recompensation with the second. A case occurred in which the first debt due to A. was secured on the debtor's liferent escheat; he subsequently purchased other debts due by B., for which he had no other security than B.'s other creditors had. The other creditors, to diminish A.'s credit upon the escheat, pleaded compensation on a debt due by A. to B., anterior to both of B.'s debts to A.; A. pleaded recompensation on the last of B.'s debts to him, and the Court found generally that he might recompense on any other debts in his person prior to the proponing of the compensation; Maxwell, Jan. 2, 1739, Elchies, voce Compensation, No. 6, M. 2550. This doctrine is contrary to that laid down by Stair. 2. If the debt due by A. be posterior to both the debts due by B., the concurrence takes place between the second debt due by B. and the debt due by A.; but on the ground that compensation, as pleaded by B. in such a case, would be a kind of indefinite payment which he might ascribe to either of the debts he chose, A., whether he insist on his first or second debt, cannot recompense with the other. 3. If the debt due by A. be in the middle between the two debts due by B., A., insisting on the last debt, may plead recompensation on the first; but if he insist for the first, he cannot plead recompensation on the last. These two last rules are laid down by Stair; but there seems to have been no decision where the debts were in such relative positions as to time. It would appear, however, that the doctrine laid down in the case of Maxwell, supra cit., is not limited in its application, but would embrace these cases likewise. If such be the case, the operation of the compensation does not depend upon the situation of the debts when contracted: but a creditor pursuing for a debt may answer the plea of compensation by pleading recompensation "on any other debts in his person prior to the proponing the compensation." Indeed, the whole course of decisions runs counter to the notion that compensation operates ipso jure, on which Stair's rules are founded. It has been found a good answer to the plea of compensation on a sum due by bill, that the debtor in that sum was cautioner for the creditor, and might therefore retain the sum in relief although not yet distressed: and thus the debt due to the cautioner was left uncompensated; Irvine, 10th July 1711, M. 2686. Compensation being pleaded against an assignee, he may recompense by debts due to his cedent, though not assigned to him: Kinstorie's Creditors, 7th Dec. 1742; Elchies, voce Compensation, No. 8, M. 2563. See Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 20; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 19; Bank. vol. i. p. 494. See Compensation, and authorities there cited. See also the case of Thomson v. Stephenson, Mar. 10, 1855, 17 D. 739.

Reconvention. Where an action is brought in Scotland by a foreigner, over whom the courts of this country have otherwise no jurisdiction, his adversary in the suit is entitled by reconvention to sue the foreigner on a counter claim, in compensation or extinction of the demand. The principle of this is, that a party is not entitled to avail himself of the jurisdiction of the Scotch courts, without subjecting himself in these courts to all incidental claims. In such cases the foreigner himself, and not his mandatary merely, must be cited, and the actions must be between the same parties, or connected with each other; for the raising of the action by the foreigner does not subject him generally to the jurisdiction of our courts. Bell's Princ. p. 624; Shand's Prac. i. 103, and cases there cited.

Record. Prior to the Judicature Act, 1825, great inconvenience was experienced in the progress of a cause, from the introduction of new averments at all stages of the process, and sometimes even at the close of a protracted litigation. To remedy this evil, certain statutory regulations were made for the purpose of compelling the parties to exhaust their averments and pleas, before any judgment on the merits of the cause was pronounced. The pleadings are called the record, and form the basis of the future argument, and of the decision of the cause. In ordinary actions, the record may be closed on the summons and defences, where the parties consent. But that rarely happens, and a revision of the condescendence and defences is generally ordered. Judicial procedure in the Court of Session is now regulated by the act 13 and 14 Vict. c. 36, 1850.

In suspensions, the record is usually closed on revised reasons of suspension and answers. In advocations of final judgments, where the inferior court record is not objected to, the record in the inferior court, with the additional pleas in law lodged in the Court of Session (where any such pleas have been lodged), is held as the record in the Court of Session; while in advocations of interlocutory judgments, or in cases where the inferior court record is objected to as improperly made up, or where no record has been made up in the inferior court, the record in the Court of Session will be closed on revised reasons of advocacy and answers; and in multiplepointings, so far as regards the competition, the record is closed on the revised condescendences and claims. Where a party in the Court of Session vexatiously or unreasonably refuses to close the record, the Lord Ordinary may pronounce such judgment against him as the other party may crave, and as the shape and nature of the action will admit; against which he can be reponed only on a reclaiming note to the Inner-House, presented within the reclaiming days, and upon payment of such expenses as shall be thought reasonable, and on consenting to close the record immediately; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 60. In the inferior courts, again, if the parties do not, within the time specified by the judge, state whether they are willing to close the record, the inferior judge is entitled to close the record, in the same manner, and to the same effect, as if the parties had agreed; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825. So also, in an inferior court, after a condescendence and answers have been lodged, and where no revisal is asked, the judge may close the record without again asking the parties to state whether or not they are willing to close. In all ordinary cases, whether in the supreme or inferior courts, where the defender makes appearance, and neither party abandons the cause, no judgment can be pronounced on the merits until the record is closed; and as this is a statutory requisite (§ 4 of stat.), any such judgment, pronounced before closing the record, is null and void. But, on the other hand, all dilatory defences and pleas ought to be decided before closing the record; e.g., objections to the form of the summons, to the title of the party, and, in general, all pleas which go to exclude the particular instance, without affecting the cause of action, or the right of the party to raise a new action. All these dilatory or preliminary pleas, except such as require probation, must be either decided or reserved before closing the record—6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 5; and it is the interest of the parties, and particularly of the pursuer, that they should be so decided, since otherwise they may have the effect of excluding the action after the expense of preparing a useless record on the merits has been incurred. So also a decree transferring in statu quo, or a decree of constitution, reserving objections contra executionem, may be pronounced without closing the record. After a record has been closed, it may, in certain circumstances, be opened up and amended by authority of the judge, and on payment of costs, at his discretion. This may be done in the case of res noviter veniens ad notitiam, or where some irregularity has been committed in closing the record, and in certain other special cases; although, generally speaking, the inclination of the Court is not to permit this, except upon payment of the whole previous expenses, and sometimes not even on that condition. Prior to closing the record, the parties respectively must have lodged in process all the writings within their power; on which they mean to found; although it is competent, after the record is closed, “to apply for a diligence for the recovery of writings in modum probationis, or to produce such writings previously in their power, as may be rendered necessary by the production of papers made by the other party after the record is closed;” A. S. 11th July 1828, § 55. The record thus made up and closed is usually disposed of in the Court of Session, in the first place, by an order for debate before the Lord Ordinary; although it is competent, where both parties are anxious for a decision, and think it unnecessary to debate the case, for the Lord Ordinary to make avizandum with the record, and to decide the cause without a previous debate. The ordinary course, however, is to appoint the cause to be debated; and with that view, a copy of the closed record is delivered to the Lord Ordinary by the party making the enrolment for debate; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 21. Parties are then heard by their counsel; and after that debate, the Lord Ordinary either decides the cause, or makes an order for cases, or remits it to the jury-roll, or takes such other step towards a decision as to him may seem proper—his interlocutor being subject to review, in the manner elsewhere explained. Record. In England, courts of record are the Sovereign's courts, in right of the crown and royal dignity. A court not of record is the court of a private person. None but courts of record have authority to fine or imprison. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Recorder. In English cities or towns corporate, the recorder is a person whom the mayor and other magistrates, having jurisdiction, associate with them for their direction in matters of law and justice. The recorder of London is one of the justices of Oyer and Terminer, and a justice of peace of the quorum for putting the laws in execution for preservation of the peace and government of the city. Being the mouth of the city, he delivers the sentences and judgments of the courts in it, and certifies and records the city-customs, &c. He is chosen by the Lord Mayor and Aldermen. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. This office seems to be somewhat analogous to that of assessors in Scotland. See Assessors.

Recorder of the Great Roll. See Clerk of the Pipe.

Records; the contents of any register. In Scotch law language the term is usually applied to the public register for deeds, instruments, and probative writings of every kind. The Scottish system of public records and registration merits particular attention, as affording the means whereby publicity is given to the state of the titles to heritable property, and as being productive of other important practical benefits. The subject may be digested as follows:—

1. Of Royal Grants.—All royal grants derive their effect from the appending of the seal, set apart for the different species of deeds (see Seals); and at the office where each of the seals is appended, the precepts or warrants of the grant are left to be preserved. In some of these grants of greater importance, as the crown charter, there are several records. Thus, the first warrant is a signature authorised in the Exchequer, which becomes a warrant for a precept under the signet, directed to the keeper of the privy seal, who again issues a precept for a charter to the keeper of the great seal; and at the office where each of those seals is attached, the warrant is left; and the charter being completed, and the seal appended, the privy seal warrant remains as the authority on which the charter is given out. In this manner there are passed, and preserved at the different offices, the warrants of all grants from the Crown. See Charter.

2. Decrees of Court.—The proceedings in the different courts are preserved by the clerks of court, and become the warrants of the decrees which are issued, and which contain a warrant for the diligence or execution of the law to enforce the decree of the judge. See Evidence. Decree. Diligence.

3. Of Deeds.—All deeds may be recorded in virtue of the clause of registration, whereby the granter consents to the deed being registered, and to judicial authority being interponed, as if a decree in terms of the deed had actually been pronounced; for which purpose he also grants a mandate to persons whose names are left blank, to act as his procurators in this matter. See Decree of Registration. Even where a deed does not contain a clause of registration, as it is called, it may be recorded as a probative writ, under authority of the act 1698, c. 4. See Evidence. Where there is a clause of registration, the principal deed is retained in the record, and an attested copy or extract, as it is called, authenticated by the clerk, and authorising diligence (when the clause of registration authorises diligence), is given out. There is besides a copy of the deed entered in a book, to which there is an index. Where the deed has no clause of registration, it is recorded as a probative writ merely, and the principal deed marked by the clerk, and returned with a certified copy, as well as a copy kept in the record. See Extract. Evidence. Registration.

4. Of Diligence.—The diligence of the law may be directed against the heritage or the person of the debtor. In the former case it is necessary to show the burdens affecting land; and accordingly the diligences affecting that species of property are carefully recorded, and the validity of the diligence made to depend on the regularity of the registration. The adjudication is recorded in what is termed the Register of Abbreviations. See Abbreviate. The inhibition has a register peculiar to itself. Personal diligence is also recorded, because formerly the oath fell on denunciation; and the form is still continued, although the principal reason no longer exists. See Diligence. Adjudication. Inhibition. Horning. Denunciation.

5. Of Heritable Rights.—The registration of heritable rights was, after several unsuccessful attempts, at last established by the act 1617, c. 16, which provides for the registration of "reversions, easines, and other writs." By this statute a public register for those deeds is established; and it is thereby expressly enacted, that all instruments of sasine shall be registered within sixty days after their date, otherwise they are to make no faith in judgment against third parties; but without prejudice to their being used against the sucken and his heirs. This act does not extend to instruments of sasine, &c., in burgage property, which are regulated by the statute 1661, c. 11. See Burgage. Sasine.

Instruments of resignation ad remanentiam must also be recorded within sixty days of their date; 1669, c. 3. As to the use of the minute-book as part of the record of heritable rights, see Minute-Book. The instrument, after being recorded, is returned with a certificate by the keeper of the record, specifying the book and page of the register where it is to be found. And extracts from this record make faith in all cases, except where the writs so registered are offered to be improven; 1617, c. 16. In competitions, the date of the registration, not of the instrument, is the criterion of preference. This record shows the extent of the burdens or limitations on heritage; and the minute-book facilitates a search for the contents of the record. In this way, and by the records of real diligence, the commerce of land is rendered secure. *Ersk. 6. Of Entails.—Deeds of entail are, by the act 1685, c. 22, ordered to be recorded in a special register, at the sight of the Court of Session, who are to interpose their authority; and this recording is necessary in order that the deed may have the benefit of the statute. A new register was accordingly established, in which the whole deed of entail, with all its conditions and restrictions, is ordered to be engrossed. There is no time prescribed within which this registration must be made; but without such registration, the deed has not the privilege of an entail; and the most remote heir in the substitution is allowed to insist for having the deed recorded. See Tailrie.

Recordum; recordatio; according to Skene, a report. "Recorda summonitionis signifies the rehearse, report, or testification of the execution of the summons, briev, or other precept, which execution is now called indorsation. Recordum curiæ signifies the report, rehearsal, or minute of that which is done in court, or the interlocutor of the court." Skene, h. t.

Recourse; is the right competent to an assignee or disponee, under the warrandice of the transaction, to recur on the vendor or cedent for relief, in case of eviction or of defects inferring warrandice. See Warrandice. Actio Redhibitoria. Excommunion. The term recourse is also applied to the right which the holder of a bill of exchange has to recur on the drawer and indorsers, should the drawee fail to make payment. *Ersk. Recovery. In the English law, a recovery is the effect of a sentence by which, in a suit instituted for the recovery of an estate claimed by the party, judgment is given that he shall recover it according to his claim. This was an expedient formerly resorted to in England, in order to get rid of the fetters of an entail. A fictitious process was instituted against a tenant in tail, in which the demandant or recoverer obtained judgment for the lands, upon a secret confidence that, on the recovery being completed, he would reconvey them to the party in fee-simple. By a recent statute, fines and feigned recoveries are abolished, and tenants in tail are enabled to make an effectual alienation by any deed to be enrolled in Chancery, by which a tenant in fee can convey; 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 74. See also Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Sandford on Entails, 28. See Fine.

Recrimination. Bankton, B. i. tit. 5, § 128, and Balfour in his Practicks, hold the plea of recrimination—viz., that the pursuer also has been guilty of adultery—to be a good defence against an action of divorce for adultery; but the contrary doctrine is now established in the law of Scotland. Recrimination, however, may be made the ground of a counter action, in which case it only affects patrimonial interests. The Court, before pronouncing judgment, generally allows the defender a reasonable time for insisting in a counter action, when an act of adultery is alleged to have been committed by the pursuer. When both parties are found guilty, both are divorced; but there is no such thing as allowing the guilt of the one party to stand as a compensation for that of the other. Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 45, Note by Mr Ivory; Bell's Princ. § 1535; Illust. § 1533; Lothian's Consistorial Prac. 166. See Divorce.

Rector; in the Episcopal Church, one who has the charge and cure of a parish church. Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 9; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Vicar.

Reddendo; is the technical name of a clause indispensable to an original charter, and usually inserted in charters by progress. It takes its name from the first word of the clause in the Latin charter, Reddendo inde annuatim, &c.; and it specifies the feu-duty or other services which have been stipulated to be paid or performed by the vassal to his superior. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 24; Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, §§ 15 and 29; tit. 4, § 7; Bank. i. 548; Bell's Com. ii. 272; Bell's Princ. § 762; Bell on Purchaser's Title, 278; Bell on Leases, i. 9, 22; Ross's Lect. ii. 160, 290. See Charter.

Redeemable Rights; are those conveyances, in property or in security, which contain a clause, whereby the granter, or any other person therein named, may, on payment of a certain sum, redeem the lands or subjects conveyed. It is in this form that securities for debt are usually given.

1. Redeemable Rights.—Prior to the Reformation, at which time the taking of interest was unlawful, all loans of money, and the like transactions, were conceived in the form of temporary sales of land, or purchases of rent; the former were termed wadsets, the latter annualrent rights. The wadset was a fair exchange of the estate for the use of the money; and where the estate and the money advanced were commensurate in value, and the creditor took the lands in return for the advance, it was termed a proper wadset. Where, again, the creditor was secured in the full amount of his debt, whatever the return of the estate might be, it was termed an improper wadset. The proprietor, during the possession of the wadsetter, was feudally divested; and his only way of returning to his possession was by redeeming the wadset, in terms of the clause of redemption which the deed contained. This form of security is now hardly known in practice. See Wadset. The annualrent right was a sale of a certain annual rent out of the estate, secured by sasine; in which last respect chiefly it differed from the English rent charge. It was redeemable on payment of a certain sum. See Annualrent Right. After the Reformation, when the taking of interest was made lawful, a personal obligation was inserted in the annualrent right, and, in security of the debt, the creditor was infeft in an annualrent. This led to the introduction of the modern heritable bond, consisting of a personal obligation of an annualrent right, and of an infeftment in security of the principal sum, interest and penalty. The superiority of the heritable bond to the annualrent right is obvious; since, under the annualrent right, nothing could be drawn from the estate but the interest of the debt, while the heritable bond covers not only the interest, but all the remainder of the rents, in payment of the principal. Hence, the annualrent right was superseded in practice by the heritable bond. The most remarkable difference between the wadset and the modern right in security is, that the wadset divests the proprietor, whereas the right in security leaves the right of property in the debtor; in so much, that an heritable bond may be granted by a superior over his feu-duties without his being held to have thereby interposed a superior between himself and his vassal. Hence, the discharge of the debt, thus heritably secured by the modern right in security, puts an end to the security, and disencumbers the lands of the debtor. See Burdens.

2. Rights of Reversion.—These rights must be exercised within forty years from the term at which the proprietor is allowed to redeem: unless the right of reversion enters the sasine as a qualification of the right of property. This power has been used to complete the right of an heir. When, for example, one member of a series of heirs has disappeared, and it is uncertain whether he be still in life, in place of inserting his name in the destination, a power of redeeming may be given to him, in the event of the succession opening to the heir he is meant to precede; and by this means the confusion and uncertainty which would arise, were he called in as an heir, is avoided. *Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 22; tit. 10, § 15; B. iv. tit. 5; More's Notes, p. cclxii.; Ersk. Redemption. The order of redemption is prescribed by the clause of redemption in the redeemable right. See Premonition.

Redhibitoria Actio. See Actio Redhibitoria.

Reduction, and Reduction-Improbation. The action of simple reduction and the action of reduction-improbation are the two varieties of the rescissory actions of the law of Scotland. The object of this class of actions, which are peculiar to the Court of Session, and cannot be competently sued in an inferior court, is to reduce and set aside deeds, services, decrees, and rights, whether heritable or moveable, against which the pursuer of the action can allege and instruct sufficient legal grounds of reduction. In the simple reduction the summons, like all rescissory summonses, commences with the Will, whereby the messenger-at-arms is authorised to summon the defender to appear in Court at the instance of the pursuer, and to bring with him the deed, writing, or decree sought to be reduced, in order to its being set aside by a decree of the Court. The summons then sets forth, articulately, the several reasons of reduction; and as the document called for is assumed to be in the hands of the defender, or at least not in those of the pursuer, who cannot therefore be supposed to be fully aware of all its defects, the first reason of reduction sets forth that the document is vitiated and erased in substantialibus, that it is not duly stamped or authenticated, and so forth, and that it is otherwise defective in the legal solemnities. The object of this reason of style is to cover any defects or informalities which may be found to exist when the document is judicially produced by the defender. But in the ordinary case, the other reasons of reduction are those on which the judicial contest is to turn; and they necessarily depend on the special circumstances of each particular case. The conclusions of the summons are, that for the reasons therein stated, and for others to be proponed at the discussion, the document called for ought to be reduced and declared, by decree of the Court, to have been ab initio, and to be now, and in all time coming, void and null, and that the pursuer should be restored thereagainst in integrum. The summons in the ordinary case also contains the proper petitory conclusion consequent on success in the reductive conclusions—e.g., repetition of sums intromitted with in virtue of the reduced deed; or mails and duties of lands wrongfully possessed; or count and reckoning, or the like. And the certification is, that if the defender fail to appear and to produce the document called for, or to assign a sufficient reason to the contrary, the Court will reduce, decern, and declare in conformity with the conclusions of the summons. The summons of reduction-improbation, in its general structure, does not differ essentially from a simple reduction. But the action being appropriated to cases where falsehood and forgery are alleged against the deed or document called for, and the conclusion in point of form being not only that the writ should be reduced and “improven” as false and forged, but that the forgers and users thereof should be punished, the action must be raised with the Lord Advocate’s concurrence; which is obtained as a matter of course. See Con-course. Where falsehood and forgery are alleged, the action must be an action of reduction-improbation; but in other cases it is frequently optional to the pursuer to proceed by simple reduction or by reduction-improbation. One advantage of the reduction-improbation is, that if the defender fail to appear, and decree of certification contra non producta be pronounced, the effect of that decree will be to hold the writ as forged and fabricated, and this decree will hardly be recalled, even although it has been pronounced in absence; whereas in the simple reduction, the certification is merely that the deed called for will be held as void, until produced; so that at any time before extract, this last decree of certification may be opened up by the defender presenting a reclaiming note, in consequence of which he will be reponed, on payment of the usual trifling sum of expenses. On account of this difference between the certification in the one action and in the other, decree of certification contra non producta, even in absence, is not pronounced de plano in a reduction-improbation. Where the defender does not appear, the case is first continued for a week; and then, when decree of certification is at last pronounced, it cannot be extracted for four weeks. But the defender may reclaim to the Inner-House within twenty-one days after the date of the interlocutor thus pronounced, and may be reponed in the usual way, if he accompany his reclaiming note with the writs called for, or be in circumstances to account for his failure to appear sooner to plead some valid defence. See Certification. Reponing.

There is nothing peculiar in the induciae or execution of the summons, either of simple reduction or of reduction-improbation. These summonses are called in the usual manner (vide Calling of a Summons); but, according to the former practice, actions of this class were what were called Inner-House processes; and hence, as soon as the writ or document called for was judicially produced, the Lord Ordinary made great avizandum with the process to the Inner-House. A petition was then presented to the Division of the Court to which the cause belonged, praying for a remit to the Lord Ordinary to discuss the reasons of reduction. This circuitous process, however, was put an end to by the Judicature Act, 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 27, whereby it was enacted, that all rescissory actions, except reductions of decrees of the Court of Admiralty (now abolished), in maritime causes, should, from and after 11th November 1825, be enrolled and continue before the Junior Lord Ordinary, without being taken by avizandum to the Inner-House, and thence remitted for discussion; the Lord Ordinary having power, however, to remit such actions ob contingentiam to another process depending before the Inner-House, or before any other of the Lords Ordinary. Where the defender, in an action of reduction, takes out the summons to see, he is entitled, as in other cases, to retain it for thirteen days, as explained (voce Calling of a Summons); but if he mean to defend the action on its merits, it is not necessary for him to lodge defences at this stage of the cause. On the contrary, he merely returns the summons, which implies that he means to satisfy the production, as it is expressed; i.e., to produce the document called for, and to contest the reasons of reduction. In that case, the pursuer enrolls the action in the weekly printed roll; and, on its being called, the defender, in the ordinary case, takes a day to satisfy the production, usually at the distance of ten or fourteen days ; and on the production being satisfied, the case is again enrolled, and an interlocutor pronounced, holding the production as satisfied, and appointing the defender, at the distance of eight or ten days, or at such other time as the Lord Ordinary may appoint, to lodge his defences on the merits. In these defences, the reasons of reduction will be met ; and thereafter the record is made up, in the ordinary case, in the usual manner. By appearing and taking a day to satisfy the production, the decree of certification, pronounced on his failing to satisfy the production, is held as a decree in foro, against which the defender cannot be repone except by a reclaiming note within twenty-one days, as in other cases of Outer-House interlocutors in foro. Where, however, the defender satisfies the production and then withdraws and lodges no defences on the merits, the decree of reduction is held as a decree in absence. See the case of Macdonald v. Brown, March 3, 1835, 13 S. 594.

Where, again, the defender means to object to the pursuer's title, or to plead an exclusive title, or to maintain any other defence in bar of satisfying the production, he must return preliminary defences confined to these points alone ; which defences will be disposed of either by making up a record (Clyne, 20th Nov. 1835, 14 S. & D. 31), or by reserving them for consideration along with the defences on the merits, as the case may be. The provision in the Act of Sederunt 11th July 1828 is, "that if the defender is to object to the title of the pursuer, or to plead on an exclusive title, or to state any other objection against satisfying the production, he shall return defences confined to these points ; but if otherwise, no defences shall be given in at this stage of the proceedings ; declaring always that it shall be competent to the Lord Ordinary, on cause shown, though no defences should be given in at this stage, to reserve all objections to the title till the cause shall be heard on the merits, and the Lord Ordinary shall dispose of such objections in terms of the act" 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 5 ; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 36. In the case where no preliminary defences have been returned, it shall then "be held, unless in the particular cases where the pursuer himself must produce the writs called for, that the defender is to satisfy the production ; and he shall be bound to take a day to satisfy accordingly, unless he shall be repone by the Court on producing his (preliminary) defences ;" and as "soon as the production is satisfied, the Lord Ordinary shall prepare the cause for disposing of the reasons of reduction, by appointing defences, after which the record shall be made up as in the case of an ordinary action ;" A. S. 11th July 1828, § 51. The remaining regulations of the same Act of Sederunt are, that a printed copy of the defences on the merits must be delivered by the defender's agent to the Lord Ordinary's clerk at the first enrolment of the cause after the lodgment of the defences (§ 37), and that "if the pursuer finds it necessary to add any further reasons of reduction to those contained in the libel, it shall be competent for him, before the record is made up, to state the same as an amendment of the libel ; but in that case he shall furnish the opposite party with a copy of the amendment forty-eight hours before giving it into process, and pay such expenses as the Lord Ordinary shall think reasonable, and the defender shall give in defences applicable to the said amendment ;" A. S. § 61. Such rescissory actions as must be sent de plano to the Jury Court are enrolled in the regulation-roll only ; and every process of reduction belongs to that Division of the Court to which the clerk is attached in whose office the process is lodged ; A. S. § 35. As to the regulations in those cases where articles improbatory and approbatory were required by the former practice, see Articles Improbatory and Approbatory. Abiding by.

The provision in the Court of Session Act, 13 and 14 Vict. c. 36, 1850, is, that if the defender is to object to the title of the pursuer, or to plead an exclusive title, or to state any other objection against satisfying the production, he shall in the first instance lodge defences confined to those points, and the form of such defence in the procedure thereon shall be the same as in the case of peremptory defences in an ordinary action ; and if the defences so lodged shall be repelled, the defender, after the production has been satisfied, shall give in defences applicable to the grounds of reduction, and upon the merits of the reduction, and a record may be made up as in any ordinary action.

Some practical points connected with actions of reduction deserve attention. (1.) As to the title to pursue, it seems to be settled that a pursuer cannot call for production and reduction of any writings except those flowing from himself, or from his predecessors or authors with whom he can connect a title, although it is not invariably necessary that he should be served heir. Apparency is a sufficient title to pursue an action of reduction on the head of deathbed, whether the pursuer be heir of line, or heir-male, or heir of tailzie or provision ; and apparency is also a good title, where, from the nature of the subject, there can be no general service. The creditors of an apparent heir may also pursue a reduction on the head of deathbed, and even, as it would seem, without previously adjudging the right to reduce. The Crown's donor, as ultimus hæres, is also entitled to pursue such a reduction; but it has been held that the creditors of a defunct cannot pursue a reduction of a discharge granted by the deceased debtor on the ground of fraud and circumvention, without having first vested themselves with the jus actionis competent to the deceased; Rodger, 2d June 1831, 9 S. & D. 671. See the cases on this subject digested in Shand's Prac. ii. 619, et seq. See also Adjudication on Trust-Bond. (2.) It is sometimes difficult to determine in what cases an action of reduction is necessary, as to which the only general rule seems to be, that where the deed is ipso jure null, that nullity may be pleaded by way of exception, as in the case of a deed by a pupil, or by a minor having curators without their consent, or where the deed of the minor is in favour of his curator, who cannot be auctor in rem suam. On the other hand, where there is no ipso jure nullity, but where the deed is merely voidable, an action of reduction is necessary; as, for example, in the case of all deeds executed by a minor, even with consent of his curators, which, within the quadriennium utile, are reducible on the head of minority and lesion. So also the deeds of an interdicted or inhibited party, or deeds flowing a non habente potestatem, or executed on deathbed to the prejudice of the heir, or deeds voidable as frauds against creditors under the bankrupt statutes or at common law, all require to be reduced. And, generally speaking, all deeds, writings, instruments, or executions ex facie formal and regular, must be set aside by way of reduction, however pregnant the proof of error may be. In the case, however, of informal executions and the like, where the objection is apparent ex facie of the document, it is pleadable by way of exception. See on this subject, Sommerville and Co., 26th Nov. 1829, 8 S. 136; Russell, 27th Nov. 1827, 6 S. & D. 133; Gibb and Macdonald, 1st June 1827, 5 S. 739; Ramsay, 13th Dec. 1828, 7 S. 193. (3.) It is now a settled rule, that the pursuer of an action of reduction, or of reduction-improbation, is entitled to sue the party in possession under, or availing himself of, the deed or right under reduction, without calling his author, "leaving it to the defenders to cite their authors, or to intimate to them their distress, as they think fit;" A. S. 15th Feb. 1723, made perpetual by A. S. 19th Feb. 1742. See also Elliot v. Wilson, 9th Feb. 1825, as reported in Fac. Coll. (4.) Final decrees of inferior courts, where not protected by statute, are reducible even before extract. In like manner, the interlocutors of an inferior judge may be reduced, although the merits of the case have not been exhausted; Boyd, 19th Jan. 1825, 3 S. 444; Campbell, 3d Dec. 1825, 4 S. & D. 264. So where an inferior court decree can be put in execution without being extracted, reduction has been held a competent form of review, though no extract be taken; Jack, 11th March 1837, 15 D. 883; but see Coutts, 5th Dec. 1835, 14 S. 110; Buchanan, 20th May 1837, 15 D. B. & M. 958, and Brown, 23d May 1837, 15 D. 977. Where a defender has been assoltized in an inferior court, and the decree has been extracted, the pursuer has no means of redress except a reduction. In some cases, however, the pursuer was not allowed to reduce such a decree, except upon payment of the previous expenses; Smith, 9th March 1826, 4 S. 538; although this rule is not invariable. See Kirk, 6th July 1827, 5 S. 905. (5.) Certain actions of reduction are appropriated for trial by jury; such are, reductions on the head of furiosity and idiotcy, of facility and lesion, or of force and fear—6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 28; and such actions, on coming into Court, are enrolled in the regulation-roll only—A. S. 11th July 1828, § 35. (6.) As to satisfying the production, the general rule is, that the defender must produce the writings called for; but to this rule there is an exception, where the defender has not and never had the writings, and where he does not represent one bound to have produced them. Where, again, the writings are in publica custodia—e. g., of the Court itself—the defender is required to do no more than lodge a note of the dates of the decrees, or of recording the writs. He is not bound to procure extracts at his own expense; but if the defender be in possession of an extract of the deed or decree called for, the production of such extract will satisfy the production, even in a reduction-improbation. If, however, the deed has not been recorded until after the raising of the action, an extract, although sufficient in a simple reduction, will not suffice in a reduction-improbation; and if the original deeds be required from the record, it is the duty of the pursuer to make the requisite application to the Court to have them transmitted, although, in a simple reduction, such an application will not be granted in initio litis; Alison, 5th March 1829, 7 S. 552. Where the deed is recorded in the books of an inferior court, an extract does not satisfy the production. Indeed, it is only where the deeds are recorded in the books of Council and Session that an extract or a note of the dates of recording will satisfy the production. The register of the great seal, or of Chancery, has no such privilege; and if the deed be recorded in the register of probative writs merely, the original, which in that record is not retained by the keeper, but returned to the party, must be produced to satisfy the production. The warrants of a decree cannot be called for after twenty years; but within that time the defender must produce these warrants, even although in publica custodia. These warrants consist of the various steps of process which remain in the clerk's hands, and letters of general and special charge, where such have been required. See Grounds and Warrants. A decree of proving the tenor obtained in foro will satisfy the production; and it appears formerly to have been the practice to allow actions of proving the tenor to be repeated incidenter, in order to stop decree of certification. See Shand, ii. 632, and cases there cited. Where, from the nature of the case, there is actually no production to satisfy—e. g., where a reduction is brought of a transaction which has been carried through verbally—the defender satisfies the production by lodging an inventory, giving a short narrative of the transaction sought to be set aside; Beveridge, i. 396. And where the reduction is of a service, in which the question is whether the inquest did right in serving the defender, it is competent to him to lead evidence in addition to the ex parte evidence originally laid before the inquest; Cochrane, 17th Dec. 1824, 3 S. & D. 411. (7.) The rules as to abiding by a deed against which forgery is proposed are explained under the articles Abiding by, and Articles Improbatory. But improbation may also be proposed in certain cases by way of exception—e. g., where forgery is pleaded in defence, or as a reason of suspension. In that case, a minute signed by counsel, alleging forgery, and proposing improbation, is lodged in process, accompanied by an offer to consign L.40 Scots, to be forfeited if the allegation prove groundless. The pursuer or charger is then ordained to appear and abide by the deed, sub periculo falsi, as elsewhere explained (voce Abiding); and although the rule as to consignment is not observed where improbation is proposed in a reduction, it is still in observance where it is pleaded by way of exception. After the minute is lodged, an interlocutor will be pronounced, ordering consignment of the L.40 Scots in the clerk's hands, and granting commission to take the party's abidance, and in other respects the action will proceed as when forgery is pleaded in a reduction. And here the maxim exceptio falsi est omnium ultima applies; the import of which is, that if falsehood or forgery be once proposed, no other nullities—e. g., extortion, want of statutory solemnities, or the like—are pleadable. This rule has no place, however, where improbation has been unsuccessfully proposed by way of action; for if a party be afterwards sued on the document which he has failed in "improving," he may plead other defences without being met by the plea of competent and omitted. See on this subject generally, Shand, ii. 651, and cases there cited. See also Articles Improbatory. (8.) Where a reduction is to be insisted in by one of the parties to a depending litigation against the other, in aid of a plea in the suit, it is sufficient to repeat a reduction incidenter by lodging a signeted summons of reduction in the depending process. But a summons thus repeated incidenter can go no further than to affect the claim of the party in the particular action in reference to which it has been repeated; Shand, ii. 652. See Repeating a Summons. (9.) The effect of a decree of reduction is, that the deed thereby reduced ceases to be of any effect against the party who has obtained it. But no party not in right of the party who has obtained the decree can found on it. Hence, where, either in a simple reduction or in a reduction-improbation, a deed has been found null, the Court will not order it to be cancelled. Where, however, it has been found false or forged, it is cut down to all intents and purposes, and will be ordained to be destroyed, as soon as the forger or user has been tried and convicted; Shand, ii. 654. (10.) Inferior courts can only judge incidentally, in the improbation of writs or executions, in processes there depending; and that only where the objection is pleaded by way of exception or reply. And even to this extent, it is only where the writings are challenged by direct proof that inferior courts can entertain the exception of improbation. Indirect proof is the proper subject of an action in the supreme civil or criminal court; Shand, ib. 655, and authorities there cited. See on the subject of this article generally, Stair, B. iv. tit. 20; App. § 8; More's Notes, p. xlv., cccxiii.—xxiii.—lxxx.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 19; Bank., ii. 637, et seq.; Bell's Com. i. 134; ii. 205, 476, 252; Bell's Princ. § 2255; *Kames' Stat. Reduction Reductive. An action of reduction reductive, is an action in which a decree of reduction, which has been erroneously or improperly obtained, is sought to be reduced. In such actions, the decree of reduction and its grounds and warrants are usually called for, in order that, when the decree of reduction reductive has been pronounced, the parties "may join issue upon the original proceedings, just as if the decree reduced had never been pronounced or extracted." The procedure in such actions is in all respects similar to that in ordinary actions of reduction. Beveridge's Form of Process, i. 393; Shand's Prac. ii. See Reduction.

Reform Act. The following are the principal provisions of the act 2 Gul. IV. c. 65, intituled, "An act to amend the representation of the people in Scotland," and of 4 and 5 Will. IV. c. 88, and 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 78, introducing certain amendments upon the Reform Act. That there shall be fifty-three representatives of Scotland in the House of Commons, instead of forty-five—thirty for counties, several or conjoined, and twenty-three for burghs and towns; § 1. Directions for the combination of certain burghs and towns, and of certain counties with each other, or parts of each other, and a description of the boundaries of the several towns, are contained in the following sections and schedules therein referred to; §§ 2, 3, 4, 5. No one can acquire the right to vote in the election of members of Parliament who does not possess the qualifications required in the act, except those who, on 17th July 1832, were entitled to be put upon, or were already lawfully upon, the roll of freeholders of any shire in Scotland, or who, before March 1831, had become owners or superiors of lands affording the qualification to vote; in which case there is an alternative vote to a liferenter and fiar so qualified; § 6. The act 5 and 6 Will. 4, c. 78, § 10, provides, that the vote of any fiar of a freehold qualification whose rights are here preserved to him, shall be taken by the sheriff on a paper apart; and shall not be reckoned in casting up the votes where the liferenter has voted. The following classes of persons are under legal incapacity to vote, a personal disqualification which extends both to county and burgh claimants: Scotch peers, minors, lunatics, idiots, women, aliens, &c.; but the eldest sons of Scotch peers, who were formerly under disability, may now both vote and be elected, if otherwise qualified. Sheriffs, sheriff-substitutes, sheriff-clerks, depute sheriff-clerks, town-clerks, and depute town-clerks, can neither vote nor be elected, nor act as agents for the candidates in their respective counties and burghs; §§ 36, 37.

County Qualifications.—The act declares the following persons qualified to be registered and to vote in the election of members for counties: Every one not under legal incapacity, who has been, for at least six calendar months previous to the last day of July in the year in which his claim of registration is to be determined, the owner (though not infeft) of any lands, houses, feu-duties, or other heritable subjects (except heritable securities) within the shire, yielding or capable of yielding to the claimant, after deducting feu-duty, ground-annual, or other consideration burthening his right, the yearly value of L.10, provided he is in actual possession of the subject, or in receipt of the profits and issues thereof to the said extent, although payable at longer intervals than once a year. Every one acquiring within the said six months, by inheritance, marriage, marriage-settlement, or mortis causa disposition, or by appointment to any place or office, property which would qualify as above, is entitled to be registered on the first occasion after his acquisition; § 7. This clause as to property acquired "by appointment to any place or office" has given rise to considerable doubt. See Minister's Right to Vote. Schoolmaster's Right to Vote. Fiares are not entitled to vote, but liferenters and every joint proprietor, whose interest is worth L.10 a year, are qualified; § 8. A tenant in lands, houses, or other heritable subjects, may be registered, who has held during the said twelve months previous to the last day of July, whether in his personal possession or not, on a lease, missive, or other written title, for not less than fifty-seven years, exclusive of breaks at the option of the landlords, or for the lifetime of the said tenant, subjects of L.10 clear yearly value after payment of rent; or on a lease of not less than nineteen years, subjects of value to the tenant, after payment of rent of L.50 a year; or where the rent is L.50, and the tenant in the personal occupancy; or where the tenant has paid a grassum of not less than L.300; the value of grain rents to be estimated by the average fiar prices of the county for the three preceding years, or the average market prices for three years where payable in other produce. Tenants succeeding to any such lease within the said twelve months are entitled to registration on the first occasion after their succession. But no sub-tenant or assignee to any fifty-seven or nineteen years' lease is entitled to be registered, unless in actual occupation of the premises; § 9.

Burgh Qualification.—The right of election of the members for burghs is taken from the town-councils, in whom it was formerly vested, and conferred on individuals, qualified according to the following provisions: Every person not subject to any legal incapacity is entitled to be registered, who shall have been for not less than twelve months previous to the last day of July in the occupancy as proprietor, tenant, or liferenter of any house, warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building within the limits of the burgh or town, separately or jointly with any other house, shop, or other building of the yearly value of L.10; or shall, though not the occupant, have been the true owner, or husband of the owner, of such premises. Provided, 1. That he shall, on or before the 20th of July, have paid all assessed taxes payable in respect of such premises, previous to 6th April then preceding. 2. That he shall have resided for six calendar months previous to the last day of July within the burgh, or seven miles of it. 3. That he shall not have received parochial relief for twelve calendar months previous to the said term; § 11. The voter's having been, during the requisite twelve months, in possession of different premises in succession, is a sufficient title of occupancy, provided he has paid the assessed taxes for them all. Every joint-occupant, whose share is of the yearly value of L.10, is entitled to vote; §§ 10, 12.

Registration.—No one can vote without registration, which takes place, in the case of those on the old roll of freeholders, by the sheriff-clerk transferring their names to his register of voters on the new constituency, without requiring any claim to be made; § 20. In the county registration, any other besides old freeholders must, on or before 20th July, give in a claim, subscribed by himself or his agent, to the schoolmaster of that parish of the county in which the property, or the greater part of the property on which he claims, is situated, according to a form contained in schedule (F), to be furnished for sixpence each by the schoolmaster. The time of lodging the claim to be filled up by the schoolmaster on his receiving it. Each schoolmaster makes up, immediately after 20th July, an alphabetical list of names, designations, and places of abode of claimants; and before 24th July he is to affix a copy of it to the church-door of the parish (with certain exceptions), with a notice annexed of the time at which the sheriff is to commence the examination of claims, and a requisition on those intending to object to lodge a note of objections on or before 5th August. Any one registered, or claiming to be registered, is entitled to object; and all persons, whether registered or claimants, may be objected to. The objections to be in a certain form, prescribed in schedule (H); and the objector is bound to give notice to the person to whom he objects by a copy of the objection. On or before 8th August, the schoolmaster transmits to the sheriff-clerk the whole claims and objections, with a duplicate of the list of claimants affixed to the church-door. And any claimant who thinks that his right to be registered is established by a written title, may, at any time after giving in his claim, and previous to the 10th day of August, transmit said title, or an extract thereof, to the sheriff-clerk. On or before 12th August, these are all laid before the sheriff; and he appoints open courts to be held, between 12th August and 15th September, for deciding on claims; §§ 13 and 22. Section 13 contains the annexation of certain parishes to other counties than their own. The sheriff disposes first of the claims to which no objections have been lodged, and which have been supported by production of a written title. When satisfied, on prima facie evidence, of the validity of the claim, he marks upon it "Admit," with his initials, and delivers it to be entered in the register. When not satisfied, he marks upon it "Reject," and delivers it to be kept till applied for. He next considers the claims which are objected to; and on hearing parties, or their agents, admits or rejects in like manner. No written pleadings are allowed upon claims.

By the act 19 and 20 Vict. c. 58, 1856, amending the law for the registration of parliamentary voters in burghs, the assessors of every burgh are directed to make out and publish a list of all persons entitled to vote in the election of a member for the burgh. The list contains the Christian name and surname of any such person written at full length, together with his occupation, the place of his abode, the nature of his qualification, and the name of the street and number of the house (if any), or other description of the place where the property in right of which he is entitled to vote is situated. Persons omitted from the list, or who are desirous of being registered for a different qualification than that for which his name appears in the list, may lodge a claim with the assessor, who makes up a list of such claimants. Objections to persons included in the list may be lodged by any one on the list of voters, and the assessor must make up and publish a list of the persons objected to. The sheriff holds courts for correcting and revising the lists before the 1st of September and the 1st of October, which courts may be adjourned from time to time, but no adjourned court can be held after the 30th of September in any year. The valuation-roll, made up by the assessor under the act 17 and 18 Vict. c. 91, is prima facie proof that the gross yearly rent or value of any subjects specified in the valuation-roll is, and has been for the year from the 15th of May in such year, of the amount set forth for the term in such valuation-roll, and also as prima facie proof that the persons therein set forth as proprietors, tenants, and occupants respectively, have, for the period to which the valuation applies, been such proprietors, tenants, and occupants respectively, as therein stated. It is competent, however, to prove to the satisfaction of the sheriff or court of appeal, that the subjects are of a greater or of a less annual value than that stated in the valuation-roll. At every future election, the register of voters is conclusive evidence that the persons therein named continue to have the qualifications which are annexed to their names in the register in force at the election, and the oath of possession cannot be put to such persons. The expenses of the registration are defrayed by a rate levied along with the assessment for the relief of the poor.

Appeals.—The sheriff's judgment is subject to appeal, notice being lodged in writing with the sheriff-clerk to a court of the sheriffs liable to attend at the circuit of the district, or three of them—the court of appeal to be held between 15th and 25th September, and the appeals to be determined before 20th October. The Reform Act directs that the sheriffs shall remain at, or return to, the circuit-town of the district after the autumnal circuit in each year, and there hold the appeal court. But as there was a danger that the right of appeal might be defeated in consequence of the circuit-courts not being terminated in time to enable the sheriffs to hold the court, it is enacted, by 4 and 5 Will. IV. c. 88, that the sheriffs shall hold their courts without relation to the holding or duration of the Court of Justiciary. It is further enacted, by 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 78, § 12, that the sheriffs composing the court of appeal may assemble at the different circuit-towns on such day as they shall fix between September 15th and 25th, whether the circuit-courts have been held prior to these dates or not. Where the court consists of four sheriffs, the sheriff against whose judgment an appeal is brought has no voice in its determination. In the event of the incapacity or absence of any of the sheriffs, any judge or judges appointed to the autumnal circuits in the district in which the vacancy occurs may, and are required, on the motion of any appellant or respondent in an appeal in the district, to nominate some other sheriff, or advocate of three years' standing, to attend and officiate in room of the sheriff incapacitated or absent; 4 and 5 Will. IV. c. 88, § 1. Where a sheriff is necessarily absent from any place where any duty other than that of acting as a judge of appeal is required of him, he may appoint a special substitute to act for him at such place; failing which appointment, his ordinary substitute at the place is entitled and required to act in his room. And if the office of sheriff at any time be vacant by death or resignation, when any of the duties in connection with elections (other than those imposed upon him as a judge of appeal) are required to be performed, the ordinary substitute at the head burgh of the shire appointed by the former sheriff is entitled and required to act until a successor be appointed and be in a capacity to act; 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 78, § 11. The judgment of this court of appeal is final, but has no effect on any election that may have taken place before it has been pronounced, unless in so far as a committee of the House of Commons shall give effect to it; Reform Act, §§ 23, 25. The list, as settled by these judgments, composes the register; and only those who are upon the register can vote at an election. No oath or affirmation is necessary, except that the sheriff will, if required on behalf of a candidate, put the oath against bribery to any voter. See Bribery Oath. Any one whose claim has been rejected may tender his vote, which shall be entered, being distinguished from the registered votes, so that an election committee may give effect to it in a disputed election; but no scrutiny is allowed respecting votes before the returning officer; § 26.

Polling.—Sheriffs and town-clerks are directed to appoint polling-places, such that not more than 600 may poll at each. Voters must poll in the district where the property which gives the qualification lies. The act 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 78, § 9, provides, that any freeholder whose rights are preserved by section 6 of the Reform Act shall be entitled to make application to the sheriff of the county, and, upon one month's notice thereof being published on the doors of the sheriff-court, to poll at all times thereafter at the polling-place for the district within which the county-town is situate. The sheriff then deletes his name from the district list, and inserts it in that for the district in which the county-town is situate. Where a fard and liferenter are registered in respect of the same freehold qualification, they must both concur in the application. After such application being made, and notice published, a freeholder cannot poll in any other than the county-town district. At any contested election, the sheriff must, if required by any of the candidates, direct two or more booths, &c. for polling, to be provided at each polling-place. All polls must be taken, both at burgh and county elections, under the superintendence of the sheriff, or of a substitute or substitutes named by him; whom the sheriff is empowered to name at his own discretion, without observing the forms necessary in the appointment of ordinary substitutes receiving salaries. Each superintending substitute has the assistance of a clerk or clerks, appointed by the sheriff, with the concurrence of the candidates, if they can agree, and by the sheriff-clerk of the county in case of their not agreeing. Each poll-clerk must have with him at the polling-place an authenticated copy of the register for that district of the shire, or of the burgh or burghs attached to each such polling-place, entitled to share in the election, alphabetically arranged; and according to this copy the votes must be taken; § 27 of Reform Act. By 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 78, the sheriff may, if required by or on behalf of any candidate, or if it appear expedient, increase or alter the number, situation, or arrangement of the existing polling-places and districts, so that not more than 300 electors shall be allotted to poll in each booth or compartment, for any of the cities, burghs, or towns within his shire. And in case of such alterations, the town-clerk must forthwith make up a list of the polling-places, and cause copies to be affixed to the doors of all the parish or town churches within the town; § 3. On the requisition of any candidate, or of any elector the proposer or seconder of a candidate, the booths or compartments at each polling-place must be divided and arranged by the sheriff or his substitute, duly authorised by him, so that not more than 100 electors shall poll in each booth or compartment. The person making the requisition must pay all expenses incident to such division or arrangement. Writs are directed to the sheriff, who must, within three days, fix a day for the election, which must, in county elections, be not less than ten nor more than sixteen days after the writ has been received. The sheriff must give due intimation of the day for the election, by notices affixed on the doors of all the parish churches in the county, or burgh or burghs, according as the election is for one or other, and also, where he thinks it expedient, by advertisement in the newspaper or newspapers of greatest circulation in the county or district; 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 65, § 28. On the day named, the writ is, in county elections, proclaimed at the market-cross of the county-town; and if there be only one candidate, the sheriff, on a show of hands, proclaims the candidate duly elected. If there be more than one, and a poll is demanded, the sheriff orders it to proceed within two days, exclusive of Sundays and Saturdays; § 29. The proceedings are nearly the same in the burgh elections under the principal Reform Act; but the act 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 78, introduces the following modifications in the case of burghs:—Every sheriff to whom a writ for a burgh election is directed must indorse on the back of the writ the day on which he received it, and (except in the cases undermentioned) within two days must announce a day for the election, which must be not less than four, nor more than ten days after the writ was received. But in the districts comprehending Kirkwall, Wick, Dornoch, Dingwall, Tain, Cromarty, Ayr, Irvine, Campbelton, Inverary, and Oban, the provisions of 2 and 3 Will. IV. still apply, in so far as they relate to the announcement of the day of election, and the interval to elapse between the receipt of the writ and its proclamation; that is to say, in these districts of burghs the rules are the same as those mentioned above as applying to counties. The time between the proclamation and polling in Orkney is extended to from ten to fourteen days, on account of the difficulty of communication; 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 55, § 31. The statute 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 78, § 5, enacts, that no poll at any burgh election shall be kept open for more than one day, between eight in the morning and four in the afternoon. Formerly, in the case of counties the polling continued for two days; but by the act 16 Vict. c. 28, 1853, it was limited as in the case of burghs to one day, from eight in the morning to four in the afternoon, except in the case of Orkney and Shetland. It is enacted by the Reform Act, that each sheriff in each polling-place take care that the attending clerk have a certified copy of the alphabetical register, and receive and record, and progressively number, the votes for each candidate, in a poll-book. The sheriff and clerk must subscribe their names to each page, before an entry is made in the succeeding one. The poll-book or books must be publicly sealed up by the sheriff and clerk, and taken charge of by the sheriff; and (in the case of a county election) on the commencement of the poll of the second day, he must publicly break the seals, and proceed as formerly. Immediately on the final close of the poll, the officiating sheriff must seal up and transmit the poll-books to the returning sheriff; § 32. The returning sheriff must, on the day next but one after the close of the poll (unless such day shall be Sunday, and then on the Monday following), openly break the seals, and cast up the votes, and openly declare the state and result of the poll; and make proclamation of the member or members chosen not later than two o'clock p.m. He must forthwith make a return, in terms of the writ, under his hand and seal, to the clerk of the Crown in England; and if the votes be equal, he must make a double return; § 33. When the election is for one burgh sending a member or members by itself, or for a district of towns lying wholly within one shire, the poll-books are transmitted to, and the return made by, the sheriff of the shire within which the town or district is situated. Where the election is for a district or set of towns lying in different shires, the poll-books are transmitted in the first instance to the sheriffs of the several shires, and afterwards to the returning sheriff for the district. The latter part of the 5th section of 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 78, leaves it doubtful whether it applies exclusively to burghs, or to counties likewise; but though that the section commences with a provision exclusively applicable to burghs, the general terms of the remainder, and the fact that it is little more than a re-enactment of the 12th section of the Reform Act, seem to lead to the conclusion that its provisions apply to counties as well as to burghs—viz., that at any time after a poll has been demanded, the poll may in any one place may be closed if all the candidates or their agents, and the sheriff or his substitutes, so agree; and after the poll has been closed at all the polling-places, the sheriff or his substitute may forthwith, upon receipt of the whole poll-books, and after having summed them up, make proclamation of the member chosen, at any hour not later than two o'clock p.m., without waiting for the day appointed for the declaration. Where the proceedings at any election are interrupted or obstructed by riot or open violence, the sheriff or his substitute, where it occurs, may adjourn the nomination, or the taking of the poll, at the particular place or places, from time to time, until the obstruction ceases, always giving notice of such adjournment to the sheriff or his substitute who is to make the return. The state of the poll cannot be legally declared, nor the result of the election proclaimed, until the poll so interrupted be resumed, and the books transmitted to the returning sheriff or substitute. Where a poll takes place for a district of burghs situated in different counties, the poll-books, at the legal close of the poll, must be forthwith sealed up and delivered, or transmitted by the sheriffs in charge of the polls to the returning sheriff. In case any of the poll-books of any county or burgh be not received by the returning sheriff in time to cast up the votes, he may declare the election within the period prescribed by this act (5 and 6 Will. IV.), the declaration of the election must be postponed till they be received. On the day after the receipt of the poll-books (but on Monday, they be received on Saturday), and before two o'clock p.m., the sheriff must declare the result of the election, and make proclamation accordingly.

No one not on the roll of freeholders when the Reform Act passed can vote for the county in respect of a subject within burgh, or for a burgh in respect of a subject beyond its bounds; Reform Act, § 35. Provision is made for the penalties on officers acting in the execution of the statute, for breach of duty, for the registration fee, for the expenses of clerks, booths, &c., the remuneration of sheriffs for registration, &c.; §§ 38 to 44. The functions of meetings of freeholders are transferred to the commissioners of supply; § 45. See on this subject, a useful "Analysis of the Reform Act," with the decisions of the Courts of Appeal, by Mr Cay, sheriff of Linlithgow; also Swinton's Digest of Registration Appeal Cases at Glasgow. The election of peers, and also the old law of election of members of the House of Commons, are treated of in the article Election Law.

Reformation. The change in the religious establishment of the country from Popery to the Protestant Church took place in Scotland in 1560; and, by the act 1567, c. 2, the papal jurisdiction was abolished, and the Reformed Church legally established. Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 5.

Regalia; are the rights enjoyed by the Sovereign. They are divided into majora and minora. Under the former are included the several branches of the royal prerogative which are absolutely incommunicable to a subject; the latter are those which the Queen may convey to any person at pleasure, as rights arising from forfeitures, bastardy, or feudal casualties. There are also certain regalia connected with the right of land, as forests, salmon-fishings, gold and silver mines, navigable rivers, &c. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 13, and tit. 1, § 6; Stair, B. ii. tit. 1, § 5; tit. 3, § 60; More's Notes, p. cci; Bank. i. 546, 566, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 748; Brown's Synop. h. t., and p. 1624; S. & D. xv. 490. See Dereliction. King. Crown Lands.

Regalia. The crown, sceptre with the cross, sceptre with the dove, St Edward's staff, four several swords, the globe, the orb with the cross, and other articles used at the coronation of the kings of Great Britain, are called the regalia; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. The regalia of Scotland, consisting of the crown used by the Scottish kings, the sceptre, the sword of state, and a mace, supposed to have been the treasurer's mace, are deposited within the Crown Room in the Castle of Edinburgh, where they have remained ever since the union of the kingdoms of England and Scotland. They are under the charge of certain of the Officers of State appointed by the Sovereign as commissioners for keeping the Regalia. Kames' Stat. Law, h. t.

Regality; was originally a territorial jurisdiction conferred by the King. The lands were said to be given in liberam regalitatem; and the persons receiving the right were termed Lords of Regality. The civil jurisdiction of a lord of regality was equal to that of the sheriff; but his criminal jurisdiction was much more extensive, as he was competent to judge in the four pleas of the Crown, and possessed the same criminal jurisdiction with the Justiciary, excepting in the case of treason. An offender amenable to a court of regality might have been repledged from the sheriff, or even from the Court of Justiciary. Their jurisdictions were abolished by the 20 Geo. II. c. 50. *Ersk. Regiam Majestatem; the title given to a collection of ancient laws, bearing to have been compiled by the order of David I. King of Scotland. There has been a controversy about the authenticity of this work. By some it is held to be a mere compilation from the Regiam Potestatem, or a collection of the old laws of England, by Glanville—Craig and Stair denying that it is of Scottish origin, while Erskine differs from them; and Ross, again, maintains its authenticity. Sir Walter Scott characterises it as a treatise “compiled with the artful design of palming upon the Scotch Parliament, under the pretence of reviving their ancient jurisprudence, a system as nearly as possible resembling that of England.” And the prevailing opinion among legal antiquaries seems now to be, that as a Scottish compilation it is spurious; and that the artifice was devised by Edward I. in furtherance of his design to assimilate the laws of the two countries, and so to facilitate his conquest of Scotland. See, in connection with this subject, *Ersk. Registration. This applies properly to the registration of deeds, which may be either in virtue of a clause of registration, or under the act 1698, c. 4, as a probative writ. The clause of registration owes its origin to the churchmen, who, in order to bring causes arising from contract under the cognisance of the church courts, inserted a clause by which the party was made to consent that his whole effects should be placed under the jurisdiction of the church courts, to the effect of forcing implement of the obligations undertaken in the deed. Those clauses were so conceived, that the effects of the grantor were declared to belong to the creditor, the terms of payment of the obligation being first arrived; and as those deeds were executed before a judge, they contained from the first a decree which authorised diligence de anno in annum on the very term-day, should the debtor fail to implement his obligation. It is this form on which the clause of registration is modelled; it appoints a procurator, whose name is left blank, to appear in presence of the judge, and consent to decree proceeding in terms of the obligation. Formerly, on the death of the creditor an action of registration, as it was called, was carried on at the instance of the heir; but by the act 1693, c. 15, and 1696, c. 39, summary registration was allowed on the death either of the grantor or receiver of the deed; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 63. See Records. Decree. Diligence. Horning. Decree of Registration.

Registry Acts; that body of enactments dictated by the naval policy of Great Britain, as to the enregistering of all ships which are to have the privileges of British vessels. See Ship. The requisites of a legal register are various, consisting, generally speaking, of proofs of the build and ownership of the vessel; of a survey of the ship by the officers of the customs; of the registry, certificate, and bond for the faithful keeping thereof.

The ownership, measurement, and registry of ships is now regulated by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104; and the numerous acts on the subject are repealed by the Merchant Shipping Repeal Act 1854, 17 and 18 Vict. c. 120. Regius Professorship; in a university, is a professorship founded by the Crown.

Regress; re-entry. Letters of regrest were granted by the superior of a wadset to the wadsetter. By the wadset, the wadsetter was completely divested, and, when he redeemed the subject, he claimed an entry from the superior as a stranger—the superior being no more bound to receive the wadsetter than he could have been to receive any third party. To remedy this, letters of regrest were granted by the superior, under which he became bound to re-admit the wadsetter at any time when he should demand an entry. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 8, § 18; Stair, B. ii. tit. 10, § 12; Bank. ii. 134, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 904; Jurid. Styles, iii. 123; Brown's Synop. 1557; Ross's Lect. ii. 334. See Wadset.

Rehabilitation; recapacitation; the restoration of a power or capacity to a person who had been previously denuded. Thus, infamis juris formerly disqualified a person for being mitted as a witness; but a pardon from the King rehabilitated him in so far as concerned his admissibility. See Infamy. So no one who has been outlawed has no persona standi in judicio; but the reponing of him against the sentence of outlawry rehabilitates him in all the rights and privileges of a free subject, including the right to have a fair trial. Hume, ii. 264, 344; Bank. ii. 75. See Fugitation. Evidence.

Re-Insurance. An insurer or underwriter entitled to protect himself against the dangers of his own engagement by what is termed a re-assurance, in which he insures himself against the risk he runs by his own original insurance. In this transaction, in the event of the original insurer's insolvency, the person originally insured has no interest, and he cannot recover from the last insurer any other way than in common with the other creditors of the first insurer. A double insurance differs from re-insurance in this, that it is made not by the insurer but by the insured. Its effect is not to give a double indemnification to the insured, who can claim his actual loss only, but to give him a claim for this loss against all the underwriters on both policies, to the extent of the sums for which each is bound. The underwriters, on the other hand, are entitled to a recourse against each other, whereby the loss is allotted proportionally on the whole underwriters in both policies. A party may re-insure his policy by expressing it to be a re-insurance, provided the former insurers are solvent or dead, but otherwise such re-insurance is prohibited by statute; 19 Geo. c. 37; Bell's Illust. § 503, Nos. 8 and 9.

Rei Interventus; is the occurrence of some circumstance on the faith of a bargain, such as the performance of an act in implementation of the bargain, or the non-performance of an act which, but for the bargain, one or other of the parties would have performed, whereby matters do not remain entire—i. e., as they were before the bargain was made—in consequence of which the law holds that either party is entitled to rescind. To give rei interventus these effects, it must be known to the party against whom it is pleaded, and must have been permitted by him as flowing from the contract. Rei interventus may exist though restitutio in integrum be practicable. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 21; B. iii. tit. ii. § 3, and Notes by Mr Ivory; Bell's Com. i. 328-9; Ill's Princ. § 26; Illust. ib.; Bell on Leases, 285; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 283-4, 37-40-41; Tait on Evidence. See Homolotion. Lease.

Reif; or robbery, is one of the four pleas of the Crown. Robbery, according to Skene, when a man lies by the King's highway, passing to market towns, in woods, ditches, or any other secret place where people pass, and robs and spuilzies them; and "albeit he take away but the valour of a penny or less, it is felony; for the malapertness of the deed, breaking of the King's peace, and the danger in the quhilk a man is of his life, causes the offence to be greater than gif the geeir so robbed or spuilzied had been theftuously stolen." Skene, h. t. See Robbery.

Rejection in Transitu. A buyer of goods who finds himself unable to pay the price, but is not yet a bankrupt, has the power, and ought to reject, goods offered to him by a carrier or other person to whom they have been delivered for transmission; and such rejection will have the effect of restoring the goods to the seller, provided he agree to rescind the contract. The buyer, in contemplation of bankruptcy, cannot reject the goods after they have ceased to be in transitu, and are identified with his stock. Re-delivery, in such circumstances, would be a fraudulent preference of the seller over the purchaser's other creditors. What shall amount to delivery, to the effect of completing the transit, depends a good deal upon circumstances. It is not delivery if the goods are still on the carts at the buyer's cellar-door. It has even been decided that the buyer may take the goods into his warehouse custodiæ causa, and yet validly reject them, by writing to the seller that they have been taken in for his behoof. If the goods be taken only by a clerk, without special authority, they may still be rejected by his principal. It has been decided in England that an actual bankrupt has no power of rejecting goods even in transitu; but in Scotland it has been repeatedly said from the bench, that a bankrupt may reject goods in transitu, and that it would be fraud in the bankrupt and his creditors to take delivery of such goods. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 8, Ivory's Note; Bell's Com. i. 232; Bell's Princ. § 1310; Illust. ib. Relaxation; were letters passing the Signet, whereby a debtor was relaxed from the horn, that is, from personal diligence. They proceeded either upon errors in the diligence or on the consent of the debtor. But the necessity of letters of relaxation is superseded, as to civil debts, by the act 20 Geo. II. c. 50. In criminal prosecutions, one who has been outlawed may apply to the Court of Justiciary for letters of relaxation, reponing him against the sentence. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, § 65;

Release; the gift or discharge of a right or action which any one has, or claims, against another or his land. See Tomlin's Dict. h. t. The term is also applied to liberation from prison. See Liberation. Bail.

Relevancy; fitness and pertinency. The relevancy of the libel is the justice and sufficiency of the matters therein stated to warrant a decree in the terms asked. The relevancy of the defence is the justice of the allegation therein made to elide the conclusion of the libel, and to warrant a decree of absolvitor. In criminal trials, an interlocutor finding the libel against the accused to be relevant is invariably pronounced before the facts charged are admitted to proof before the jury. In civil cases the rule is different, it being frequently necessary in such cases to have the facts in question ascertained before answer, as it is technically expressed—that is, before determining as to the relevancy of the respective averments of the parties. Stair, B. iv. tit. 39, § 4; Bank. See Criminal Prosecution. Jury Court. Defences. Record.

Relievium; according to Skene, is a French word from the Latin relevare, to relieve or take up that which is fallen. For it is given by the tenant or vassal, being of perfect age, after the expiring of his ward, to his overlord, of whom he holds his lands by knight service—that is, by ward and relief; and by payment thereof he relieves, and as it were raises up again, his lands after they were fallen down in his superior's hands by reason of ward. Skene, h. t. See Relief.

Relict; a widow. A widow has a claim against the representatives of her husband for aliment corresponding to her husband's rank and fortune from the first day of her viduity to the first term at which her legal or conventional provisions are payable. She may also claim from her husband's representatives the expense of suitable mournings, and the expense attending the birth and baptism of a posthumous child. But these claims for aliment, mournings, &c., are postponed to the claims of the husband's creditors. Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 41, and B. ii. tit. 9, § 45; Stair, B. iii. tit. 11, § 24; tit. 8, §§ 43 and 47; More's Notes, cxv., cxxv.; Bank. ii. 379; Bell's Com. i. 632. Relief; has in the law of Scotland various acceptations; as, 1. The Casualty of Relief; 2.

Relief of Cautioners; and, 3. Relief between Heir and Executor.

1. The casualty of relief is a sum exigible from an heir on his entry with the superior. It has been doubted whether this casualty be exigible from an heir in a feu-holding. But Erskine shows it to be a casualty common to every feudal tenure. The term "relief" is applied to this exaction, because the feu is thereby relieved or recovered from the superior by the entry of the heir. And it is the established practice to hold the heir, both in feu and blench holdings, liable in relief-duty equal to one year's feu or blench duty over and above the ordinary annual duty. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, § 47, et seq.; Stair, B. ii. tit. 4, § 26, et seq.; More's Notes, p. ccviii.; Bank. i. 628, et seq.; Bell's Princ. §§ 715-16. See Relievium. Composition.

Where an entail has been recognised by a superior, and a composition paid by the vassal, each substitute is liable in relief only, and not in composition, on his succeeding to the estate. See the case of Stirling v. Ewart, Feb. 18, 1842, 4 D. 684; House of Lords, 4th Sept. 1844, 4 Bell, 128; 2 Ross's L. C. 340. See also the case of Advocate-General v. Swinton, in Exchequer, Jan. 30, 1854, 17 D. 21. When the party requiring a recognisance of the entail is the heir aliiquei successoris under the existing investiture, he is liable only in relief; but the superior is entitled to insert in the charter granted by him a reservation of his right to exact composition as a substitute requiring an entry under the entail who is not the heir aliiquei successoris under the former investiture. See the case of Mackenzie v. Mackenzie, 4th July 1777. Mor. 15503; also App. voce Superior and Vassal, No. 2; also, 2 Hailes, 760, and 2 Ross's L. C. 398. See also the recent case of the Marquess of Hastings v. Oswald, 27th May 1859, 21 D. 871.

2. Relief of Cautioners and of Obligants generally.—The cases in which a cautioner is entitled to sue his principal for relief are stated in the article Cautionary, p. 143. The cautioner may be infeft in relief of his obligation, but he is not entitled to enter into possession till he either pay the debt or be distressed for payment. An infeftment in relief, or any other security, granted to the cautioner, accretes to the creditor, so that he may demand the benefit of it for the payment of his debt. A cautioner's claim of relief has been held a good warrant for arrestment. It may be stated as a general rule, that any one who warrantably takes upon himself the fulfilment of another's obligation is entitled to relief from the party for whom he interposes. Thus, if one of two co-obligants, bound only pro rata, pay the whole debt, he is entitled to be relieved to the extent of the other's share. And where both are bound in solidum as regards the creditor, they are entitled to proportional relief inter se. The obligation to relieve holds in those cases likewise where a party is rendered liable to pay expenses or damages through the negligence, fault, or delict of a third party. For it frequently happens that, although the injured party may be entitled to come against the principal in the first instance, yet the principal is not bound to suffer for another's fault. Stair, B. i. tit. 8, § 9; tit. 15, § 8; tit. 17, § 13; More's Notes, p. cxiii.; Mr Brodie's Supp. 944; *Ersk. See Cautionary Beneficium Divisionis. Beneficium Ordinis. Discussion. Bond of Relief. Infeftment of Relief.

3. Relief between Heir and Executor.—This claim of relief arises where either the heir pays a debt legally payable by the executor, or where the executor pays a debt in which the heir is the proper debtor. Thus, if the heir pay a personal debt, he has relief against the executor; and should the executor have paid an heritable debt, he has relief against the heir. This reciprocal relief is not affected although the last will or other settlement of the deceased should contain a clause burdening the heir or executor with certain debts; unless such appear clearly to have been the intention of the testator, and that he has taken the legal means of expressing his intention. Otherwise, such a clause is understood to have been introduced merely in favour of the creditor, but as in no shape intended to affect the mutual rights of heir and executor. *Ersk. Religion. Courts of justice cannot take notice of religious opinions, in order to decide whether they are right or wrong; but they may take cognizance of them as facts, with a view to determine the ownership of property; Craigdallie, Dec. 21, 1812, and Feb. 5, 1813, 1 Dow, 1. All persons are now admissible as witnesses, whatever their religious principles may be, provided they believe in a God and a future state of retribution. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 23. See *Blasphemy. Relocation, Tacit; is the tacit or implied renewal of a lease, inferred where the landlord, instead of warning the tenant to remove at the stipulated expiration of the lease, has allowed him to continue without making any new agreement. This is termed tacit relocation. This renewal is held to be for one year; and either party may put an end to the tacit relocation by taking the requisite steps forty days before Whitsunday of any year in which the parties, or either of them, desire to bring the contract to a termination. *Ersk. Remainder. In English law, an estate in remainder is an estate limited to take effect and be enjoyed after another estate is determined. Thus, if lands be granted to A. for twenty years, and after that term to B. and his heirs for ever, A. is tenant for years, remainder to B. in fee; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. The distinction is somewhat analogous to that which exists between fee and liferent in the law of Scotland. See Fee and Liferent.

Remembrancers; officers of the Exchequer, whose duty it is to remind the Lord Treasurer and Court of Exchequer of such things as are to be called on, and dealt in, for the Queen's benefit. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Remissio Injuriae. In an action of divorce for adultery, the plea of remissio injuriae—i. e., that the pursuer has already forgiven the injury—affords, when established, a good defence. Forgiveness may be declared expressly, or by fact and deed—e. g., by the injured party cohabiting with the defender after his or her guilt was known. In order to support this defence, it is necessary to aver and to instruct that the specific guilt libelled was known to the pursuer, and that it was pardoned. Mere suspicion will not be sufficient; there must be a complete and perfect belief derived from what is considered satisfactory evidence of the guilt. If the remissio occurred during the course of the process, the oath de calumnia is complete evidence of the belief of the guilt libelled, whether it actually existed or not. The raising of the process, or the giving of instructions to counsel to prepare the summons, is also complete evidence. Personal detection or confession, or the conducting of a precognition, in consequence of which the spouses separate, affords direct evidence of the belief. Facts inferential of belief may be established prout de jure. A written pardon by either husband or wife is sufficient. The requisite circumstances implying pardon must be stronger on the part of the woman than of the man. Being solus cum sola, or open cohabitation as man or wife, after belief in the guilt, infers forgiveness, unless the pursuer can show that the belief was destroyed by false or fraudulent representations on the part of the defender. The plea of remissio is not incompatible with that of innocence. It is also competent to creditors to urge this plea. Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 44; Bell's Princ. § 1533; Illust. § 1531; Lothian's Consistorial Prac. 157; Shand's Prac. See Divorce. Condonation.

Remission. A crime may be extinguished by a pardon or remission from the Sovereign, or it may be extinguished by an act of indemnity given by Parliament. These remissions do not prevent a private party from pursuing for damages. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 105; Stair. B. i. tit. 9, § 7; Bank. i. 247; ii. 275. Kames' Stat. Law, h. t. See Pardon.

Remit. In judicial procedure, the term remit is applied to an interlocutor or judgment transferring a cause, either totally or partially, or for some specific purpose, from one tribunal or judge to another, or to a judicial nominee, to execute the purposes of the remit. Such remits are made under various circumstances: e. g., on the ground of contingency, a cause may be remitted by one Division of the Court of Session to the other, or by one Lord Ordinary to another, before whom the contingent process is in dependence. See Contingency. So certain proceedings which originate in the Inner-House, such as petitions and complaints, petitions for exoneration, and the like, are remitted for preparation, or in order to ascertain the facts, generally speaking, to the Junior Lord Ordinary in the Outer-House. In the Bill-Chamber, where a note of advocacy or of suspension, complaining of a judgment of an inferior court, whether interlocutory or on the merits, has been competently presented, the Lord Ordinary, on hearing parties, or on considering an answer to the bill, may remit, with instructions to the inferior judge. See 1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. 38, 1821. See also Beveridge on Bill-Chamber, p. 70, et seq.; and the articles Advocation. Suspension.

In addition to these remits, there are, in practice, various incidental remits made in the course of a process; such are remits to accountants to prepare states of accounts, in actions of count and reckoning, and other processes involving accountings between the parties; remits to persons of science, or of skill, to report on disputed matters of science, or as to the usage in particular trades and professions, the execution of work, and so forth; remits in rankings and sales, in multiplepointings, in teind processes, and the like, to the common agent, or to the clerk of Court, and in some cases to accountants, to prepare states of ranking and schemes of division, or of locality; remits to the auditor of Court to tax accounts of expenses; remits to a commissioner to take a proof, or to examine havers; and, finally, remits to a judicial referee, mutually chosen by the parties, to determine the whole matters in dispute, and to report his opinion to the Court, in order that decree may be pronounced in terms of his award. In the inferior courts, as well as in the Court of Session, remits, particularly to accountants, and to persons of science or skill, are frequent; and with respect to all such remits, whether in the supreme or in inferior courts, it seems desirable that the record should be closed before the remit is made. At the same time, this rule is not inflexible, nor in all cases expedient; and hence, particularly in accountings, and similar complicated investigations, it is often of mutual advantage to the parties that the remit should be made before the record is closed. Where that course is followed, the remit is made "before answer," as it is expressed—that is, before pronouncing any judgment on the legal questions at issue; seeing that, before the record is closed, it is not competent to pronounce any judgment on the merits. Remits to scientific or skilled persons are frequently made on the joint nomination or suggestion of the parties; and in such cases, or where the parties make no objection to the judge's nominee, or where such objections are overruled, the report obtained on the disputed point will be held almost tantamount to the award of a judicial referee, and will not be opened up unless the objector can instruct specific errors or irregularities. Finlay, 3d Dec. 1828, 7 S. & D. 130; Rowat, 17th Nov. 1826, 5 S. & D. 19; Dixon, 16th Nov. 1821, 1 S. & D. 145. affirmed 29th June 1825, 1 W. & S. 636; Meason, 22d Dec. 1827, 6 S. & D. 326; Halkett, 9th Feb. 1831, 9 S. & D. 412; Muir, 26th Nov. 1833, 12 S. & D. 129; Macintosh, 1st March 1834, 12 S. & D. 518; *Grant, 11th June 1834, 12 S. & D. 717. Removing of Tenants. After the expiration of the stipulated endurance of a lease, the tenant is notwithstanding entitled to continue his possession on tacit relocation from year to year, until legally removed by the landlord. In order to authorize judicial removing, the tenant, where the lease does not provide otherwise, must be warned by the landlord to remove. The warning or notice to quit must be given forty days before the term of Whitsunday at which the removal is take place; or, if the term of removal be any other than Whitsunday, then forty days preceding the term of Whitsunday of that year in which the term of removal occurs. The form of the warning, and the manner of ejecting the tenant, are regulated by the statute 1555, c. 39, and by the Act of Sederunt 14th December 1756. Warning and removal under the statute is effected by a succession of cumbersome forms, commencing with a precept of warning, executed forty days before Whitsunday, against the tenant personally, or at his dwelling-place, and on the grounds of the land, and published at the parish church; which is followed by an action and decree of removing. But this form of removal is in practice almost entirely superseded by the forms prescribed by the Act of Sederunt 14th December 1756, which, where the lease contains no obligation on the tenant to remove, authorises citation to be given in an action of removing, raised before the judge-ordinary; which is a sufficient warning for a decree of removing and ejection, provided such action be called in the inferior court forty days preceding the term of Whitsunday of the year in which the removal is to take place. Where, on the other hand, the lease contains an obligation on the tenant to remove, the Act of Sederunt holds a charge on letters of horning on the registered lease, given in like manner forty days preceding Whitsunday, to be sufficient to authorise ejection within six days after the term of removal in the tack. These forms of removing are proper, according to the statute, against tenants of "lands, mills, fishings, and possessions whatsoever." But, under these expressions, urban tenements, houses in the country to which no land is attached, coal-works, mines, &c., and grass parks let from year to year, are not included—as to all of which the agreement of parties, or common law, qualified to a certain extent by consuetude, as to reasonable notice, affords the rule. *Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 45, et seq.; Bell on Leases, ii. 51 and 118, in notes. See, generally, on Removing, Ersk. By the act 16 and 17 Vict. c. 80, 1853, it is competent to raise a summons of removing at any time, provided there be an interval of forty days between the date of the execution of the summons and the term of removal. Other alterations of this law of removing are also regulated by this statute. See Lease.

Remuneration. See Recompense.

Rencounter; Rencontre; a meeting. The term is applied, however, chiefly to a hostile meeting between two individuals. Erskine distinguishes a rencounter from a duel; holding the former to be a meeting without a previous challenge, which is not accounted a capital offence unless death ensues; whereas, prior to the statute 59 Geo. III. c. 70, the offence of fighting a duel on a previous challenge, although death did not follow, was accounted a capital crime. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 49. See Duelling. Challenge.

Rent; the consideration given to the landlord by a tenant for the use of the lands or subjects which he possesses under lease. See Hypothec. Lease. Where rents are assigned, if by a simple assignation, due intimation, or a decree of maills and duties following thereon, renders the right effectual against singular successors; and if by disposition or heritable bond, the sasine completes the creditor's right to the rents as an accessory to the real right to the lands. A decree of adjudication, even without a sasine on a charter of adjudication, as being a judicial disposition, carries right to the rents falling due after its date; and, like a judicial conveyance, it requires no intimation. But no right to rents alone, however complete, can compete with the right to the rents as an accessory to a real right in the lands. *Bell's Com. i. 71; ii. 8, et seq.; More's Notes to Stair, pp. cxxxix., cclxvi., cclxxiv.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, §§ 40–1–3; tit. 9, § 64, et seq.; B. iii. tit. 2, § 23; tit. 5, § 5; tit. 6, § 9; tit. 7, §§ 12 and 20; Bank. i. 386; ii. 101, 198, 324; Bell's Princ. §§ 634, 1047, 1197 et seq., 1228 et seq., 1479–84–99 et seq.; Illust. §§ 1197, 1499; Bell on Leases, i. 20, 35, 87, 125, 219, 232, 253, 263, 403; ii. 45, 51, 276; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Bell on Purchaser's Title, 64, 70; Jurid. Rental; Bolls; were a stated quantity of corn paid yearly by the heritors to the titular of tithes, who accepted of them in place of drawing the teinds. The quantity was regulated either by a written rent-roll, or by mere use of payment. When this mode of payment was once established, it could be interrupted on the part of the titular only by inhibition of tithes, and on the part of the heritor only on his offering the tithes in kind. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 25; Bank. ii. 57; Bell's Princ. § 1157. See Teinds. Inhibition.

Rental Right. See Kindly Tenant.

Renunciation. See Discharge. Implied Discharge.

Renunciation; the act of renouncing a right. It may be considered under the following heads:—1. Renunciation by an Heir. 2. Renunciation of Redeemable Rights. 3. Renunciation of a Lease.

1. Renunciation by an Heir.—Where an heir is charged to enter, he must either renounce, or he will be rendered personally liable for the debt. If it be a debt of the ancestor, decree cognitionis causa, as it is termed, is pronounced, for the purpose of enabling the creditor to attach the estate. Where the debt is due by the heir himself, the estate to which he has succeeded may be attached by the heir's creditors, whether the heir renounce his ancestor's succession or not. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, §§ 13, 14; Stair, B. iii. tit. 2, § 45; tit. 5, § 24; B. iv. tit. 51, § 10; Bank. ii. 232, 357; Bell's Com. i. 710–13. See Heir. Apparent Heir. Adjudication contra hæreditatem jacentem.

2. Renunciation of Redeemable Rights.—Redeemable rights may confer either a right of property or a right in security. Where the deed conveys a right of property, as in wadsets, a renunciation of the right is not sufficient unless the right has remained personal, on which no sasine has followed; for in that case a renunciation will sufficiently extinguish the right. Where, again, the deed conveys a right in security only, as in the case of an heritable bond, a simple discharge and renunciation is sufficient to extinguish the creditor's sasine. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 8, §§ 17, 18, and 34, et seq.; Stair, B. ii. tit. 10, § 13; Bank. ii. 132; Jurid. Styles, i. 595–8, 601–6; Ross's Lect. ii. 259, 378, 389.

3. Renunciation of a Lease.—This renunciation may either be verbal or by a written deed. In the former case it may be resiled from; in the latter it cannot. But it requires acceptance by the landlord to give it effect; and therefore it is usual to take a notarial instrument on the acceptance in evidence of the fact. It would seem that the voluntary renunciation of a current written lease must be in writing; and hence, that a mere verbal renunciation of such a lease may be resiled from. But, on the other hand, there are several decisions which go to support the doctrine that a verbal renunciation is binding, and may be proved by oath of party. Yet it would rather appear that these decisions were pronounced in cases where the stipulated term of removal had expired, and the tenant was in possession on tacit relocation. See this subject considered in Bell on Leases, i. 524, et seq.; and consult the following authorities, *Stair, B. ii. tit. 9, § 35; Bank. B. ii. tit. 9, § 37; Ersk. Repairs of a Ship; hypothec for. See Hypothec.

Repairs by a Tenant. The general doctrine of the liability for meliorations and repairs is stated in the article Meliorations. Independently of stipulation, the landlord is bound to make all necessary repairs; and in default of his doing so, the tenant may make them himself, and deduct the amount from his rent. In tenements within a royal burgh where a considerable sum is required for the necessary repairs, which the landlord is unwilling to grant, it is customary for the tenant to apply to the Dean of Guild, whose warrant, proceeding on the estimate of tradesmen, is evidence both of the necessity and amount of the expense of repairing. The tenant must repair injuries occasioned by his own fault or negligence; the landlord must repair injuries occasioned by any extraordinary cause, even where, by the lease, the tenant is allowed a sum for preservation. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 43; Bank. i. 430; Bell on Leases, i. 74; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant. See Dean of Guild.

Reparation; indemnification. The obligation to repair a damage is a necessary consequence of the rule Uterum non laedere; and damage may arise from positive acts of trespass, or from blameable omission or neglect of duty. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 12. See Damage. Delict. Relief.

Repeating a Summons. This expression is applied to the case where it is necessary to support a defence by a counter action, at the instance of the defender against the pursuer. In such cases, instead of raising and executing a summons, and sisting the other action until the counter action comes into court, and then having it remitted ob contingentiam, and conjoined with the former process, the signet counter summons is produced, and an interlocutor pronounced, holding it as repeated. This is called repeating a summons incidenter. But it is not competent to a third party to appear in a depending action as a pursuer, and to get a separate action at his instance repeated. Some formalists also hold that a summons cannot in any case be repeated, except of consent of the opposite party, although this seems to be doubtful; but it is settled that a summons so repeated operates merely as a defence against the original action, and that if it is intended to have any farther effect, the regular forms must be gone through. Shand's Prac. i. 503, and authorities there cited.

Repetition; repayment of money erroneously paid. Thomson on Bills, 402, 529; Jurid. Styles, iii. 72; Shaw's Digest, h. t. See Condictio Indebiti.

Repetundarum Crimen; the crime of receiving a bribe to pervert judgment. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 30. See Baratry.

Replegiare; in old law language, to repledge; that is, "when any man, by virtue of his own jurisdiction, brings back again, or reduces to his own court, his own man, from any other man's court, and leaves a pledge or cautioner behind him for administration of justice." Skene, h. t.

Repledging; a power formerly competent to certain private jurisdictions to demand judicially the person of an offender accused before another tribunal, on the ground that the alleged offence had been committed within the repledger's jurisdiction. Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 8; Stair, B. iv. tit. 37, § 4; Bank. i. 570.

Replevin; in English law, a re-delivery to its owner of a thing distrained, on his finding security that he will abide the trial. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Replication; in English law, an exception or answer made by a plaintiff to a defendant's plea. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Replies. In inferior court processes, the defences or answers to the summons or original petition were formerly followed by replies, in which paper the pursuer met each averment in the defences by an explicit admission or denial, in so far as not already admitted or negated in the summons. Under the Sheriff Court Act, 16 and 17 Vict. c. 80, 1853, the record is made up on revised confederences and defences. McGlashan's Sheriff Court Prac. § 251; Maclaurin's Form of Process, 119, et seq.

Reponing. Under the form of process in the Court of Session prior to the passing of the Judicature Act, 1825, if the reclaiming or representing days, against an interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary, had, from mistake or inadvertence, expired without a petition or representation, it was competent, with the leave of the Lord Ordinary, to submit the interlocutor to review of the Court by petition, on condition of the petitioner paying to the other party the whole expenses previously incurred by him in the process—48 Geo. III. c. 151, § 16; and this enactment seems to be still in force. According to the existing form, a party may be reponed against a decree in absence, or by default in lodging papers, obtempering orders of Court, or the like, by presenting a reclaiming note to the Court, before extract, accompanied by defences, or with the other paper, whatever it may be;

when the Court will remit to the Lord Ordinary to repon him, on payment of such expenses as to his Lordship may seem reasonable, the usual sum being L.2, 2s. But where the Lord Ordinary has pronounced an interlocutor on the merits of the case, which, whether through inadvertency or otherwise, has not been submitted to review within the reclaiming days, he cannot be so reponed—6 Geo. IV. c. 120, §§ 18, 29; A. S. 11th July 1828, §§ 45, 46, 72, 73; although it is understood that he may be reponed under the above-cited statute, 48 Geo. III. c. 151. Similar regulations are in force in inferior courts; except that, where there is no statutory finality, the interlocutor of the inferior court, which has become final, may be submitted to the review of the Court of Session in one or other of the ordinary methods; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825. See Reclaiming. Advocacion. Suspension. Reduction.

Reponing in Assignation. See Assignation.

Report; in judicial procedure is usually applied to the report or return made by a judge or a judicial nominee, to whom a remit has been made. In the Court of Session, where a proof has been allowed on commission, or a diligence granted for examining havers, the interlocutor fixes a day for reporting the proof to the Lord Ordinary or to the Court, as the case may be, the day so fixed being a sederunt-day; and where a prorogation of the time for reporting the proof, or a renewal of the diligence is required, it must be applied for or arranged in the manner explained voce Prorogation. If the proof has been ordered to be reported to the Court, the application for prorogation or renewal must be made to the Division of the Court to which the report was directed to be made. Analogous rules are in observance in the inferior courts; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 108; Darling's Prac. i. 223; Maclaurin's Sheriff-Court Prac. 154, et seq. See Evidence. Commission. In cases of importance or difficulty in the Court of Session, the Lord Ordinary, instead of deciding the cause himself, may report the case, as it is expressed, to the Inner-House; § 64. See Cases. So also, where an incidental point of difficulty arises before a Lord Ordinary, he may report it verbally to the Court, on intimating his intention to the parties by interlocutor, pointing out the incidental matter; and if judgment shall be pronounced by the Court, or an order made in respect of the matter so reported, that judgment or order shall be final; 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 19; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 66. In practice, however, and independently of the above regulations, a Lord Ordinary occasionally reports a point incidentally to the Inner-House for advice, on the emergence of the difficulty; and then, after advising with the Court, pronounces an interlocutor, which however is accounted the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary merely. But in Bill-Chamber cases, where the Lord Ordinary on the Bills takes a case to report to the Inner-House, the interlocutor then pronounced is considered as a judgment of the Inner-House, and signed by the Lord President of the Division accordingly; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 76. Other incidental reports are made by Lords Ordinary to the Inner-House, as in various steps of the procedure in rankings and sales, and other Inner-House processes—see Ranking and Sale; in applications by judicial factors and other officers of Court for exoneration and discharge; in various statutory proceedings, and so forth; as to all which the usual form is for the Lord Ordinary to come to the foot of the clerk's table in the Inner-House and make a verbal report, which is the warrant for a corresponding judgment or interlocutor by the Inner-House. With regard to other reports made on judicial remits, the most important are the reports of accountants, as to which the regulation of the Act of Sederunt is, that "when, in any cause, a report has been obtained from an accountant or other professional person, and the parties, or either of them, shall be dissatisfied with the report, the same shall be enrolled before the Lord Ordinary for debate on the report, and a note of the objections shall be furnished to the opposite party forty-eight hours before the enrolment, and at the time of enrolling the cause a copy of the note of objections shall be furnished to the Lord Ordinary's clerk for his Lordship's use, and upon hearing parties the Lord Ordinary may order cases, or otherwise dispose of the note of objections as he sees cause;" A. S. 11th July 1828, § 67. The weight attached to the report of persons of skill is very great. See the cases on this point cited, voce Remit. And with respect to the fees due to accountants and other reporters, the rule formerly was, not only that the parties, but also their agents, were conjunctly and severally liable personally for the whole fees; Milne, 31st May 1825, 4 S. & D. 45. But this rule, so far as regards the agents, has been altered, and now "the agent is not, without special agreement, to be held personally responsible to an accountant, engineer, or other reporter to whom a remit may hereafter be made by the Court, on matters of fact in a depending process, where the agent has authority to bind the party;" A. S. 19th Dec. 1835. The parties to the suit, however, are conjunctly and severally liable to the accountant or other reporter for his whole fees; and he is not bound to wait the issue of the cause, but as soon as his report is lodged, he may enrol the case, and ask decree for his fees against either, or both parties, leaving the question of relief to be afterwards adjusted between them, and without prejudice, of course, to the right of the Court or of the Lord Ordinary to lay the expense of the report, along with the other expenses of the process, on either of the parties, as they may think just; with which, however, the reporter has no concern. It has been further held that an accountant is entitled to retain the documents which have been put into his hands under the remit, until the fees of his report are paid; Stewart, 23d Feb. 1828, 6 S. & D. 591. In jury trials, reports are not held as evidence of the facts therein set forth, although admissible to prove that, de facto, such reports were made. See on the subject of this article, Shand's Prac.; Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 182, et seq.

Representation. Whatever infers the substitution of one person in the room and place of another, so as to identify the rights and obligations of the person substituted with those of the principal, falls under the general denomination of representation; but the term in the law of Scotland is usually applied to the obligation incurred by an heir to pay the debts and perform the obligations incumbent upon his predecessor. See Passive Titles. In the law of heritable succession, the term representation is applied not only to the above identification of the heir-at-law with his predecessor, but in a peculiar manner to the jure representationis, whereby a grandson by an elder son deceased, as representative of his father, succeeds as heir-at-law to his grandfather in preference to all the grandfather's immediate descendants. Stair, B. iii. tit. 4, § 4, et seq.; tit. 8, § 32; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 50, et seq., and § 12; Bank. ii. 294; Bell's Princ. § 1660; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825), 505; Sandford's Herit. Succes. i. 2. See Jus Representationis.

Representation in insurance. See Insurance. Warranty.

Reprivee. See Remission. Pardon.

Reprisals; letters of marque granted by princes or states to seize upon the goods of all persons under the dominion of any foreign state which refuses satisfaction for injuries done by its subjects to the subjects of the state issuing the reprisals. See Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Letters of Marque. Capture. Privateer. Law. Privateer.

Reprobator. When a witness was offered, to whose admissibility there were objections which could not be immediately verified, it was formerly the practice for the party making the objection to protest for reprobator before the examination of the witness was proceeded with—i.e., to protest that it should be afterwards competent for him, in an action of reprobator, to prove that the witness was liable to the objections of agency, enmity, partial counsel, or the like. This action, latterly, was not admitted where reprobator had not been previously protested for; but when such a protest had been made, the action was competent even after decree in the principal cause, although the decision in the principal cause was usually superseded until the action of reprobator should be disposed of. The concurrence of the Lord Advocate was required in this action, because the libel concluded that the witness was guilty of perjury; hence it was necessary that the alleged inhabitable witness should be made a party to the suit. The ground of reprobator might have been proved by the oath of the party who had adduced the witness objected to, and by the testimony of other witnesses omni exceptione majores. There is no recent example of an action of reprobator. The objections which were formerly the subject of this action were afterwards allowed to be proved by the testimony of witnesses adduced when the objectionable witness was tendered. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 29; Bank. B. iv. tit. 31; Hutch. Just. of Peace, i. 158; Maclaurin's Sheriff Process, 167. See Evidence.

By the present law, however, interest, agency, and partial counsel, are no longer objections to a witness.

Reputation, injuries to. See Defamation. Libel.

Repute. See Habit and Repute.

Reputed Ownership. The false credit raised by a person exercising all the rights of ownership over a subject not his own has led to the adoption of the rule, that the creditors of the apparent or reputed owner may take the subject as if it were his own. In England this rule is enacted by statute; 21 James I. c. 19; 6 Geo. IV. c. 16, § 72. In Scotland it has been supposed to exist at common law. It is necessary to the creditors having this right, that the reputed owner should appear to be uncontrolled in the disposal of the subject. Reputed ownership from possession properly applies only to moveables, and not to heritable estates. The presumption of collusion is much stronger when the reputed owner has been left in possession of the subject than when he has acquired it on what is asserted to be another title than that of ownership. Indeed, by the law of Scotland, where there has been no delivery, it would be unnecessary to allege collusion, since the buyer would be merely a creditor for the delivery. It is only where possession is retained after the ownership is said to be passed by constructive delivery or otherwise, that recourse must be had to the doctrines of reputed ownership. In a case where goods were conveyed merely in security, but the possession of them was retained by the debtor, another creditor doing diligence against them was preferred to him to whom they were conveyed; Boys, 27th July 1708. In like manner, an assignation to a trustee for behoof of creditors, retenta possessione, is no bar to the diligence of creditors; Borthwick, Feb. 17, 1829, 7 S. 420; Fraser, June 26, 1830, 8 S. 982. An assignation in security of a lease intimated to the landlord, and followed by a sublease by the assignee to the cedent, was found ineffectual against creditors; Brock, March 5, 1838, 8 S. & D. 647; affirmed, Sept. 23, 1831, 5 W. & S. See Assignation. A conveyance in relief of a cautionary obligation is ineffectual if possession be retained. In cases of temporary possession, if the thing be of a kind usually let out and held separately from the ownership, such usage may be admitted to counteract the reputed ownership. But the presumption is very strong for ownership in the case of furniture or implements of trade. There are certain contracts possession in virtue of which is held to raise no credit—such as commodate, location, deposit, pledge, factory where the principal's and factor's goods are distinguishable, sale and return, consignment for advances and sale. The liferenter of furniture does not, by possession of it in virtue of his liferent, subject it to the diligence of his creditors on the ground of reputed ownership; Scott v. Price, May 13, 1837, 15 D. 916. See Bell's Com. i. 248; More's Notes on Stair, xlviii.; Brodie's Sup. 850, 896; Brown on Sale, 19 et seq., 537; Bell's Princ. § 1315; Illust. ib. See Possession. Delivery. Sale.

By the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, § 1, 1856, it is declared, that goods sold, but not delivered, shall not be attachable by the creditors of the seller, to the effect of preventing the purchaser, or others in his right, from enforcing delivery of the same; and the right of the purchaser to demand delivery of such goods, from and after the date of the sale, is discovered to be attachable by a transference to the creditors of the purchaser.

Requisition; a demand made by a creditor that a debt be paid or an obligation fulfilled. In certain cases, requisition is necessary to put the debtor in mora, and then the proper way of proving requisition is by a notarial instrument. It is competent, however, to prove requisition by writ or oath of party, but not by witnesses. In the case of a wadset, if the reverser, after requisition, fail to pay the wadset sum, the wadsetter may proceed to adjudge the right of reversion. Forms of the procuratory of requisition and attendance, of the instrument of requisition and of the instrument of attendance, are given in Jurid. Styles, i. 750. And an analogous proceeding takes place where the creditor in an heritable bond or disposition in security demands payment, usually in contemplation of exercising a power of sale. See Power of Sale. Res Alienæ. By the Roman law there might be a valid sale by one person to another of what belonged to a third, and the seller was bound to procure and deliver the subject or pay damages. Brown on Sale, 111. As to legatum alieni, see Legacy.

Res Communes; are things which are in their nature incapable of appropriation, as the light, the air, running water. Ersk. B. ii. tit. i. §§ 5, 6.

Res Furtivæ; things stolen, and thereby tainted with a vitium reale, which attaches to them in all their transmissions until they are restored to their rightful owner, who is entitled to reclaim them at any time within the period of the long prescription, even from a bona fide possessor who may have paid a full price for them. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 14; Brown's Synop. 292. See Lost. Labes Realis.

Res Futuræ. There may be a sale of a thing which may exist at a future time; and if the thing does not come into existence, the contract falls. Brown on Sale, 111. But see Spei Emptio. Sale.

Res inter alios acta, aliis neque nocet, neque prodest; a maxim of very general application in the law of Scotland. In conformity with this maxim, acts and decrees of Court cannot be adduced against persons who were not parties to the suit. Interruptions of prescription by protestation, or even via juris, by process not followed forth to a sentence, are of no avail to any other person than him who uses them. The writ or oath of one obligant in a bill will not infer the liability of another for the debt, although the latter do not allege payment; Hannay's Trustees (McNeill), 31st Jan. 1823, 2 S. 174. See Stair, B. iv. tit. 42, § 13; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 69; tit. 7, § 42; Bank. vol. ii. p. 626. See Res Judicatæ.

Res Judicatæ; are those judgments of the Supreme Courts which have become final, and which are held conclusively to settle the question discussed, so as to prevent the parties or their representatives from afterwards raising an action founded on the same medium concludendi or cause of action. The judgment of an inferior court does not fall under the description of res judicatæ; for, in inferior courts, a copia peritorum is not presumed, and parties ought not to suffer from employing ignorant procurators when perhaps no better are to be had. In like manner, a party who brings a case under review of the Supreme Court will not be barred from pleading a defence, or from urging any other plea, although it may have been omitted in the inferior court. When decree is pronounced in terms of the libel, the whole conclusions of the libel are held to be res judicatæ, even although some of them have never been adduced to or discussed; Glendinning, 27th Dec. 1699, Fount. ii. 76. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, §§ 1 and 7; Stair, B. iv. tit. 40, § 16; App. § 8; Morr's Notes, p. cccxciv.; Bank. ii. 625; Bell's Princ. § 2346; Illust. § 1536; Kames' Stat. Decree in Absence. Comppearance. Decree. Exceptio Rei Judicatæ.

Res Noviter Veniens ad Notitiam. In judicial procedure, this phrase is applied to matters of fact pertinent to the cause of which the party acquires the knowledge pending the process, which he was unavoidably ignorant of before, and which, by due previous investigation or inquiry, could not have come to his knowledge. The rule of the Judicature Act is, that it shall be competent to either party, in the course of a cause, to state matter of fact noviter veniens ad notitiam, or emerging since the commencement of the action, if, on cause shown, leave shall be obtained from the Lord Ordinary or the Court—the party always paying such expenses as the Lord Ordinary or the Court may deem reasonable. If leave be granted, the new matter must be stated in a condescendence, accompanied by a corresponding plea in law, to be answered by the other party, and made part of the record; 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 10. And the relative Act of Sederunt enjoins, that, after closing the record, where a party wishes to state on the record matter of fact noviter veniens ad notitiam, or emerging since the commencement of the action, he shall enrol the case, and furnish the opposite party, at least forty-eight hours before the enrolment, with a condescendence of the new matter. And a new plea in law must be notified in the same manner; A. S. 11th July 1823, § 59. Papers noviter venientes, &c., or noviter repertæ, may also be produced after the record is closed; A. S. § 55: Regulations similar in principle are in force in inferior courts; the rule there being, that, at any time before final judgment, either party may give in a short note, stating, without argument, any matter of fact noviter veniens ad titiam, or emerging since the commencement of the action; and in other respects, the regulation is verbatim the same with that of the Supreme Court; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825. In jury causes, res noviter veniens ad notitiam is a relative ground for an application for a new trial; but the new trial will not be granted if it appear that, by due preparation and proper inquiries, the new matter could have been made available at the trial. An application for a new trial on this ground will be supported by affidavit. See Shand's Prac. i. 485; Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 267; McLaurin's Form of Process, 272; Bell's Com. 279, 288.

Res Nullius; things in which no one can have any property, as sacred things dedicated to the service of God. See Res Sacra.

Res Perit suo Domino; a maxim importing that the owner of a subject must bear the loss, if it perish, unless its destruction can be ascribed to another's fault. In the House of Lords this maxim was explained to mean, at the interest which each has in a subject, it rises to the dominus of that interest, as well as the corporeal thing to its dominus; Bayne v. Walker, 22d March, 12th May, and 3d July 1815, 3 Dow, 233. See Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 1; Bell on Leases, i. 240, note; Hunter's Indulgent and Tenant. See Periculum.

Res Publicae; are things exempted from commerce, and which belong to the public, to the Sovereign as trustee for the community, as navigable rivers, highways, harbours, &c. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, §§ 5, 6; Bell's Princ. § 638; Brown on Sale, 115. See Relia.

Res Sacrae; by the Roman law, were the property of none. By the law of Scotland, things appropriated to the service of God, as churches, church-bells, communion-cups, &c., may be disposed of or sold on proper occasions, and others substituted in their room. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 8; Bank. vol. i. p. 84; Brown on Sale, 3. See Church. Church-yard. Burying-places. Gravestone.

Res sua Nemini Servit; a maxim importing that no one can have a servitude over his own property, since every use to which he applies the subject may be ascribed to his paramount right of property. Accordingly, when the proprietor of the dominant becomes proprietor also of the servient tenement, the servitude is said to be extinguished confusione. Professor Bell objects to this doctrine being adopted without limit, and says, "If, in the exercise of the right or otherwise, the owner has indicated no intention of extinguishing the servitude, it would, on separation of the tenements, revive;" Bell's Princ. 397. See also Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 36; Stair, iv. tit. 15, § 3; Bank. vol. i. p. 684;

Stewart's Answers to Dirleton, voce Servitude, p. 383.

Res Universitatis; are things belonging to a corporate body. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 7. See Community.

Rescissory Action. Rescissory actions are those actions whereby deeds, &c., are declared void. Under this class are included actions of improbation, actions of reduction, and actions of reduction-improbation; all of which are competent only before the Court of Session. Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 19. See Reduction.

Rescue. The rescuer or recapturer of vessels or goods is entitled to salvage. See Salvage.

Rescue. According to Bankton, any one accessory to the escape of a prisoner from the messenger will be liable for the debt; Bank. iii. 5. In England, rescuing a person in custody of a sheriff's officer on his way to jail is punishable as a misdemeanour; so likewise is the rescue of a felon from a constable. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Deforcement.

Reseantia; sickness or infirmity. Skene, h. t.

Reserved Power. Reserved powers are of different sorts; as a reserved power of burdening a property, or a reserved power to revoke or recall a settlement or other deed. See Burdens. Delivery. Deathbed. Faculty.

Reset of Theft; is the offence of receiving and keeping goods, knowing them to be stolen, and with an intention to conceal and withhold them from the owner. It is immaterial how short the offender's possession may have been; or whether it was only for the sake of temporary concealment. Harboursing a thief with stolen goods in his custody does not constitute reset, unless the goods are in some way committed to the entertainer's care. It is of no consequence on what footing the goods are received, and whether immediately from the thief, or from one who received them from the thief. But it is believed that the receiving of goods sold by way of decoy by the thief, at the instigation of the officers of law who apprehended him, will not constitute reset. The punishment of reset varies from a few months' imprisonment to transportation for life. The thief may be adduced as a witness, but his evidence is received with caution. Hume, i. 110; Alison's Princ. 328; Steele, 137; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 33; Tait's Justice, voce Theft; Blair's Justice, voce Theft; Shaw's Digest, 154.

Residuary Legatee; is he to whom a testator bequeaths the residue of his moveable estate, after the legal claims thereon and other legacies have been paid. Where the universitas of the moveable estate is conveyed to one by a settlement or general disposition, the donee is usually called universal legatee.

or legatary, or general donee; and where his universal right is burdened with the payment of debts and legacies to others, he is in effect a residuary legatee, since he is entitled to the whole estate after paying the testator's debts and legacies. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 6; Jurid. Styles, ii. 472-81. See Legacy. Disposition, General.

Residue Duties. See Legacy and Residue Duties.

Resignation; is the form by which a vassal returns the fee into the hands of a superior. It is of two kinds—resignation ad remanentiam, and resignation in favorem. Resignation ad remanentiam is made where it is intended to return the property permanently to the superior; it is then resigned into his hands ad perpetuam remanentiam, and for the purpose of consolidating the property and superiority. Resignation in favorem, again, is the form where the object is to transfer the property to a third party; in which case the resignation is made in favour and for new investiture to be given to the new donee. Resignation is made in virtue of a procuratory of resignation; under which warrant a procurator for the resigner, with a notary-public and two witnesses, appears in presence of the superior or of his commissioners, and, in virtue of the procuratory, makes the resignation. Where it is a resignation in favorem, the procurator also acts for the donee, and receives the symbols by which he is invested; and on this procedure instruments are taken in the hands of the notary-public. Where the resignation is ad remanentiam, a notarial instrument is drawn up and attested by the notary and witnesses; and that being a transmission of property to the superior, it requires to be recorded in the Register of Sasines within sixty days; 1669, c. 3. Where it is a resignation in favorem, the act of resignation is recited in the charter of resignation, which must be granted by the superior to the new vassal, in virtue of the resignation in favorem, on which charter investiture follows, and completes the right of the donee. And as the instrument of sasine following on the charter of resignation is of course recorded in the Register of Sasines within sixty days after the date of the investiture, the requisite publicity is given to the transfer, and the requisite evidence of it preserved, without the necessity of an instrument of resignation, which in practice is not used in the case of resignations in favorem. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 7, § 17, et seq.; Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 21; tit. 11, §§ 1-7; B. iii. tit. 2, § 8; More's Notes, pp. cxcvi., cclxiii., ccxciv.; Bank. ii. 143-4; Bell's Com. i. 683, 674; Bell's Princ. § 786; et seq.; Illust. ib.; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825), 452; Bell on Purchaser's Title, 255, et seq.; Ross's Lect. ii. 79, 215, et seq. See Charter. Procuratory of Resignation. Cognition and Sasine. Disposition.

By the Titles to Land Act 1858, an entry by resignation may be completed by recording in the Register of Sasines a writ of resignation, written on the deed containing the warrant of resignation along with such deed itself. See Titles to Land.

Resolutive Clause. See Clauses Irritant and Resolutive. Irritant Clause. Tailzie.

Resolutive Condition; a condition in a sale, which does not suspend the completion of the contract, but which resolves the sale, if the condition be purified at the time specified. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 11; Bell's Com. i. 239. See Pactum Legis Commissoriae. Suspensive Condition.

Respite of Sentence; is the delay of a capital punishment; as in the case of a pregnant woman who has been condemned, and pleads her pregnancy, the Court, for the sake of the child, are in use to respite the sentence. See Pregnancy.

Responde Book, in Exchequer; is a book kept by the Directors of Chancery, in which are entered all non-entry and relief duties payable by heirs who take precepts from Chancery. Those duties are payable by the heir, although he may not have used the precept; and the Crown may compel him, by an action, to pay, as the sheriff, if he has paid the duties, has his action of relief against the heir. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, § 50; Stair, B. ii. tit. 4, § 28; Bank. ii. 497; Kames' Stat. Law, h. t.; Skene, h. t.

Respondentia; a loan upon the cargo of a ship, made in contemplation of a particular voyage, on the condition that, if the subject on which the money is advanced be lost by sea-risk, or superior force of the enemy, the lender shall lose his money; and that if the voyage be successful, the sum advanced shall be repaid with a greater than ordinary rate of interest, called marine interest, which may be lawfully taken in consideration of the risk incurred by the lender who ventures on the voyage. If the ship be lost under any of the risks which would render an insurer liable, the claim of the lender is extinguished. In foreign countries, the contract of respondentia creates a real security over the cargo; but in this country it for the most part affords personal security only to the lender. Bell's Com. i. 530, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 468; Illust. ib.; Jurid. Styles, ii. 533. See Bond of Respondentia.

Restitution; is an obligation incumbent on the person in possession of a moveable, when that moveable is truly the property of another, even although the possessor should have obtained it by purchase; nor will the owner, in that case, be bound to pay the price which the holder may have given. Where a person has had an article of this kind in his possession, but has sold it before any demand has been made by the true owner, he is liable no farther than as he has received more than he paid for it; for this surplus is clearly the property of the owner, to whom it is justly due; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 10. An action lies for restitution of money paid through mistake or ignorance, or of money paid in contemplation of an event which, through the fault of the receiver, has not happened. Stair, B. i. tit. 7; More's Notes, p. xlviii.; Bank. i. 208, et seq.; Bell's Com. i. 132, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 526 et seq., 1320; Illust. ib. See Condictio Indebiti. Condictio Causa Data.

Retenta Possessione. See Possession. Reputed Ownership.

Retention. The distinction supposed to exist between the lien of the English and the retention of the Scotch law, has been already noticed in the article Lien. As a real distinction, however, between these rights, it deserves attention, that the right of retention may be exercised over a subject which is the retainer's own property, but which, were it not for the right of retention, he would be bound to deliver to another, as in the case of goods sold, but not delivered, which remain the property of the seller; whereas it is an essential characteristic of lien, that the subject over which it extends is the property of another. Retention is a right of withholding a debt, or retaining moveable property, until a debt due to the person claiming the right of retention shall be paid. The right of retention differs from hypothec in this, that retention depends entirely upon possession, while the right of hypothec may exist over a subject not in the possession of him who has the right. Thus, an agent has a right of hypothec over the expenses in which the opposite party is found liable; he has a right to retain the title-deeds, &c., of his own client in security of his account. See Hypothec. It would appear, as stated in the article Lien, that there is not in the law of Scotland any general right of retaining, in all circumstances, whatever belongs to a debtor in security of his debt. In the ordinary case, there must be something to connect the thing retained with the debt in security of which it is retained, so as to give room for the presumption of an express or implied agreement that the creditor should have such security for his debt. Thus, a ship may be retained in security for repairs, whether executed at home or abroad. There is also a right of retention over goods aboard ship, for the freight and passage-money; and a similar lien over goods in land carriages, and over the goods, horses, and carriages of travellers, for their entertainment in inns. Retention is also competent to workmen of the articles put into their hands to make or to repair, for the price of the article made, or the expense of repairs. There is a kind of retention, which has been called general retention, in which the right extends not only over the individual article on which the debt has been contracted, but also over other articles of the same kind, sent in regularly in a course of dealing. There are also classes of individuals, exercising certain professions or trades, who have a right to retain, in security of their general balance, the goods and effects of their debtor which have come into their hands in their professional character. The law-agent's right of retention has been considered under the article Hypothec. The factor's lien entitles him to retain, in security of his advances, the property of the principal which has come into his hands as factor. When he has sold the goods, he is not entitled to retain them against the purchaser, on account of the balance due by the principal; but his lien in such a case extends over the price of the goods when paid to him. Specific appropriation excludes the factor's lien. A banker has a right of retention, in security of the general balance, over unappropriated paper belonging to customers, but not over bills discounted, or appropriated. A policy-broker's lien entitles him, on his principal's bankruptcy, to retain the policy and sums paid to him for a loss. A trustee has a right of retention over the trust-property in security of his advances, and in relief of his responsibility—that is, he may refuse to reconvey until such claims are satisfied. But if the subject be heritage, no one can retain it against the owner without a written title of possession. Even in the case where a party, by mistake, had built on the ground of another, and where the builder's claim for the value of the building, in so far as it was a melioration, was not disputed, the Court held that he was not entitled to retain possession until repaid the expense of building; but, on the contrary, they decreed him to remove, with a mere reservation of his claim for the money bona fide expended in erecting the house; Beattie, 27th May 1831, 9 S. & D. 639. It would appear that the cautioner's right of retention is the only case in which a proper general lien exists. A cautioner may retain, in order to secure his relief, the goods or money of his principal, whether acquired before or after his becoming bound. Possession is necessary to every right of retention. And the possession must be lawful and actual possession, not civil, nor confidential, nor for a specific purpose. The right of retention ceases on the loss of possession (unless possession has been lost by mistake), and does not revive on recovery of possession. According to Professor Bell, the factor's lien forms an exception to this rule, and "the regaining of possession by fair means, in the course of the factory, will restore the lien;" Bell's Princ. § 1449. See on this subject generally, Stair, B. i. tit. 18, § 7; B. ii. tit. 3, § 27; More's Notes, pp. lxx., lxxvii., cxxxi., ccxli.; Mr Brodie's Sup. 913; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 20; Bell's Com. ii. 91; Bell's Princ. § 1411; Illust. ib., where several cases are cited; Bank. i. 388; Bell on Leases, i. 229, 370-8; ii. 25; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Brown on Sale, 13, 210, 436, 452-60; Thomson on Bills, 376, 584, 736, 763; Ross's Lect. ii. 414; Kames' Equity, 344, 563. See Lien. Hypothec.

By the law of Scotland, formerly, the seller of goods paid for but not delivered, might, on the bankruptcy of the purchaser, in virtue of his undivested right of ownership, retain the goods in satisfaction of a previous debt due to him by the purchaser. See the cases Mein v. Boyle, Jan. 17, 1828, 6 S. 360, and Melrose v. Hastie, March 7, 1851, 13 D. 880. By the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, however, a seller is not entitled to a right of retention generally against a second purchaser, but he may arrest or poind the goods at any time prior to the sale of the goods to a second purchaser being intimated to him.

In the case of Brown v. Sommerville, Jan. 13, 1844, 6 D. 1267, it was found that a printer had no right of retention over stereotype plates put into his hands for the purpose of his printing from them, for payment of his account. See on the subject of retention, Hamilton v. Western Bank, Dec. 13, 1856, 19 D. 152; Gardiner v. Milne & Co., Feb. 13, 1858, 20 D. 565; and National Bank of Scotland v. Forbes, Dec. 3, 1858, 21 D. 79.

Retentis; proof to lie in. See Evidence, pp. 373-4.

Retour. This name is given to an extract from Chancery of the service of an heir to his ancestor. The brief of inquest, after the jury have pronounced their verdict, is retourable to Chancery, whence it issued; and it is the duty of the judge to whom it is directed to return it, nor is the service complete until this be done. The extract or copy of the retour to Chancery is, in practice, termed the retour. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 61; Stair, B. iii. tit. 5, § 42; B. iv. tit. 3, § 5; More's Notes, p. cclxxi.; Bank. ii. 327; Bell's Princ. §§ 1831-47-53, 2024; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. h. t.; Sandford's Heritable Succession, i. 314, 376; ii. 37; Sandford on Entails, 282, 319, 333; Tait on Evidence, 3d edit. 187, 194;

Jurid. Styles, i. 347-54, 385. See Briens Service. Prescription, Vicennial.

By the act 10 and 11 Vict. c. 47, 1847, the practice of issuing briefs from Chancery for the service of heirs is abolished, and the procedure is now by way of petition before the sheriff of the county in which the deceased was domiciled, or before the sheriff of Chancery.

Retoured Duties. The retoured duty is the new extent which is inserted in retour, and by which the non-entry duties before citation are regulated. Blanch-holdings, substituted for ward-holdings by 20 Geo. II. c. 50, are liable in a retour duty of one per cent. of the valued rent according to which the land-tax is paid. Feu-holdings are retoured to the feu-duties specified in the charter; and thus, in a feu-holding, the non-entry duties are the feu-duties, so that the superior claims nothing à nomine before citation which he would not be entitled to claim under the reddende of his charter. Where there is no retour of lands, and no means of proving their retoured duties, the superior is entitled to the valued rent before citation. In tithes, when they are held blanch, the superior is entitled to the fifth part of the retoured duty of the lands; but where they are held in feu, the superior is entitled to the feu-duty payable for them as their non-entry duties. Infestments of annual rent are by the act 1692, c. 42, retoured to the blanch, or other duty contained in the infestment. There is, besides, a clause in the heritable bond obliging the debtor, when the right is held of him, to assign all the casualties, and to give an entry gratis. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, §§ 36-38; Stair, B. ii. tit. 4, § 21; B. iv. tit. 8, § 3; Bank. ii. 332. See Non-Entry.

Retractus Feudalis; is the power which a superior formerly exercised of paying of a debt due to an adjudging creditor, and taking a conveyance to the adjudication. Where the amount of the debt exceeded the value of the estate, the superior was bound to pay only to the extent of the value. No such power is now exercised by superiors. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 37; Bank. ii. 235; Kames' Stat. Law, voce Jus Retractus.

Retrocession; a term signifying the conveyance of any right by an assignee back into the person of the cedent, who thus recovers his former right by becoming the assignee of his own assignee. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 6, § 1; Bank. ii. 192; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Jurid. Styles, ii. 351, 380; Shaw's Signat. p. 43; Thomson on Bills, 566. See Assignment.

Return; the certificate of a sheriff to whom a writ, warrant, or precept is directed, setting forth what has been done by virtue of such

Return, Clause of. See Clause of Return.

Return Premiums. In insurance, return premiums are due where the contract is voided; as where the risk has never been begun, or sometimes in consequence of express stipulation—as in the event of a ship's sailing with convoy, of her arriving safe, or the like. Bell's Com. i. 599, ii. 135. See Insurance.

Reverser. The reverser is the proprietor of an estate who has granted a wadset of his lands, and who has a right, on repayment of the money advanced to him, to be replaced in his right. See Wadset.

Reversion; as applied to heritage, is a right of redemption, and is either legal or conventional. The legal reversion is that which is provided by the operation of the law itself; as in an adjudication, where the law gives a power to the debtor to redeem within the legal. The conventional reversion is that of a wadset, or of an heritable bond, where the reverser or the debtor in the heritable bond is entitled to disencumber the estate, or to redeem it under the clause of reversion in the deed. Stair, B. i. tit. 14, § 3; B. ii. tit. 10, § 3; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 8, § 2, et seq.; Bank. i. 416, ii. 128; Bell's Com. i. 757; Bell's Princ. § 902; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825), 281; Bell on Purchaser's Title, 158, 374; Ross's Lect. ii. 331 et seq., 351. See Redeemable Rights. Legal Adjudication. Wadset.

Review; revision. In the phraseology of the law of Scotland, this term is chiefly applied to the reviewing of any interlocutor, or decree, or sentence against which a party has reclaimed or appealed. No judge in the Court of Session is now authorised to review his own decrees or interlocutors; 6 Geo. IV. c. 120; Bank. ii. 516, 539, 627. See Appeal. Reclaiming Note. Advocat. Suspension.

Revocation; is a deed recalling some former deed; or a clause of revocation may form part of another deed; as where it is introduced into a settlement for the purpose of recalling a former settlement. Where a donation between husband and wife, or a deed executed during minority, is meant to be recalled, it is usually done by an express revocation, although, where the power to revoke is indisputable, revocation may also be inferred from posterior deeds irreconcilable with the subsistence of the former. But on the principle that rights are dissolved in the same manner in which they are constituted, where a donation between husband and wife has been constituted by writing, it must be revoked either expressly or by implication, by a written deed—e. g., a posterior deed defeating the effect of the former by a new gift. The consent or knowledge of the other spouse is not requisite; and it has even been held that the posterior contraction of debt by the husband is tantamount to a revocation of a previous donation to his wife. See Donatio inter Virum et Uxorem. Where, again, a minor means to recall a deed executed during minority, it is by an action in a court, and by reducing the objectionable deed, that he accomplishes his object. The action of reduction may be preceded by a revocation; but this is not indispensable as a preliminary, nor will a revocation within the four years after majority supply the want of an action within that time. *More's Notes on Stair, p. cxc. i; Ersk. Rhind Mart; a word which sometimes occurs in the reddendo of charters in the north of Scotland. It is applied to any species of horned cattle—e. g., oxen, cows, &c., given at Martinmas as a reddendo.

Riding Interests. Where any of the claimants in an action of multiplepinding, or in a process of ranking and sale, have creditors, these creditors may claim to be ranked on the fund set aside for their debtor; and such claims are called riding interests. If there be more than one rider claiming upon the share of a single claimant, and that share is insufficient to pay them all, a competition may incidentally ensue among these riders without any separate process of multiplepinding in the name of the claimant whose share is thus in medio. Shand's Prac. 602 and 908; Beveridge, i. 384, ii. 545; MacLaurin's Sheriff Prac. 258. See Multiplepinding. Ranking and Sale.

Rief; an obsolete term, synonymous with robbery; hence Rievers (1477, c. 78). Stouthrief is a term still known in criminal law, and importing masterful theft or depredation; Hume, i. 101. See Robbery. Reif. Stouthrief.

Rights; properly speaking, may be opposed to things or subjects, as rights of property, of possession, of servitude, &c. But the distinction between corporeal and incorporeal things (to the latter of which divisions rights more properly belong) have been absorbed in the division into heritable and moveable; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1. See Corporeal and Incorporeal. Heritable and Moveable. Jus in re and ad rem. Obligation. Jus Crediti.

Riot Act. See Mobbing.

Rivers. Navigable rivers are inter regalia, and are held by the Sovereign, as trustee for the community; but the river, including the alveus or bed, and the banks (for the purpose of tracking or of navigation), is public property; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 17. Rivers also may be private property, in so far as the use of the water belongs to those through whose property the stream passes; but although a proprietor may employ the water while it is within his own grounds, he must allow it to pass onwards to the inferior heritors, in its original channel, and cannot alter its level, either where it enters or leaves his property. Where a river divides two properties, neither proprietor can carry off any part of the stream from the bed of the river without the consent of the opposite heritor; nor can he obstruct or dam it up so as to cause the water to re-gurgitate on the lands of the superior or upper heritor. The bed of the river belongs to the proprietor through whose grounds the river runs; and where it divides adjoining properties, one-half of it belongs to each. It is in the power of a proprietor, either in a public or a private river, to protect his banks by bulwarks; but he can construct them only for defence, and not in such a manner as to throw the stream on the opposite banks. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 5; Bank i. 507; Bell's Princ. § 648-50, 971; Illust. § 648; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825), 33. See Property. Loch. Salmon-Fishing.

Road or Way; as a servitude. The rural servitude of passage or way, is (like the Roman law servitudes, iter actus et via) of three degrees—foot-road, horse-road, and cart or carriage-road; and to these may be added the servitude of a way or loaning, or drove-road for cattle. In the Roman law, the servitude iter, gave right to a horse or foot-passage; but in Scotland, a servitude of a foot-road does not comprehend a horse-road. This class of servitudes imports no obligation on the servient proprietor to maintain the road. He is not even prevented from changing the direction of the road, provided the new one be equally convenient for the dominant proprietor; and, on a foot-road, he may place gates or styles of easy access, and on a cart-road, swing-gates. One important distinction between servitude-roads and public-roads is, that a public-road may be used by all the Queen's subjects, whereas a servitude-road can be legally used only by the dominant proprietor and his family, and the tenants in the dominant lands. The right to a servitude-road, eighteen feet wide, subject to be used for carts and led cattle, implies a right of driving loose cattle along it; *Suan, Jan. 21, 1834, 12 S. & D. 316. Road Acts. See Highways.

Road Trustees. The General Turnpike Act, 1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 43, provides, that the qualification of a road trustee shall be such as is required by the local act for the county or district. No one can act as trustee before he has made oath or affirmation that he possesses the required qualification. No person appointed a trustee by any road act, is capable of acting as such, while he holds any place of profit under such act, or under the general act, or is a tacksman of the tolls on any turnpike-road. Persons acting without being qualified are liable to a penalty of £20 forfeited to the prosecutor, and recoverable by summary action before the sheriff of the shire, or in the Court of Session. Trustees appointed under a turnpike act are not disqualified from acting as sheriffs or justices in the execution of such act. Lenders of money on the credit of tolls, or their assignees, are not disqualified from acting as trustees, sheriffs or justices. Trustees meeting under authority of any local act may from time to time adjourn, to meet at such place and time as they shall appoint. At all their meetings they must defray their own expenses. There must be present at each meeting the quorum appointed by the local act, and their powers are exercised by the major part of the trustees present. A preses must, in the first place, be appointed at every meeting, who, in case of an equal number of votes (including the vote of the preses), has a casting or double vote. No order or determination made or agreed upon at a meeting can be revoked or altered at any subsequent meeting, unless notice of the intention to propose such revocation or alteration shall have been given at a previous meeting holden for the same road, and entered in the book of proceedings of such meeting, and have been transmitted by post to every trustee not present at such previous meeting, who was present at the meeting where the order or determination was made. Notice must also be published by two several advertisements in some paper usually circulated in the shire in which the road, or the principal part of it, is situated, at least ten days previous to the subsequent meeting, or by affixing it for two consecutive Sundays on the church-doors of the parish or parishes within which the road is situated. Any two trustees of a turnpike-road may at any time call, or require their clerk to call, a meeting of the trustees of the road, provided notice of the meeting, and of the purpose of it, be published by two advertisements, or be affixed under said. The trustees may, at any general meeting, divide the roads into districts, and name committees for their management, of which three are a quorum. They may appoint clerks, collectors, treasurers, superintendents, surveyors and other officers, with reasonable salaries or allowances for trouble; and provision is made to prevent these officers from misconducting themselves. None of them can, in any way, be concerned in any contract entered into by the trustees.

The trustees of every turnpike-road may sue and be sued, in all actions or processes, in the name of their clerk or treasurer for the time being; but it has been found that this provision is not applicable to district clerks, but only to the clerk under the general trust; Williamson, March 2, 1832, 10 S. & D. 413. In a subsequent case, however, the clerk of a committee of district road trustees was held entitled to pursue a cautioner for the balance due by the treasurer, having received special authority for that purpose by a minute of the trustees; but it was questioned whether, without such authority, he would have been entitled to pursue; Creighton, Feb. 6, 1838, 16 S. & D. 447. No action or process brought or commenced by or against any trustees of any turnpike-road, in the name of their clerk or treasurer, ceases by the death or removal of such clerk or treasurer, or by the act of such clerk or treasurer without the consent of the trustees, but the clerk or treasurer for the time to the trustees is always deemed the pursuer or defender. All expenses of process or proceedings incurred by the clerk or treasurer, are reimbursed and paid out of the trust-funds of the road. The trustees may accept subscriptions for any sum of money requisite for making or maintaining any part of the road, and may, in security of repayment, assign the tolls leviable on the road. Payment of subscriptions may be enforced after forty days' notice to the subscribers, in any court competent in Scotland. The trustees may borrow money and assign the tolls in security. The form of the assignation is given in the act. The trustees may borrow money on annuity, but they must not give more than 10 per cent. on any sum of money so borrowed, or grant an annuity on any life under fifty years of age. A party who lends money to road trustees, is entitled to rely on the terms of the bond granted to him, and of the statute under which they act; and if by these he be entitled to look to the tolls of a whole district for his security, he will not be affected by previous resolutions of the trustees not communicated to him, subdividing the district; Threshie, Nov. 21, 1833, 12 S. & D. 105. The trustees will not incur a personal liability for the repayment of any money borrowed, or interest, by having signed any securities in pursuance of any turnpike act, the tolls being held the only security. Nor is any trustee or subscriber personally liable, upon any pretext, for payment of any sum, or performance of any obligation to which he has not bound himself personally as an individual, independent of his office as a trustee under any turnpike act; § 24. Lands, buildings, or other heritable subjects required for turnpike-road purposes, become the property of the trustees by simple discharge, or consignment of the price in certain specified banks, as completely as if the respective proprietors had executed in favour of the trustees regular dispositions of the same, and infeftments had followed thereon; § 67. The procurator-fiscal and trustees of any turnpike-road, or any person authorised by them, or any one of their number, may prosecute for any expenses, toll-duty, penalty, &c., and the trustees may allow the expenses of such prosecutions to be defrayed out of the funds of the trust; § 109.

In one case, road trustees were found liable for loss of life and injury from a gig being overturned by stones left on the road in the course of an operation, although they alleged that they had no knowledge of the obstruction, and had employed a contractor, habit and repute competent for the operation, and who had been specially charged to be careful; Findlater, July 18, 1837, 15 S. & D. 1304. The judgment however was reversed in the House of Lords, August 23, 1839; M. & R., 911. The local turnpike acts are adapted to the special circumstances of the particular district or county. See also the general Statute Service Act, 8 and 9 Vict. c. 81, 1845. See Highways.

Robbery. The crime of depriving a person of his property by violence offered to his person. By this violence is meant any overmasterful constraining of the person's will to whom it is offered; and wherever this sort of intimidation is resorted to, whether by the mere show of weapons, or by the actual employment of them, or by blows or threats, followed by the taking of the property, the crime is completed. It is not necessary that the property taken be taken from the person of the man invaded. If it be taken from under his immediate charge or custody—e. g., a horse which he leads, or a packet from his cart—it constitutes robbery. The crime is perfected by the carrying away of the thing taken, however trifling its value may be; and provided it has been thus taken, and in the robber's complete and exclusive possession for however short a period, the robbery is held to be fully perpetrated. This crime is one of the four pleas of the Crown, and it is punishable capitally. Hume, i. 101, et seq.

Robes. The costume worn by certain persons in respect of the dignities or offices held by them, or of the profession to which they belong. So early as 1455 (long before the institution of the Court of Session), the Scottish Parliament enacted, "That all men of law that are forespeakers for the cost [hired advocates] have habits of green of the fashion of a tunkill, and the sleeves to be open as a tabart."—(1455, c. 12; 2 Thomson's Acts, p. 43). The matter remained without any farther regulation for nearly 200 years. In 1609, it appears that Judges even wore no professional costume, and the same may be inferred as to advocates. By the act 1609, c. 8, the whole matter was referred to King James VI. by the Scottish Parliament; thus—"And because a comelie, decent, and orderlie habite and apparrell in the Judges of the land is not onely ane ornament to themselves (being a badge and marke for distinguishing them from the vulgar sort), but the same also breeds in common people that reverence and regard that is due and proper for men in these places. And this being a custome universallie observed almaist through all Europe, the want whereof is greatlie censured by strangers resorting in these parts. The saides Estaites, therefore, upon infinite proves they have of his Majestie's maist singulare wisdome in all his directions, and of his gratus love and affection to this his native kingdom, have, in all humilitie, referred to his Highness' awne appoyntment the assigning of any sik severall sort of habite and vestement as shall be in his Majestie's judgment maist meet and proper, as well for Lords of Session, being the supreme judges in civil actions, as for all other inferior judges of the lyke causes. As also for the criminall and ecclesiasticall judges, and for advocates, lawyers, and all others living by law and practice thereof, that sa every ane of these people may be known and dignosed in their place, calling, and function, and may be accordinglie regarded and respected. Attour, his Majestie and Estaites foresaids, considering what slander and contempt hes arisen to the ecclesiasticall estate of this kingdom by the occasion of the light and undecent apparell used by some of that profession, and cheeflie those having vote in Parliament: It is therefore statute that everie preacher of God's word shall hereafter wear black, grave, and comelie apparell beseming men of their estate and profession; as lykewyse that all pryors, abbots, and prelates, having vot in Parliament, and especiallie bishops, shall weare grave and decent apparrell agreeable to their function, and as appertaines to men of their rank, dignitie, and place. And because the hail Estaites humble and thankfullie acknowledges that God of his great mercy has made the people and subjects of this cuntries so happie as to have a King raigne over us who is maist godlie, wyse, and religious, hating all erronious and vaine superstition, just in government, and of lang experience therein, knowing better than any king living what appertains and is convenient for every estate in their behaviour and duetie: Therefore it is agreed and consented to by the said Estaites, that what order soever his Majestie in his great wisdome shall think meet to prescribe for the apparrell of kirk-men, agreeable to their estate and moeyen, the same being sent in writ by his Majestie to his Clerk of Register, shall be a sufficient warrant to him for inserting thereof in the buikes of Parliament, to have the strength and effect of an act thereof."

Following up this statute, the King sent a letter to the Privy Council, dated 16th January 1610, which will be found printed in the first volume of the "Miscellany of the Maitland Club," p. 149. A proclamation was thereafter issued, dated 30th January 1610, which acknowledges the King's "singular wisdome in all his princelie directions, and his gratus love to this his antient native kingdom," in reference to the apparel "alswele for the Lordis of Session, being the supreme judgis in civile actions, as for all utheris inferior judges in the lyke causes, as also for the criminal ecclesiasticall judges, and for advocates, lawyris, and al utheris leving by law and practize thair, as also for churche men." His Majesty, it was stated, had sent certain directions, but reserved to himself to add thereto on more due consideration, and when he had more leisure. The directions as to the lawyers were—

"That the President and remanent ordinarie Lordis of Session sall weare a purper (purple) cloath gowne, faced all about with red crimson satyne, with a hood of purple lyned with crimson satyne also, according to the model and forme of a gowne send downe to his Majestie to be a pattern for all gowns of ordinarie sessionaris, onlie the President's gowne sall be faced with red crimson velvet, and the hood lynit with red crimson velvet." This seems to be the gown at present worn by the Judges.

With regard to the bar, clerks of Session and writers to the Signet, the regulation was, "that the advocatis, clerkis of the Session and Signet, sall haif their gowns a black lyned with some grave kind of lynyng or furring."

Regulations are also made as to the gowns of the Justiciary Judges; but these were ultimately settled by the subsequent act 1672, c. 16, which enacts, "That for the splendour of that Court, all the Judges sit in red robes faced with white—that of the Justice-General's being lined with ermine for distinction from the red."

No notice is taken of procurators before inferior courts.

The gown of the advocate was to be lined. An idea of what it was may be obtained from drawings in the Lyon Office, representing the order of the funeral of the Chancellor Rothes in 1681. Representations are given in the drawings of all who attended in their robes. The gowns of the Judges appear to have been the same then as now. The Lord Advocate also appears in the same full dress gown as worn by him, on important occasions, at present. The Dean of Faculty and Solicitor-General are not distinguished as wearing any different gowns from the ordinary bar; and at what time this latter officer assumed a silk gown cannot be ascertained. The gowns of the outer bar are represented in the drawings as having ornaments down the front, very much like the braiding on the gown of the Lord Advocate. The whole bar wore bands and full-bottomed wigs. The bands went out of general use in the course of the succeeding half-century; and in the Faculty minutes on 19th June 1766, there appears a notice of motion to this effect, "That for the more decent habite and apparel of the advocates, and to distinguish them from others who wear either the same apparel or very little different from it, that it should be resolved that the advocates shall wear bands as a part of their formalities; that the Dean and his council shall wait on the Lord President and lay before his Lordship this motion, and pray his Lordship's and the Court's approbation. The Faculty delayed the consideration of this affair till some after meeting." Nothing farther was done in the matter by the Faculty, and the delayed motion has yet to be taken up. At what time bands were entirely given up cannot be traced. In Crosbie's picture, which hangs in the library entrance, he is represented as wearing bands. And at present, when a member of the Outer Bar pleads before the House of Lords, the bands are resumed.

The only body that seem to have worn, at the funeral of the Chancellor, the plain stuff gown now worn by advocates, were the Professors in the University; and it is probable that convenience and considerations of economy may have recommended it to the bar in later times. See Report of Faculty of Advocates, 1859. See also Solicitor-General.

Rogue-Money. The freeholders of every county in Scotland are directed annually to assess the county or stewartry at any of the head courts, in such sums as they judge necessary, for defraying the expense of apprehending offenders, subsisting them in jail, and prosecuting them. This assessment is called rogue-money; it is exclusively appropriated to the above purpose, and collected and accounted for by a person appointed by the freeholders. See stat. 11 Geo. I. c. 26, § 12; Kames' Stat. Law, voce Delinquency; Hutch. Justice, ii. 257; Tait's Justice, h. t.; Blair's Justice, h. t. See Justice of Peace.

Rolls, Master of. The Master of the Rolls is a patent officer for life, who has the custody of the rolls and patents which pass the great seal, and of the records of the Chancery. In the absence of the Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper, he also sits as Judge in the Court of Chancery, and is by Coke called his "assistant." At other times he hears causes in the Rolls' Chapel, and makes orders and decrees. He is also the first of the Masters of Chancery, and has their assistance at the rolls; but all hearings before him are appealable to the Lord Chancellor; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. The Master of the Rolls has, by prescription, a general authority to keep the peace throughout the realm; but so far as he is merely an English officer, he has no such authority in Scotland; Hutch. Justice, i. 2.

Rolls of Court. In the Court of Session, the rolls or lists of depending causes are called and regulated in a manner which requires a short explanation. What regards the calling lists has been explained, voce Calling a Summons. But after a cause has been called, and has come to be a process, it is set down in order to be brought under judicial cognisance in one or other of certain rolls of Court. These rolls are divided generally into the Inner and the Outer House Rolls. The latter comprehend what are called the weekly printed rolls of the Court, which exhibit all the new causes coming weekly into Court, and also the hand-rolls of each Lord Ordinary. After a cause has been once called in the weekly printed roll and disposed of, it appears no more in that roll; but while it remains in the Outer-House it is enrolled in the Hand-roll of the particular Lord Ordinary before whom it depends. In these hand-rolls, as occasion requires, any case depending before a Lord Ordinary may be enrolled. The hand-rolls are divided into motion-rolls and debate-rolls; and both the weekly roll of new causes and the hand-rolls are made up and placarded in the Outer-House by the clerks of the Judges, according to certain regulations elsewhere explained. The roll itself is a list of the several causes, containing the surnames of the parties and of the counsel, and in the weekly printed rolls the name of the agent also is given; and in all the rolls the initial letter of the clerk to the process is prefixed to the names of the parties. The ordinary Inner-House rolls of the Court of Session are—1st, The Single Bill Roll; 2d, The Summar or Summary Roll; 3d, The Long Roll; and, 4th, The Short Roll. In the Single Bill Roll are inserted all petitions, reclaiming notes, and other notes or applications to either Division of the Court, whether written or printed; and this roll is daily put out and called during the sitting of the Court. It is kept by the keeper of the Inner-House Roll. See A. S. 11th March 1791. By the act 20 and 21 Vict. c. 56, 1857, all summary petitions and applications to the Court are now brought before the junior Lord Ordinary officiating in the Outer-House. The Summar Roll is appropriated to such causes as require despatch, including cases where the Court act ministerially, or decide by virtue of special statute, or exercise their nobile officium, as in the appointment of judicial factors and the like. Applications under the Bankrupt Statute, petitions and complaints, and so forth, after having first appeared in the Single Bill Roll, are, where no ulterior steps in the Inner-House are necessary, enrolled in the Summar Roll. So also reclaiming notes against Bill-Chamber interlocutors, or interlocutors pronounced in the preparation of a cause, are put out to be advised in the Summar Roll. And in addition to these, any case which, on special grounds, can be shown to the Court to require despatch, will be enrolled with the leave of the Court in this roll. In disposing of the business, the Court first calls the Single Bill Roll and then the Summar Roll. The Long Roll is the roll for all Inner-House causes, which, after having come into the Inner-House rolls through the Single Bill Roll, or by a warrant to enrol granted by an Outer-House Judge, are not appropriated to the Summar Roll. This long roll is put up only at the end of the session, and exhibits the entire list of causes depending in either Division of the Inner-House. The Short Roll, again, is merely a section of the long roll, generally consisting of two or three cases taken in the order of the long roll and put down for advising daily during the session. In the daily order of business, this roll is taken last, unless when special circumstances render a deviation necessary. The only other rolls which it is necessary to notice are the Teind Rolls, as to which the rule is, that the teind ordinary action roll of new causes, coming before the Commission of Teinds, is kept by the Teind Clerk, and called once a fortnight during the session—

i. e., on the Teind Court day, being Wednesday of every alternate week. The depending teind causes and localities are enrolled before the Junior Lord Ordinary, and called weekly on Saturday morning; Beveridge's Form of Process, ii. 727. See Augmentation. Locality. Teind Court. In the inferior courts there are also rolls analogous to those in the Court of Session, but of course not so complicated or various. See, on the subject of this article, Beveridge, i. 292, ii. 277; Shand's Prac. i. et seq.; ii. 458, et seq.

Roman Catholics. Very severe laws were formerly in force against Roman Catholics; but these are now entirely abolished. See Papists. By 31 Geo. III. c. 32, all the severe restrictions and penalties of the former laws were removed from those Roman Catholics, who should make and subscribe a declaration of their professing the Roman Catholic religion, and take an oath of allegiance to the Sovereign, abjuration of the Pretender, renunciation of the Pope's civil power, and abhorrence of the doctrine imputed to them, of destroying and not keeping faith with heretics, and deposing or murdering princes excommunicated by the See of Rome. But the most important measure of relief to the Catholics was the statute 10 Geo. IV. c. 7, commonly called the Catholic Emancipation Act. On the preamble that, by various acts of Parliament, restraints and disabilities are imposed on Roman Catholics to which other subjects of the realm are not liable; and that it is expedient to discontinue these; and that certain oaths and declarations, commonly called the declaration against transubstantiation, and the invocation of saints, and the sacrifice of the mass, as practised in the Church of Rome, formerly required as qualifications for sitting and voting in Parliament, and for the enjoyment of certain offices, franchises, and civil rights, should be dispensed with; it is enacted, that the provisions of the acts requiring these declarations shall be repealed, save as afterwards excepted in the act. It is then provided, that Roman Catholics may sit and vote in either House of Parliament, on taking the following oath, in lieu of the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration:—"I, A. B., do sincerely promise and swear, that I will be faithful, and bear true allegiance to her Majesty, Queen Victoria, and will defend her to the utmost of my power against all conspiracies and attempts which shall be made against her person, crown, or dignity; and I will do my utmost endeavour to disclose and make known to her Majesty, her heirs and successors, all treasons and traitorous conspiracies which may be formed against her or them: And I do faithfully promise to maintain, support, and defend, to the utmost of my ower, the succession of the Crown, which accession, by an act entitled An Act for the further limitation of the Crown; and better securing the rights and liberties of the subject, is and stands limited to the Princess Sophia, Electress of Hanover, and the heirs of her body, being Protestants; hereby utterly renouncing and abjuring any obedience or allegiance unto any other person claiming or retending a right to the Crown of this realm: And I do further declare, That it is not an article of my faith, and that I do renounce, reject, and abjure the opinion, that princes excommunicated by the Pope, or any other authority of the See of Rome, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or by any person whatsoever; and I do declare, that I do not believe that the Pope of Rome, or any other foreign prince, prelate, person, state, or potentate, hath, or ought to have, any temporal or civil jurisdiction, power, superiority, or pre-eminence, directly or indirectly, within this realm. I do swear, That I will defend, to the utmost of my power, the settlement of property within this realm, as established by the laws: And I do hereby disclaim, disavow, and solemnly abjure, any intention to subvert the present Church Establishment, as settled by law within this realm: And I do solemnly swear, that I never will exercise any privilege to which I am or may become entitled to disturb or weaken the Protestant religion or Protestant government in the United Kingdom: And I do solemnly, in the presence of God, profess, testify, and declare, that I do make this declaration, and every part thereof, in the plain and ordinary sense of the words of this oath, without any evasion, equivocation, or mental reservation whatsoever. So help me God."

Roman Catholics may vote at elections, and be elected, on taking and subscribing this oath, and the other oaths lawfully tendered to electors; § 5. No Roman Catholic priest can sit in the House of Commons; § 9. Roman Catholics may hold and enjoy all civil and military offices and places of trust or profit under her Majesty, and exercise any other franchise or civil right, except as excepted in the act, upon taking and subscribing the above oath; § 10. But the act is declared not to exempt Roman Catholics from taking the oaths required from other persons on their admission to such offices; § 11. A Roman Catholic cannot be a guardian and justice of the United Kingdom, in absence of the Sovereign, or Regent of the United Kingdom, or Lord High Chancellor, Lord Keeper or Lord Commissioner of the Great Seal of Great Britain or Ireland; or Lord-Lieutenant, or Lord-Deputy, or other chief governor or governors; or High Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland; § 14. Roman Catholics may be members of any lay body corporate, and hold any civil office or place of trust or profit therein, and do any corporate act, or vote in any corporate election, or other proceeding, upon taking and subscribing the above oath; and other oaths required from members; § 14. But such members cannot vote in ecclesiastical appointments; § 15. The act is declared not to extend to offices in the Established Church, or ecclesiastical courts, universities, colleges, or schools: And it is likewise provided, That nothing contained in the act shall be held to enable any person, otherwise than he is now by law enabled, to exercise any right of presentation to any ecclesiastical benefice whatsoever; or to repeal, vary, or alter in any manner, the laws now in force in respect to the right of presentation to any ecclesiastical benefice; § 16. Where any right of presentation to any ecclesiastical benefice belongs to any office in the gift or appointment of the Crown, and such office is held by a Roman Catholic, the right of presentation devolves upon the Archbishop of Canterbury; § 17. No Roman Catholic, directly or indirectly, can advise the Sovereign, or guardian, or regent of the kingdom, or Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, &c., respecting appointments in the Church of England and Ireland, or of Scotland, under pain of being deemed guilty of a high misdemeanour, and disabled forever from holding any office, civil or military, under the Crown; § 18. Provision is made for the time within which the above oath must be taken by persons appointed to offices. Persons entering on any office without having taken the oath are liable to forfeit L.200, and the appointment is void; § 21. Titles to sees, &c., must not be assumed by Roman Catholics; § 24. Judicial or other officers must not attend at any place of worship other than the established church, under a penalty of L.100; § 25. Roman Catholic ecclesiastics officiating, excepting in their usual places of worship, are liable to a penalty of L.50; § 26.

By 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 115, passed for the purpose of securing the charitable donations and bequests of Roman Catholics, they are declared to be subject to the same law, in respect to their schools, places of worship, education, and charitable purposes, in Great Britain, and the property held therewith, and the persons employed in or about the same, as the Protestant Dissenters are subject to in England. Roman Catholic schoolmasters, when required to take an oath as a qualification, are directed to take the above-cited oath, prescribed by 10 Geo. IV. c. 7. Roman Catholics, the following authorities may be consulted : Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 16, in note; More's Notes to Stair, p. xlv.; Bank. vol. i. p. 49; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. h. t.

By the act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 102, 1844, various penal enactments anent to Roman Catholics are repealed. The act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 97, (1844), regulates the application of charitable donations and bequests in Ireland; and the act 14 and 15 Vict. c. 60, 1851, prevents the assumption of ecclesiastical titles in respect of places in the United Kingdom.

Roman Law. The Roman law, the principles of which are so remarkably incorporated with those of the law of Scotland, was founded originally upon the constitutions of the ancient kings of Rome; next upon the twelve tables of the decemviri; then upon the laws or statutes enacted by the senate or by the people; the edicts of the prætor and the Responsa Prudentum, or the opinions of learned lawyers; and, lastly, upon the imperial decrees or constitutions of the emperors. Authority was also given in the Roman, as in most other systems, to what is called customary or unwritten law. Those materials were first reduced into a Code by the order of the Emperor Theodosius, A.D. 438, which, under the name of the Theodosian Code, continued for several centuries to be the only authoritative compilation recognised in the western part of the empire. Justinian's body of the Roman law, the authority of which was confined to the eastern division of the empire, was compiled and finished by Tribonian about the year 533. It consists, 1. Of the Institutes, containing the elements or first principles of the Roman law, in four books. 2. Of the Digest or Pandects, in fifty books, containing the opinions and writings of eminent lawyers. 3. Of a new Code, or collection of imperial constitutions, in twelve books—the Theodosian Code having been, by the lapse of a century, rendered imperfect. 4. Of the Novels, or new constitutions posterior in time to the other books, being a supplement to the Code containing the new decrees of successive emperors. These form the Corpus Juris Civilis, as published about the time of Justinian, and which soon afterwards fell into oblivion, until about the year 1130, when a copy of the Pandects is said to have been found at Amalfi, in Italy; after which the study and authority of the Roman law was revived and adopted as the foundation of most of the European codes. The story of the finding of the Pandects at Amalfi, however, is considered a mere romance, or, at all events, quite inadequate to account for the revival of the civil law after it had been altogether extinguished. The opinion now generally adopted is, that the Roman law was never altogether extinguished, and that the extraordinary influence which it has exerted over every system of jurisprudence in Europe is to be accounted for not only by its wisdom and general agreement with the law of nature, but also by the systematic manner in which the Romans completed their conquests, and communicated their arts, language, and manners to their new subjects. The Digest or Pandects is divided into seven parts: the first containing the elements of law, as what is justice, right, &c.; the second part treats of judges and judgments; the third of personal actions, &c.; the fourth, of contracts, pledges, &c.; the fifth, of wills and testaments, &c.; the sixth, of the possession of goods; and the seventh, of obligations, crimes, punishments, &c. The Institutes are an epitome of the Digest, divided into four books, correcting the Digest in some respects, and arranged more systematically. The Novels were published at several times, without any method. They are also termed Authentica, as having been authentically translated from Greek into Latin; and they are divided into nine collations, constitutions, or sections; and these again into 168 Novels, which are distributed into certain chapters. The first collation relates to heirs, executors &c.; the second to the state of the Church; the third is against bawds; the fourth concerns marriages, &c.; the fifth forbids the alienation of the possessions of the Church; the sixth treats of the legitimacy of children, &c.; the seventh of witnesses; the eighth ordains wills to be good, although imperfect; and the ninth relates to succession in goods, &c. To this body of the civil or Roman law is added the Book of the Feus, explanatory of the customs and services due by subjects or vassals to princes or superiors, for feus held of them. The Constitutions of the emperors were promulgated either by rescript, which was the letter of the Emperor in answer to those who inquired the law of him; or by edict, which the Emperor issued of his own accord; or by decree, which was pronounced judicially in a particular cause. The Emperor possessed the power of issuing rescripts, edicts, and decrees, under the lex regia, which not only empowered him to make laws, but exempted him individually from their coercive power. Roof. In Edinburgh and other towns in Scotland, where there are numerous tenements or lands (as they are called), consisting of several storeys or floors, belonging to different proprietors, questions sometimes arise as to the burden of supporting the roof, which in one sense may be said to be common to the whole tenement. This burden is usually regulated by an express clause in the title-deeds of the several parties interested; but in absence of such special covenant, the burden of supporting and upholding the roof lies de jure on the proprietor of the garret or upper floor. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 11; Nicholson, 19th Feb. 1708, M. 14516; Luke, 1st Feb. 1690; Brown's Supp. iv. 258. See Common Interest.

Rotation of Crops. See Cropping.

Roup. See Articles of Roup. Auction.

Royal Burghs. A royal burgh is an incorporation created by a royal charter, giving jurisdiction to the magistrates within certain bounds, and vesting certain privileges in the inhabitants and burghesses. See Burgh-Royal. Burghage-Holding.

Rubric of a Statute. The rubric of a statute is its title, which is so termed because anciently it was written in red letters. The rubric may be accounted part of the statute, and in dubio an argument may be legitimately deduced a rubro ad nigrum—i. e., from the rubric to the body of the statute. Ersk. B. i. tit. 1, § 49.

Running Days; a term in the contract of charter-party used in contradistinction to Working Days, and referring to the ship's lay-days, or days of demurrage. In computing by running days, they are reckoned as days in a bill of exchange; while in computing by working days, all Sundays and Custom-house holidays are excluded. Bell's Com. i. 577. See Charter-Party. Demurrage.

Running Letters. See Liberation.

Running Ship; a vessel which in time of war does not sail with convoy, is technically said to run the voyage. In an insurance on a running ship, if the underwriters are given to understand that there is even a chance of convoy, while the owners have already resolved to run, the contract is void. Bell's Com. i. 620. See Convoy. Insurance.

Runrig-Lands; are lands where the alternate ridges of a field belong to different proprietors. By the act 1695, c. 23, a division of such lands was authorised to be made between the different proprietors according to their respective interests, with the exception of lands belonging to burghs or incorporations. This division may be insisted in before the judge-ordinary or justices of the peace. Under the description of runrig-lands are comprehended lands where the portions consist not of ridges only, but of alternate portions of several acres each. *Ersk. Sacraments. The act 1617, c. 6, lays the burden of providing necessaries for the administration of the sacraments upon the parishioners. But this has been interpreted to mean the heritors. In practice the expense of providing communion elements falls on the teinds, and the Court of Session have always been in use, in augmentations, to decern for a special sum for this purpose. When this burden is laid on the titular, he is entitled to have the amount allocated on the proprietors of the several lands over which his titularity extends. L.8, 6s. 8d. is usually awarded, but in populous parishes L.10 is sometimes given. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 50; Bank. ii. 69; Dunlop's Parochial Law, 289; Church Law Styles, 313.

Sacreborgh; or sickerborgh, a "sicker, sure, sufficient cautioner, a kind of caution found more especially in actions or playes." Skene, h. t.

Sacrilege; is any violation of things dedicated to the offices of religion. Theft becomes more heinous when sacred things are its subjects; but in Scotland there is no express enactment which declares the punishment more severe. There are instances, however, of capital punishment having been formerly inflicted on persons convicted of stealing chalices, priests' ornaments, and the like; Hume, i. 108. See Violating Sepulchres. Capital punishment for sacrilege in England was abolished by 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 81; explained by 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 4.

Sak; in old law language, the unlaw or americiament paid by him "who denies that thing which is proven against him to be true, or affirms that thing whereof the contrary is of verity." Skene, h. t.

Salaries. The salaries of the Judges of the Court of Session have been found not to be arrestable; and according to Erskine pensions from the Crown are not arrestable because they are alimentary, and indeed all salaries annexed "to offices, in so far as they amount to no more than a reasonable allowance for the decent support of those who are named to them, though they be granted not by the King but by subjects, whether communities or private donors, ought on the same ground to be accounted alimentary;" Ersk. B. iii. tit. 6, § 7. It has been found that arrears due to officers in the army (but not on half-pay), ministers' stipends, magistrates' fees and dues payable to the principal keepers of the Parliament-House, are arrestable quoad excessum. *Bell's Com. i. 126-31; Ersk. Sale. In the law of Scotland, sale is a consensual contract, by which one party, called the seller or vendor, agrees to transfer the property of a subject, in consideration of a price to be paid by the other party, called the purchaser or vendee. In the law of England sale is defined to be a contract, by which the seller at once transfers the property of a subject, in consideration of a price paid or to be paid. There is this difference, therefore, between the laws of the two countries, that, according to the English law, a thing, when sold, immediately becomes the property of the purchaser; whereas, by the law of Scotland, the seller does not, by the completion of the contract, alienate the subject—he only becomes bound to alienate it—the alienation being completed by delivery. This distinction in principle between the laws of two countries is important; although certain peculiar provisions of the law of England render the practical differences between the two systems less prominent than might have been anticipated. Among what may be called the equalising peculiarities of the English law may be mentioned:—1. The qualified nature of the right of property in certain cases—while, in Scotland, property never signifies anything but the jus in re. 2. The English law doctrine, that the contract is not completed without payment of the price, unless credit has been expressly given, or unless the subject has been delivered unconditionally, or unless earnest has been paid—although payment of earnest does not entitle the buyer to take away the goods without paying the price. 3. The doctrine that a sale of goods in market overt is good, though the goods should turn out not to have been the property of the seller; see Market Overt. And, 4. The doctrine of reputed ownership, which secures the creditors of those who retain the possession of goods which they have sold. See Reputed Ownership.

In the law of Scotland the contract of sale is completed by simple consent. But in England, by the statute of frauds, no contract for the sale of goods, for the price of L.10 or upwards, is good, unless the buyer accept and actually receive part of the goods; or give something as earnest; or unless some note or memorandum in writing be made, and signed by the parties to be charged by such contract, or their agents thereunto authorized; 29 Car. II. c. 3, § 17. The doctrine, that consent alone is sufficient to complete the contract of sale in the law of Scotland, is subject, however, to certain exceptions. Thus, writing is necessary to prove the consent, wherever the parties stipulate that writing shall intervene; and in the sale of heritable property and of ships, writing is legally indispensable. See Sale of Land. Ship. Vendition of Ship. Evidences. The parties may make the purification of a condition essential to the completion of the contract, and such a condition is called a suspensive condition, or a condition precedent—until the fulfilment of which there is no proper sale. It has been found in England, that a condition adjoined to a sale of goods, that they shall be approved of by the buyer, within a certain time, is intended for the benefit of the buyer only, and that the sale becomes absolute on the lapse of the specified time, without intimation of the buyer's approbation. Humphries, 16 East 45, cited in Brown on Sale, 36. It is sometimes agreed by a retailer, that if he do not sell goods within a certain time, he shall be entitled to return them to the wholesale dealer from whom he had them. See Sale and Return. A sale on arrival is a sale of goods coming from abroad: if the goods do not come, there is no sale. In conditional sales, while the condition is pendent, neither party is at liberty to resile; and the accomplishment of the condition has a retrospective effect to the date of the contract, so that if either should die in the interim, his rights under the contract would pass to his heir. If the seller, pendente conditione, sell the goods to a third party, the buyer will be entitled to damages. See Conditional Obligation. Suspensive Condition. By the Roman law, and also by the law of England, where any operation of weighing, measuring, or the like, remains to be performed, the contract of sale is incomplete. There do not appear to be any adjudged cases establishing this rule in the law of Scotland: nor, according to the principle of the Scotch law, is such a rule necessary, because, while, by the law of England, the completion of the contract transfers the property (which is irreconcilable with the notion that the subject is not yet known or defined), in the law of Scotland the contract may be completed without transferring the property. In such cases, by the law of Scotland, the seller, and not the buyer, has the risk of the subject not yet separated from the mass. See Periculum and infra.

If it be found that the subject of the sale has previously perished, there is no sale. There may, however, be the sale of something which has not yet come into existence. See Res Futuræ. Spei Emptio. And there may be a sale of what belongs to another. See Res Alienæ. As a general rule, everything adapted to the purposes of commerce may be sold, except where the sale is prohibited by law. But there are certain things which, from their nature, are held to be placed extra commercium. See Res Publicæ. Res Sacræ. The contracts which are prohibited on account of their opposition to law or public morals are considered in the articles Pactum Illicitum. Smuggling. Offices, &c. As to the requisite qualities of the price, which is another essential of the contract of sale, see the article Price. The consent of the parties, which is the third essential of the contract, means the co-existence of a mutually expressed purpose to buy and to sell. If, therefore, a merchant makes an offer by letter to buy goods, and, before the letter reaches its destination, sends another letter recalling his offer, there is no sale, even although the party to whom the offer is made, before receiving the second letter, should have sent off an acceptance; for in such a case there is no co-existence of a reciprocal wish to buy and to sell. Of course, if the party to whom the offer is made suffers any loss in consequence of the offer, the other party will be bound to make reparation. The parties must also be agreed as to the subject of the sale. If they differ in corpore—i. e., if the seller agrees to sell one thing, and the buyer to buy another—there is no sale. By the Roman law, if they agreed in corpore, but differed as to something accessory to it, the sale was valid. If there be no error in corpore, but if there be error as to the substance of the thing, or any of its essential qualities, without which it would not be entitled to the name under which it is sold, there is no sale. See Error in Essentialibus. If there be error only as to some accidental quality, the sale is good. The parties must be agreed as to the price; but if the buyer's price be larger than the seller's price, the sale is good at the seller's price, since both have consented to that price. The parties must agree that the contract shall be sale, and no other contract.

No one can be a party to the contract of sale who is not capable of consent. See Idiot. Pupil. Minor. Marriage. Alien. A wife may sell any subject belonging to herself, provided her husband, as her legal curator, give his consent. Debts due by a constituent, purchased by his factor or agent, are held as purchased for behoof of the constituent, and no claim can be sustained but for the transacted sum. If, therefore, factors, agents, trustees, and others in similar circumstances, purchase debts due by their constituents for a sum less than they will bring, they can only claim the sum which they have actually paid, and not the full amount of the debt, or the dividend which may be paid upon it; and this, even although the factor should contain a clause expressly authorising the factor to make such acquisitions for his own behoof. A common agent in a process of ranking and sale was found disqualified from purchasing the estate exposed under his direction; York Buildings Co., 8th March 1793, Mor. 13,367, and 4 Dow, 379. See Ranking and Sale. Factors appointed by the Court in a sequestration of a land estate are prohibited by Act of Sederunt from buying in and compounding the debts affecting it; A. S. 25th Dec. 1708.

The obligations which the seller incurs by the completion of the contract are, 1. The delivery of the thing sold, where it is not already in the possession of the buyer. The seller must, at his own expense, take the steps necessary for implementing this obligation, and freeing the subject, if it be in the possession of a third party. He is likewise bound to free the subject from all burdens or incumbrances. In the sale of heritage, this is a doctrine of great importance; and the records furnish the means of discovering the incumbrances which exist. See Incumbrances. Search of Incumbrances. In absence of express stipulation, the seller is bound to deliver the subject as soon as the buyer demands it; provided the latter has paid, or offers to pay, the price. Where nothing has been stipulated as to the place of delivery, the seller is bound to deliver the subject only in the place where it was at the time of the sale. If the sale has not been upon credit, the buyer cannot demand delivery of any part of the subject, without payment of the whole price. And even when the sale is upon credit, the seller is not bound to deliver, if, after the contract, the seller has become insolvent, and unable to pay the price. But even in this case, if the buyer or his creditors be willing to pay the price where the sale has been for ready money, or to give security where it has been upon credit, the seller is bound to deliver in like manner as if the buyer were solvent. It has been questioned, whether the seller may be compelled to make delivery, or whether he is entitled to be relieved of his obligation on paying the damnum et interesse. See this question discussed in the article Factum Prostandum. If the seller unduly delays, or altogether fails, to make delivery, he must make up the loss thereby occasioned to the buyer. See Mora. Damages. It has been questioned, whether the seller's obligation is fulfilled by his merely making delivery, or whether he is also bound to make the buyer proprietor of the thing sold. By the Roman law, if the seller sold the subject believing it to be his own, the buyer could not reject it on the ground of defect in the title, or make any claim for indemnification, before he was actually disturbed in the possession. But if the seller knew it not to be his own, he might be sued even before eviction. Stair adopts this rule in its full extent; B. i. tit. 14, § 1. The question, however, does not seem ever to have been tried in the Scotch courts in the case of a sale of moveables; and, perhaps, were such a question to occur, the rule of the Roman law might be followed. But it is certain that, by the law of Scotland, the buyer, when there is no stipulation to the contrary, is entitled to reject any title to heritage which is not sufficient securely to convey the property. See Sale of Land. Progress of Titles. The seller is not only bound to deliver the subject, but is also bound to warrant the buyer against eviction. See Warrandice.

By the Roman law, if the buyer found that the subject was so deficient in either quantity or quality as that, had he known the deficiency, he would not have entered into the contract, he was entitled to sue for repetition of a part of the price corresponding to the deficiency; but this rule does not appear to have been adopted in the law of Scotland. See Quantum Minoris Actio.

The obligations of the buyer are—to pay the price, and to take possession of the thing sold. Where no term is agreed upon, the seller may demand payment of the price immediately upon offering sale of the thing sold. If, after the sale, the seller, without any fault of his own, has become unable to make delivery, the price is, notwithstanding, due by the buyer. See Periculum. But the buyer cannot demand payment of the price while he is himself in mora in delivering the subject. With regard to the cases in which interest is due on account of mora in paying the price, see the article Interest. When no special agreement has been made as to assuming possession or carrying away the subject, or when a certain time is not allowed by the custom of the country, or of a particular trade, the buyer may be called upon to do so immediately. If he unduly delays, he will be liable, in the case of moveables, for warehouse rent or other expenses in keeping the subject. But it has been decided in the English courts, that the neglect of the buyer to carry away the subject does not entitle the seller, of his own authority, to annul the contract, and resell the goods. With regard to the risk of a subject sold, but still undelivered, see the article Periculum. As soon as the subject is delivered, it becomes the property of the buyer, provided it belonged to the seller at the time of the sale. The right of property is not, as it was in the Roman law, in dependence until the payment or securing of the price; the buyer being uncontrolled in the use of the subject as soon as it is delivered to him, whether the price has been paid or not; Stair, B. i. tit. 14, § 2.

The contract of sale may be brought to an end without being implemented; and its dissolution is distinguished from its original nullity. Dissolution may take place either by consent, or in consequence of certain circumstances attending the formation of the contract, which may entitle one of the parties to rescind. Constraint, or fraud inducing the contract, are grounds of dissolution. One great distinction between a contract void ab initio and one only voidable is, that, in the former, everything following upon the contract partakes of its nullity, and the buyer acquires no property in the thing sold; in the latter, the contract is good until challenged. The buyer, therefore, in such a case acquires a property in the thing sold, which he may transfer to a third party, whose title, if he be in bona fide, will not be affected by the vices of the former contract. See Force and Fear. Fraud. Error in Essentialibus. When the contract is dissolved by mutual consent, things are restored to the situation in which they were previous to the sale. It is equivalent to a consensual dissolution, if the parties enter into a second contract concerning the same thing; as, for example, when it is resold for a greater or smaller price. In Scotland there can be no sale by one who has no property in the thing sold. See Labes Realis. Maritima Overt. The contract may be dissolved in consequence of the purification of a resolutive condition—i. e., on the arrival of an event at which it was previously agreed that the contract should determine. See Resolutive Condition. Pactum de Retrovendendo. Pactum Legis Commissoriae. A sale on trial is an example of such a condition. By such a contract the property and the risk are transferred, but under the condition that, if the subject does not please, the buyer may return it.

The supervening insolvency of either party has very important effects on the contract of sale. And the law provides various remedies to prevent loss to either party. See Liens—Ship—page in Transitu—Retention—for the seller's remedies. Should the seller become bankrupt after the completion of the contract, the buyer is merely a personal creditor for the value of the thing sold; nor is this rule in any way affected by the circumstance of his having not having paid the price. In either case, he is in no better situation than the seller's other creditors. Where, again, the subject has been delivered before the seller's failure, it is placed entirely beyond the diligence of his creditors. In certain circumstances the buyer, when aware that he will not be able to pay the price, is entitled and bound, with the seller's consent, to rescind the contract and refuse to take delivery of the goods. See Rejection in Transitu. Where, however, the seller refuses his assent, or where there are circumstances inferring that he has made his election not to rescind the contract, he will not be entitled, on the buyer's bankruptcy, to demand the goods.

Peculiar rules are sometimes brought into operation in consequence of sale being combined with other contracts; as where the thing sold is something which the seller, in the exercise of his art, agrees to manufacture for the buyer—e. g., where one buys a carriage, or a ship, to be built by the seller. In England, such contracts are not within the statute of frauds, and the property does not pass until the thing is finished, although the price may have been paid. In a Scotch case, however, where the price of a ship was to be paid by instalments, at laying the keel, and at planking to the top of the gunwale, and at launching, there was held to be an appropriation to the buyer from the time of laying the keel; Simson, 2d August 1786, Mor. 14,204. And the doctrine of this case was afterwards adopted in the English courts; Woods v. Russell, 1822, 5 Barn. and Ald. 942. See Bell's Illust. i. 384. See the subject of Sale very ably treated in the late Mr Mungo Brown's "Treatise on Sale." See also Stair, B. i. tit. 14; More's Notes, p. lxxv.; Mr Brodie's Supp. 849; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 3; Bell's Com. i. 434; Bank. i. 407, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 85, et seq. 889; Illust. ib.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Bell on Purchaser's Title, ii. 142; Ross's Lect. ii. 65.

In the case of Hansen v. Craig, Feb. 4, 1859, 21 D. 432, a cargo of oil prepared for sale, weighed and lying ready for delivery, was sold. In the notes of sale which were exchanged the number of tons was stated, and a lump price per ton for the whole cargo. By the usage of the trade, the purchaser had right, either before or after delivery, to check the quantity and quality of the oil, and was entitled to a deduction for any sediments or "foots" that might be found in the casks. Before the delivery the greater part of the oil was burned. The Court held that the bought and sold notes afforded the means of ascertaining the price, and that the right to check the quantity and quality not being a suspensive condition, the contract of sale was complete, and the risk transferred to the purchaser. Lord Justice-Clerk INGLIS observed—"I hold that the sale of a mass of fungibles, certain and known by general description, but of unascertained extent, at a rate of price according to measure, weight, or number, is not a complete personal contract of sale, such as will operate a transfer of the risk to the buyer, until the mass shall have been measured, weighed, or counted, and so the price ascertained. It is the non-ascertainment of the price by the contract that makes the contract incomplete. How far, then, is this principle applicable to the case in hand? Does the statement of the quantity in the contract remove that uncertainty of the price which alone, in the case supposed, derogated from the completeness of the contract? I am of opinion that it does, and that the price in the case before us is not uncertain, because there is within the contract itself not a statement of the cumulo price certainly, but a statement of particulars which enables any man, without going beyond the contract, by simple arithmetical process, to ascertain the cumulo price for himself."

By the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, 1856, it is declared that goods sold, but not delivered, shall not be attachable by the creditors of the seller. When, also, the first purchaser, before delivery, sells to another, the original seller is not entitled to retain the subject in a question with the second purchaser, or other in his right, for any debt or obligation due by the original purchaser, but only for the price of the subject, or for performance of the obligations or conditions of the contract of sale. It is further declared, however, that any seller of goods may arrest or poind the goods sold while in his possession at any time prior to the date of the sale to a second purchaser being intimated to the original seller; and such arrestment or poinding has the same operation and effect in a competition as an arrestment or poinding by a third party. By the same Act, a seller is not now held to warrant goods unless he shall have given an express warranty of the quality or sufficiency of the goods, or unless the goods have been expressly sold for a specified and particular purpose.

Sale of Land. In Scotland, every proprietor of heritage must have a written title; and that legal rule, combined with the peculiarities connected with the Scotch system of records, renders the doctrine as to the sale of land, in some particulars, different from that as to the sale of moveables. In so far as this subject is connected with feudal conveyancing, see Disposition. Confirmation.

Resignation. Sasine. Precept of Sasine. Instrument of Sasine. Apparent Heir. Bounding Charter. Burgage. Charter. Charge. Cognition and Sasine. Consolidation. Conveyancing. Heir. Liferent. Missives. Prescription. Progress of Titles. Quæquidem. Redeemable Rights. Search of Incumbrances. Testing Clause. Titles to Land. Warrandice. And, in addition, the following rules as to the contract itself are important:—In the sale of heritable property writing is absolutely required, not only as a means of proof, but also as a solemnity without which the contract is not binding, although its existence be admitted, or offered to be proved aliunde, or even by oath of party. Even where the contract has been reduced into writing, it is not binding, rebus integris, if the writing be defective in the solemnities required by law, although the subscription should be acknowledged. Where the contract is in the form of an offer and acceptance, or of mutual missives, both writings must be probative. See Missives. There may, however, be an effectual bargain for the sale of heritage in the form of a unilateral obligation—e. g., of a promise or obligation to sell. In such cases, it is enough that the promise be contained in a probative writing binding the seller. Rei interventus may also bar the right of resiling from an informal written contract. See Rei Interventus. The completion of the contract raises an obligation on the seller's part to transfer the property of the subject to the purchaser, and to establish it in his person by a valid title. Until, therefore, such a title is offered to the purchaser, he is not obliged to pay the price. This right of the purchaser to object to a defective title may be renounced; and it is frequently agreed between the parties that the purchaser shall be satisfied with the title as it stands. The effect of such an agreement is to bar the purchaser from objecting to the title, or refusing to pay the price, on the ground of its being defective. See Progress of Titles. But it does not discharge the seller's obligation under the warrandice in case of eviction. In absence of such an agreement, where the seller's title is defective, the buyer is not entitled both to retain the price and the subject until a good title is offered. He must make his election either to pay the price or to renounce the bargain altogether. See, as to the sale of land, and the completion of titles, Bell on Purchaser's Title; Stair, B. i. tit. 10, § 9; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, § 2; Brown on Sale, 54, 232; Bell's Princ. § 889; Bell on Deeds, i. 144.

Sale and Return; is a contract by which goods are delivered by a wholesale dealer to a retailer, to be paid for at a certain rate, if sold again by the retailer; and if not sold, to be returned to the vendor. When no time is specified for the return, if the goods are not returned within a reasonable time, the contract becomes absolute, and the price may be recovered from the retailer as from a buyer. In a case of this kind in England, where the goods had not been returned within six months, the judge expressed his opinion that the sale had become absolute. *Bailey, Park. N. P. Salmon-Fishing. The right to fish for salmon in rivers and estuaries, within sea-mark, or where the sea ebbs and flows, otherwise than with the rod, is inter regalia, and cannot be exercised by a subject without a grant from the Crown. A grant is made either by an express conveyance of a salmon-fishing, cum piscatione salmonum, or by the conveyance of lands cum piscationibus, or cum piscariis, followed by forty years' possession of salmon-fishing; or by the erection of land into a barony. It has even been found that possession on a grant cum piscationibus by a subject-superior, himself entitled to salmon-fishing, followed by possession, is sufficient to establish the right. It has been repeatedly decided that following up a conveyance cum piscationibus, by fishing salmon with the net or spear, is not sufficient to establish a title to salmon-fishing. A right of salmon-fishing may be given to one who has no right to the lands on either side of the river; and the right to the fishing necessarily implies a power of dragging the fishing-nets to the adjacent banks; but it will not confer the right of constructing towing-paths on the banks of the river, or of making any erection in alveo fluminis. If a river should change its course, the right of fishing in this river will not be lost to the heritor entitled to it; but he may follow the river in its new course, and his exclusive right of fishing will remain as long as the water of the river can be distinguished from the water of the sea. Certain mechanical contrivances for taking salmon are prohibited by law, in rivers where the sea ebbs and flows, and in estuaries; and no practice, however long continued, will justify any illegal mode of fishing. See Salmon-nets. The right of cruive-fishing may be granted by the Crown, even though previous rights of fishing have been granted to other heritors, provided the cruive-fishing will not materially interfere with those rights. The form of the cruives and cruive-dikes, and various regulations as to this mode of fishing, are settled by statutes and decisions. The act Geo. IV. c. 39, directs that Saturday's sleep, and the width of the hecks or bars, as regulated by 1477, c. 73, shall be observed, under a penalty of from L.5 to L.20 for each offence. The old appointment for Saturday's slop is, that in all cruives the hecks be raised to the breadth of a Scotch ell (three feet one inch), from six o'clock on Saturday evening till sunrise on Monday; and the old breadth of the space between the bars or hecks is three inches. No contrivance, by covering the hecks with sheets or otherwise, whereby the passage of fish between them would be stopped, is lawful.

During a certain period of the year, called close-time, salmon-fishing is altogether prohibited. By the act 9 Geo. IV. c. 39, the close-time is, between the 15th October and 15th February succeeding for all but rod-fishing, and between 1st November and 15th February for rod-fishing; but the fishings in the Tweed and the Solway Firth are excepted from the operation of the act. The Tweed Fisheries Act, 1857, 20 and 21 Vict. c. 148, was amended by 22 and 23 Vict. c. 70, 1859; and by it the annual close-times are declared to extend from the 14th of September to the 15th of February for net-fishing, and from the 20th of November to the 1st of February for rod-fishing. The Tay Fisheries Act is 21 and 22 Vict. c. 26, 1858, and by it the annual close-time for net-fishing is declared to be from the 26th of August to the 1st of February; and for rod-fishing, from the 20th of September to the 1st of February. It is understood, however, that alterations of these acts are in contemplation.

In the case of Gammell v. the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, March 6, 1851, 13 D. 354, it was held that the salmon-fishings around the sea-coast of Scotland belong exclusively to and form part of the hereditary revenues of the Crown of Scotland, in so far as they may not have been specially the subjects of grants by charter or otherwise. This judgment was affirmed in the House of Lords, March 28, 1859. Lord CRAWFORTH had great difficulty in concurring from the impossibility of defining the extent to which the claim could go in regard to the sea. Lord WENSLEYDALE thought that it would be hardly possible to extend the subject seawards beyond the distance of three miles from the coast, which, by the law of nations, belonged to the country.

Salvage; is a reward or recompense given to those by whose labour or assistance a ship or goods, or any part thereof, have been saved from shipwreck, fire, or capture; being the cases to which such property is peculiarly exposed. This claim forms a burden on the property saved or recovered; and founds an action in the Court of Admiralty in rem, and at common law by lien; or a personal action or claim against the owner to whom the property is restored. The claim for salvage is not competent to the master or crew, however extraordinary their exertions may have been. But when their duty as seamen is over (as by capture), any successful effort thereafter made by them to recover, recapture, or rescue the ship, entitles them to salvage. The amount of salvage is fixed in some cases by statute, in others it is left to the discretion of the judge; and it is due by those who receive benefit by the exertions of the salvors. Sample, sale by. When goods are sold by sample, there is an implied warrandice that the bulk is of equal quality with the sample, otherwise the buyer is not bound to take it. The mere circumstance of a sample having been exhibited at the time of the sale, will not make it a sale by sample; because a sample may be produced, not as a warranty that the bulk corresponds to it, but to enable the purchaser to form a reasonable judgment of the commodity. The contract, therefore, must expressly refer to the sample, in order to raise the warranty that the bulk is equal to it. Sale by sample is not good against the landlord's hypothec. Brown on Sale, 337; More's Notes on Stair, lxxxii., cccvi.; Brodie's Supp. 912; Bell's Princ. § 93; Bell on Leases, i. 375; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Brown's Synop. 2184. Sanctuary. The Abbey of Holyrood House, as having been a royal residence, has the privilege of giving sanctuary to debtors in civil debts. To retire to the Abbey is, by the act 1696, c. 5, made one of the circumstances which, combined with insolvency, constitutes legal bankruptcy. The precincts of the palace, to which the privilege belongs, are extensive; and the whole are placed under the direction of a bailie, appointed by the Duke of Hamilton, as heritable keeper of Holyrood House. When a person retires to the sanctuary, he is protected against personal diligence from the instant he passes the confines, and this protection continues for twenty-four hours; but, in order to enjoy it longer, he must enter his name in the books kept by the bailie of the Abbey. This sanctuary affords no protection to a criminal; neither does it protect a Crown debtor, nor a fraudulent bankrupt, nor a person under an obligation to perform an act within his own power; nor does it protect the debtor against diligence for such debts as he may have contracted during his residence within the sanctuary. For personal execution on debts contracted within the sanctuary, there is a prison within the precincts. Where a person claims the benefit of the sanctuary who has no title to it, he may be taken into custody by an officer of the law, to which act the bailie of the Abbey gives his concurrence. The privilege of giving sanctuary was anciently enjoyed by many other places, as the Mint or "cunzie-house." The Castle of Edinburgh seems also to have been at one time considered as a sanctuary. The Palace of Holyrood House, however, and its precincts, are now the only sanctuary which the law of Scotland recognises. Bell's Com. ii. 570, et seq.; Bell's Princ. p. 682, and authorities there cited; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, § 25, and note by Ivory; Bank. iii. 14, et seq.; Ross's Lect. i. 331. Sasine. This term may signify either the act of giving legal possession of feudal property, or, colloquially, the instrument by which that fact is proved. The act of giving infeftment consisted in the grantor and receiver of the right, or rather, as generally happened, the bailie of the superior, and the attorney of the vassal, appearing on the ground of the lands or other subject in which the infeftment is to be given, in presence of a notary-public and two witnesses. The attorney took with him the charter or other warrant containing the precept of sasine, which he presented to the person who was to act as bailie, and required him to exercise the powers thereby committed to him: the bailie received the deed, and delivered it to the notary-public to be published to the witnesses present, which he did by giving a short explanation of the nature of the deed, and, strictly speaking, it was his duty to read the precept of sasine. The bailie then proceeded to the execution of his office, by delivering earth and stone of the ground to the attorney in name of his constituent, on which the attorney took instruments in the hands of the notary-public. This ceremony proceeded in presence of at least two male witnesses, and the whole was reduced into the form of a notarial instrument, describing the subject of the infeftment, and detailing the ceremony, and thus defining not only the nature and extent of the estate, but affording evidence of all the requisite forms having been complied with. This instrument was signed by the notary and by the two witnesses, and was the only evidence which the law recognised to prove that legal possession of feudal property had been taken. The instrument required to be recorded within sixty days after its date, either in the General Register of Sasines at Edinburgh, or in the

Particular Register of that district within which the lands are situated; and in competitions, it is by the date of the registration that its preference is regulated. See Registration. Disposition. Instrument. Notary. Evidence. Where lands were discontinuous, or, though contiguous, had descended from different authors, or from the same author by different titles, or were held by different tenures, or passed by different symbols, different acts of infeftment, or of delivery of sasine, were required to take place on each separate or discontinuous parcel. In property held burghage, the magistrates received resignation and gave sasine by one act, and one instrument was evidence of both, the town-clerk being notary. The sasine was then recorded in the books of the burgh within sixty days; 1681, c. 11. The provisions of 10 Geo. IV. c. 19, requiring that the notary's doquet should be recorded, are stated in the article Doquet. See Burghage. Cognition and Sasine. See generally, on the subject of Sasine, Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 16; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, §§ 17, 34, et seq.; Bank. B. ii. tit. 3, § 39, et seq.; Bell's Com. i. 21, 211, 670, et seq.; Bell's Princ. §§ 807, et seq., 842, 870; Illust. §§ 768, 872; *Kems' Stat. By the act 8 and 9 Vict. c. 35, 1845, a valid infeftment may be obtained without proceeding to the lands, or performing any act of infeftment thereon. All that is necessary is to produce to a notary-public the warrants of sasine and relative warrants, and to expedite and record, in the General or Particular Register of Sasines, an instrument of sasine, setting forth that sasine had been given in the lands contained in the warrant of infeftment, and subscribed by the notary and witnesses in the form annexed to the act. Such form of infeftment is effectual, whether the lands lie contiguous or discontinuous, or are held by the same or different titles, or of one or more superiors, and may be recorded at any time during the life of the party in whose favour the instrument has been expedited: but the date of the presentment and entry set forth in the instrument by the Keeper of the Record, is the date of the instrument. Where there is any error or defect in the instrument, a new instrument may be made and recorded; or where there is any defect in the recording of the instrument, it may be recorded anew; and in either case the instrument has effect from the date of the recording, as if no previous instrument had been made or recorded. Forms of the presentment and the instrument of sasine are given in the schedule annexed to the act. No change of title on the form of burgage sasines, excepting only that they were made valid and effectual if attested by the town-clerk as a notary, without the addition of his doquet, and by the witnesses, and that the delivery of symbols might be given either on the ground of the subjects, as formerly, or within the council-chamber of the burgh, by delivery of a pen. By the act 10 and 11 Vict. c. 49, 1849, however, the ceremony of the giving of pens was dispensed with.

By the Titles to Land Act, 21 and 22 Vict. c. 76, 1858, it is no longer necessary to expedite any instrument of sasine, but the conveyance may be recorded instead in the Register of Sasines. See Titles to Land.

Savings Banks. Previous to the year 1828, various statutes had been passed relative to savings banks in England, which were in that year consolidated and amended by 9 Geo. IV. c. 28. This was followed by 3 Will. IV. c. 14, respecting savings banks' annuities, and both of those acts were extended to Scotland by 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 57. There was formerly a statute as to such banks peculiar to Scotland; 59 Geo. III. c. 62. But that act is repealed in so far as relates to any savings banks to be established in future, and only remains in force as to all savings banks established under it, until they conform to the provisions of the English statutes. Such banks already existing are authorised to conform to the English acts in preparing and depositing their rules. The principal provisions of 9 Geo. IV. c. 28, are the following:—The institutions entitled to the benefits and privileges of the act are, any in the nature of a bank established by any number of persons in the kingdom forming themselves into a society to receive deposits of money for the benefit of the depositors, to accumulate the produce of so much as is not required by the depositors, their executors or administrators, at compound interest, and to return the whole or any part of the deposit and produce to the depositors, their executors or administrators (deducting the expenses of management), but without deriving any benefit from the deposit or its produce. No savings bank is entitled to the benefits of the act unless sanctioned by the justices of peace at the General Quarter Sessions, and by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, or by their comptroller-general or assistant-comptroller on their behalf; § 2. The rules and regulations must be entered in a book or books to be kept by an officer appointed for the purpose, and open at all reasonable times for the inspection of depositors. They must likewise be fairly transcribed on parchment, and the transcript deposited with the clerk of the peace for the county, who is directed to file it with the rolls of the sessions, and sign a certificate of its enrolment on a duplicate copy, to be provided by and returned to the savings bank on payment of a fee of ten shillings, provided it be returned within ten days. Alterations on the rules are not prohibited, but such alterations are not of force until entered in the aforesaid book or books, and enrolled and certified as above, on payment of a fee of five shillings; § 3. The rules, before being deposited with the clerk of the peace, must be submitted to a barrister appointed by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, who certifies in how far they are consonant, and in how far repugnant to law. The barrister's fee must not exceed L.1, 1s. The justices may reject any of the regulations, notice of which must be sent by the clerk of peace to two of the trustees; § 4. The rules, when entered and deposited, are binding on members and depositors, and a copy of the transcript may be received as evidence; § 5. The treasurer, trustee, or manager, or person having any control in the management of the bank, must derive no benefit from any deposit except the salaries and allowances provided by the regulations for the charges of management, and for remuneration to the officers, exclusive of the treasurer, trustees, managers, or other persons having direction in the management, who must not, directly or indirectly, have any allowance beyond their actual expenses; § 6. The treasurer and other officers in the receipt or custody of money must give security; § 7. The effects of the institution are vested in the trustees for the time being; § 8. No trustee or manager is personally liable except for his own acts, nor for anything done by him in virtue of his office in the execution of the act, except where guilty of wilful neglect or default; § 9. All persons who have received money or effects must, on demand made, in pursuance of an order of at least two trustees and three managers, or at any general meeting of trustees or managers, account for, and deliver up, the money and effects; § 10. Money, when invested by the trustees, must be invested in the Bank of England or Ireland. Provision is made for investing money to the account of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, &c.: §§ 11 to 16. The managers and trustees of any savings bank may, if they think fit, direct all interest due and payable to depositors to be calculated yearly, or twice a-year, and carried to the credit of the depositors, after which it becomes principal, and carries interest; § 17. Various provisions are made for the trustees of savings banks drawing money placed to their account in the National Debt Commissioners' books, for the appropriation of surplus funds, &c.; §§ 18 to 23. The interest payable to depositors must not exceed 2½d. per cent. per diem; § 24. Minors may deposit, and their receipt is declared to be a sufficient discharge; § 25. Where deposits are made by married women who have given no notice of their being such, or by women who have afterwards married, money may be paid to them in respect of such deposit, unless the husband or his representatives give notice of the marriage to the trustees, and require payment to be made to him or them; § 26. Charitable societies may invest their funds in a savings bank to the amount of L.100 in any one year, provided the whole amount invested never exceed L.300, exclusive of interest; § 27. Friendly societies may subscribe any portion of their funds into savings banks, except that no more than L.300, principal and interest, can be received, nor any interest paid; nor can interest be paid when the sum amounts to or exceeds L.300; § 28. The receipt of the treasurer, trustee, or other officer of a friendly or charitable society, is held a sufficient discharge; § 28. Members of friendly or charitable societies are not liable to penalty or disability in those societies by subscribing to any savings bank, even though the rules of such societies declare them to be so. Nor is any depositor subject to any penalty by reason of belonging to, or being interested in, the funds of any friendly or charitable society deposited in any other savings bank; §§ 30 and 31. No sum can be received without the name, employment, and residence of the depositor, which are entered in the books of the institution; § 32. Persons are empowered to subscribe as trustees on behalf of others; § 33. Subscribers to one savings bank cannot subscribe to any other, and a declaration to this effect must be made at the time of the deposit. The penalty of contravening this provision, or making a false declaration, is forfeiture of all the deposits to the sinking-fund. A printed notice of this regulation and prohibition must be affixed in the office for receiving deposits; § 34. More than L.30, exclusive of compound interest, cannot be received from depositors in one year, nor any sum or sums whatever making the sum to which the depositor is entitled exceed L.150 in the whole. In such questions the year is reckoned forwards from the 20th of November; and whenever the sums standing in the name of the depositor amount in the whole to L.200, principal and interest included, no interest is payable on such sum so long as it continues to amount to L.200; § 35. No fresh deposit can be received so long as the sums to which the depositor is entitled amount to or exceed L.150; § 37. The provisions of § 38, relative to re-deposits, are repealed by 3 Will. IV. c. 14. § 29. Provision is made for the granting of certificates, in case of deposits being withdrawn from one savings bank and placed in another; § 39. If a depositor die, leaving any sum in a savings bank exceeding L.50, it cannot be paid but upon the probate of the will or letters of administration. No duty is paid on the probate, or legacy, or residue of a deceased depositor, where his whole estate did not amount to L.50; and a certificate of his interest in the savings bank is taken as evidence thereof; § 40. Administration bonds, &c., for effects under L.50, are exempted from stamp-duty. Where the effects of persons dying intestate do not exceed L.50, they may be divided according to the rules of the savings bank; and if there are no rules made in that behalf, the trustees or managers may divide them according to the statute of distributions; § 41. It is enacted by 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 57, § 4, that where the English acts provide for payment made to any of the relations of any deceased intestate depositor, such provisions shall be held to apply to the next of kin according to the law of Scotland; and where they refer to probate of the will of the deceased, or letters of administration of his or her effects, and provide that they shall or shall not be received in the cases therein provided, the provisions shall be held to apply to confirmation by the law of Scotland, which shall be required or dispensed with as therein provided. Payment to persons appearing to be entitled to receive it as representatives, or under a probate, are declared to be valid as regards the liability of the savings bank; but the persons really entitled to payment have their recourse against the persons who have received the money; §§ 42 and 43. Powers of attorney, &c., given by trustees or depositors, are not liable to stamp-duty; § 44. Where disputes arise, they are directed to be referred to arbitrators, and in case of their not agreeing, to be settled by a barrister, whose fee must not exceed L.1, 1s.; § 45. Various provisions are made with respect to the making up accounts of progress, the computation of interest, the purchase of Exchequer bills, and other matters calculated to carry the purposes of the act into execution; §§ 46 to 62.

The act 3 Will. IV. c. 14, was passed with the view of enabling depositors in savings banks, and others, to purchase Government annuities through the medium of savings banks; and it also makes some amendments on the above act, 9 Geo. IV. c. 92.

The act 16 and 17 Vict. c. 45, 1853, entitled, "An Act to consolidate and amend the laws, and to grant additional facilities in relation to the purpose of Government Annuities through the medium of Savings Banks, and to make other provisions in respect thereof," repeals so much of 3 and 4, c. 14, and 7 and 8 Vict. c. 83, as relates to the purchase of Government annuities through the medium of savings banks. This act, among various other provisions, empowers the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt to grant to or for the benefit of any depositor in a savings bank, or other person whom the Commissioners may think entitled to be or to become a depositor in a savings bank, an immediate or deferred life annuity, depending on single lives, or immediate annuities, depending on joint lives, with benefit of survivorship, or on the joint continuance of two lives, to any amount not less than £4, nor more than £30 in the whole, to or for the benefit of any one person, and to receive payment for such immediate life annuities in one sum, and for such deferred life annuities, either in one sum, or in annual sums, payable for fixed periods; but no such annuities can be granted to or for the benefit of any person under the age of ten years. Life annuities purchased under this act are free from all taxes, charges, or impositions whatever, and are deemed personal estate. See also the acts 19 and 20 Vict. c. 41, 1856, and 22 and 23 Vict. c. 53, 1859.

Savings banks for seamen are regulated by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and by 19 and 20 Vict. c. 41, 1856, and military savings banks by the act 22 and 23 Vict. c. 20, 1859. By the act 22 and 23 Vict. c. 53, 1859, the trustees or treasurers of any penny savings bank, charitable or provident institution or society, or charitable donation or bequest for the maintenance, education, or benefit of the poor, are empowered to invest, with the approval of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, the funds of such bank, institution, or society, or the funds of any savings bank, without restriction as to amount.

Scandal; an injurious report circulated, or printed and published, which may be the foundation of either a criminal prosecution, or of a civil action of damages, or of a combination of both. All actions upon scandal, or verbal injuries for damages, although competent in inferior courts, may also be brought before the Court of Session. *Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 21; Bank. Scandalum Magnatum; words spoken in derogation of a peer, a judge, or other great officer of the realm. These words, although they would not be actionable in the case of a common person, yet when spoken in disparagement of persons of rank and station, are accounted criminal. In England, scandal of this description may be the ground of an action both for punishment and for damages. In Scotland, this offence is called leasing-making, the punishment of which has been greatly mitigated by the two recent statutes, 6 Geo. IV. c. 47, and 7 Will. IV. c. 5. Hume, i. 337, et seq.; Bank. B. i. tit. 2, § 33; tit. 10, § 36; and Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Leasing-making.

Schaffa Sagittarum; according to Skene, is a sheaf of arrows, containing twenty-four. (See Garba.) A sheaf of arrows contains sixteen "gades;" a sheaf of steel contains fourteen "gades." Skene, h. t.

Schedule of Poinding. When a poinding is completed, the messenger or officer who executes it leaves a schedule for the debtor of the particulars of the effects taken in virtue of the diligence, together with a copy of the letters and executions, signed by himself and the witnesses; and this serves for a discharge of the debt to the value of the pointed effects. Bell's Com. ii. 61; Ross's Lect. i. 437; Bell on Leases, ii. 313; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant.

Scheme of Division; in judicial procedure, is the name given to the state or cast, according to which it is proposed to divide a common fund amongst the several claimants thereon, or to allocate any fund or burden on the different parties liable. Such schemes of division are required in processes of competition; the most important being the action of ranking and sale. See Ranking and Sale. Multiplepoin ding. Sequestration.

Schools. By the act 1696, c. 26, the heritors of parishes where no parochial school has been before established, are ordered to provide a schoolhouse, and to modify a salary to the schoolmaster, not under L.100, and not above 200 merks Scots, to be proportioned according to the valued rent of the parish. If the heritors should neglect this duty, the presbytery are directed to apply to the commissioners of supply of the county, who, or any five of them, have power to establish a school, and settle a salary, in terms of the statute; and by 1693, c. 22, the sufficiency and qualification of the parochial schoolmasters, as well as their conduct after their admission, are to be judged of by the presbytery. The schoolmaster's salary and the poor's rates are divided equally between the heritor and the tenant; 1696, c. 26; 1663, c. 16; Kames' Abridg., voce Vagrant; Frsk. B. i. tit. 5, § 24; B. ii. tit. 6, § 42; Bank. B. i. tit. 6, § 16. Parochial schools, so far as regards parishes not entirely comprehended in royal burghs, are now regulated by the statute 43 Geo. III. c. 54, whereby it was enacted, that, within three months after 11th June 1803, the salaries of the schoolmasters were to be fixed at from 300 to 400 merks Scots, by the minister, and by the heritors of lands in the parish of L.100 Scots valued rent in the cess-books. In twenty-five years after that date, the heritors and minister were in like manner to modify a new salary according to the average price of oatmeal, to be ascertained by Exchequer, of the value of from one and a half to two chalders; and so on periodically, at intervals of twenty-five years. In case of neglect or wrong by the heritors and minister, application by the aggrieved party is made competent to the quarter sessions, within three months after such meeting ought to have been held, or such determination has been made. In extensive districts, the heritors and minister may appoint two masters, with an increased allowance, subject to appeal to the quarter sessions as to the division of the allowance. And where there is not a proper schoolhouse, a house for the schoolmaster, and a garden, containing at least one-fourth of a Scotch acre, the heritors of the parish must provide them; or, in certain cases, an equivalent for the garden, by authority of the quarter sessions. But the quarter sessions cannot legally alter the situation of a schoolhouse formerly established; Dawson, 18th Feb. 1809, Fac. Coll. The choice of the schoolmaster is vested in the minister and heritors; the person elected being found qualified by the presbytery as to morals, religion, and literature, and signing the Confession of Faith and Formula of the Church of Scotland. The determination of the presbytery as to the qualifications of the presentee (where they have proceeded in terms of the statute) is not subject to review in any court, civil or ecclesiastical. Their determination in cases of complaint against the schoolmaster, even if it should end in his dismissal, is also final, and not subject to review in any court; and, in general, the presbytery has an absolute control over the schoolmaster, with respect to the hours of teaching, the length of the vacation, and the like. But the presbytery has no superintendence of private schools. By 19 Geo. II. c. 39, however, no person can keep a private school for teaching English, Latin, Greek, or any part of literature, until the description of the school has been registered, and the master has qualified himself by taking the oaths to Government, under the pain of transportation. See also 21 Geo. II. c. 34, § 12. The law respecting schools and schoolmasters has been digested in Dunlop's Parish Law, 292, 321. The payments of the salaries of schoolmasters, from Martinmas 1855 to Martinmas 1859, has been regulated by the act 20 and 21 Vict. c. 59, 1857. And the same act provides that, after Martinmas 1859, the salaries shall be fixed according to the average fair prices of a chaldar of oatmeal in each county for the twenty-five years preceding and including the year and crop of 1858, the average being determined by the sheriff on or before the 1st of July 1859. See also 17 and 18 Vict. c. 78, 1854.

Schoolmaster's Right to Vote. The Reform Act, 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 65, § 7, provides, that when any property which would entitle the owner to be registered, and to vote, shall come to any person within the said period of six months before the making up of the lists, by appointment to any place or office, such person shall be entitled to be registered on the first occasion of making up the list of voters next following such acquisition. In virtue of this provision, many claims have been made by parochial schoolmasters; to whose office the right to a dwelling-house and garden is by law attached; and where the induction to the office and value of the property have been established, such claims have been admitted. If any person other than a parochial schoolmaster appointed in virtue of the acts of Parliament mentioned in last article claim on premises which he occupies as a schoolmaster, he must show a right for life. A schoolmaster appointed by a society, who can remove him at pleasure, was rejected. It has even been doubted whether any other than a parochial schoolmaster can be said to be a person holding a place or office, in the sense of the Reform Act. Claims have been made by parochial schoolmasters on the schoolhouse, on the play-ground, on the salary, and on the allowance made when there is no garden. But the majority of the appeal courts have found that these subjects are not to be taken into account, and that the only subjects on which the schoolmaster can claim, as attached to his office, are the dwelling-house and garden. Scots Money. When money is mentioned in the acts of the Scots Parliaments, or in public or judicial proceedings prior to the Union, and even for a considerable time thereafter, Scots money is meant, unless the contrary be expressed. Sterling money is twelve times the value of the same denomination of Scots money. The following table of the relative values of Scots and sterling money may be of service:—

Scots.	Sterling.
A doyt or penny, is - -	L.0	0	0 $\frac{1}{12}$
A bodle, or twopence, - -	0	0	0 $\frac{1}{6}$
A plack, groat, or fourpence, 0 0	0	0	0 $\frac{1}{4}$
A shilling, - - - - -	0	0	1
A merk, or 13s. 4d. (two-thirds of a pound), - - - -	0	1	14 $\frac{2}{3}$
A pound, - - - - -	0	1	8

A table will be found at the end of the article Money, in the Enc. Brit., containing the comparative value of Scotch coin, at various periods in our early history. See also Tait's Justice, h. t.

Scrutiny. No scrutiny is allowed by or before any returning officer with regard to any votes given or tendered at any election. But persons whose claims to be registered have been rejected may tender their votes, which are entered by the sheriff, being distinguished from the votes of registered persons, so that an election committee may have it in their power to give effect to such votes, in deciding upon the validity of a disputed election; 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 65, § 26. See Reform Act. In the election of a trustee in a sequestration, the judgment of the sheriff is final, and in no case subject to review. See the act 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, 1856. Sea and Sea-shore. It is a question which has been frequently discussed, whether the sea is open to all, or whether it may not be appropriated by particular nations. In this country, while it has been admitted that the ocean is incapable of appropriation, it has, on the other hand, been maintained that the seas which wash the coast of any state may be appropriated. The seas and sea-shores of Great Britain are inter regalia; that is, they are held by the Crown for the behoof of the public. This right of lordship comprehends the right to free navigation, to fishing, to taking wrecks, to forbid passage to enemies, the right of flag, of jurisdiction, &c. The shore comprehends all between high and low water mark. It has been decided in England, that land gained from the sea by sudden recess goes to the Crown; but that what is gained by imperceptible addition becomes the property of the neighbouring proprietor. In Scotland, the shore is presumed to be part and pertinent of the adjacent land, under the burden of the right of the Crown, as trustee for the public uses. Accordingly, where lands are described as bounded by the sea or sea-shore (between which there is no substantial distinction), the grantee has an absolute right of property down to the shore or high-water mark, and the above modified right of property in the shore, or down to the low-water mark. No one can, on any pretence, interpose between such a grantee and the shore. In the case of Macalister v. Campbell, Feb. 17, 1837, 15 S. 490, it was found not necessary to the possession of the shore, as part and pertinent, and to the exclusive use of the wreck, shell-sand, sea-ware, &c., which such possession confers, that the titles of the proprietor of the contiguous lands should describe them as bounded by the sea or sea-shore. It was held sufficient that, de facto, the lands were notoriously part of the coast, and washed by the sea; Stair, B. ii. tit. 1, § 5; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 2, § 6; tit. 6, § 17; Bank. i. p. 82; Bell's Princ. § 641; Ilust. ib. Hutch. Just. ii. 377; Brown's Synop. 1892. See Kelp.

In the case of Paterson v. Marquis of Ailsa, March 11, 1846, 8 D. 752, it was held that a proprietor of lands, de facto bounded by the sea, with a clause of parts and pertinents in his Crown title, although there was not a sea boundary expressed in it, was entitled to resist an action of declarator by a proprietor of lands lying near the sea-shore, of his right to gather sea wreck and ware on the shore. Lord MONCRIEFF observed, "I think it clear that the defender has a title abundantly sufficient to enable him to secure by prescriptive possession an exclusive right to gather the wreck and sea-ware on the sea-shore opposite to his own lands. My opinion on the case goes further than this, for I think that he would have that right independent of any prescriptive possession, at least if no adverse possession could be proved." In the case of Officers of State v. Smith, March 11, 1846, 8 D. 711, affirmed July 13, 1849, 6 Bell, 487, it was held that the Crown had a title to prevent any encroachment by the proprietors of ground adjoining the sea-shore upon the enjoyment of the shore by the lieges for the purpose of passage or relaxation. In the case of Sir John Hall v. Willis, Jan. 14, 1852, 14 D. 324, it was held that a proprietor of lands adjoining the sea, and erected into a barony, with a clause of parts and pertinents, and a general grant of fishing, had not a sufficient title to exclude the public from taking limpets and other shell-fish adhering to the rocks below high-water mark or the shore of his lands, provided these rocks were accessible without trespass.

Sea-Greens; are those grounds which are overflowed in spring-tides. These, on the assumption that the sea-shore comprehends that over which the tide flows, have been supposed to be inter regalia. But, by the custom of Scotland, the shore is not held to extend further than to that point which the sea reaches in common tides; and, therefore, sea-greens are held to be private property. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 17; Bank. B. i. tit. 3, § 4; Bell's Princ. § 644; Bell on Leases, i. 357; Hutch. Just., ii. 379, 450; Brown's Synop. 797, 2249. See Warr.

Seal of Cause. Most royal burghs, and many superiors of burghs of barony, have conferred upon them in their charters the power of constituting subordinate corporations or crafts. The grant or charter by which such a constitution is given, and which defines the privileges and powers to be possessed by the subordinate corporation, is called the seal of cause. A seal of cause cannot be rescinded or infringed by the corporation in whose favour it was granted, without consent of the magistrates and council who granted it; Crooks, Dec. 4, 1776, M. 2007. If a seal of cause granted to the corporation B. refer to and bestow the exclusive privileges contained in the seal of cause granted to the corporation A., it has been decided, where one of the seals of cause had been lost, that the seal of cause of A. forms a good title for B. enjoying these privileges; Mowat, June 1, 1825, 4 S. & D. 52. In the report of this case, a verbatim copy of the seal of cause is given. See Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 64, note by Ivory; Bell's Princ. § 2185; Brown's Synop. 315, 404. See Community. Burgh Royal.

Seals. Anciently, when writing was not a common accomplishment, deeds were executed by sealing; which, however, came to be superseded by subscriptions. See Deed. Testing Clause. Subscription. And now, royal grants are the only deeds which, in Scotland, are authenticated by means of seals. There are different seals, which, in practice, are applied to different purposes. As, 1. The Great seal, which, since the Union, has been altered, and a new Great seal for the private affairs of Scotland introduced. By the articles of Union, it is declared to come in place of the former Great seal; but no change has been made on the other seals. Under the Great seal are authenticated charters and grants of lands, and gifts when the lands hold of the Crown, as also the commissions to the principal officers of the Crown, as to the Lord Justice-Clerk, King's Advocate, Solicitor, &c. 2. The Privy seal is used for grants and presentations to lesser offices and to the transference of moveables, and whatever rights a subject may transmit by assignation; but moveables may be conveyed under the Great seal, if conveyed along with some feudal subject. 3. The Quarter seal is so called from its having been originally the quarter, and merely the testimonial of the Great seal. Under this seal commissions of tutory, gifts of bastardy, forfeiture, or of ultimus hæres, where the lands hold of a subject superior, are passed; for, where the lands hold of the Crown, these gifts pass the Great seal. By 1587, c. 82, commissions to the justice-depute pass this seal. 4. The Signet; for although Erskine (B. i. tit. 4, § 39) considers it as the seal of the Court of Session, yet this is obviously a mistake. The Signet existed before the Court of Session was established; the writs which passed under it were the private letters or orders of the King, directed "to sheriffs in that part," authorizing them to summon parties before the King's Court, or to execute the diligence of the law. It is more than probable that, when the briefes and forms of the old law came to be disused Signet Letters, as they are termed, succeeded them; and that the orders of the King were given to the sheriffs in that part (that is, to messengers-at-arms, who were, for the special purpose mentioned in the letters, invested with the powers of the judge ordinary), as to supply all that was requisite for calling parties before the King's Court, or for carrying its sentences into execution. In this way, the Letters passing the Signet, for the purpose of judicial procedure, received the warrant of the King's Court; and it has been inferred that the Court of Session, on its institution, continued the practice which had been previously established. Hence the Signet is not properly the seal of a court, though it answers the purposes of one; but a seal of ginally intended to authenticate the King's warrants connected with the administration of justice. Formerly, in expediting Crown charters, the signatures passed in Exchequer were the warrants of precepts under the Signet, which were directed to the Great seal, for the purpose of completing a royal grant. *Ersk. By the act 10 and 11 Vict. c. 51, 1847, signatures and precepts to Chancery, as preliminary to the granting of charters, are abolished.

Seamen; are either sailors in the royal navy, or in the merchant or fishing service. All persons using the sea (as it is expressed) are liable to be impressed for the navy, by authority of impress warrants from the Admiralty. There are, however, certain exceptions to this rule. Thus, generally, all persons under eighteen or above fifty-five years of age; all persons during two years after beginning to use the sea; apprentices to the sea service during three years from the dates of their indenture, unless they formerly used the sea; and seamen who have bona fide retired from the sea service. There are also certain particular exemptions, such as the masters of fishing vessels, having at least one apprentice under sixteen years, bound for five years and fishing; other persons connected with the fishing and coal trade are exempted; 13 Geo. II. c. 17. A seaman of the navy cannot be taken out of the service by any process or execution, unless for some cause criminal, or unless the plaintiff, or some one for him, makes affidavit before a judge of the court out of which the process issues, or before some person authorised to take affidavits in such courts, that the cause of action amounts to £20; a memorandum of which oath must be marked on the back of the process or writ, without fee. A seaman cannot be arrested otherwise; but a plaintiff, on giving notice to the seaman personally, or leaving it at the place where he resided before entering into the navy, may have judgment and execution other than against the person of the seaman; 31 Geo. II. c. 10, §§ 28-9. A petty officer or seaman who has been arrested for debt or crime is not discharged on payment of the debt, or termination of the imprisonment; but is delivered to the commander-in-chief of some of the royal ships, or some commissioned officer authorised to raise seamen, or some principal regulating officer of the impress, whichever is nearest; 44 Geo. III. c. 13. Provision is made by several statutes to enable petty officers of the navy, seamen, non-commissioned officers of marines, boatswains, gunners, and carpenters in the navy, to allot part of their pay to their wives, mothers, or children. The statute 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 24, was passed with a view of encouraging the voluntary enlistment of seamen, and making regulations for manning the navy. By this act the term of service in the navy is limited to five years. If the ship be abroad when the term of service of seamen expires, provision is made for their being sent home by the earliest opportunity. The admiral, or commanding officer of the squadron or fleet in which a seaman whose term has expired is serving, is empowered, in case of emergency, to detain him six months longer, with one-fourth increase of pay. Seamen under arrest for trial, when their service expires, cannot be discharged till after their trial. Seamen, though entitled to be discharged, must perform their duties, and be amenable to naval discipline until actually discharged. Seamen, when discharged after a service of five years, are entitled to receive protections from service in the navy for two years. Provision is made by the same statute for bounties and other privileges to volunteers.

Merchant Seamen; have been the subject of various statutory regulations; but these have all been repealed by 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, 1854, and 18 and 19 Vict. c. 91, 1855, which consolidates the law as to this matter.

Search of Incumbrances. It is of importance for a lender or a purchaser to discover the burdens which affect the borrower's or seller's estate. The system of records in Scotland furnishes the most advantageous means for this purpose, which is effected by what is technically called a Search. A search of the records comprehending a period of forty years is supposed to give sufficient security. But to render the search complete, it ought to be continued down to the date of the recording of the purchaser's sasine, for, without this, the purchaser is exposed to the risk of a new sasine being recorded between the date of signing the disposition and the registration of the sasine following on it. In practice, however, purchasers generally trust to the execution of the disposition, and pay the price on the delivery of that deed; and there is no known instance of the seller taking advantage of this opportunity to defraud the purchaser. A search embraces the following particulars: 1st, A search of the General and Particular Register of Sasines; 2dly, A search of the Record of Abbreviates of Adjudications; and, 3dly, A search of the General and Particular Register of Inhibitions. If the property consist of burgage subjects, a search of the Record of Sasines kept in the burgh must be produced; and a search of the Dean of Guild Record of Jedges and Warrants is sometimes demand; for by these a preferable security over burgage subjects may be created, discoverable from no other record. But there are certain dangers against which a search, even for the whole period of the long prescription, affords no protection, and others against which it affords only a partial protection. Thus, against litigiosity, a search furnishes no protection. This is a legal restraint imposed on a debtor for the benefit of those creditors who have commenced diligence for attaching his heritage. The diligences by which heritage is affected are inhibition and adjudication; and in both of these litigiosity takes place. In executing the inhibition, there are three stages: 1. The execution of the diligence against the debtor; 2. Its publication against the lieges, prohibiting them from taking any right from the debtor; and, 3. The act of registration in the county within which the lands lie, or in the General Register at Edinburgh. Litigiosity commences at the completion of the second stage, and a sale by the debtor after that period will be struck at by the inhibition. The security thus afforded to creditors against all voluntary deeds granted after publication, is conditional on their perfecting their diligence by registration; hence, during the forty days within which the inhibition may be recorded, there is a risk against which a search affords no protection. In the case of adjudications, litigiosity commences from the date of citation. Litigiosity strikes against voluntary deeds only; and a deed granted in implement of a previous obligation is unchallengeable. Delay or mora in the completion of the diligence constitutes another exception to the doctrine of litigiosity. Thus, in one case, a delay of four, and in another of two, years in completing an adjudication was held sufficient to take off the effect of litigiosity, and render the deeds of the debtor binding. There are other dangers to the purchaser which cannot be discovered from the records. The plea of death-bed, and the fraud or forgery of the author, are each a ground of reduction of a deed, and constitute a labes realis even in the hands of an onerous holder. The act 1661, c. 24, declares, that no right or disposition granted by the apparent heir of a deceased proprietor shall be valid, in so far as it prejudices the creditors of the deceased, unless granted a full year after the defunct's death. A purchaser, therefore, from the heir within the year, is exposed to this risk. The granting of a deed gratuitously in favour of conjunct and confident persons, is a ground of reduction which follows the subject into a purchaser's hands. (See Conjunct and Confident.) Servitudes enter no record, and are yet effectual against a purchaser. The legal liferents of terce and courtesy are burdens affecting heritage in the hands of a purchaser, wherever the marriage has been dissolved before the purchaser has been infeft. Such are the burdens which do not enter the records, and against which a search has no protection. To ascertain them, therefore, inquiries must be made in other quarters. There is also a class of dangers discoverable from the records, but which may escape notice in a search for forty years. The minority of the parties entitled to challenge the right of the party in possession, is deducted in reckoning the years of the long prescription; and if it appears from the progress of the seller's or borrower's titles that there is any reason to apprehend such an interruption, the search ought to be extended farther back than the forty years. Yet the purchaser is bound to accept of a feudal title standing in the seller or his predecessors for forty years, unless he can show a precise burden still subsisting. See Progress. Prescription may be interrupted by the raising of an action, and there is a register where citations for interrupting prescription are recorded which ought to be examined, although it is seldom done. Prescription begins to run against heritable securities, not from the date of the security, or its entering the record, but from the time that no demand has been made by the creditor, or no interest paid; so that the fact, that no sasine on an heritable bond appears on record for forty years back, is not sufficient evidence that the land is unaffected by heritable debts. Prescription against an inhibition raised on a depending action begins to run, not from the date of the inhibition, but from the date of the decree in the action. Prescription on an infeftment in real warrandice does not begin to run until eviction has actually taken place. These burdens, like the former, are here adverted to, in order that conveyancers, in conducting a search, may have in view the dangers against which the usual search of the records is no guarantee, and, according to circumstances, direct such farther inquiries as prudence may suggest. Ross's Lect. ii. 384; Bell on Purchaser's Title, 365; Jurid. Styles, i. 301. See Burdens. Incumbrances. Record.

Seats in Churches. In landward parishes in Scotland, the area of the church is divided among the heritors according to their valued rents. The area of a parish partly landward and partly within a town ought to be apportioned, like the expense of building the church, according to the real rents of the owners of lands and houses. Where part of the parish is within a burgh, if the burgh, as a community, bear the expense of building in proportion to the rent of the property within burgh, it would seem that they are entitled to a share of the area in the same proportion, which they may let or dispose of to the inhabitants. The patron of the parish, at least, if likewise an heritor, is entitled to a family-seat for himself, in the choice of which he has a preference over all the heritors. See Patronage. The Court, in one or two cases, have recognised a species of right to church-seats, of the nature of private property, in parties neither heritors nor inhabitants of the parish. The minister is entitled to a seat for his family; and seats are generally set apart for the poor. Each heritor is entitled to have a seat for his family, which is taken into account in making up his share of the area. The right of priority of choice after the patron is determined by the amount of valuation of the several heritors. After all the heritors have selected their family-seats, they choose, in the same order, each as much of the area as will make up the share to which he is entitled; and it would appear, that what he chooses ought to be all in one place. An heritor not satisfied with the division made by the other heritors may challenge it, and insist in a process of division before the sheriff. The sheriff's judgment is subject to the review of the Court of Session. The area assigned to each landward heritor does not become his private property; it is merely an inseparable pertinent of the lands, for the accommodation of his family and of his tenants, and others dwelling on his property. An heritor may sell the materials of a seat which he has erected upon his area at his own expense. Although there does not seem to be any restriction of the heritor's right to dispose of his title to sit in his family-seat, he cannot exclude his tenants and others dwelling on the property from occupying his portion of the area; and suitable accommodation in that part of the area of the parish church which belongs to the landlord is held to be included in a lease of lands. In town churches, or in that part of a church in a parish partly landward and partly in a town which has been assigned to be community generally, the magistrates may let the seats; and it is the practice for them to make them a source of revenue. In the case of Clapperton v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, July 14, 1840, it was held that the magistrates were not entitled to levy seat rents for the purpose of increasing the revenue of the burgh. Where a parish is partly within burgh and partly landward, and the community has a share assigned to them, they would appear to be entitled to a seat for their magistrates. The law with regard to the division of church areas has been clearly stated by Mr Dunlop, Parochial Law, 30. Seaworthiness. Questions frequently arise relative to the implied condition of seaworthiness, both in the contract of affreightment and of insurance. The obligation is, "that the ship shall be tight, staunch, and strong, properly manned, and provided with all necessary stores, and in all respects fit for the intended voyage." A distinction, however, must be taken between the condition of seaworthiness in insurance and in affreightment. In the former, it is a warranty, the breach of which voids the contract; in the latter, it is only part of the contract of the shipowners, and the want of it gives relief from the hire, or grounds a claim of damages. In affreightment, ignorance of the defect does not avail the owners; nor will the most regular and formal survey at setting out on the voyage have any other effect than to strengthen the evidence in their favour, should the vessel be wrecked in questionable circumstances. In insurance, in like manner, no ignorance or innocence on the part of the insured will be an answer to the fact that the ship was unfit for the voyage. Seaworthiness is presumed; and it is not sufficient for the underwriter to prove that the ship became unseaworthy after the risk began, but if the ship spring a leak, or go down, or become unnavigable without adequate cause, unseaworthiness will be inferred. The opinion of the carpenters who repaired a vessel, although it strengthens the presumption, is not conclusive proof of seaworthiness. Disrepair of any kind left in the hull, rigging, sails, ground-tackling, &c. of a vessel, is a breach of this warranty. Overloading may make a vessel unseaworthy. The policy is binding if the defect have been discovered and remedied before any harm is done, provided this occasions no delay or deviation not authorised by the underwriters. See Bell's Com. i. 550, and Bell's Illust. § 477, for cases as to what amounts to a breach of the warranty of seaworthiness. See Abbott's Law of Shipping. Sedition; consists in attempts made, by meetings, or by deed, word, or writing, of whatever kind, to disturb the tranquillity of the State, to produce public trouble or commotion, and to excite the subjects to the dislike, resistance, or subversion of the established government. Sedition is distinguished from leasing-making in this respect, that the object of leasing-making is to disparage or prejudice the private character of the Sovereign, whereas sedition is directed against the order and tranquillity of the State; and although the two offences may be combined, yet the great distinction seems to be, that the offence against the Sovereign, in the former case, is of an individual nature, extending no farther than to the person of the King; whereas sedition, by whatever means it may attain its object, is an attack upon Government and the constitution of the State. Where this offence is carried the length of tumultuous meetings for the professed purpose of altering the constitution, it assumes a different character, and becomes treason. The punishment of sedition was formerly arbitrary; but by 6 Geo. IV. c. 67, it was restricted to fine and imprisonment, with an alternative of banishment on a second offence. This alternative, however, was taken away by 7 Will. IV. c. 5. See Hume, i. 544; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 29; *Hutch. Seduction. An action of damages is competent at the instance of a husband against the seducer of his wife; and that although the husband have not previously raised an action of divorce against his wife. Semplena Probatio; has been defined, "something less than proof, and more than suspicion; per Lord Gillies in M'Crone, 9th June 1831, 9 S. & D. 692. It has also been said, "that a semplena probatio does not mean merely a suspicion: That suspicion depends merely on the turn of mind of the person who suspects; some persons suspecting merely where there is possibility; but that a semplena probatio must amount to such evidence as induces a reasonable belief, though not complete evidence;" per Lord President Blair in Craig v. Creighton, June 14, 1809, Fac. Coll. In M'Laren v. M'Culloch, June 12, 1844, 6 D. 1133, Lord MACKENZIE defined semplena probatio to be such a measure of probation as, taken along with what is to be added to it, viz., the oath of the pursuer, makes a plena probatio—such an amount of proof, that when to it shall be added the oath of the pursuer, it will be reasonable to be satisfied that the case is established against the defender; and in this definition Lord JEFFREY concurred. Whenever semplena probatio is made out (which is in all cases a question of evidence), the pursuer is entitled to the oath in supplement. When a merchant's books are regularly kept, there is semplena probatio that they are correct, and his oath in supplement is competent to prove the truth of what is contained in them; Ivory, Feb. 21, 1816, 4 Dow, 467. But the most frequent cases in which questions of semplena probatio occur are actions of filiation, or for the aliment of bastard children. Whenever the pursuer is able to make out acts of indecent or suspicious familiarity on the part of the putative father, or other the like circumstances, inducing a reasonable belief that he is the father of her child, she is entitled to her oath in supplement to that effect. Such cases necessarily depend entirely upon specialties; but the inclination of the Court may be gathered from such as have been decided, several of which are noted in Macglashan vs. Aliment, p. 80. See also Stair, B. iv. tit. 44, § 9; tit. 45, § 17 (2); Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 50, and note by Mr Ivory; B. iv. tit. 2, § 14, Bank. ii. 630; Bell's Princ. § 2061.

Since the passing of the act 16 Vict. c. 20, by which parties are made admissible as witnesses, it may be doubted whether an oath in supplement would now be allowed, as the reason for allowing such evidence no longer exists. In the case of Scott v. Chalmers, Dec. 2, 1856, 19 D. 119, which was a case of filiation, Lord Justice-Clerk HOPK observed,—"I do not think, though it is not necessary to determine that in the present case, that the provisions of the former law are still in force, allowing to the pursuer in those actions the benefit of giving an oath in supplement if the case made out a semplena probatio. Her oath in supplement was allowed because she could not be a witness, while the nature of her case, implying secret matters, required that her oath should be allowed. But now she is allowed to be a witness, and what can she require more?" Lord Wood observed,—"There may perhaps be reason to doubt whether the old law of semiplena has been wholly abrogated. If the pursuer do not offer herself as a witness, and the defender does not put her into the witness-box, I am not sure that we might not have to proceed upon the old law, and to consider whether or not a semiplena probatio had been made out without her evidence, and if satisfied that it had been, to admit her oath in supplement. But upon such a state of the case I give no opinion now, it not being necessary for the decision of that which is before the Court."

Separation of Married Persons; may be either the act of the law, or it may proceed on a voluntary contract. 1. Where a husband deserts his family, turns his wife out of the house, or abuses her "in such a manner as to render her condition quite uncomfortable," she may apply to the Court of Session either for a separate aliment, or to the same Court, as coming in place of the Commissaries, for a decree of separation, finding her husband liable to support her during her continuing to live as his wife separate from him. 2. An agreement to live separate may be entered into extrajudicially between husband and wife. But if the husband express his readiness to receive his wife again into his family, or if the wife consent to return to it, the contract of separation is at an end; although a judicial separation may notwithstanding be applied for by either party. The wife cannot sue her husband for aliment during voluntary separation; and although, at the time of entering into the contract of separation, the husband may have assigned her an aliment, he is entitled to recall it at any time, if he, at the same time, offer to receive her back. The wife's only remedy is to return to his house, or to obtain a judicial separation, which, if there be good grounds for it, is competent, notwithstanding the voluntary separation. *Bank. Sepulchres, Violating. Although the abstraction of a corpse before interment may be prosecuted as theft, yet the violation of a sepulchre is not considered as such, but as an indecency and a crime sui generis. Sequestration. Under this name are comprehended two proceedings of characters very different—the sequestration of land estates, and the sequestration, in a mercantile bankruptcy, of the whole estate, both heritable and moveable, of a bankrupt. The former is intended to preserve a disputed property from dilapidation or waste; the latter to convert into money, and distribute the estate equitably amongst the creditors of the bankrupt.

1. Sequestration of land estate.—During the dependence of a process of ranking and sale, or where two or more creditors are in competition for the property of a land estate, the owner of which is bankrupt, or nearly so, and none of the competitors has attained possession, or where the right to a land estate is the subject of litigation, the Court may, if they think proper, sequester the rents, and appoint a judicial factor, to preserve the estate, collect the rents, and manage or dispose of the whole, under the authority of the Court, for behoof of those in whose favour the Court shall in the end decide. But where one of the competing parties is in possession, under a title which is the subject of an action of reduction, the Court will not sequester the rents, or appoint a factor on the application of one of the competitors; Ralston, June 18, 1831, 9 S. & D. 766. By Act of Sederunt, it is not competent to present a petition praying for the sequestration of a land estate after 27th Feb. in the winter, or 25th June in the summer session; A. S. 17th July 1764; A. S. 5th June 1790. The judicial factor must find caution for his intrusions and actings; and within six months after his appointment, he must make up a rental of the estate, and a list of arrears, which he must deposit with the clerk to the process, as forming the charge against him. The judicial factor must also, under penalties prescribed by Act of Sederunt, make up and lodge with the clerk annually a scheme of his accounts, showing the charge and discharge; A. S. 22d Nov. 1711; 13th Feb. 1730. By another Act of Sederunt, July 31, 1690, the judicial factor is liable for the interest of the rents recovered, or which might have been recovered, from a year after the term they fell due. The factor-fee is settled by the Court, and is fixed commonly at five per cent. on the amount of the intrusions. See Commission. Judicial Factor. A judicial factor can make no payment, and carry through no sale, without the warrant of the Court; and when he acquires right to any debt affecting the subject, it operates as a complete discharge of the debt. The judicial factor is discharged of his office by the Court, and he accounts to the party found to have the best right, or to the preferable creditor; and upon paying over the balance in terms of the order of Court, his bond of caution is given up. The cautioner may at any time apply to have his bond of caution delivered up, when the Court will order new caution; and the factor's proceedings may at all times be brought under review of the Court by petition and complaint at the instance of those having interest therein. Bell's Com. ii. 262; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 55, et seq.; Stair, B. i. tit. 13, § 5; B. iv. tit. 41, § 7; tit. 50, § 27; More's Notes, pp. lxxviii. cccxciv.; Bank. i. 377; ii. 312, 239; Bell's Princ. §§ 2418–22; Shand's Prac. 980. See Judicial Sale. Factor. Trustee. Judicial Factor. Petition and Complaint.

2. Sequestration in a mercantile bankruptcy.—This sequestration is awarded under the statute 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, 1856, on an application to the Court of Session by the bankrupt himself, with the concurrence of one or more creditors having the undermentioned qualification, or, where the bankrupt does not concur, on the application of one creditor of L.50, or of two creditors whose aggregate debt is L.70, or of three or more creditors whose aggregate debt amounts to L.100 and upwards. Sequestration may also be awarded of the estate of a deceased debtor on the petition of a mandatory to whom he had granted a mandate to apply for sequestration, or on the petition of a creditor or creditors who have the above qualification. The general provisions of this statute have been already given in the article "Bankrupt." See Alexander's Digest of the Bankrupt Act. Kinnear's Law of Bankruptcy. M'Brair's Practice in Bankruptcy.

Sequestration for Rent. Sequestration is the judicial means by which the landlord makes his right of hypothec effectual. Sequestration is obtained on a summary petition to the sheriff, setting forth the arrears and praying for a warrant to sequester the crop and other articles subject to the hypothec, and for warrant to sell to the extent of the arrears. The first deliverance on this petition is a warrant to sequester as prayed, and an appointment on the tenant to answer the petition. The application may be made both where there are arrears due, and where the landlord has reason to apprehend that the tenant is endeavouring to deprive him of his hypothec by displenishing the farm or removing his effects, or where the credit of the tenant is suspected. The sequestration renders special the landlord's right, which was before general, and makes it attach to each individual article sequestered, so as to entitle the landlord to recover the property or the value of the cattle, &c., into whose hands soever they may have gone. The regular issue of the application for a sequestration is a roup and sale of the goods for payment of the rent. See the form of the petition, of the sheriff's deliverance, and of the inventory of the goods sequestered, in Bell on Leases, ii. 318. Seranterie; was, according to Skene, a tenure common in England. "Grande seriantye," was where a man held his lands of the King, with the reddendo of passing with him in his host, or bearing his banner with him in his wars, or leading his host or army. "Petit seriantye" was when one held his lands of the King, paying a knife or buckler, a sheaf of arrows, or the like service; Edw. I.; Skene, h. t.

of weights and measures, contained fourscore stones, a term chiefly used in the accounts of merchants and shipmasters (skippers). A "sek" (sack) of wool contained 24 stones, and by the daily calculation of merchants, 40 stones Troy, although this was not invariable. Each stone Troy contained 16 pounds Troy, and each pound 16 ounces. Each "tunne" contained 6 cwt. Troy, and each cwt. five-score pounds, or $6\frac{1}{2}$ stones Troy. "A last of gudes fured hame" (imported), commonly contained 12 barrels, or half a serplath. A last was two packs, and each pack was as great as half a sack of wool-skins, and contained in weight 36 "Sprusse" stones. A Sprusse stone contained 28 pounds Troy. For every last of wax imported by strangers there were 14 ship pounds, and imported by Scotch shipmasters, 12 ship pounds. There were 12 great or 14 small barrels for the last of tar, pitch, and such-like wares. By strangers, 24, and by Scotch "skippers," 18 barrels of rye-meal were imported for the last, and a last of rye was sometimes 18 and sometimes 19 holls in measure. Ten packs of wool made a last of wool. Ten hides made a daiker, and 20 daikers made a last; 12 dozen of gloves or "ladder poyntes" made a gross, and a great gross contained 12 single gross. Ten stones of brass made a barrel. Six barrels of English drinking bear made a tun. Twelve barrels of salmon were bought for the last; but in "furing" them over the sea, skippers counted only 9 barrels for the last. The fiddler of lead contained nearly 6 score and 8 stones. A "ship pound" contained $16\frac{1}{2}$ stones of Scotch Troy weight. Six score skins or ells of woollen cloth were counted to the hundred. Skene, h. t. See Weights and Measures.

Service of an Heir. Before an heir can regularly acquire a right to the estate of his ancestor, he ought to be served heir, which formerly proceeded upon a brieve, and included in it the verdict of a jury, fixing the right and character of the heir to succeed to the estate of the ancestor. An heir before his entry is termed apparent heir, and as such possesses certain rights. See Apparent Heir. The heir, who desires to complete his title, may proceed either by a service; or, where he holds of a subject, he may, on satisfying the superior of his propinquity and of his right to receive an entry, obtain from him a precept of clare constat, infeftment on which will complete the heir's title. See Clare Constat. Or the heir may grant a trust-bond to a confidential friend, who, having charged him, as his debtor, to enter, may adjudge, and in that way acquire a title by an adjudication, which will enable the heir, by means of his trustee, and without incurring a representation, to try the effect of any right the ancestor may have given. And if the estate be in this way cleared of any claims, the confidential adjudger may transfer to the heir the whole right under the adjudication. See Adjudication on Trust-Bond.

Where the title is to be completed by service, the form of the procedure will be affected by circumstances. Where the ancestor has died feudally vested in the estate, the heir must complete his title by a special service; and on a precept following on this special service, he must be infeft; for if he should die after being served heir in special, but without being infeft, the whole procedure falls, and the next heir who enters disregards the special service, and enters to the person last infeft, as if no such service had been expedie by the person who died uninfeft. Where, again, the ancestor was not infeft, but held personal rights to the subject, as dispositions with unexecuted procuratories or precepts, the heir, in place of a special service, expedes a general service, in virtue of which he acquires a complete right to the unexecuted procuratories and precepts, and may be forthwith infeft on them precisely as his predecessor might have been. And should he die without being infeft, still the personal rights are thus completely transferred to him, and will pass to his own heir-at-law, who, in order to acquire right to the unexecuted procuratories and precepts, must be served heir in general to him, and not to the former proprietor. Where, again, the estate is burdened with the debts of the ancestor in such a manner as to render it hazardous for the heir to enter and incur a universal representation, it is competent for him, within the tempus deliberandi, to enter by an inventory, and he will be liable no further than to the value of the subjects contained in the inventory. See Inventory. Beneficium Inventarii.

A general service formerly proceeded on a brieve issuing from Chancery. A note was given in to Chancery stating the nature of the brieve required, and that it must be a brieve directed to such a judge ordinary (and any judge ordinary was competent in the general service) for serving the claimant heir in general to his ancestor—care being taken to describe the heir in his proper character. A brieve was then issued from Chancery and delivered to the claimant's agent, containing all the heads of the brieve in a special service, for there was no distinction in the terms of the brieve farther than in the character of the heir, as described in the brieve. This brieve was proclaimed and published at the head burgh of the jurisdiction within which the heir was to be served, which superseded the necessity of any personal service. It was not necessary to summon a jury; any fifteen persons (the number of which the jury consists) who might be in Court, or who might be selected by the claimant's agent, were allowed to act as jurors. See Inquest. At the distance of fifteen days after the publication, the service proceeded before the judge. The inquest was sworn by the judge to act faithfully. The heir, or one acting for him, then produced his claim, which stated his relationship, and claimed that he might be served heir under the character stated in the brieve. Evidence was also produced in support of the claim. Under the general service there were only two of the heads of the brieve inquired into, viz., 1. Whether the deceased died at the faith and peace of the Queen, which was presumed, unless the contrary be asserted; and, 2. Whether the claimant be the real and lawful heir. The propinquity must be proved; but where a degree of propinquity was proved, it was presumed to be the nearest; and, in the same way, the person was presumed a lawful heir, unless the contrary was asserted. The jury, if satisfied on these heads with the evidence laid before them, served the claimant, and their sentence was attested by the judge and retoured to the Chancery, whence the brieve issued. From the Chancery a certified copy was given out which was called a retour. A general service established the right of the persons served to the character of heir, and also vested those rights which did not require infestment. It was, for the former purpose, considered at one time merely as a kind of declarator of propinquity; and in conformity with this idea, it was held in the Court of Session, after a consultation of the whole judges, that a general service was competent, although there had been a prior general service to the same person, without the necessity of serving through the party who had obtained the prior service; Cochrane, March 11, 1828, 6 S. & D. 751. This decision, however, was reversed April 29, 1830, 4 W. & S. 128. Where a party infest in fee-simple executed an entail, not disposing in favour of himself, but reserving a power of revocation, and died leaving the deed unrevoked and undelivered, a general service as heir-substitute of entail to the entailer is inept to take up the procuratory or precept granted by him; Colquhoun, July 8, 1831, 9 S. & D. 911. See Retour. Brieve. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, §§ 63, et seq., 75, 78; Bank. B. iii. tit. 5, § 14, et seq.; Stair, B. iii. tit. 4, § 33, et seq.; More's Notes, p. cccxiii.; Bd. Princ. § 781, 1848, et seq.; Sandford v. Heritable Succession, i. 287, 290-6; Sandford on Entails, 318, 339, 347; Jurid. Styles, i. 28.

The special service includes not only a title to a special estate in which the ancestor died infest, but also a title to all personal rights which were vested in the ancestor, and which are descendible to the heir in the character described in the special service. In other words, the special service embraces a general service to the same heir. The special service also formerly proceeded on a brieve issued from Chancery, but directed not to any judge ordinary, as in the former case, but to the sheriff of the county within whose territory the lands lay to which the heir was to be served. The brieve was published at the head burgh of the jurisdiction, and the service might proceed fifteen days after the publication. The jury, consisting of the same number (fifteen), was selected or taken àstantibus, in the same manner as in the general service; and the claim was made, and the evidence in like manner laid before this jury or inquest. The heads of the brieve in the special service were — 1. That the deceased died at the faith and peace of the Queen: This was presumed. That he died infest: This was proved by production of the investiture of the estate. The precise period of the death required also to be proved, to show how long the lands had been in non-entry. 2. That the claimant was the next and lawful heir: This required to be proved by parole evidence, the testimony even of the jurymen being admitted; and propinquity being proved, the degree was presumed to be the nearest in existence; but where the propinquity was remote, ancient deeds, specifying the relationship, were received in evidence. 3. Of whom the lands are held: This was proved by the ancestor's charter. 4. By what tenure they were held: This was also proved by the charter. 5. What was the extent of the lands old and new: This was proved by the production of a former retour, or, where there was none, by the report of an accountant, stating the extent at the same rate with the neighbouring lands in the same county, in proportion to the valued rents of the said lands, of which the cess-books afford sufficient evidence. 6. That the claimant was of lawful age: This was affirmed by the jury, whatever the age of the claimant might be. 7. In whose hands the fee had been since the death of the ancestor: This was no further answered than to prove liferents where they had existed, as they excluded non-entry while they lasted. These heads being proved, the jury served the heir, and the judge retoured the service to Chancery; an extract from which, as in the case of the general service, was called the retour of the heir's service. *Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 67; Bank. A service cum beneficio inventarii is authorised by the act 1695, c. 24. The service differs in no respect from the ordinary service of an heir, further than that he is said in the service to be heir cum beneficio inventarii. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 68, et seq.; Bell's Princ. §§ 781, 1926, et seq.; Jurid. Styles, i. 361. See Beneficium Inventarii. Inventory.

The general service was completed as soon as it was retoured; and all the right which a general service can give was thenceforward vested in the person served. The special service, as already observed, carried no right to the heir served, until his title was completed by sasine. Where the lands held of the Crown, the heir applied to the Chancery; and, upon production of his retour, a precept was issued of course, directed to the sheriff of the county, requiring him to infest the heir, and to take security for the non-entry and relief duties; and the precept required to be executed before the next term, or it could not be executed at all, and a new one had to be applied for. On this precept the heir was infest, and his title to the estate of his ancestor thereby completed. See Post Proximum Terminum. Where the lands held of a subject, the heir must obtain a precept of clare constat from the superior, proceeding on a narrative of his special retour, and infestment on that precept completed his title; but should the superior refuse, the heir might under the act 20 Geo. II. c. 50, upon production of his special retour to the Court of Session, obtain a warrant to charge the superior to receive him within fifteen days; and on payment of the non-entry and relief duties, and production of the ancient titles, the superior was bound to give his precept in terms of the ancient rights. See Charge to Enter. Charter. But, should the superior still delay, a precept might be obtained from Chancery for infesting the heir. Where the superior was unentered, he must, in place of being charged under the 20 Geo. II., be charged to enter himself heir, and thus to complete his title to the superiority, in terms of the act 1494, c. 58, within forty days, that he may be in a situation to receive his vassal's heir; and should he fail so to do, he loses the casualties which he might have claimed. But he does not lose the feu-duties: these remain due to the immediate superior; and the heir proceeds against the higher superiors, successively, on their respective refusals, until he arrives at the Crown, from whom a precept is obtained without the necessity of a charge. In one or other of these ways is the title of the heir holding of a subject-superior completed. On the subject of service generally, see *Ersk. Alterations in the Forms of Service.—By the act 10 and 11 Vict. c. 47, 1847, the practice of issuing brieves from Chancery for service of heirs is abolished. A general service now proceeds by petition to the sheriff of the county within which the deceased had his ordinary or principal domicile at the time of his death, or, in the option of the petitioner, to the Sheriff of Chancery. Where the deceased had no domicile in Scotland, the petition must be presented to the Sheriff of Chancery. When a special service is desired, the petition must be presented to the sheriff within whose jurisdiction the lands comprehended in the petition are situated, or, in the option of the petitioner, to the Sheriff of Chancery. Where the lands are situated in different counties, the petition must be presented to the Sheriff of Chancery. A petition of service is equivalent to a brieve and claim under the former law, and an extract decree of service is equivalent to an extract retour. A decree of special service, besides operating as a retour, has the operation and effect of a disposition from the deceased to the heir served. Such decree of service, however, cannot be transmitted for the purpose of completing the title of the heir or assignee of the party served. No person is entitled to appear and oppose a service proceeding before the sheriff who could not competently appear and oppose such service proceeding under a brieve of inquest under the former law. In cases of competition the proceedings may be advocated to the Court of Session, in order that the case may be tried by a jury. Where, also, the sheriff refuses to serve the petitioner, his judgment may be brought under review of the Court of Session by a note of advocacy. A special service does not now infer a general representation, either active or passive, but only a limited passive representation to the extent and value of the subjects embraced in the special service. In a petition for a special service, an heir of line or heir-male may also apply for a general service in the same character. A general service may be applied for, and obtained to a limited effect, by annexing a specification setting forth the particular subjects to which the service is limited, and the service obtained infers only a limited passive representative to the extent of the subjects contained in the specification.

Services, Personal. See Personal Services.

Serviens Curiae. See Serviant.

Servient Tenement; is the tenement over which a servitude has been granted or acquired in favour of a dominant tenement. See Servitudes.

Servitudes; are either predial or personal. A predial servitude is a servitude constituted over one subject or tenement, in favour of the proprietor of another subject or tenement. It is only in virtue of his property that a person enjoys a predial servitude; and when he transfers the property to another, the servitude passes along with it. The tenement over which a predial servitude is constituted is called the servient tenement, and its proprietor the servient proprietor: that in favour of which the servitude is constituted is called the dominant tenement, and its proprietor the dominant proprietor. Personal servitudes are those constituted over a subject in favour of a person, without reference to his possession of another subject. In the Roman law there were four classes of personal servitudes—usufructus, usus, habitatio and operæ servorum. In Scotland the only rights which have been classed under personal servitudes are the different kinds of usufruct;—liferent, by reservation or constitution, terce, and courtesy. See Liferent. Terce. Courtesy. And it has been doubted whether liferent would not with more propriety be considered as limited property than as a servitude. Those who adhere to the Roman law classification maintain that servitude is the category to which liferents are most conveniently referred. But this is merely a matter of arrangement. Predial servitudes are either rural or urban. This distinction has no reference to the circumstance of the tenements being within or beyond the limits of a town. A rural servitude is a servitude which does not affect houses or other edifices, but which is constituted over fields, inclosures, &c., though in a town: to this class belong the servitudes of passage, road, way, pasture, feal, and divot, aqueduct, watering, or aqueductus, thirlage. See these articles, and also Actus. Iter. Via. An urban servitude is in some way connected with houses: to this class belong support, oneris ferendi, tigni immittendi, stillicide, flumen, altius tollendi, light, prospect. See these articles. Predial servitudes are either positive or negative. A positive servitude is one in virtue of which the dominant proprietor is entitled to perform some act affecting the servient tenement, which, but for the servitude, the servient proprietor would be entitled to prohibit: thus, a proprietor is not entitled to rest his house upon another proprietor's pillar; but if the servitude oneris ferendi be constituted in his favour, he may do so. A negative servitude is one in virtue of which a servient proprietor is prohibited from performing some act, which, but for the servitude, he would be entitled to perform. Thus a proprietor is entitled to build his house as high as he chooses; but if the servitude altius non tollendi be constituted in favour of a neighbouring tenement, he will be restricted from building it higher than it is when the servitude is constituted. A positive servitude is constituted either by grant or by prescription. When it is constituted by grant, it must be followed by possession, either actual, as by use, or civil, by the recording of a sasine containing the grant. Charter and sasine in the dominant subject, with use of the servitude for forty years, completes the right to a positive servitude. A negative servitude can only be constituted by grant. It does not admit of possession, and therefore cannot be acquired by prescription. For the same reason, the grant alone, without use, is sufficient for its constitution. A distinction between such services as are, and such as are not, known and recognised, has been considered in the article Nominate and Innominate. Servitudes are extinguished, 1. Confusion; that is, by the dominant and servient tenements becoming the property of the same person. Professor Bell's doubt, whether such extinction is permanent, has been stated in the article Res sua nemini servit. 2. By renunciation. 3. By the extinction of either the dominant or servient tenement; or by a change of circumstances rendering the servitude no longer available. Sometimes, however, where such change is only temporary, the servitude may be merely suspended until matters are restored to their former state. 4. By prescription; and this applies both to positive and negative servitudes. A servitude only creates an obligation ad patiendum; and therefore the servient proprietor cannot be called on to do anything, such as to repair his wall for the purpose of giving better support for the dominant proprietor's roof. A stipulation that the servient proprietor be bound ad agendum, imposes merely a personal obligation. A servitude is intended for the benefit of the dominant tenement; and the dominant proprietor, therefore, is not entitled to exercise his right merely to distress the servient proprietor, where it is productive of no benefit to himself. The benefit is confined entirely to the dominant tenement. The servient proprietor must do nothing to diminish the use or convenience of the servitude. See Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 1, et seq.; *Bank. Session, Court of. The Court of Session is the supreme civil court of Scotland, and was instituted in the year 1532. This Court formerly consisted of fifteen Judges, who sat all in one court. But by 48 Geo. III. c. 151, the Judges were required to sit in two Divisions; and by 1 Will. IV. c. 69, their number was reduced to thirteen—the Lord President, the Lord Justice-Clerk, and eleven Ordinary Lords. The Lord President and three Ordinary Lords form the First Division, and the Lord Justice-Clerk and other three Ordinary Lords the Second. There are five permanent Lords Ordinary, the last appointed of whom officiates on the Bills during session. The jurisdiction and other powers of the Court of Session are necessarily treated of in many separate articles throughout this work. They have a privative jurisdiction in competitions relative to heritage and declarators of the right to it. But actions respecting moveables, and other rights to which their privative jurisdiction does not extend, cannot be brought in the Court of Session in the first instance, where the subject of the action does not exceed the value of L.25. This rule is, however, modified in certain cases. Many classes of cases have been appropriated to the Court of Session by statute. Their jurisdiction as a court of review is treated of in the articles Appeal. Advocation. Suspension. In cases where the power of review is excluded, the Court of Session may nevertheless interfere wherever any inferior court exceeds its powers or deviates from statutory regulations. The Court have a criminal jurisdiction (which however is seldom exercised) in certain cases in which the civil question at issue implies crime in one of the parties. See Fraudulent Bankruptcy. Forgery. Fraud, &c. The Court has power to punish contempts of its authority, and to control the conduct of the members of the College of Justice. They have the right of passing Acts of Sederunt for the regulation of judicial procedure. See Acts of Sederunt. The Judges of the Court of Session hold their office ad vitam aut culpam. Their nomination and appointment is in the Crown. No one can be appointed who has not served as an advocate or principal clerk of Session for five, or as a writer to the Signet for ten years. Certain forms are prescribed for ascertaining the qualifications of the nominees. By 10 Geo. I. c. 19, if the presentee be found duly qualified, he must immediately be admitted; but if he be found unqualified, the whole matter must be certified to the Sovereign; and if the Sovereign, notwithstanding, desire that he be admitted, he must be admitted forthwith. For the quorum of the Court, and of each Division, see Quorum. Upon a vacancy occurring in the Inner-House of either Division, any one of the Inner-House Judges of the other Division may, if he desire it, be removed to the Division in which the vacancy has occurred; and the vacancy thus created in the Division which the Judge has left is supplied by the senior permanent Lord Ordinary. If no Inner-House Judge, not in the Division in which the vacancy has arisen, desire to be transferred, the vacancy is supplied by the senior permanent Lord Ordinary, whether he belongs to the Division in which the vacancy has occurred or not. Upon a vacancy among the permanent Lords Ordinary of the Second Division, the junior or last appointed Ordinary of the First Division is appointed to sit as junior of the two permanent Lords Ordinary of the Second Division; 59 Geo. III. c. 45, §§ 1 and 2. In case of equality of votes of the Judges of either Division, the cause is directed to remain for a subsequent discussion and decision. In all cases, upon report of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, where there is an equality, the Lord Ordinary on the Bills is called in to vote; and in all other cases, where, in consequence of equality, the cause remains for subsequent discussion, if the question have previously depended before any Lord Ordinary of the same Division, being at the time of the discussion one of the permanent Ordinaries, such Lord Ordinary, without regard to rotation, is called in to be present at the discussion and vote in the case; but when one of the Inner-House Judges is absent at the first advising when the equality takes place, but is present when the consideration of the case is resumed, the Lord Ordinary is not called in; 1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 38, § 3. The Judges of either Division may, in every cause in which they are equally divided in opinion, direct the cause to be judged either by the Inner-House Judges of both Divisions, or by the whole Court, including the Lords Ordinary; 13 and 14 Vict. c. 46, 1850. See Consultation of Judges. Provision is made, by 2 Will. IV. c. 5, for carrying on the business in case of the death or sickness of any of the Judges. See Death. Set-off; is the English law term corresponding to compensation. Where there are mutual debts due by the plaintiff and defendant, the debts may be set off against each other; that is, they may be allowed to extinguish each other. Like compensation, set-off must be pleaded, and is only allowed in liquidated money debts. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Bell's Com. ii. 124; Bell's Princ. § 572; Thomson on Bills, 762; Shaw's Digest, p. 70. Sett, Action of. Where the owners of a ship disagree as to the manner in which the vessel is to be employed, or where one of the owners is desirous to sell his share, he usually offers it at a certain price to the other owners; and failing an extrajudicial arrangement, an action of sett is competent. This action is an Admiralty process. It is directed by the owner who wishes to be free against the other owners; and the conclusions of the summons are, that the defenders shall be decreed either to take his share at a certain price, or to let him have their shares at the same rate; or otherwise, that the vessel shall be sold by public roup, and the price divided amongst the owners according to their respective shares. If, when the action comes into court, either of the parties agree to take the shares of the others at the price put on them, an interlocutor is pronounced decerning and adjudging accordingly; but if not, a judicial sale is ordered, and the price divided, in terms of the conclusions of the summons. The jurisdiction in this matter, formerly exercised by the High Court of Admiralty, was transferred to the Court of Session and to the Sheriff Courts, by 1 Will. IV. c. 69, whereby the High Court of Admiralty was abolished. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 56; *Bank. Sett of a Burgh; is its constitution. The setts are either established by immemorial usage, or were at some time or other modelled by the Convention of Burghs. There is an instance of a new sett being granted to the burgh of Montrose by royal warrant;

Sheriff; the chief local judge of a county. According to Skene, the name is derived from his jurisdiction, extending over a "schire, that is, a cutting or section, like as we say, a pair of scheirs, quairwith clath is cutted;" Skene, voce Schireff. The institution of this office is very ancient. The first notice of it appears in the beginning of the twelfth century, in the reign of Alexander I. But the institution was at that time but imperfect; regular sheriffdoms having been established somewhat later. The appointment of sheriffs properly belonged to the Crown; but the great barons frequently assumed the right of naming them. The term "schire," was anciently given to districts of much smaller extent than the sheriffdoms of the present day, each of which, however, had not a sheriff. Previous to the year 1296, these smaller divisions had disappeared, and the enactments of Edward I. give an exact enumeration of thirty-four sheriffdoms, over most of which a separate sheriff had jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of this judge, civil as well as criminal, was anciently very extensive, and within his own district nearly as unlimited as that of the great justiciars throughout the kingdom. See Tytler's History of Scotland, vol. ii. p. 244. In Skene, De verborum significatione, voce Schireff, a very full account is given of the institution of the office of sheriff, and the purposes it was intended to serve. According to him, the sheriff had for his fee of the escheat, ten pounds, paid when he accounted to the Exchequer for his intromissions. He was bound to have a good and sufficient bailie, for whom he was answerable. He was obliged to hold a sheriff-court for the execution of justice after every forty days; and afterwards, all sheriffs, stewards and bailies, were bound to hold three head courts in the year "by themselves in proper person, at which all barons and freeholders who owed suit and presence in the said courts appeared personally. The sheriff had no jurisdiction beyond his own sherrifdom, in which he was bound to take all means to have the laws proclaimed, that no one might pretend ignorance. It was his duty also to be present in all courts of bishops, abbots, earls barons and freeholders, who could not hold their courts unless the sheriff or his deputies were present, or had been summoned.

By 20 Geo. II. c. 43, the sheriff must be an advocate of at least three years' standing at the bar. He is disqualified to act as counsel in any cause from the county of which he is sheriff. He holds the office ad vitam aut culpam, except when nominated merely pro tempore by the Court of Session, in the event of a vacancy; and he may be removed for misconduct in his office, on a complaint presented by the Lord Advocate, or by four freeholders of the county, to the Court of Session. The Court, on the presentation of such a complaint, judge of the sheriff's conduct, and decide accordingly. The sheriffs have a power of appointing substitutes, who receive stated salaries from Government for performing the duties of their office. The substitutes must be advocates, or writers to the Signet, or solicitors before the Supreme Court, or Sheriff-court procurators of at least three years' standing; and certified by the Lord President and the Lord Justice-Clerk to be duly qualified; and they must not act, directly or indirectly, as procurators in any court within their bounds; 6 Geo. IV. c. 23. For the appointment of substitutes to perform particular duties at elections, see the article Reform Act. The Crown may still appoint a high-sheriff, but he must not (by the foresaid act, 20 Geo. II. c. 43) be appointed heritably, or for life, or for any longer time than for one year, and cannot judge in virtue of such appointment.

The civil jurisdiction of the sheriff extends to all personal actions on contract, bond, or obligation, to the greatest extent; to actions for rent—furthcomings—poundings of the ground—and even adjudications, though that is now little more than a nominal jurisdiction, as actions of adjudication are seldom brought before the sheriff. In all possessory actions, as removings and spuilzies, &c.; in all briefs issuing from Chancery, as of inquest, tence, division, tutory, &c.; and generally in all civil matters not specially committed to other courts, the sheriff may judge. By 1 Vict. c. 41, he has a summary jurisdiction in all causes not exceeding L.8, 6s. 8d. sterling exclusive of expenses and extract. See Small Debts. By 4 Geo. IV. c. 97, the sheriff-depute of each county is also commissary. He may appoint his substitute to be commissary substitute also. See Commissary Court. The jurisdiction of the sheriff has been extended to cessio bonorum, and certain Admiralty cases. See Cessio Bonorum. Admiralty. The judgments of the sheriff in civil causes are reviewable by the Court of Session only; except that, where the case embraces matters partly civil and partly criminal, the Court of Justiciary is the proper court of review; and in civil causes, where the sum in dispute does not exceed L.25, there is a statutory appeal to the Circuit Court; and in small debts, an appeal to the Circuit Court is made competent in certain circumstances. See Small Debts. Appeal to Circuit Court.

By 16 and 17 Vict. c. 80, 1853, the summary jurisdiction of sheriffs in small debts is extended to L.12.

The sheriff's criminal jurisdiction extends, generally speaking, to the trial of all crimes which do not infer death, or banishment from Scotland, and also to murder (though seldom thus prosecuted), bigamy, sedition, theft, robbery (if not from the person); and he may fine, imprison, banish from the county, and, in the general case, even inflict corporal pains, without a jury. Of late, however, the criminal jurisdiction of the sheriff without a jury has been considerably restricted; and a prosecutor who proceeds without a jury may be made liable in damages. See Jury. He may take cognisance of theft, either at the instance of the private prosecutor or by indictment; and all offences against the police are cognisable before the sheriff. He likewise possesses a cumulative jurisdiction with the justices of peace in all riots and breaches of the peace. He is authorised to apprehend rebels and offenders; and where it is necessary, in prosecution of this duty, he may call out the posse comitatus, or force of the county, to his assistance. He may give warrant to arrest for any crime, even treason. He has the charge of taking all precognitions; is answerable for the accuracy of the copies served on panels; he had the charge of the Porteous Roll for the Circuit Court under the old practice; and he is bound to attend on the judges, and to answer to any complaint made against him there. His decision may be appealed from to the Court of Justiciary. Hume, i. 494; ii. 22 et seq., 57 et seq., 139 et seq., 241; Alison's Prac. 35, et seq. See Precognition. Porteous Roll. Criminal Prosecution. Delegated Jurisdiction. Procurator-Fiscal. Appeal to Circuit Court.

Sheriffs act also ministerially in returning juries to serve on trials. They execute all writs from Exchequer; and for the blanch and feu-duties, and other casualties due to the Crown, they are bound to account in Exchequer; and they annually, in the month of February, strike the flara, with the assistance of a jury. Writs for electing members of Parliament are directed to the sheriffs, to be executed and returned to the Crown Office. The procedure in Sheriff Courts is treated of in separate articles throughout this book. See on the subject of sheriffs, and their jurisdiction generally, *Ersk. Sheriff-Clerk; is clerk to the sheriff's court. He alone could be notary in those assizes which were given by the sheriff, proceeding on precepts, for infesting heirs holding of the Crown. The act 6 Geo. IV. c. 23, made provision for the regulation of his fees, by the appointment of a commission, consisting of five sheriffs-depute, to examine and report. The report having accordingly been given in, the Act of Sederunt 7th July 1836 was passed, by which the fees of the sheriff and steward clerks are regulated. See MacLaurin's Sheriff Prac. 59, 322; Jurid. Styles, ii. 502; Skene, voce Schireff.

Sheriff in that Part; is a person appointed by the Queen, in Signet letters, to supply the place of the sheriff. He was termed the sheriff in that part from being appointed to execute a particular duty, which previously had been in use to be performed by the sheriff. By uniform and immemorial custom, all the diligences of the law are directed to "messengers-at-arms," as sheriffs in that part. Stair, B. ii. tit. 38, § 10; *Ersk. Sheriff; in England, an officer appointed by the Crown to execute process, preserve the peace, and give assistance to justices and others in doing so. During his office, he is the first man in his county. The sheriffs of London and Middlesex are chosen by the citizens of London. The office of sheriff in England is entirely different from that which goes under the same name in Scotland. See Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Shewers; in jury causes, are the persons named by the Court, usually on the suggestion of the parties, to accompany the six jurors when a view is allowed. See Viewers.

Shewing of Holding; an action formerly competent to the superior, to have a deed granted to his vassal judicially exhibited to him, that its validity or import might be ascertained. It is now long since this action was laid aside; but its purpose is answered by an action of reduction-improbation. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, § 3; Bank. i. 616; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. h. t.

Ship. Property in ships differs from ordinary moveable or personal property in several respects; and the form of the title, as well as the mode of transferring or burdening this species of property, has been the subject of statutory enactments. British ships have a monopoly of the British trade with the colonies and settlements of this country; and of the importation of many articles; and of fisheries for importation. Foreign Ships are also privileged to share with British ships in the importation of commodities grown or manufactured in the country to which the vessel belongs. But in order to confer this privilege, the foreign vessel must be built in that country; or prize of war there; or condemned under the slave-trade laws; or British built, not captured from a British subject; and, finally, in all those cases, the ship must be owned by subjects of that country, and three-fourths of the crew must be subjects of that country. In order to confer the privilege of a British ship, the vessel must be of the build of this country, or her colonies; or condemned in the Court of Admiralty as a prize; or forfeited under the slave-trade acts, excluding ships, although built in Great Britain, if repaired in a foreign country at an expense exceeding 20*l.* a ton, unless such repair has been occasioned by damage on the voyage, and to enable the vessel to return home. British ships, if captured, and sold to foreigners, are excluded. See on this subject, 12 Charles II. c. 18; 1661, c. 45; 26 Geo. III. c. 60; 4 Geo. IV. c. 41; (consolidating prior statutes), repealed 6 Geo. IV. c. 105, and enacted 6 Geo. IV. c. 104; 6 Geo. IV. c. 109; 6 Geo. IV. c. 110; 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 54 and 55; Bell's Princ. § 1322 et seq., § 1372, and authorities there cited.

By the act 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, 1854 foreign ships are admitted to the coasting trade, and all matters in regard to merchant shipping are now regulated by the acts 17 and 18 Vict. cc. 104 and 120, 1854, and 18 and 19 Vict. c. 91, 1855.

Where the owners of a ship cannot agree how she is to be employed, or if one or more of the owners wish to sell the vessel, the remedy is by the process of sett and sale (see Sett); and where the vessel has been arrested by creditors, instead of the usual process of furthercoming, an action of arrestment and sale is raised by the creditor, setting forth the ground of debt and the arrestment, and concluding that the ship should be sold and the proceeds made furthercoming to the pursuer, at least to the amount of his debt. When the action is called in court, if there be no opposition, the pursuer lodges a minute, praying the Lord Ordinary to name a person to make on oath an inventory of the ship, and to give his opinion as to the upset price. Commission will be granted to any justice of the peace to take the valuator's oath, and on the oath being reported, another minute is lodged, craving warrant to expose the vessel to sale, at the upset price so fixed, after due advertisement, and to consign the price in the hands of the clerk of Court. Articles of roup are then prepared by the clerk, who officiates as clerk at the sale; and when the sale is made, a third minute is lodged, reporting the proceedings, and praying for decree of sale in favour of the purchaser, and that his bond of caution for the price may be delivered up. The same minute may also pray, that as much of the proceeds as may be necessary to pay the pursuer's debt should be paid over to him. Where the debt has not been previously constituted, the summons in this action may also conclude for decree constituting the debt, and in that case the action will be called an action of constitution and sale. Where there is a shortcoming in the proceeds, the expense of the sale will be deducted in the first place; and if there be competing claimants on the residue, the competition will be disposed of precisely as in a process of multiplepoinding. Condescendences and claims will be lodged by the several claimants, and the competition will be closed by an interlocutor of ranking and preference, and a warrant to the clerk to pay the competitors as ranked. If, pending this process, the vessel is to be dismantled, a petition ought to be presented for authority to that effect. This process was formerly competent only in the High Court of Admiralty, and the forms of procedure will be found in Boyd's Judicial Proceedings, 8vo. edit. p. 29, et seq. The jurisdiction is now transferred to the Court of Session and Sheriff Courts; 1 *Vill. Shore. See Sea, and Sea Shore.

Short-Entry; of a bill in a banker's books, is done by stating the amount in an inner column, and carrying it out into the account between the parties, only when the bill is paid. Such an entry forms the best evidence that the banker has got the bills merely as an agent to recover payment, subject to a lien for his indemnity against his own acceptances. Bell's Com. i. 271; Thomson on Bills, 731.

Short-Hand Notes. Notes taken by a short-hand writer, when sworn to by himself, are considered the best evidence of what occurred at a former trial. A party himself is the best evidence of what he said in a speech; but failing him, any short-hand writer who was present, and took notes, may be adduced. The evidence of witnesses at a former trial can be proved only by themselves; but where the witnesses are dead, or where their evidence is otherwise unattainable, their previous evidence may be proved by the notes of a short-hand writer, or of the judge, or from the bill of exceptions, when the evidence has been engrossed in it from the judge's notes. Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 180, 282. Side-Scriptio. Before the introduction of the present system of writing deeds "book-wise," the sheets were pasted together at length; and in order to authenticate them, the party was required to sign his name at each junction, half on the one sheet and half on the other. This was called side-scription. See Testing Clause.

Signatures. A signature was a writing prepared and presented by a writer to the Signet to the Baron of Exchequer, as the ground of a royal grant to the person in whose name it is presented; which having, in the case of an original charter, the sign-manual of the Sovereign, and in other cases the cachet appointed by the Act of Union for Scotland attached to it, became the warrant of a conveyance, under one or other of the seals, according to the nature of the subject or the object in view. Every Crown charter was preceded by a signature containing the principal clauses of the charter, and specifying the seal or seals through which it was to pass, and required to be revised and authorised by the Baron of Exchequer, who acted ministerially in this, and in the character of Crown commissioner, in the same way with the commissioner of any private superior, who may have granted a commission for receiving resignations and renewing the titles of his vassals. In every feudal conveyance from the Crown, requiring charter and sasine, the precept required to pass the Privy Seal and the Great Seal, and to be registered in their respective registers before passing; 1672, c. 7. Signatures and charters of the vassals of kirk lands within L.10 Scots valuation, and all commissions to the principal Crown officers, passed the Great Seal alone. *Ersk. Silver and Gold Plate. The act 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 69 fixes the standard qualities of gold and silver plate in Scotland, and provides for the assaying and marking of it. Goldsmiths and silversmiths must not work plate inferior to certain standards specified in the act; § 1. Persons following the trade of silversmith, goldsmith, or platerworker, before sending their names, descriptions, and marks to the Goldsmiths' Incorporation of Edinburgh, or the Goldsmiths' Company of Glasgow, forfeit L.100; § 2. Goldsmiths, &c., must strike their mark on the plate, and send it to the assay-office to be assayed, where, if it is found to be standard, it is marked with certain marks; § 3. Assayers are empowered to levy specified rates upon plate sent to be assayed; § 4. Plate of objectionable manufacture is returned without assay; but if it is found unobjectionable, a few grains are scraped from it to be assayed; § 5. If the assayer suspects that too great a quantity of base metal, or solder, is contained or concealed in the plate, he must test; but if it is found that his suspicions are groundless, compensation must be made for the damage done to the plate in testing. Disputes are settled by the justices or magistrates; § 6. The scrapings are assayed, and if found inferior to the standard, the plate is defaced; if equal to standard, it is marked; § 7. The assayer weighs and sells the scrapings for the benefit of the assay-office; § 8. Provision is made for the accuracy and faithful administration of the assayers, &c.; §§ 10 to 15. Certain small gold and silver articles require marks or stamp, such as rings, chains, necklace beads, filigree work, pencil cases, &c.; §§ 16 and 17. Selling or exporting plate not duly marked, subjects the offender to a penalty; § 18. Forging or imitating marks or stamps, stamping with forged dies, &c., and fraudulently using the lawful dies, is felony; § 19. Members of the incorporation or company are competent witnesses in prosecutions; § 23. The act is declared not to affect the act 59 Geo. III. c. 28, for establishing an assay-office in Glasgow, except in so far as alterations are expressly made upon it, and not affect any other acts for granting duties on plate, or on dealers' licences; § 24.

Siminellus; white bread or "main" bread. Skene h. t.

Simony; an unlawful contract, for the presenting of a clergyman to a benefice, or procuring him a presentation; so called from its supposed resemblance to the office of Simon Magus. Simoniacal practices afford a ground for deposing a clergyman who has been guilty of them, or for depriving a probationer of his license; and the same penalty is imposed where clergymen or probationers do not divulge such practices to the probatory of the bounds, as soon as they come to their knowledge. By the canon law, the party who took benefit by a simoniacal paction, even without his knowledge, was declared incapable of holding that or any other benefice. *Bank. Simple Contract. In England, a debt by simple contract is where the contract is ascertained neither by matter of record, nor by deed or special instrument, but by mere oral evidence, or notes unsealed. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Sine Quo Non. It frequently happens, that in nominations of curators, tutors, trustees and the like, one of the nominees is named sine quo non; and the legal construction of such a nomination is, that by the death or non-acceptance of the sine quo non the nomination falls. So also the sine quo non has a negative on the acts of the rest. Bell's Princ. §§ 1993, 2074, and authorities there cited. See Curatory. Quorum.

Single Escheat. See Escheat.

Single Combat; was admitted in the law of Scotland as a species of evidence, in the case of capital crimes, where the accusation was supported by presumptive evidence only. This mode of proof was in use in the reign of Robert III. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 2; Ross's Lect. i. 121. See Combat.

Singular Successor. A purchaser, or other disponent, or acquirer by titles, whether judicial or voluntary, is called a singular successor, in contradistinction to the heir, who succeeds by a general title of succession or universal representation. A singular successor, on the other hand, acquires right solely by the singular title acquired from the former proprietor. Ersk. iii. 81; Bell's Com. i. 23; Bell's Princ. §§ 719, 783-6, 990. See Heir. Service.

Sist on a Suspension; is the order or injunction of the Lord Ordinary prohibiting diligence to proceed, where relevant grounds of suspension have been stated in the bill of suspension. *Stair, B. iv. tit. 52; Ersk. Skeleton Bills; signed blank papers stamped with a bill stamp. The subscriber will be held the drawer or acceptor, as it may be, of any bill afterwards written above his name, for any sum which the stamp will cover. *Ersk. Slains, Letters of; were letters subscribed by the relations of a person who had been slain, declaring that they had received an assythment, and concurring in an application to the Crown for a pardon to the offender. These or other evidences of concurrence were necessary to found the application; 1457, c. 74, and 1528, c. 7; 1592, c. 155, No. 1; 1593, c. 174; so far at least as to prevent a pardon from being pleaded without them. Hume, i. 280; ii. 478; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 105; Bank. i. 247. See Assythment. Pardon.

Slavery; the condition of human beings,

when, without their consent, they are subjected to the will of another human being, whom they are in all things compelled to obey. In the Roman law, slaves were things, not persons; and at first they were placed entirely at the disposal of their masters, who had the power of life and death over them. By the later law, however, many regulations were made to protect them from the cruelty or caprice of their masters. See an excellent work on the subject of Roman slavery by William Blair, Esq. advocate. Slavery existed in Scotland at an early period, as indeed it did in all the nations of Europe. See Nativi. Colliers and Salters. Adscripti Glebæ. The general character of slavery was different among the Romans under the feudal system. Almost all the Roman artificers and domestics were slaves; while the bondsmen of the feudal ages were labourers perpetually attached to the soil which they cultivated. A slave is free whenever he touches British ground, or goes on board a ship belonging to the British navy. But it is said, that if he return to the country of his former master, he may be reclaimed. The acts passed with a view to abolish slavery in the British colonies, and to suppress the slave-trade, are 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 72 and 73; 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 45; 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 5, 16, 81, and 82.

Sleeping Partners; are partners of a company, not proclaimed or known as such. There may be dormant partners where the trade is apparently carried on either by one individual, or by fewer individuals than the company consists of. Dormant partners differ in no respect from ordinary partners; they are equally liable for the debts of the company. The steps to be taken for discovering and proceeding against the latent partners in a sequestration of a company are suggested in Bell's Com. ii. 673. See also Ib. 622, 643; Bell's Princ. § 359; Thomson on Bills, 250. See Society.

Sleeping of Process. In the judicial procedure of the Court of Session, a process, in the Outer-House, is said to be asleep when a year and day have elapsed without any judicial order or interlocutor having been pronounced therein. See Wakening.

Slip. In the contract of insurance, the policy is preceded by a note of the contract, made out for the purpose of asking the consent of underwriters to the proposed policy. This is called a slip. It is merely a jotting or short memorandum of the terms, to which the underwriters subscribe their initials, with the sums for which they are willing to engage. It has no force as a contract of insurance; it cannot be received in evidence to contradict the policy; and it is ineffectual to show even priority of subscription. Whether it might ground an action to compel the signing of a policy, has never been tried. The form of a slip will be found in Jurid. Styles, ii. 564. See also Bell's Com. i. 608; Bell's Princ. § 469; Illust. ib. See Insurance, Policy.

Small Debts. 1. Justices.—The statute 39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 46, commonly called the Small-Debt Act, conferred a summary civil jurisdiction on justices of the peace in small debt causes. This statute was superseded by 6 Geo. IV. c. 48, of which the following are the principal provisions: It is made competent for any two or more justices of the peace to hear and determine all causes and complaints brought before them concerning the recovery of debts, or the making any demand effectual, provided the debt or demand do not exceed L.5 sterling, exclusive of expenses; § 2. All such causes proceed upon a complaint, agreeably to a form (A) subjoined to the act, stating shortly the ground of action, and concluding against the defender; to which complaint, and on the same paper, the clerk of the peace adjects a warrant signed by him, agreeably to the form subjoined to the act, containing authority to cite the defender to appear at the next meeting of the justices in the district within which he resides, or where the meetings of the court are held weekly; then, in the option of the pursuer, at the second or third diet of court from the date of the warrant, the diet not being sooner in either case than the sixth day after the date of citation, and for summoning witnesses at either party's instance to the same day and place. A copy of the complaint and warrant, with a citation annexed, and also a copy of the account or other ground of action, is delivered by a constable or peace-officer to the defender personally, or left at his dwelling-place; in which latter case, if the defender do not appear, he must be cited again, either personally or at his dwelling-place, upon the words de novo being signed and subjoined to the original complaint, or signed and inserted in the procedure book kept by the clerk, to appear either at the next stated meeting, or at a meeting to be held by adjournment for that purpose, not sooner than three days from the date of the first meeting, with certification that if he do not then appear he shall be held as confessed. If the defender have been cited at first to a diet of court not sooner than twelve free days from the date of citation, the officer, in case the defender have not been found personally at the time of the first citation, may cite him a second time, either personally or at his dwelling-place, to the same diet of court, on the original warrant, and without previously reporting an execution of the first citation to the court. Such second citation must not be given sooner than the sixth day after the first, nor later than the sixth day before the diet to which the defender is cited for the second time: if the defender do not then appear, he is held as confessed. The constable must in all cases return an execution of citation signed by him, or appear and make oath that he cited the defender in manner foresaid; § 3. Where a constable is required by either party to cite witnesses, he must lodge in the clerk's hands a written execution of every such citation at or before the diet to which the defender is cited, or otherwise verify in court the execution of citation, as the justices see fit. And if the witnesses cited do not appear, a new warrant may be obtained to compel their attendance at next stated or adjourned meeting, under a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings, to be awarded by the justices, in case a sufficient excuse be not offered and sustained. This penalty is payable to the party at whose instance the witness was cited, and may be recovered in the same manner as other small debts. Or, in the option of the justices, the witness failing to appear, without a sustained excuse, may be imprisoned for any time in the county jail not exceeding ten days. But the penalty is not exigible, nor the witness liable to imprisonment, unless the second citation have been given, not later than the sixth day before the diet of court to which he has been cited; § 4. When the parties appear, the justices hear them viva voce, and examine witnesses upon oath, and also the parties by declaration or upon oath; but no practitioners of the law are allowed to plead for them either viva voce or in writing; and the pleadings must not be taken down in writing or entered on record; § 5. If a defender, who has been duly cited anyhow, do not appear by himself, or a substitute not a practitioner, he is held as confessed, unless he send an excuse by one of his family, satisfying the justices that delay ought to be granted; in which case, or for some other good reason, the justices may adjourn the cause to the next stated meeting, or other day to be specially appointed; § 6. A pursuer or defender, if the justices see cause, may be heard by one of his family; or if the pursuer be not resident within twenty miles of the place where the court is held, the justices, if they see fit, may hear him by a person holding a written mandate for that purpose, the said mandatory not being a legal practitioner; § 7. Where decree has been pronounced in absence of the defender, he may, upon consigning the sum decreed for in the clerk's hands, obtain warrant under the clerk's hand at any time before the days of the charge are expired, sisting execution until the next court-day, and containing an authority to cite the pursuer and witnesses. This warrant being served on the pursuer in the manner already pointed out, is an authority for having the matter reheard at next court-day, provided it be not sooner than the sixth day after personal citation, or the second citation left at his dwelling-place, or, if so, at the next court-day thereafter. The justices may delay such rehearing to such time as may be thought fit. In like manner, where decree of absolvitor has passed in absence of the pursuer, he may at any time, within one calendar month thereafter, upon consigning two shillings and sixpence to be paid to the defender, obtain a warrant for citing the defender and witnesses; which being served on the defender in manner foressaid, is an authority for having the matter reheard, as is pointed out in the case of a rehearing at the defender's instance; § 8. The constable, in the event of his returning a false execution, or otherwise neglecting his duty, is punishable by fine not exceeding 20s., or imprisonment for not more than ten days. Recourse against the constable at common law is reserved to the party injured; § 9. The clerk must keep a book in which must be entered the names and designations of the parties, and whether present or absent at the calling of the cause—the nature and amount of the claim and date of in-giving—the mode of citation—the several interlocutors of the justices—and the decree dated and signed by the justices or by the preses, if more than two, agreeably to the form annexed to the act. A copy of the decree, containing warrant for arresting, or pointing, or for imprisonment, together with a note of the expenses awarded, is annexed to the complaint. And this copy of decree, signed and delivered, is a warrant for execution after ten free days from the date of pronouncing the decree, if the party against whom it has been given was present, by himself or family, when it was pronounced; or if he was not present, execution only proceeds after a charge of ten free days, given in common form by the constable; § 10. The justices, if they see fit, may direct sums found due to be paid by instalments; § 11. The execution of the pointing by the constable is summary, by carrying the pointed effects to the nearest market town, kirk town, or village in the parish; and after their being appraised, and after one hour's notice, selling them by auction at the cross, or other most public place, between the hours of eleven and one, or any other later hour fixed by the justices. The overplus of the price, after payment of the debt and expenses of process, if any, and of the expense of carrying the pointing into execution, is delivered to the owner; or the effects, if not sold, delivered to the creditor at the appraised value, to the amount of his debt, &c. If the place of sale is not a market town, but only a kirk town or village, two days' previous notice must be given at the parish-church door on Sunday after the forenoon service; § 12. In all cases of execution by pointing or imprisonment, the constable employed must, on or before the next court-day thereafter, make a return, either verbally or in writing, to the clerk, of the date and manner of the execution, the number of assistants employed, and the sum, if any, recovered; and in the case of a pointing, stating farther the value at which the goods were appraised—the time and place of sale—the charges paid for conveying or warehousing goods, where such have been incurred—and the price for which the goods sold where a sale was made. If the execution was by imprisonment, he must state the jail in which the debtor was incarcerated. These particulars are entered by the clerk in the procedure book, or other book kept for the purpose, and laid before the justices at next meeting, and exhibited to any person desiring inspection of them; § 13. Decrees pronounced by the justices under authority of this act are not subject to advocacy, suspension, appeal, or other stay of execution, except in the case of consignation for a rehearing, as before provided; nor can they be set aside by reduction before the Court of Session, except on the ground of malice and oppression on the part of the justices. Even such reduction is incompetent unless brought within a year after the date of the decree of the justices; § 14. When a reduction is brought, the pursuer must, before the summons of reduction is called, find caution for the expenses which may be awarded against him; § 15. One justice, in case no more be present, may hold a court for the purpose of calling the roll of causes—of pronouncing decrees in absence—receiving returns of execution of citations—and granting warrants of citations de novo, but for no other purpose; § 16. Provision is made respecting the fees payable to the clerk, the officers or constables, and the crier; § 17. An abstract of the table of fees must be printed on the complaint, and copy thereof for service; and a copy of the table, signed by two justices and the clerk, is hung up in the court-room and the clerk's office. The fees are subject to modification by the justices; § 18. Where the clerk or other officer of court exacts any fee not authorised by the act, the person so offending shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding, if he is a clerk or depute-clerk, L.5, if a constable or other officer, 20s. for each offence. These penalties are awarded by the justices on complaint from the party aggrieved, and satisfactory proof, and are paid to the party complaining, or to the poor, or partly to both, as the justices see fit. The justices may further punish their officers by suspension or dismissal for this and other offences; § 19. An account must be kept by the clerk of all court-fines awarded by the justices, which, where not otherwise provided for by the act, are paid to the poor as the justices direct; § 20. The justices of each county are empowered, at quarter sessions, to make suitable divisions of the county into districts, or to alter the divisions already made; within which they are directed to meet at such time and place as they may fix at quarter sessions, in order to carry the purposes of the act into execution. These meetings may be adjourned to any other lawful day at the same place. Of these divisions into districts, and of the stated times and places of meetings so to be appointed, or of the alterations of such divisions or stated meetings, the justices, at their quarter sessions, must order due notice to be given, by advertisement at the church-doors of every parish in the county, at least two Sundays previous to the first stated meeting so appointed or altered; § 21. Where the clerk fails to attend personally, or by depute, at any of the district meetings of which he has had due notice, the justices present at the meeting may name an interim-clerk, who may be removed by subsequent quarter sessions, and another clerk appointed from time to time; § 22. The justices are empowered, at their quarter sessions, to make from time to time such rules and orders as may be thought necessary for carrying the provisions of the act into effect; such rules not being inconsistent with the conditions of the act itself or contrary to law. These rules and orders remain in force until repealed by the justices at their quarter sessions, or by the Court of Session or Justiciary at Edinburgh, or by the Circuit Court of Justiciary, on the application of two or more justices; § 23. No person is exempt from the jurisdiction of the court under this act, on account of privilege, as being a member of any other court; § 24. The act does not extend to any debt where the title to land or other heritable right is in question, nor to any debt or matter arising upon or concerning the validity of wills or contracts of marriage, although such debts do not amount to L.5; nor to gaming debts, or debts contracted for spirituous liquors; § 25. The constables or officers of the peace are declared exempt from the penalties for selling goods or effects under authority of the decree and warrants of the justices by public sale or auction, although such constables or officers be not licensed auctioneers; § 26. Solicitors or procurators in inferior courts, or the partners of such solicitors or procurators, are prohibited from acting as justices of the peace while they continue to be legal practitioners; § 27.

The act 12 and 13 Vict. c. 34, 1849, amends the previous act, and gives the form of complaint on which the claim is to proceed.

2. Sheriffs.—The sheriff's exclusive jurisdiction in small debts was introduced by 6 Geo. IV. c. 24. This was repealed by 10 Geo. IV. c. 55, which has in its turn been repealed by the existing act, 1 Vict. c. 41. The chief provisions of that statute are the following: Sheriffs are empowered to determine civil causes, prosecutions for statutory penalties, and maritime civil causes, where the debt, demand, or penalty does not exceed the value of L.8, 6s. 8d., exclusive of expenses and fees of extract, the pursuer or prosecutor being held to have passed from all claim beyond the sum concluded for; § 2. All such causes, unless otherwise provided in the act, proceed upon summons or complaint, according to the form in schedule (A.) annexed to the act, and containing warrant to arrest upon the depending action, stating shortly the origin of debt or ground of action, and concluding against the defender. This summons or complaint being signed by the sheriff-clerk, is a warrant to a sheriff's officer to summon the defender to appear at the time and place mentioned in it; not being sooner than upon the sixth day after the citation; and the same, or the copy thereof, served on the defender, is a sufficient warrant for summoning such witnesses and havers as either party requires. A copy of the summons or complaint, with the citation annexed, and also a copy of the account, if any, must be served at the same time on the defender, personally, or at his dwelling-place, or in case of a company, at their ordinary place of business. The summoning officer must, in all cases under the act, return a signed execution of citation, or appear and give evidence on oath of the citation having been duly made; and citations given by an officer alone, without witnesses, and executions subscribed by the officer, are good and effectual; § 3. Any cause before the sheriff's ordinary court, in which the debt, &c., did not originally exceed L.8, 6s. 8d., or in which, by an interim decree or otherwise, it has, previous to the closing of the record, been reduced to that sum, may, with the pursuer's consent, be remitted to the small-debt roll by the sheriff, either ex proprio mero, or on the motion of a party. If the pursuer do not consent, the provisions of the act as to the fees or expenses to be allowed in such below L.8, 6s. 8d., brought not according to the summary form provided in the act, are applied to such causes subsequent to the proposition for remit, if the sheriff think fit so to modify the expenses; see § 36. When a case has been remitted by the sheriff-substitute from the ordinary court to the small-debt court, an appeal is competent to the sheriff against the remit, but no reclaiming petition is allowed against the remit; § 4. The sheriff may try, in his small-debt court, in the above summary way, applications by landlords or others, having right to the rents and hypothec, for sequestration and sale of a tenant's effects for recovery of rent, provided the rent or balance claimed do not exceed L.8, 6s. 8d. The summons and warrant of sequestration and procedure must be according to the forms directed in schedule (B). Provision is made respecting the appraisal, the inventory and other procedure, in carrying the sequestration into effect; § 5. The pursuer of any civil cause may use arrestment, on the dependence of the action, of any money or effects to the amount of L.8, 6s. 8d., owing or belonging to the defender, in the hands of any third party. The arrestment ceases by the mere lapse of three months, unless it be renewed by a special order or warrant intimated to the arrestee, in which case it continues in force for the like period and under the same conditions; or unless an action of furthcoming or multiplepoinding have been raised before the end of the three months, in which case the arrestment continues in force until the termination of the action; § 6. Wages of labourers and manufacturers, so far as necessary for their subsistence, are deemed alimentary, and, in like manner as servants' fees and other alimentary funds, not liable to arrestment; § 7. Arrestment may be loosed, on the defender's lodging with the sheriff-clerk a bond of caution by one or more sufficient cautioners, to the satisfaction of the sheriff-clerk, agreeably to the form in schedule (C); or on his consigning in the hands of the clerk the amount of the debt or demand, with 5s. or 10s. for expenses, according as the action was for a sum above or below L.5; or on his producing evidence of having obtained decree of absolvitor, or having paid or consigned the debt. A certificate of the sheriff-clerk operates as a warrant of loosing the arrestment; § 8. Provision is made for rendering arrestment effectual by furthcoming summarily, and the forms of the summons and complaint are given in schedule (D); § 9. An action of multiplepoinding may be raised in the same summary way, in name of the holder of a fund not exceeding L.8, 6s. 8d.; see § 10, and relative schedule. Where the defender intends to plead a counter account or claim against the debt, he must serve a copy of such counter account or claim, by an officer, on the pursuer, in the form set forth in schedule (A), or to the like effect, at least one free day before the day of appearance, otherwise it cannot be heard except with the pursuer's consent, but action is reserved for it; § 11. Provision is made for compelling the attendance of witnesses, by imposing penalties in case of their neglect; § 12. When the parties appear, the sheriff hears them viva voce, and examines witnesses or havers upon oath. He may also examine the parties, and put them or any of them upon oath, in case of oath in supplement being required, or a reference made; and if he see cause, he may remit to persons of skill to report, or to any person competent to take and report in writing the evidence of witnesses or havers unable to attend, upon special cause shown. Such cause must, in all cases, be entered in the book of causes kept by the sheriff-clerk. Due notice is given of the examination to both parties. Thereupon the sheriff may pronounce judgment. The decree, stating the amount of expenses (if any) found due to any party (which may include personal charges if the sheriff think fit), and containing warrant for arrestment, and for poinding and imprisonment, when competent, is directed to be annexed to the summons or complaint; and on the same paper with it, agreeably to the form in schedule (A), or to the like effect. The decree and warrant being signed by the clerk, are a sufficient authority for instant arrestment, and also for poinding and sale and imprisonment, where imprisonment is competent, after the lapse of ten free days from the date of the decree, if the party against whom it has been given was personally present when it was pronounced; but, if he was not present, poinding and sale and imprisonment can only proceed after a charge of ten free days, by serving a copy of the complaint and decree on the party personally or at his dwelling-place. If any decree be not enforced by poinding or imprisonment within a year from its date, or from a charge for payment given upon it, the decree cannot be enforced without a new charge given as aforesaid; § 13. No procurator, solicitor, or legal practitioner is allowed to appear or plead for any party without leave of the court, on special cause shown. Nor can any of the pleadings be reduced to writing, or entered on any record, unless with leave of the court, obtained in consequence of any difficulty in point of law, or of the special circumstances of any particular case. When the sheriff orders pleadings to be reduced to writing, the case is thenceforth conducted according to the ordinary forms and proceedings in civil causes.

and in prosecutions for statutory penalties ; § 14. A defender not appearing personally or by one of his family, or by such person, not being an officer of court, as the sheriff shall allow, is held as confessed, and the other party obtains decree against him. In like manner, if the pursuer fail to appear, personally or otherwise, the defender obtains decree of absolvitor ; unless, in either case, a sufficient excuse for delay be stated ; on which account, or on account of the absence of witnesses, or any other good reason, the sheriff may adjourn any case to the next or any other court-day, and ordain the parties and witnesses then to attend ; § 15. Where a decree has been pronounced in absence of a defender, he may, on consigning the expenses decreed for, and the sum of 10s. to meet further expenses, in the hands of the clerk, at any time before a charge is given, or in the event of charge being given before implement of the decree has followed on it (provided, in the latter case, the period from the date of the charge does not exceed three months), obtain from the clerk a warrant, signed by him, sisting execution till the next court-day, or to any subsequent court-day to which the same may be adjourned, and containing authority for citing the other party, and witnesses and havers for both parties ; and such warrant being served upon the other party, is an authority for hearing the cause. In like manner, where absolvitor has passed in absence of the pursuer or prosecutor, he may, at any time within one calendar month, on consigning in the hands of the clerk the sum awarded by the sheriff, as the expenses of the defender and his witnesses, with 5s. to meet further expenses, obtain a warrant, signed by the clerk, for citing the defender and witnesses for both parties ; and this warrant, being served upon the defender, is an authority for hearing the cause. The sum of expenses awarded by the sheriff, and consigned as aforesaid, is in every case paid over to the other party, unless the contrary be specially ordered by the Court. All such warrants for hearing are in force, and may be served by any sheriff-officer in any county, without indorsation, or other authority than this act ; § 16. The sheriff-clerk is directed to keep a book, in which must be entered all causes conducted under the authority of the act, &c. ; § 17. The sheriff may, if he think proper, direct the sums found due to be paid by instalments weekly, monthly, or quarterly, according to the circumstances of the party found liable, and under such conditions and qualifications as he thinks fit to annex ; § 18. A decree may be enforced in any other county besides that in which it is issued, provided it, or an extract of it, be endorsed by the sheriff-clerk of such other county ; § 19. Provision is made, in detail, for carrying into effect the sequestration, appointing and sale, in a summary way, by appraisement, &c. ; § 20. In all charges and arrestments, and executions of charges and arrestments under this act, one witness is sufficient ; § 21. Action of damages for loss or injury by riots, authorised by 3 Geo. IV. c. 33, where the sum concluded for does not exceed 1*l*. 8*s*. 8*d*., may be heard and determined in the summary way provided by this act ; as likewise actions for recovery of arrears, by virtue of 9 Geo. IV. c. 39, although the amount of the assessments exceeds 1*l*. 6*s*. 8*d*. ; § 22. The sheriffs must, in addition to their ordinary small-debt courts, by themselves or their substitutes, hold circuit courts for the purposes of the act. Provision is made for the times and places at which such courts shall be held, the attendance of sheriff-clerks by themselves or deputies, &c. ; §§ 23, 24, 25. The sheriff is directed, three months before holding a circuit court, to apportion the parishes to be within the jurisdiction of the court. And all causes are brought before the ordinary small-debt court, or any circuit court within the jurisdiction of which the defender resides, or to the jurisdiction of which he is amenable. But if there be more defenders than one, in one cause of action, amenable to the jurisdiction of different courts, or if, in any other cause, the sheriff think it just, he may, on summary application in writing, made by or for any pursuer, lodged with the sheriff-clerk, or on verbal application made by or for the pursuer in open court, order a summons or complaint to be issued, and the cause to be brought before his ordinary small-debt court or any of his circuit courts ; § 26. The sheriff may adjourn causes from one court to another ; § 27. Provision is made for accounts being given in to Exchequer of the expenses of sheriffs and of sheriff-clerks at circuit courts ; § 29. No decree given by any sheriff in any cause decided under authority of this act, is subject to reduction, advocacy, suspension, or appeal, or any other form of review, or stay of execution, other than provided by this act, either on account of any omission or irregularity, or informality in the citation or proceedings, or on the merits, or on any other ground ; § 30. Any one thinking himself aggrieved by a decree of a sheriff under this act may bring the case by appeal before the Circuit Court of Justiciary, or, where there are no circuit courts, before the High Court of Justiciary at Edinburgh, in the manner directed by 20 Geo. II. except in so far as altered by this act. (For this mode of appeal see the article Appeal to Circuit Court.) Such appeal is only competent when founded on the ground of malice and oppression on the part a sheriff; or on such deviations, in point of from the statutory enactments, as the t may think took place wilfully, or as prevented substantial justice from having been done; or on incompetency, including t of jurisdiction of the sheriff. Such ap are heard and determined in open courts; the Court may correct such deviation in t of form, or remit the cause to the sheriff, instructions, or for rehearing generally. not competent to produce or found upon document, as evidence on the merits of original cause, which was not produced e sheriff when the case was heard, and to h his signature or initials were not then ed, which he only does if required; nor to d upon or refer to the testimony of any ess not examined before the sheriff, and e name is not written by him, when the is heard, upon the record copy of the mona; which he does when specially re- ed to that effect. No sist or stay of the ess and decree, and no certificate of ap- l, can be issued by the sheriff-clerk, except n consignment of the whole sum, if any, erved for by the decree, and expenses if any, security found for the whole expenses ch may be incurred and found due under appeal; § 31. Provision is made for the payable under this act to the clerk, officer, errier; § 32. It is enacted, that a copy ection 32, containing the fees, be printed each summons or complaint, and on each vice copy, and hung up in every sheriff- ck's office, and in every sheriff-court place, ; § 33. Provision is made for fining of- ers who neglect their duty, reserving all ther claim of damages against them; § 34. person is exempt from the jurisdiction of e sheriff in any cause raised under this act, account of privilege, as being a member of e College of Justice, or otherwise; § 35. all causes and prosecutions in which the mand or penalty does not exceed L.8, 6s. 8d., ough before any court not according to the mmary form provided in this act, it is made wful to the judge to allow no other or higher s or expenses to be taken or paid than ose above mentioned; § 36. On the con- uction of the Sheriffs and Justices Small- bt Acts generally, the following authorities ay be consulted: Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 13, et l., and notes by Mr Ivory; Bell's Com. Bell's inc. §§ 2206-7; MacLaurin's Sheriff-Court cesses, 6.

By the act 16 and 17 Vict. c. 80, 1853, the all-debt jurisdiction of sheriffs is extended causes not exceeding L.12, and parties may free by minute to have actions for a larger ount than L.12, tried in the small-debt form.

3. Imprisonment.—The following are the ovisions of 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 70, for the abolition of imprisonment for civil debts of small amount. It is declared unlawful to im- prison any person on account of a civil debt not exceeding L.8, 6s. 8d., exclusive of interest and expenses. But it is lawful to imprison debtors on debts incurred, or which may be- come due under contracts made before the passing of this act, in like manner as if it had not passed, provided imprisonment for such debts commence before 1st January 1840; § 1. It is unlawful for a magistrate, or for any person having the charge of a prison in Scot- land, to receive into prison, or for any mes- senger-at-arms, or other officer of the law, to apprehend, or detain in custody, the person of any debtor for a civil debt not exceeding L.8, 6s. 8d., exclusive of interest and expenses, in virtue of letters of caption, or other war- rant, unless in the case of debts contracted before the passing of the act as aforesaid; § 2. On application made to the sheriff of the county in which the prison is situated, or to the magistrates having charge of a prison, by any person incarcerated in it, showing that he is imprisoned or detained in jail, for a civil debt or debts, contrary to the provisions of this act, the sheriff or magistrates must cause intimation to be made to the incarcer- ating creditor or creditors, upon inducia of six days after intimation; and on being satis- fied that the statement of the prisoner is true, the sheriff or magistrates must grant warrant for his liberation, in so far as regards the debt due to such creditor; § 3. It is unlaw- ful for any person to acquire from third par- ties, by assignation or otherwise, except by marriage or inheritance, one or more civil debts, of or below the amount of L.8, 6s. 8d., against one individual, to the effect of accu- mulating such debts into one decree, or war- rant, or writ, or of adding the same to debts previously due to him, for the purpose of de- feating this act, by imprisoning the debtor for such accumulated debts; § 4. The act is declared not to extend to obligations ad facta præstanda; nor to affect the right of the Sove- reign, or the Crown officers, or the fiscals of courts of law, or others, to imprison as for- merly, or on account of taxes or penalties due to the revenue, or on account of any fines or forfeitures imposed by law; or apply to im- prisonment for poor-rates, or local taxation, or to imprisonment for sums decerned for alim- ent; § 5. See Cessio Bonorum.

Small Stipends. By 50 Geo. III. c. 84, and 5 Geo. IV. c. 72, the minimum stipend to be modified to ministers having a right to stipend from the teinds of their parishes is fixed at L.150 per annum, with L.8, 6s. 8d. for communion elements; and where there is not a sufficient amount of teinds in the parish, the sum is to be made up by a payment from Exchequer. In addition to their stipend, these ministers have right to a manse and glebe, or a provision of L.50 per annum, in lieu of both. Under these statutes the Teind Court has a ministerial jurisdiction; Beveridge, ii. 739. See Teind Court. Locality, &c. Glebe. As to what are called Government or Parliamentary churches in the Highlands of Scotland, and the stipend and accommodations of the ministers, see 5 Geo. IV. c. 90.

Smith's Forge. The right of forges is given by the clause in the Crown charter, cum fabrilibus, &c. Anciently the right to have a forge for making plough-irons, or shoeing horses, could not exist in the vassal's person without a special clause in his grant; but modern practice has rendered this unnecessary. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 8.

Smuggling; is the making, transferring, importing or exporting, of goods without paying the duties to Government, and with the intention of defrauding the revenue. If a merchant sells smuggled goods, knowing them to be so, he cannot sue for payment of their price, in a transaction entered into in this country, and no action lies for delivery of them, if purchased as such; the maxim as to all illegal contracts being, Potior est conditio possidentis et defendentis. Where an action is brought for the price of smuggled goods by a foreign merchant, the determination seems to depend a good deal on the question, whether the foreign merchant was accessory to, and aiding in, the plan of smuggling the goods into this country; for where he has had no accession to the fraud, but merely sells the goods, and the merchant in this country takes upon himself all the risk of importing them contrary to the revenue laws of this country, an action may competently be brought by the foreign merchant in the courts of this country. A bill for smuggled goods cannot be charged on by one aware of its character; and a debtor, whose losses have arisen from such illegal transactions, will not obtain the benefit of the cessio, even if he might otherwise have obtained it, until the Court conceive that the length of his imprisonment has atoned for his fault. Many statutes have been passed with a view to prevent smuggling. These have been consolidated by 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 53, amended by 4 and 5 Will. IV. c. 13. These acts make many important provisions respecting the management of vessels and boats, the licensing of ships, the delivery of goods, &c. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 3, vide note; Kames' Eluc. Art. 23; Bell's Com. i. 306; ii. 588; Stair, B. ii. tit. 2, § 9; More's Notes, p. lxiiv.; Bank. i. 94; Bell's Princ. §§ 42, 460; Kames' Princ. of Equity, 223, 231 (1825); Brown on Sale, 131. See Contraband Goods. Excise. Defrauding Revenue. Pactum Illicitum.

Socage; an ancient tenure, under which the vassal performed exclusively agricultural services to the superior in the lands which the vassal occupied, a tenure which is said to have prevailed at one time in Scotland, but which is now unknown. It would appear that in socage tenures, the right of primogeniture did not originally hold; on the contrary, all the children succeeded equally, according to the principles of the civil law; Bank. B. iii. tit. 4, § 17; Ersk. B. i. tit. 1, § 35; B. i. tit. 4, § 5; Ross's Lect. ii. 322; Kames' Stat. Law, h. t.; Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Society; or partnership, is a consensual contract, by which the parties, either in writing or rebus ipsis et factis, agree to conduct a certain business, trade, or manufacture, under certain conditions, and by the aid of a certain capital, dividing the profits and suffering the losses arising in the course of the connection, according to certain proportions stipulated in the contract. Where the proportions are not previously arranged, the presumption is for equality of rights and of liability; but this presumption may be overcome by contrary proof or presumption. This contract does not differ essentially from joint adventure, in which the partners are liable singuli in solidum for the obligations contracted in reference to the adventure, and warranted by the terms of the contract. See Joint Adventure. See Peacock v. Peacock, 2 Campbell, 45; and Campbell's Trustees v. Morrison, 7 S. 650; and in House of Lords, 5 W. & S. 15. See also 3 Ross's L.C. 381. Partners, even if lending their names merely, and whether ostensible or not, are liable for the company debts singuli in solidum, to the extent of their whole estates. See Sleeping Partner. Persons are also made responsible to third parties, by receiving a share in the profits, or by an agreement entitling them to share in the profits. But wages may be paid to clerks and other servants, ratably according to the profits; or a third part may, by private agreement with one of the partners, get part of his share, without such responsibility being incurred. When the partner of a company acquires a right in name of the company, the property belongs to the company; or where the partner acquires a right in his own name, with the money of the company, he lies under an obligation to communicate the benefit to the company. Every member of a company is understood to have the power of using the company firm; and in every act of ordinary administration, in the line of the company's trade or employment, he may bind the company by the use of that firm. But he cannot use it to execute a deed which is not an act of ordinary administration, to execute a submission, for example, or to grant a bond; nor would his giving consent pany's firm for a private debt, where the party receiving it was aware of the fraud, be effectual to the person receiving it. A guarantee is implied by each of the partners of a company to third parties, of all the engagements legally undertaken in the name of the company. The partners are even liable in restitution of what one of their number has obtained by fraud in the line of the company's trade.

Where there is no special agreement on the subject, a partner's share cannot be transferred, either by conveyance or by succession, except to the amount of his claim on the company at the time of their dividend. Any partner whom he may, independently of the company, assume, continues to be his partner, not the company's, on the maxim, Socius mei socii non est meus socius. But one company may become, as it were, an individual partner of another company, and thus subject to the obligations of partnership in a variety of companies. The stock of the company is liable, in the first place, to the company's debts; and the company debts rank on the private estate of the partners of the company, or of the survivors, or of those remaining solvent; who, however, have their recourse. The debts or losses of a private partner cannot come upon the company's funds until all the company's debts are paid. His creditors cannot transfer his share by pawning, though they may attach it prospectively by arrestment. The death of a copartner dissolves the company, unless the contrary be provided for in the contract, or where the survivors tacitly or expressly agree to continue. The death of one of the partners does not dissolve the company, if it be expressly provided that heirs shall become partners; or if the right of heirs be necessarily implied, as in a contract exceeding the term of human life. Thus, a partnership in a coal concern for 124 years was binding on the heirs taking up the succession; and while the concern was prosperous, and there was no reasonable apprehension of loss, the heir of one of the parties was not entitled to a dissolution of the partnership, to the prejudice of the other party; Warner, Jan. 24, 1798, M. 14603; affirmed, April 25 and May 19, 1815, 3 Dow, 76. Although the contract be declared to endure for a certain time, a partner may judicially dissolve the partnership upon good grounds. Insanity, insolvency, or bankruptcy, under 1696, c. 5, of one of the partners, is a ground of dissolution. Sequestration is eo ipso dissolution. Where no term of endurance has been agreed upon, any of the partners may retire whenever he chooses, and so dissolve the partnership. In order that a partner who has once appeared in a concern may not mislead the public into a belief that he remains a partner, after he has withdrawn, and thus give greater credit to the company than they would otherwise have received, he and the remaining partners must be at great pains, by public advertisements, and even by circular letters to the correspondents of the company, to notify his retirement from the company. The partnership continues to subsist even after dissolution, for the purpose of winding up the concern. During this period no new debts can be contracted. Special stipulations, as to the winding up, are effectual; but if no arrangements have been made in that manner, the surviving or solvent partners are entitled to take the management; or, in case of dispute, a neutral person is judicially appointed to wind up. An agreement to refer disputes to arbitration is effectual only if the arbiter be named. See Arbitration.

Questions occasionally occur respecting the rights and obligations of an association for religious purposes, or other similar voluntary association. It was at one time held that such societies could not hold lands or tenements even by the intervention of trustees; but it is now settled, by a long course of decisions, that they may hold property in the name of trustees. In such cases, the trustees may maintain action respecting the property; and the purposes of the trust, where not expressly declared, may be inferred from circumstances. Thus, it was decided, that where a schism takes place among a religious society, the use of the meeting-house remains with the members who adhere to the religious principles of those by whom it was erected; Craigdallie, &c. v. Aikman, 27th June 1805, M. 14,584; appealed in 1813, 1 Dow, 1; in 1829, 2 Bligh, 529. The members of a religious association are not bound to pay the stipend of the minister whom they have called and appointed, longer than they adhere to the congregation; Hyslop v. Nairn, 14th June 1825, 4 S. & D. 84. A number of persons having formed themselves into a society for religious purposes, under the denomination of Bereans, purchased a piece of ground to build a meeting-house, in the name of certain persons, as trustees for the congregation, who were infert. A schism happening in the congregation, one party seceded, and pursued the trustees for their share of the property. It was held that the trustees were bound to denude in favour of the majority of the contributors for purchasing the ground and building the meeting-house; Allan v. Macrae, 25th May 1791, M. 14,583; Bell's Cases, 538. A question respecting the possession of a meeting-house arose out of a dispute between two sections of a Relief congregation. The meeting-house was vested in trustees for behoof of the congregation. One section adhered to the Relief Synod, who declared the minister out of connection with the Relief body, and appointed the church to be preached vacant; the other section adhered to their minister. In the circumstances, and until the question of right was settled, the interim possession was divided between the two sections, each having the meeting-house half of the day, forenoon and afternoon, on alternate Sundays; Galbraith v. Smith, Mar. 10, 1837, 15 D. B. M. 808. In the same case it was subsequently held, that the pursuers had failed in proving that the principle of Establishments was held originally as a fundamental and essential tenet of the Dissenting body in question, and the defence was sustained, that the chapel, being held in trust for a Relief congregation, can be enjoyed and occupied only by a congregation and minister in communion with the Relief Presbytery and Synod, and that this was an essential condition of the trust. Smith v. Galbraith, Feb. 21, 1843, 5 D. 665. See generally, on the subject of Society, *Ersk. Socius Criminis; an accomplice or associate in the commission of a crime. See Accomplice. Evidence. King's Evidence.

Sodomy; the crime of carnal copulation against nature. The punishment is death. An attempt to commit this offence is punishable arbitrarily. Hume, i. 465; Alison's Princ. 566.

Sok (secta de hominibus suis, in curia, secundum consuetudinem regni); was an old word used in charters and infeftments. According to Skene, he who was infeft with sok or soyt had the right of holding courts within his own barony or lands, at which "homines sui," or his vassals, gave "soyt," according to the tenor of their infeftments. Skene, h. t. See Heritable Jurisdictions. Furca et Fossa.

Sokmanria; or soccage, according to Skene, was a kind of holding of lands, when any man was infeft freely without any service, ward, relief, or marriage, and paid to his master the duty called "petit serantie." Skene, h. t. See Soccage. Seranteria.

Solatium. It is a principle of the law of Scotland, not recognised in English law, that one who injures another is bound, not only to repair the actual loss suffered, but also to give a solatium for wounded feelings. Thus solatium for wounded feelings is allowed in cases of breach of promise of marriage. And where a father, husband, or near relative is killed through negligence, a solatium will be given even where the death of the sufferer might be regarded as a benefit instead of a loss to his family. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 14, note by Ivory; Kames' Equity, 305. See Damages. Defamation.

Soldiers; all persons in her Majesty's land forces, except militia, yeomanry, or volunteers, if these be not expressly included. With regard to the enlisting of soldiers, see the article Enlisting. The annual act for the government and regulation of the forces is called the Mutiny Act. See Mutiny Act. This act declares soldiers exempt from personal arrest for debt, unless it be sworn to amount to £30. As to the question whether an officer or soldier can be arrested in meditatione fugæ, see Meditatio Fugæ. No soldier can be reclaimed from the army, on the ground of breach of contract, except an apprentice indentured for not less than four years. See Apprentice. Soldiers are liable to trial by the ordinary courts, for crimes or offences not of a military kind; and when accused of such offences, their officers must aid in delivering them up to the civil power. Soldiers are billeted or quartered on all the inhabitants in royal burghs, burghs of regality, or chief market towns, except schoolmasters, widows, unmarried women, and paupers. But it is customary to pay a composition instead of actually giving the soldiers quarters. *Ersk. Solicitor-General, of Scotland; one of the Crown counsel, next in dignity and importance to the Lord Advocate, to whom he gives his aid in protecting the interests of the Crown, in conducting prosecutions, &c. Like the Lord Advocate, the Solicitor-General has precedence and the privilege of pleading within the bar. Formerly, the Solicitor used to get a special letter to that effect; but now, when there is only one Solicitor, it is held to be a privilege of his office,—not when there are two, as there sometimes have been. The Solicitor has been held not to be a calumniator publicus: he cannot therefore sue in or authorise a complaint as such, except in his character of advocate-depute; Complainer v. Kelties, 18th Nov. 1775, Tait's Cons. in Brown's Supp. v. 602. All proclamations for observance of days of public fasting or thanksgiving are directed to the Solicitor-General. See Bank. vol. ii. p. 492.

The right of the Lord Advocate to plead within the bar has the authority of statute. By the Act 1537, cap. 57, it is enacted, "that nane advocate nor procurator within the bar stand to pley, bot passe outwith, with the partie, except the Kingis Advocat." And the King, on 20th January 1538, sent a letter to the Court, recorded in the Acts of Sederunt, directing them to allow the Lord Advocate to remain during the advisings of the Bench, which then took place in private. The Lord Advocate also acted judicially, and had a vote with the Judges in the decision of causes. See Acts of Sederunt 17th Nov. 1610, p. 69. In those cases where he himself was counsel, his vote was rejected. "Mr James McGill allegit that the Advocate sulde nocht remain and vote on the mater forsaide, becaus the accione is perseuit be him, and at his instance as Advocate, and therfor sulde nocht vote. The Lords be sentence interlocutour findis that the Advocate sulde ryse, and pass to the Bar, and nocht vote thereon. See Acts of Sederunt, 4th Feb. 1564, p. 47.

With regard to the Solicitor-General, there is the following provision in an Act of Sederunt, 28th February 1662:—"The macers are authorised to remove all persons, of whatsoever quality who shall be found within the innermost bar, where the Ordinary, Lords, and Clerks do abide, except the Keeper of the Minute-book, the King's Solicitor, and one servant appointed by his Majesty's Advocate." But this privilege was soon taken from the Solicitor, and the old practice returned to, of allowing only the Lord Advocate and Clerks to be within the bar. On 16th December 1686, the Court, without any instructions from the Crown, and upon their own authority, issued the following declaration in regard to the parties who had right to come within the bar:—

"The Lords of Councill and Session considering, That by the ancient custome, no persons, of whatsoever quality, were permitted to come within the bar of the Inner House durieng the time of debateing causes, except his Majesty's Advocat, the Clerks of Session, the Clerk of the Bills and his deput, and one mace: They do revive that custome, and ordain the same to be duely observed in time comeing, discharging hereby the macers to permitt any persnes, except those above exprest to come within the said bar, as they will be answerable on their perill: And in case any person be desyreous to speak with any of the Lords while they are upon the Bench, that he call for a mace at the door, and give notice thereof by him: It is always hereby declared, that the Lord Thesaurer, and Thesaurer-depute, or the Commissioners of his Majestie's Thesaurary, not being of the Bench, shall be allowed to be within the bar when the King's causes are called and debated, and no otherways."

In 1713, when Forbes published his collection of Decisions, he describes the Lords as sitting at a semicircular bench: "the bar, like a diameter line, at which the advocates, even the King's Solicitors, stand and plead uncovered, is opposite to the Bench. Her Majesty's Advocate sits in chair within this bar, and pleads always with his hat on." The practice of the Advocate pleading with his hat on was introduced in the time of Sir Thomas Hope, who was Advocate to King Charles I. "This indulgence he owed to his having two sons on the Bench, Sir John, his eldest, and Sir Thomas, Lord Kerse."—Notes to Tait's Index, p. 500.

The Crown, however, interfered on behalf of the Solicitor-General. When Charles Areskine, afterwards Lord Tinwald, was appointed sole Solicitor on 10th June 1725 (it being the practice both then and afterwards to have more Solicitors than one), he produced a letter to the Court from the King in the following terms:—

"George R.—Right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well: Whereas, we have appointed Mr Charles Areskine, advocate, to be sole Solicitor for that part of Great Britain called Scotland, and we being pleased to show him a farther mark of our royal favour, it is our will and pleasure that a seat be placed for him within the bar of your Court, where and from whence he may be at liberty to plead cases in your presence; and we do hereby direct you to cause such to be placed accordingly. Given at our Court at St James, this 2d day of June 1725, in the 8th year of our reign. By his Majesty's appointment, sic subscribitur, ROXBURGH."—MS. Records of Privy-Council.

The entry in the Book of Sederunt bears that the letter was read and ordered to be recorded, that the Solicitor took the oaths, "and that the Lords appointed a seat for him within the bar."—MS. Books of Sederunt. When Mr Robert Dundas was appointed Solicitor in 1742, he produced a similar letter, and the entry in the Books of Sederunt is in the same terms. But when Mr Henry Dundas was appointed Solicitor in 1766, no letter appears granting him this privilege, and the Minute in the Sederunt Book does not confer it.

From Tait's Reports, it would appear that the privilege thus granted by the Crown to the Solicitor had come to be recognised, in 1775, as one he was entitled to claim irrespective of express grant. Tait states that "when Mr Montgomery presented his commission as sole Solicitor, with the whole privileges of his office as enjoyed by his predecessors, the Lords understood one of them to be his being allowed to sit and plead within the bar; therefore he was admitted to do so. Formerly the Solicitors used to get a special letter to that effect; but now, when there is only one Solicitor, it is held to be a privilege of his office, not when there is two."—5 Brown's Sup. p. 603. Apparently it was upon some idea of this kind that the two Solicitors in Bankton's time acted: "The Solicitor takes care of the King's interest as assistant to the Advocate. Both have the privilege of pleading within the bar; at least the Solicitor formerly enjoyed it, though now the two gentlemen joined in the commission as Solicitors do not use such privilege."—Bank. vol. ii. p. 492.

In modern times the practice is for the President of the Court to direct the Solicitor to take his seat within the bar, after he has taken the oaths.

From the above account it would appear that the Lord Advocate has right to sit within the bar in virtue of a statute; and the Solicitor's admission to the same privilege may be said to have originated with the Crown, since the Act of Sederunt of 1662 was repealed in 1686. At the same time, the Court seem to have asserted the right to admit such parties as they pleased within the bar. By the Act of Sederunt of 16th December 1686, above quoted, they permitted the Lord Treasurer, or the Commissioners of the Treasury, to be within the bar when Crown causes were heard. And by Act of Sederunt of 7th July 1763, "this day the Lords resolved to admit all the members of His Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, whether Peers or Commoners, within the bar, and to have a seat in this house" (p. 541). This was a decided alteration of the old rule and practice. Fountainhall reports a case where the practice was thus stated: "The Marquis of Montrose compearing to choose his curators in presentia, the Lords, by the fault of their macers, suffering the Lady Marchioness, his mother, and many with her, to enter within the Inner Bar, were necessitated to desire her to remove; and then cause signify it was the privilege of none to stand within but Dukes and Duchesses—which my lady obeyed."—Marquis of Montrose, 8th Nov. 1695, 4 Brown's Sup. 277.

It would thus appear that both the Crown and the Court have the right to authorise any parties they please to come within the bar. See Report of Faculty of Advocates, 1859. See also Robes.

Solicitor-General, of England; is one of the officers of the Crown, next in rank to the Attorney-General. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Solicitors before the Supreme Court. The solicitors or agents practising before the Supreme Court of Scotland were formed into a society in the year 1784, and incorporated by royal charter in 1797, with the usual powers, and with the liberty of holding lands to an amount not exceeding L.500. They are empowered to hold certain annual meetings, to elect office-bearers, on the 1st of June in each year, and to make bye-laws, subject to the review of the Court of Session, on the summary application of any one interested. The office-bearers are a president, vice-president, treasurer, and secretary. They have also two censors, two auditors, and a librarian. The qualifications of agents in the Supreme Courts are regulated by A. S. 10th August 1754, 11th March 1772, and 13th February 1787; and these are all ratified by 21st December 1833, which makes certain regulations for checking irregularities and abuses in conducting the business of the Court. Among other provisions, it is enacted, that each person entitled to act as agent or solicitor, shall give in to each of the Clerk's offices, and to the Bill-Chamber, a signed list of the names of his clerks and apprentices, for whom he is answerable. And when any of those contained in the list leave his service, he must, within three days at farthest, notify the fact at the above places, that their names may be expunged from the list. By a bye-law, 1st December 1808, no solicitor can enter into an indenture with an apprentice for a shorter period than five years. The apprentice must attend the Humanity or Greek class in a university, either two sessions before the commencement of his indenture, or one previous to, and one during his apprenticeship. Previous to his admission into the society, he must have attended the Scots Law class in the University of Edinburgh, at least one session. The society possess a library and a widows' fund. They are members of the College of Justice; Brac. Jan. 24, 1833, 11 S. & D. 313. See Scot. Abridg. h. t.; Kames' Stat. Law, h. t.; Skene's Prac. i. 61; Alexander's Abridg. of A. & pp. 67, 86, 423. See Attorney's Licence. Agent.

Solicitors at Law; a society of law-agents in Edinburgh, incorporated by royal charter, and entitled to practise before the Sheriff Court of Edinburgh, and other inferior courts.

Solidum. To be bound in solidum is to be bound for the whole debt, although only one of several obligants. In order to constitute an obligation of this kind, the person must be taken bound, conjunctly and severally, with the others, or as principal and full debtor; except in bills of exchange, where simple acceptance by one of several acceptors imports a joint and several liability. Where several debtors are bound each for his own share, they are said to be bound per capita.

Sorners. A person is guilty of sorning who takes meat and drink from others by force or menaces, without paying for it. This practice had formerly prevailed to such an extent in Scotland, that the most vigorous measures were requisite for its suppression; in so much, that the offence was punishable with the severest penalties, and at one period with death. Robert II. c. 12; 1449, c. 22; 1455, c. 45; 1477, c. 77; Hume, i. 471; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 64; Bank. i. 274; Hutch. Justice, ii. 75.

Soundness, Warranty of, in Horses. See Horses.

Sowming and Rowming; are two old law terms, now applied to the action whereby the number of cattle to be brought upon a common, by the persons respectively having a servitude of pasturage, may be ascertained. The criterion is the number of cattle which each of the dominant proprietors is able to fodder during winter. This action (which is competent before the Judge Ordinary) lies against such of the claimants on the common as have had indefinite promiscuous possession for forty years; such possession being contrary to the nature of the right, and calculated to injure the other parties interested. But the action does not lie against the proprietor of the servient tenement himself, who, it is presumed, will not overstock his property so as to impoverish it. A sowm of land is as much as will pasture one cow or ten sheep (Hutchinson, ii. 412); and strictly speaking, to sowm the common, is to ascertain the several sowms it may hold; and to rowm it, is to portion it out amongst the dominant proprietors. But no such apportionment the parties interested cannot be compelled by this particular process, which is confined to the ascertainment of the numbers each may pasture. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 15; Stair, B. ii. tit. 7, § 14; Bank. B. ii. tit. 7, § 32. See Pasturage. Commonly.

Special Case. In civil jury causes, a special case differs from a special verdict only in this, that the special verdict is returned by the jury, whereas the special case is adjusted by the parties themselves, or by their counsel, and sets forth the special facts on which they are agreed, without the evidence. On the case thus adjusted, the Court decides the points of law raised by the facts as admitted. Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 243, and authorities there cited. See Special Verdict.

Special Charge. Letters of special charge are letters passing under the Signet, charging the heir of one who has died infert in lands, to enter heir to him, under certification, that, if no entry take place, the complainant shall have the same execution against the lands as if the heir had entered. They are now abolished. See Charge. Adjudication. Hereditas Jacens. Annus Deliberandi.

Special Jury Book; a book kept by the sheriff, and prepared by copying from the general jury book the names of those qualified to serve as special jurors, i. e., persons possessed of heritable property yielding L.100 of yearly rent, or personal property to the amount of L.1000; 6 Geo. IV. c. 22, § 4; 7 Geo. IV. c. 8; Alison's Prac. 377; Steele, 4. See General Jury Book. Jury.

Special Service; is that form of service by which an heir is served to his ancestor in a special feudal subject, and under a special character. See Service of Heirs. Succession. Brieve.

Special Verdict. In civil causes tried by jury, where it happens that the facts proved raise difficult questions of law, a special verdict may be returned by the jury, under direction of the judge at the trial. The usual course is for the judge to state the facts in detail to the jury, and to ask them how they find as to each of them; and the facts so found having been taken down by the clerk of Court, the special verdict is afterwards transmitted to the Division of the Court to which the cause belongs, in order to have the law applied. It is also competent for the judge to retire, and draw up the special verdict, and afterwards to return to Court and read it to the jury for their assent, subject to the observation of the counsel in the cause. Or the counsel may themselves agree on the special findings in point of fact, and lead evidence only as to those facts with respect to which they are not agreed. The special verdict must be confined to specific findings of fact, with no detail of the evidence on which the verdict rests. See on this subject Lord Chief-Commissioner Adam's Treatise on Jury Trial, and Macfarlane's Jury Practice, 242, and App. 349. See also Issue. Jury Trial. Exceptions, Bill of.

Special Verdict, in a criminal trial; is a return of certain facts or circumstances as proved, without any general conclusion from them as to the panel's guilt; the conclusion being left to be made by the judge, according to his opinion of the lawful construction of the facts so laid before him. Hume, ii. 439; Alison's Prac. 647; Steele, 213. See Verdict. General Verdict. Issue.

Specification; is the formation of a new property from materials belonging to another. In this manner of creating property, a transference of the right, with indemnification, however, to the owner of the materials, is made wherever the materials cannot be reduced to their original state. Thus, wine, as it cannot be again reduced into grapes, belongs to the maker. But silver plate, formed from bullion, may be reduced to its original state, and therefore still belongs to the person to whom the bullion belonged. *Ersk. Spei Emptio; the sale of the hope or chance of a thing's existence; e.g., the draught of a net, or the hope of a succession. Differently from the sale of a res futura, such a sale is good though the thing never exist. Brown on Sale, 111; Bell's Princ. § 91. See Res Futuræ. Goodwill of a Shop.

Spes Successionis. The right or hope of succession. By the law of Scotland, a spes successionis may be sold, but it cannot be adjudged; Beaton, 7th June 1821, 1 S. & D. 49. In rights taken to parent and child, unless very strong terms are used to limit the father's right to a mere liferent, he is understood to have the fee, and the child's right is merely a spes successionis. See Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 23; Bell's Com. i. 56; Bell's Princ. §§ 1954, 1964. See Pactum de Hæreditate Viventis.

Spirituality of Benefices; the tithes of all lands; used in contradistinction to the temporality of benefices, which consisted of the property of such lands as had been gifted to the Church. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 4; Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, § 35; Bank. ii. 50. See Teinds.

Splitting of Superiority. A superior cannot split the superiority into parts, where there is one fee and one reddendo, so as to compel the vassal to seek his entry from more than one superior; Bell's Princ. § 859; Illust. ib. See Superiority.

Spoliatus Ante Omnia Restituendus; a maxim importing that spuilzied goods must be restored, immediately on the pursuer proving that he was in lawful possession of them, and that the allegation of a preferable right, though instantly verified, will not be received as an answer to this demand. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 15; Bank. B. i. tit. 10, § 148. See Spuilzie.

Sponsalia. See Espousals.

Sponsio Ludicra; an agreement, in which the contracting parties are held not to be serious in their intention of binding themselves. Kames' Equity, 22; Brown's Synop. p. 1438. See Gaming. Wager. Pactum Illicitum.

Spring-Guns; and similar engines, are thought to be justifiable when employed to ward off attacks on houses. Their legality is very doubtful when placed in enclosed grounds, even with notice; and they are certainly illegal when employed to protect unenclosed grounds. It was thought unnecessary to extend to Scotland the English statute 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 18, prohibiting such engines, as the evil was already provided for by the common law. See Bell's Princ. § 961.

Spuilzie; corresponding to ejection and intrusion in heritage, may be defined, the taking away of moveable goods in the possession of another, against the declared will of the person, or without the order of law. In consequence of this unlawful act, an action lies not only for restoring the goods, but for all the profits which it was possible for the owner to have made of the goods, as these profits shall be proved by his oath in litem, which, by 1503, c. 65, the sheriff may administer. This action must be brought within three years, in order to entitle the pursuer to the violent profits, and will be elided by any probable ground of excuse, or by the spoliator's voluntary restitution de recenti. But an action for recovery of the goods carried off illegally, and for ordinary damages, may be brought at any time within forty years, not against the spoliator alone, but against all abettors, who are liable singuli in solidum, and against his heirs, who are liable in violent profits also, if litigation took place with the ancestor. The spuilzied property may be evicted from bona fide purchasers, for spuilzie inurit labem realem. *Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 16, et seq.; Ersk. Spunging-Houses. In England a bailiff must detain persons arrested for debt for twenty-four hours in a private house, before lodging them in prison. They are usually carried to taverns kept by the bailiff; and such taverns, on account of the extortion often practised in them upon the prisoners, are called spunging-houses. Ross's Lect. i. 346.

Squalor Carceris. This term means merely the strictness of imprisonment which a creditor is entitled to enforce, with the view of compelling the debtor to pay the debt, or disclose any funds which he may have concealed. It does not imply (as it did with the ancient churchmen, from whom the term is derived) anything loathsome or unhealthy in the imprisonment in Scotland, which is indeed less close than in England. Squalor carceris is not necessary in imprisonment on a meditatio fugæ warrant, security being all that is required in such cases. See Stair, B. iv. tit. 47, § 22; Bell's Com. B. ii. 565; Hutch. Justice, ii. 277. See Imprisonment.

Stabbing; is indictable at common law, either as a species of assault, or under the general head of stellionate; and nothing will excuse such intentional stabbing but the plea of self-defence, not ultra moderamen inculpatae tutelæ, in an affray not begun by the individual accused; for if the affray was begun by him, he will hardly be exculpated even on that plea. The ordinary punishment for stabbing, is whipping and banishment. Hume, i. 322, 324, et seq. See Assault. Stellionate. With regard to cutting or stabbing with intent to murder or injure, see Attempt at Murder.

Staff and Baton. These were the usual symbols of resignation when the vassal resigned his feu into the hands of his superior, either ad remanentiam or in favorem. *A. Stage-Coaches. The owners and drivers of stage-coaches are liable for the safety of the passengers and goods, as has been explained in the articles Nautæ, Caupones. Public Carriages. Driving, Careless. The licensing and duties for stage-coaches have been the subject of several statutes, the most recent of which are 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 120, and 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 65. The act 2 and 3 Will. IV. in addition to the duties, contains certain general provisions respecting the conduct of stage-coaches, and in this respect it has been amended by 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 47. These provisions are too minute and numerous for insertion in this work. They will be found well abridged in Blair's Justice, h. t. The following may be noticed: A stage-carriage is defined by the older act to be any carriage employed to convey passengers for hire, to or from any place in Great Britain, and which, when passing along any highway or other road, travels at the rate of three miles or more in the hour, whatever be its form or construction, provided the passengers, or one or more of them, pay separate and distinct fares for their respective seats. The term stage-carriage is not applied to carriages employed wholly upon any railway, nor to any carriage drawn by steam, or otherwise than by animal power; § 5. The later act provides, that not above a certain number of passengers shall ride on the outside; and this number varies according to the number the coach is licensed to carry. If this provision is contravened, the driver forfeits L.5; § 2. The driver, guard, and children in the lap, are not counted as passengers; and two children under seven years of age are reckoned as one passenger; § 3. No person must sit on the luggage on the roof, nor more than one, besides the driver, on the box, under a penalty of L.5, forfeited by the driver; § 4. See, on the law as to stage-coaches, Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, §§ 13 and 29, notes by Ivory; Bell's Com. i. 462, et seq.; ii. 104; Bell's Princ. § 236; *Hutch. The act 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 47, was amended by 5 and 6 Vict. c. 79. See also 11 and 12 Vict. c. 118, 1848.

Stake-Nets. Some years ago a complicated machine, for the capture of salmon, known under the name of the stake-net, was introduced, the use of which, on account of the success attending it, and on account of its falling under the prohibitions of various Scotch statutes against particular modes of fishing, has been obstinately resisted by the upper heritors, and has consequently led to much litigation. The stake-net consists of a sheet of net-work, stretched upon stakes fixed into the ground, generally in rivers or friths, where the sea ebbs and flows, with contrivances for entangling and securing the fish. The result of the numerous questions which have been tried is, that stake-nets, and other contrivances, of the nature of fixed machinery, for capturing the fish, or detaining or interrupting them in their free passage up the river, are illegal, and may be put down, whether they are expressly prohibited by any statute or not. This illegality, however, only applies to stake-nets, and other such contrivances, when made use of in rivers where the sea ebbs and flows, or in estuaries, and not in the sea itself, or on the proper shore of the sea. It is generally, therefore, a question of evidence, whether the prohibition applies to any particular spot or not; and there has been much curious inquiry as to where the precise position of the fauces terræ is. In granting execution, pending appeal of a judgment decerning for the removal of a stake-net fishing, the Court have repeatedly allowed the stakes to remain. In Mr Buchanan's Remarkable Cases, p. 254, will be found a full and excellent report of the case the Duke of Athole v. Maule, in which the principles of the law as to stake-nets are well brought out. See also More's Notes on Stair, cci. See Salmon-fishing. Fishing. Cruives. Yairs.

Stallangiatores; according to Skene, were persons who, in a market or fair within burgh, kept stalls, for which they paid duty. Skene, h. t.

Stamp-Laws. These are laws enacted with a view to provide a revenue to the Crown, by requiring that all contracts, bills of exchange, bonds, deeds, and many other writings of a similar nature, should be written upon stamped paper, a duty being payable to the Crown on every stamp. The stamp-laws, in addition to serving the purpose for which they were enacted, have been of considerable use in checking fraud, and rendering forgery difficult, and supplying means of detecting the one or the other. The revenue collected in this way was first granted to the Crown by 5 Will. and Mary, c. 21. By several acts of the same and of the subsequent reign, these duties were continued; extended to various articles not included in the above act; and by 1 Geo. I. c. 12, they were made perpetual. The duties imposed for England did not apply to Scotland previous to the union of the kingdoms. By the 10th article of the Act of Union, it was stipulated that Scotland should not be charged with the duties on stamped paper, &c., granted by the acts then in force in England. But, by 6 Anne, c. 5, the stamp-duties then payable in England were expressly extended to the whole kingdom; and since that time Scotland has been subject, in common with England, to the several charges and regulations imposed by the various acts of Parliament relating to this branch of revenue, unless when specially exempted. By 5 Will. and Mary, c. 21, the Crown is authorised to appoint commissioners of stamps; and these commissioners are enjoined to observe and perform the rules and orders of the Treasury. The commissioners are appointed during pleasure; and when a vacancy in their number is to be supplied, new letters-patent issue, by which the preceding patent is revoked, and the former members are re-appointed in conjunction with the new commissioner. There were formerly separate boards for England and Ireland; but by 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 55, these boards were consolidated. And by 4 and 5 Will. IV. c. 60, the Boards of Stamps and Taxes are consolidated. The duties of the board consist in carrying into effect the several acts of Parliament and letters-patent which relate to this branch of revenue. They have a general superintendence of every department, both at the head office and elsewhere; they report to the Treasury upon references, or make representations on matters which require it; carry on the whole correspondence with the officers of the establishment, and the public; order prosecutions for offences against the stamp-laws; and consider the propriety of mitigating the penalties, on the petition of the parties; make the regulated allowances for spoiled stamps, and cancel those allowed; and, generally speaking, nothing is done, except the receipt of money, the keeping accounts, and the stamping instruments, in the common course of daily business, which does not, or may not, require the intervention of the board, either collectively, or by some one of its members. See the 13th Report of the Commission appointed to inquire into the Stamp Establishment.

Before the passing of 44 Geo. III. c. 98, much confusion existed on this subject, on account of the numerous statutes requiring to be referred to. That statute, which was intended to remedy the evil by consolidating the acts, in so far as regards the amount of stamp-duties on writings, was repealed by 48 Geo. III. c. 149, which again was superseded by 55 Geo. III. c. 184. The recent Stamp Acts are 13 and 14 Vict. c. 97, 1850; 16 and 17 Vict. cc. 59 and 63; 17 and 18 Vict. c. 83, 1854; 18 and 19 Vict. c. 78, 1855; and 23 Vict. c. 15, 1860.

Forgery; and Licenses to Sell Stamps.—Many acts make provision against the forgery of stamps, and a special statute was lately passed upon the subject; 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 97. By this act, the commissioners are empowered, by writing under the hands of any two or more of them, to grant a license, free of expense, to any person whom they think fit (not being a distributor appointed by themselves, nor a sub-distributor appointed by a distributor), to vend and deal in stamps at any place in Great Britain named in the license, each licensed person entering into a bond, is a penal sum of L.100, not to sell, or offer for sale or exchange, or keep or have in his possession for sale or exchange, any stamps not procured at the head office for stamps in Westminster or Edinburgh, or from a duly appointed distributor, or from a person licensed under the act; § 1. Any person, except distributors or sub-distributors, dealing in stamps without a license, or in a place not specified in his license, forfeits L.20; and if any proceedings be had for recovery of this penalty, and it appear that any of the stamps so dealt in were false, forged, or counterfeit, although this may not have been alleged in the information or pleading, the penalty is doubled, the reason for the increase of penalty being stated in the judgment; and in any issue relating to the vending of stamps, the jury are required to say whether or not they are forged. These provisions are declared not to exempt any person from the legal consequences of uttering or having in his possession stamps, knowing them to be forged; § 3. Any person employed to prepare, write, or engross a deed or instrument liable to stamp-duty, may charge his employer with the amount of the stamp without obtaining a license; § 4. Licensed persons are required to paint their names, and the words "Licensed to sell Stamps," in front of their houses or shops; and unlicensed persons are prohibited under a penalty, to paint anything importing that they are dealers in stamps; §§ 5 and 6. Allowance is made for stamps in the possession of unlicensed vendors, dying or becoming bankrupt or insolvent, or whose licenses are revoked; § 8. The commissioners are empowered to grant warrants to search and inspect the stocks of stamps of distributors and licensed dealers, with power to break open doors if necessary; § 9. The person executing the warrant must, if required, give an acknowledgment for the stamps which he seizes. A licensed vendor is entitled to be paid the amount of the genuine stamps seized, or to have them returned to him; § 10. Licensed vendors having counterfeit stamps in their possession, are liable to the penalties of yielding forged stamps, unless it be proved that they were procured from some distributor or licensed vendor; § 11. If any person, knowingly and without lawful excuse (the proof of which lies on the accused), have in his possession any counterfeit die, plate, &c., or any vellum, parchment, or paper, having thereon an impression of any such counterfeit die or plate; or fraudulently use, join, fix, or place, for, with, or upon one vellum, &c., any stamp or impression cut from another; or erase from any stamped vellum, &c., any name, sum, date or other thing, with the intention of using the stamp for some other instrument, &c., on which a stamp duty is payable; or knowingly use, utter, sell, or expose to sale, or knowingly and without excuse have in his possession, any stamped vellum, &c., so erased, he, and all who aid and abet in such offences, shall be adjudged guilty of felony, and shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be transported for life, or for any term not less than seven years, or to be imprisoned for not more than four, nor less than two years; § 12. On the information given before a justice, upon the oath of one or more credible persons, that there is just cause to suspect any one of being concerned in the forging of dies or stamps, or in the commission of other felonious acts therewith connected, and specified at length in the act, the house of such suspected person may be ordered to be searched; § 13. Hawkers of stamps are liable to a penalty of £20; and may be apprehended by any person, and taken before a justice; § 14. Justices may issue warrants for seizing stamps suspected to be stolen or fraudulently obtained; § 15.

Legacy-Duties.—The act 55 Geo. III., from § 38 to § 51, enacts certain regulations respecting the duties on probates of wills and on letters of administration in England. The analogous instruments in Scotland are testaments-testamentary and testaments-dative. See Confirmation. The duties on probates and letters of administration were exigible in England upwards of a century before the duties on confirmation were introduced in Scotland. These were first charged by 44 Geo. III. c. 98, § 23, but were payable only in the case of actual confirmation, which was generally optional. A new system was introduced by 48 Geo. III. c. 149, §§ 38 to 42, which transfers the duties to inventories; and these inventories must be given in whether a confirmation be obtained or not. The act 55 Geo. III. c. 184, increased the duties, and made a distinction between testate and intestate succession; see Part III. of the schedule. The only clause in this act, applicable especially to Scotch confirmations and inventories, is the 51st, which is considered defective. See further, on this subject, the articles Confirmation, Inventory, Legacy and Residue Duties.

Duties on Succession.—The act 16 and 17 Vict. c. 51, imposes duties on succession to property not charged under the Legacy-duties Acts. See Succession Duties.

Denomination of Stamps.—It is provided by 43 Geo. III. c. 127, § 6, that if the stamp be of a proper denomination, it shall not be ineffectual from its being of greater value than the Stamp Act requires. And by 55 Geo. III. c. 184, § 10, all instruments for or upon which any stamp or stamps shall have been used of an improper denomination or rate of duty, but of equal or greater value in the whole, with or than the stamp or stamps which ought regularly to have been used thereon, the same shall be held valid and effectual in law, except in cases where the stamp or stamps used on such instruments shall have been specially appropriated to any other instrument, by having its name on the face thereof. As to such special appropriation, see 55 Geo. III. c. 184, §§ 3, 4, and 5, supra, p. 936.

Number of Stamps required.—It is provided by 44 Geo. III. c. 98, that no single instrument, article, matter, or thing liable to only one specific duty, is chargeable under any two or more separate and distinct heads or denominations. A deed executed and indorsed on a former deed, as a further security for advances made and to be made under the first deed, is exempted, by 48 Geo. III. c. 49, from the ad valorem duty, provided the first deed be stamped with a proper ad valorem stamp. But, in general there must be distinct stamps for each distinct contract, instrument, or transaction. Thus, in a case where three several infestments were taken under three several charters, and included in one instrument written on a 9s. stamp, it was held, in a question as to a claim of enrolment as a freeholder, that the instrument afforded no legal evidence of the infestment, and therefore that the claim was properly dismissed; Mackintosh, May 12, 1831, 9 S. & D. 163. Several subjects of contract may, however, be included in one instrument impressed with one stamp. And where the interest of all the parties relates to one subject-matter, one stamp is sufficient, however numerous the parties may be. Thus, it was found that an obligation in security granted by several persons, for payment of the sums due to the creditors of a common debtor, may be executed upon a single stamp, whatever be the number of creditors; Johnston, 7th March 1801, M. App. voce Writ, 5. And it has been held in the English courts, that if several persons bind themselves in a penalty by one bond, agreeing to the performance by each of them of the same matters, the bond requires only one stamp. Where there are several transactions, distinct as to the several parties, and on a paper stamped with only one stamp, action may be maintained on it against one party if the stamp be affixed, or in "juxtaposition to" his signature; and, in general, the stamp will be held to apply to the person first executing the instrument; Chitty on Stamps, 21; Bell's Com. i. 322. Where various letters are offered in evidence to prove any agreement between the parties who have written such letters, it is sufficient if one of them be stamped with a duty of L.1, 15s., though the same, in the whole, contain more than twice the number of 1080 words; 55 Geo. III. c. 184, sch. tit. Agreement. To explain this, it is necessary to state, that in ordinary agreements a duty of L.1, 15s. is payable for the first 1080, and a progressive duty of L.1, 5s. for every additional 1080 words. Before an instrument is completed, an alteration may be made without rendering a new stamp necessary; but, in general, any material alteration or qualification of a deed or contract, after it is complete, requires a new stamp.

When and how Writings should be Stamped.—In general, writings may either be executed on paper previously stamped, or they may (with the exception of policies of insurance, indentures of apprenticeship, receipts, bills of exchange and promissory-notes) be stamped after execution, on payment of a penalty of L.10, whether they have originally had an insufficient stamp or no stamp at all, without any re-execution by the parties. The proper stamp, when added, gives effect to the instrument from its date. For an instance of this, see Creditors of Kingstorie, competing, 12th Jan. 1743, Elch. voce Writ, 14. An unstamped writing may be stamped even after an adjudication has been deduced upon it; Lamont, 4th Dec. 1789, M. 16,945 and 5494. The excepted articles are, for the most part, declared absolutely null and void, if not properly stamped at the time they commence operation. When deeds are stamped after execution, a receipt for the penalty is indorsed at the office, which is considered as valuable in evidence as the stamp itself. Where an executor-creditor, in confirming to a defunct, stated that he could put no value on one item till the claim was constituted, this was held no objection, under the Stamp Acts regarding inventories, to his title to pursue for it, it being sufficient to add the amount to the inventory when constituted before extract; Williamson, Nov. 13, 1832, 11 S. & D. 7. Where an unstamped writing is founded upon, it is customary for the Court of Session to sist process until the stamp is affixed. The competency of this has, however, been occasionally called in question; and it has been pleaded that the action ought to be dismissed, leaving it to the pursuer to bring another action when the writing has been stamped. In a case, in which the competency to sist process was maintained, the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK said, "Our practice has been invariable to sist process, and we will adhere to it till corrected elsewhere;" Hutton, June 15, 1833, 11 S. & D. 727.

By the act 13 and 14 Vict. c. 97, 1850, the penalty exacted for stamping a document after it has been signed is L.10; but the Commissioners of Inland Revenue may remit the penalty, in whole or in part, if the document is brought within twelve months after being signed, provided it is proved to their satisfaction that it was not previously stamped by reason of accident, mistake, inadvertency, or urgent necessity, and without any wilful design to evade or delay the payment of the duty. If a deed is executed by any one abroad, it may be stamped without payment of any penalty, if brought for that purpose within two calendar months from the time of being received in the United Kingdom.

Setting out the true Consideration.—It is enacted by 48 Geo. III. c. 149, §§ 22, 23, that in sales, the consideration-money, directly or indirectly paid, or secured or agreed to be paid, be truly expressed in words at length in the conveyance; and in default, the purchaser and seller forfeit L.50, and are charged with five times the amount of the excess of duty due beyond what was actually paid. Parties liable to such penalties informing against others, are indemnified and rewarded. Further, where the consideration is not truly set forth, the purchaser may recover back as much as is not truly set forth; see also act to 55 Geo. III. c. 184, sch. voce Conveyance. Penalties are also imposed upon attorneys or other persons preparing deeds in which the consideration is not truly set forth; 48 Geo. III. c. 149, §§ 30 to 34.

Evidence in Connection with the Stamp-Law.—No deed is effectual in any court unless stamped with the duties imposed by the existing acts. Previous to admitting secondary evidence of the contents of a writing, lost or destroyed, there must be positive or presumptive evidence that it was properly stamped. Although it is pars judicis to refuse sanction to any evasion of the act, yet it is incumbent on the party who relies on the objection that a writing is not stamped, to show that it is within the operation of the law, unless in the case of exemption, when the party producing the instrument must establish the exemption. It has been questioned whether an unstamped instrument, when judicially founded on, is or can be at all recognised in law, or read in a court of justice. Such an instrument, however, may be adduced in proof of fraud, and for certain collateral or extrinsic purposes; Erskine, July 16, 1819, 2 Mur. 184. In some cases (e. g. a receipt), an unstamped writing may be shown to a witness to refresh his memory. And a witness was allowed to look at an unstamped contract between a collier and coalmaster, to refresh his memory as to its contents; Dickson, Nov. 1, 1816, 1 Mur. 142. If an agreement be written on unstamped paper, it cannot be proved by parole evidence. The want of the stamp voids the instrument merely, leaving the party to resort to other evidence. It is therefore sufficient, in the ordinary case, if the opposite party, on a reference to his oath, admit the fact, which, in absence of such admission, the instrument might have been necessary to prove; Bell's Com. i. 322.

In the case of Matheson v. Ross, June 25, 1847, 9 D. 1366, an unstamped receipt was tendered in evidence, not for the purpose of proving the receipt of the money for which it was granted, but for the purpose of showing the state of an account as it stood before the receipt was granted. The Court, by a majority of nine to four, were of opinion that the receipt could not be received; but in the House of Lords this judgment was reversed; House of Lords, March 27, 1849, 6 Bell, 374.

Spoiled Stamps.—All who have stamped paper or parchment written or engrossed upon, and undesignedly spoiled, or by any means rendered unfit for the purpose intended, and which has not been used, may, on oath of the circumstances, to the satisfaction of the commissioners, obtain an equal supply of fresh stamps, either in one or several stamps. If the writing has been executed, the stamp is held to have been used, and is not considered a spoiled stamp entitling the party to an allowance, though circumstances should render it useless. It is, however, provided by 50 Geo. III. c. 35, § 14, that allowance may be made for stamps used upon any instrument which has been executed, but which, by some mistake, is found unfit for the purpose, or which, by the death of any party thereto, cannot be executed, provided such fact be proved by affidavit or otherwise. In general, no allowance is made for a spoiled or misused stamp after six calendar months from the time it is spoiled or misused. The commissioners are directed to make rules and orders for the regulation of the allowance for spoiled stamps. This allowance is not paid in money, but a ticket is given, transferable without indorsement, for an equal number of stamps. It is, however, enacted, by 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 97, § 19, that in any case where the commissioners make allowance for spoiled stamps, they may, if in their discretion they think fit, instead of giving stamps, refund the amount in money, deducting the percentage allowed by law on the purchase of stamps of the same description as those in respect of which the allowance is made. They are also empowered to refund money for stamps not spoiled, but for which the possessor has no immediate occasion, if applied for within three months after being purchased.

Exemptions from Stamp-Duty.—There are exemptions from payment of stamp-duty in favour of certain transactions and writings. If the agreement do not admit of pecuniary estimation (e. g., a promise of marriage), it may be proved by unstamped letters. On the same principle, a missive containing a consent to remove without warning does not require to be written on stamped paper; Maclaren, Dec. 17, 1831, 10 S. & D. 163. A holograph letter by a party arrested on a meditatio fugæ warrant, to his cautioner de judicio sisti, that he will not leave the country, is admissible as evidence without a stamp; Clark, Jan. 9, 1817, 1 Mur. 180. All proceedings under the Scots statutes relative to the alimont of poor prisoners are exempted from stamp-duty; and it has been held that a disposition omnium bonorum, executed under an application for the benefit of the Act of Grace, falls within the exemption; Rae, Feb. 23, 1837, 15 S. & D. 653. An agreement for the hire of a servant or labourer requires no stamp; but an agreement for the assignment of an apprentice from one master to another must be stamped. A memorandum, letter, or agreement, the primary object of which is the sale of goods or merchandise, requires no stamp. The following writings are also exempted: Bills for payment of officers of the navy drawn in pursuance of 57 Geo. III. c. 20; see § 11. Bills, &c., for pay and allowance to local militia or volunteers; 57 Geo. III. c. 41, § 8. Proceedings connected with savings banks and friendly societies. See Savings Banks. Friendly Societies. Proceedings relating to charitable funds under 59 Geo. III. c. 91; see § 3. Insurances on farming stock, and implements of husbandry; see 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 23, § 5, 1853. See Insurance. See also Chitty on Stamps. Coventry on Stamps. Tilsley's Stamp-Laws, and Supplement to do.

Draft and Receipt Stamps.—All drafts or orders for the payment of any sum of money to the bearer or order, on demand, are liable to a stamp of one penny, and there is now no exemption in favour of drafts drawn upon a banker residing within fifteen miles of the place where the draft was issued. All receipts or discharges given for or upon the payment of money amounting to L.2 or upwards are also liable in a stamp of one penny. These stamps may be either impressed or affixed. Where adhesive stamps are used, the party who makes, signs, or issues the document, must, before he deliver the same out of his hands, affix the proper adhesive stamp, and must effectually cancel and obliterate the same, by writing upon it his name, or the initials thereof, and the date of the day and year in which he shall so write the same, and in such manner as clearly and distinctly to indicate that the stamp has already been used, and so that it cannot without fraud be again made use of. In doing this, the grantor and receiver of the document are liable in a penalty of twenty pounds. See Act 23 Vict. c. 15, 1860.

Heritable Bonds chargeable with Probate and Inventory Duties.—By the act 23 Vict. c. 15, 1860, all personal estate appointed or disposed of by will under any power authorising the disposal, is chargeable with probate and inventory duties, and these duties are made chargeable on such estate. Money secured on heritable property, and by heritable bonds in Scotland, are also made chargeable with those duties. No will, testamentary instrument, or disposition mortis causa is chargeable with any stamp-duty.

Doubts as to Sufficiency of Stamp.—By the act 13 and 14 Vict. c. 97, § 14, 1850, it is provided that the opinion of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, as to what stamp-duty is chargeable on any deed, may be obtained by presenting the deed, whether previously stamped or not, to the commissioners at the office, and paying a fee of ten shillings. The opinion of the commissioners may be appealed from to the Court of Exchequer at Westminster. By the act 16 and 17 Vict. c. 59, § 13, 1853, the opinion of the commissioners may also be obtained in the same manner as to whether a deed is not chargeable with any stamp-duty.

Stamping of Executions. The executions of messengers were formerly allowed to be authenticated by being stamped—1540, c. 74; but by 1686, c. 2, this practice was abolished, and the subscription both of messengers and witnesses required. See Execution.

Standing Orders; are the orders made by either House of Parliament respecting the manner in which business shall be conducted in it. The orders of the General Assembly, respecting the management of business there, have also been called standing orders; Church Law Styles, 270. Clerks of the peace and others are, by express statute, ordered to take the custody of documents directed to be deposited with them under the standing orders of either House of Parliament; 1 Vict. c. 83. See Parliament. Private Bills.

Status; a Roman law term, signifying a quality attaching to persons, in virtue of which they differed in the eye of the law. Thus, a Roman citizen differed in status from a stranger, a paterfamilias from a filiusfamilias. A change of status was called capitis diminutio, which was called maxima, media, or minima, according to the rights lost or acquired. See Heinec. Elem. §§ 76 and 224; Bank. i. 45.

Statute Labour; is the amount of work appointed by law to be furnished annually for the repair of highways not turnpike. Formerly the persons liable to give statute labour were tenants, cottars, and labourers, including inhabitants of royal burghs, artificers, &c.; but sailors employed in distant or coasting voyages, colliers, and others engaged in collieries, were exempted. Heritors do not furnish statute labour, but may be called on to supply its insufficiency. The number of days of work is six a year for the first three years, and four for each year thereafter. The labour is divided between two seasons—any time before the last of June, not being seed-time; and any time after harvest. Those having carts and horses must bring them; and others must bring the requisite implements. The call to perform statute labour must be intimated in the parish churches on the Sunday preceding the proposed working days. The penalty for default of attendance, or finding a substitute, is 1s. 6d. for each day's non-attendance of a man, and 2s. 6d. for each day's non-attendance of a man and horse. The joint board of justices of peace and commissioners of supply has full powers in determining the roads to be repaired, and in apportioning and commuting statute labour. Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 14, notes by Ivory; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Blair's Justice, voce Highways; Hutch. Justice, ii. 471, et seq.; Cleland, July 21, 1835, 13 S. & P. 1143.

The act 8 and 9 Vict. c. 41, 1845, intitled "An Act for Amending the Laws concerning Highways, Bridges, and Ferries in Scotland, and the making and maintaining thereof by Statute Service, and by the conversion of Statute Service into Money." By this statute, it is provided that no person shall be liable to perform statute service, or be assessed for the same, who is not a proprietor or occupier of lands, buildings, or other heritable subjects, of the yearly value of Two Pounds, or more. See the various provisions of the statute.

Statute Law. The proper statute law of Scotland commences with those acts which were passed in the reign of James I. of Scotland, continuing from that period down to the union of the kingdoms. After the Union, the Scotch statute law is to be found in those British statutes which extend to Scotland. A statute is held to be published by being printed and circulated. It may be subdivided into the rubric or title; the preamble, which states the reasons and grounds on which the new enactment has been made, and the other statutes to which it refers; and the statutory part, by which the enactment is actually made. In explaining the statutory part of a law, the following rules are received: That no sense is to be taken which implies injustice or absurdity: That there is place for interpretation only where the words admit of two different meanings: That where they do not admit of a double meaning, the words must be explained in that sense only which they can bear, whatever hardship may be the consequence: That the interpretation of laws, where they admit of it, ought not to depend on critical refinement or subtle distinctions; since, being directed to the great body of the people, they ought to be interpreted in that sense which the words most obviously bear: That, when a law term of known legal signification occurs in a statute, it is to be understood, not in its popular, but in its legal sense: That private statutes are not to be applied at large: That, when the words of a statute are obscure, their meaning may be sought in a comparison of them with other parts of the same statute, or by a reference to former statutes, or by the usage of the country: That doubtful laws ought to receive that interpretation which suits best with the avowed intention of the Legislature; and that restrictive statutes are always to be strictly interpreted. Until the year 1793, all acts of the same session of Parliament were held to commence their operation on the same day; and as, in ancient times, the royal assent was reserved till the end of the session, the whole enactments of each session were considered as one statute. The Chancery enrolment of acts specified no date except that of the commencement of the session, and accordingly all acts were, in legal construction, held to have been in force from that day. The inconvenience and injustice of this construction, which made every statute an ex post facto law, led to the act 33 Geo. III. c. 13, directing the clerk of Parliament to indorse on every act the date when it receives the royal assent, and declaring that this indorsement shall be taken to be a part of the act, and the date of its commencement, where no other commencement is provided therein. Since that time, the date of the royal assent is printed under the title of every act. In November 1797, a standing order was made, that the duration of every new temporary act should be expressed in the title and last clause of the act; and another order requires distinct acts for the revival and for the continuance of expiring laws; but these, which were called "hotch-potch acts," and until 1806 were usually founded upon successive reports of the Expiring Law committee, have been superseded by a separate act for reviving or continuing each expiring law thought fit to be continued. It was enacted by 48 Geo. III. c. 106, that when a bill is introduced for the continuance of any act expiring within the session, and such act expires before the continuing bill has received the royal assent, the continuing act shall be held to have effect from the date of the expiration of the act intended to be continued. In the end of the session in which Geo. III. died and Geo. IV. succeeded, an act was passed continuing till the next session such acts as should expire within a limited period; but this was not done at the death either of George IV. or William IV. Soon after the union with Ireland, it was enacted by the last session of 41 Geo. III. c. 90, that the publications of statutes by the King's (Queen's) printer should be deemed legal evidence in Great Britain and Ireland respectively; and this law is retrospective with regard both to British and Irish Acts of Parliament, as well as prospective with regard to the statutes of the United Kingdom. On the subject of statute law generally, as well as for the construction of particular statutes, consult the following authorities: *Ersk. B. i. tit. 21, § 37; Bank. Steam-Vessels. Steam-boats fall under the edict Nautæ Caupones; Bell's Com. i. 467; Brown's Synop. 1412, 2307. It is culpable homicide when death is occasioned through want of caution or neglect of the rules in managing a steam-vessel. The master must have one or more persons constantly on the look-out, so as to have a clear view of the vessel's course. At night, or in hazy weather, a light must be kept burning in a conspicuous part of the vessel, and in a crowded channel a bell must be rung or a horn sounded, if customary. Vessels meeting, steer each to the left; and where one overtakes another sailing in the same direction, the one which proposes to pass steers to the right, the other to the left. The vessel having the advantage of wind and tide makes way for the one beating up against it, and the vessel in motion is bound to avoid the one stationary or at anchor. The man at the helm is bound to obey the orders of the captain; and the man on the look-out is exonerated if he gives the due notification to the former of these parties. When a pilot is taken on board for a particular piece of navigation, he is, for the time, responsible for the navigation of the vessel. Alison's Princ. 122; Steele, 77.

Steelbow Goods; consist in corn, cattle, straw, and implements of husbandry delivered by the landlord to his tenant, by means of which the tenant is enabled to stock and labour the farm, and in consideration of which he becomes bound to return articles equal in quantity and quality at the expiration of the lease. Stair, B. i. tit. 11, § 4; B. ii. tit. 3, § 81; B. iii. tit. 8, § 58; More's Notes, p. ccl.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 12; B. iii. tit. 1, 18; Bank. i. 355; Bell's Princ. §§ 208, 1264; Illust. 1264; Bell on Leases, i. 335; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Brown's Synop. h. t. Stellionate; is a term applied, in the law of Scotland, either to any crime which, though indictable, goes under no general denomination, and is punishable arbitrarily, or to any civil delinquency of which fraud is an ingredient. Those, a. g., who grant double conveyances of the same subject, are guilty of this crime—1540, c. 105; 1592, c. 140; and are punishable arbitrarily in their persons and goods, besides becoming infamous. The cognisance of fraudulent bankruptcy, one kind of stellionate, is competent to the Court of Session, who may inflict any punishment for it short of death, though a remit to the Justiciary is the usual practice; 1696, c. 5; 1621, c. 18; 33 Geo. III. c. 74; 54 Geo. III. c. 137; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 79; Hume, i. 322; Alison's Princ. 624; Bell's Com. i. 288; Kames' Equity, 305; Kames' Stat. Law, h. t.; Brown's Synop. 532.

Stent and Stentmasters. Stent is an old word for a tax, impost, or duty, and a stentmaster is a person named to allocate the stent on the persons liable. In the case of Winter v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, Dec. 21, 1837, 16 S. 276, the validity of the appointment of the stentmasters, who allocate the annuity-tax and impost in Edinburgh, was questioned. The act directed that three stentmasters should be "chosen and sworn by the Town-Council." It was objected that the Magistrates, and not the Town-Council, had chosen them, and that they had not been duly sworn; and on these grounds it was pleaded, that the nomination was invalid, and that therefore the stenting and collection of annuity and impost following on it were illegal. In pursuance of these views, a bill of suspension and interdiction against the collection of arrears was presented, and after a full discussion on cases, passed unanimously by the First Division—the opinion of the Court being, that the duties were incompetently stented for. See, on Stent generally, the cases cited in Brown's Synop. pp. 302–3, 2023.

Sterility; barrenness. Where, from the effects of inundation, the devastation of a foreign enemy, or from any other inevitable accident, lands possessed by a tenant do not yield a crop sufficient to pay the expense of seed and labour, no rent is payable to the landlord; Stair, B. i. tit. 15, §§ 2 and 3. But, although such extraordinary sterility may relieve the tenant from payment of rent, it will not lay the landlord under any obligation to indemnify him for the expense of seed and labour. The landlord loses his rent, and the tenant the expense of cultivation, unless he can show that the accident has arisen from some fault of the landlord. The tenant will not be relieved from payment of rent if the loss has arisen from his having used bad seed, or from the natural exhaustion of the land; neither will he be relieved from the effects of accidents befalling the crop after the sowing or reaping. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 12; Stair, B. i. tit. 15, § 2; More's Notes, p. ccl.; Bank. i. 432; Kames' Princ. of Equity, 305; Bell on Leases, i. 421; Brown's Synop. 216.

Sterlingus; a kind of weight, containing thirty-two corns or grains of wheat. According to Skene, the expression "sterling," as applied to money, comes from its weighing a certain number of grains; the sterling penny in England having weighed thirty-two grains. Skene, h. t.

Steward—Steward of Scotland. The steward was an officer appointed by the King, with jurisdiction over Crown lands, and with the same power as that of a lord of regality; 1540, c. 97. His jurisdiction, which varied with circumstances, was generally heritable, until the 20 Geo. II. c. 43, which abolished all minor stewartries, and annexed the remainder. The judicial office of steward is the same in everything but name with that of sheriff. It is declared by express statute that the words sheriff, sheriff-clerk, &c., in any existing or future statute, shall be held to apply to steward, steward-clerk, &c.; 1 Vict. c. 39. See County. The Steward of Scotland was an officer of the highest dignity and trust. He administered the Crown revenues, superintended the affairs of the household, and possessed the privilege of holding the first place in the army next to the king in the day of battle. From this office the royal house of Stewart took its surname. But the office was sunk on their advancement to the throne, and has never since been revived. Bank. B. ii. tit. 3, § 18; B. iv. tit. 14, § 4; B. iv. tit. 15, § 2; B. iii. tit. 10, § 28; Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, §§ 7, 10, 11.

Stilloidii Servitus; a Roman law urban ervitude, whereby a proprietor was obliged to permit the drop from the roof of his neighbour's house to fall into his ground. By the law of Scotland, a proprietor who has no right of servitude cannot, without permission, build so as to throw either the eaves-drop, or the rain water from his roof collected in a spout called fumen in the Roman law), on the property of a neighbouring proprietor. Stair, B. ii. tit. 7, § 6; More's Notes, lxxxiv., xciii., cxxxvii., cclxxiv.; *Ersk. Stingisint; a "dint or straike with a ring or batton." Skene, h. t.

Stipend. The stipend is the provision made for the support of the parochial ministers of the Church of Scotland. It consists of payments in money or grain, or both, varying in amount according to the extent of the parish and the state of the free teinds, or of any other fund specially set apart for the purpose. (See Teinds.) The exclusive powers of the Court of Session, as Commissioners of Teinds, in assigning, modifying, and localizing stipends, are not infringed by the Judicature Act. All stipends which come short of L.150 per annum are made up to that sum from Government funds—50 Geo. III. c. 84; and the act 5 Geo. IV. c. 72, allows to those clergymen of town parishes who have neither manse nor glebe, nor allowance for them, L.50 per annum; to those who have no manse, L.30; and to those who have no glebe, L.30 per annum; to be paid by Exchequer, according to a schedule. The Commission of Teinds cannot decern for a stipend where there are no teinds, as in burghs, or exhausted teinds; or in parishes where a second church is required;—a stipend being, in these cases, derived either from royal or parliamentary grant, or from voluntary burgh or private contributions. By act 48 Geo. III. c. 138, no augmentation can be applied for within twenty years after the last augmentation (the provision as to the fifteen years' interval being now, by lapse of time, inoperative). See Augmentation. Whitsunday and Michaelmas are the two terms at which the stipend is held to fall due to incumbents. Where the incumbent is admitted before Whitsunday, he is entitled to the whole year's stipend, because his entry is considered as prior to the sowing of the corn; and, for the same reason, if his interest has ceased before that term, he has right to no part of the fruits of that year. If he has been admitted after Whitsunday, and before Michaelmas, he is entitled to the half of that year's stipend; and in the same way the incumbent, whose interest ends before Michaelmas, has a right to the half-year's stipend. The reason why Michaelmas is taken in preference to Martinmas is, that all stipends are held to come in place of the tithes, which were due at the separation of the crop from the ground. These are the terms by which the interests of the executors are regulated, as regards stipend due to the minister at the time of his death, whether it consists in money or victual. See Widows' Fund. Ann. Ministers' stipends prescribe in five years. As to the disposal of stipends during a vacancy, see *Vacant Stipend. Patronage. Ersk. In the case of the Earl of Kinnoull v. Gor- don, it was held on appeal (4 Bell, 126), that the vacant stipend, caused by the presbytery refusing to take a presentee on his trials, belonged to the trustees of the Ministers' Widows' Fund, and not to the patron. In a competition between these trustees and a minister on whom sentence of deposition had been pronounced in 1842, but of which extract had been delayed till 1850 by interdicts which were afterwards recalled as unfounded, the claim of the minister for the vacant stipend between the date of the sentence and date of extract was sustained. See the case of Livingstone v. Grant, Dec. 20, 1850, 13 D. 394; affirmed May 3, 1860.

Stirpes; succession per; succession by the right of representation, so called because the hereditas, instead of being divided among the individuals, is divided among the different stocks or stirpes. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 12. See Representation. Capita.

Stoppage in Transitu. The right to stop in transitu is possessed by the seller of goods who has committed them to some middleman, such as a carrier, shipmaster, &c., to be conveyed to the buyer. As long as they are in the hands of the middleman, if the buyer becomes insolvent and unable to pay the price, the seller may remand them, and retain them in security. The doctrine of stoppage in transitu is the same in its practical operation in the laws of England and Scotland. Goods are in transitu not only while in possession of the carrier, by water or land, but also while in any place of deposit connected with their transmission and delivery, until they come into the consignee's possession. The transitus is terminated not only by delivery into the buyer's own hand or repositories, or, as it is called, by his actual possession, but also by his constructive possession of them. The transitus is ended by the goods arriving in the warehouse of a wharfinger, packer, &c., which the buyer is in the habit of using as his own. The transitus is terminated by the goods being deposited in a warehouse which the buyer's agent has hired for the purpose, and by the buyer exercising any act of ownership upon them, though it is intended that they shall afterwards be forwarded from the first place of deposit to the buyer's abode. When goods have been delivered to the buyer's agent at a seaport, with whom they are to remain until the buyer sends orders for shipping them to a foreign country, the transit is at an end, and does not recommence on the goods being sent on their new destination. Delivery into a general ship, or into a ship chartered for the voyage wholly by the buyer, does not end the transit; but it would appear, that a ship hired on time by the buyer, and fitted out by him, is held as his own, and that delivery into it ends the transit. Where goods are ordered to be sent by sea from a distance, if the shipmaster give a receipt to the buyer, bearing that the goods are received from him, the right of stoppage is lost to the seller. The right of stoppage may be lost through certain acts of the buyer, while the goods are still in transitu. Thus, where goods are sent by sea, and an indorsed bill of lading has been transmitted to the buyer, the seller loses his right of stoppage, if, before he exercises it, the bill of lading has been assigned to a bona fide onerous indorsee. After the seller, by notice to the carrier, has stopped the goods in transitu, his right is not injured by the goods being delivered by mistake. In such a case, he may not only bring an action against the carrier, but may also recover the goods from the buyer. The right of stoppage in transitu may be made effectual by any means short of actual violence. Actual repossession is not necessary to cause the property to revert to the seller. Thus, a claim made to wine lodged in the King's cellar, was held to be a sufficient stoppage. It is settled in the law of England, that the mere bankruptcy of the buyer does not of itself operate as a countermand of his previous order, without some act of stoppage on the seller's part. But Professor Bell says that there is, "in Scotland at least, a bias to an opposite rule;" Bel's Princ. § 1309; Com. i. 229. See generally, Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 8, note by Ivory; Bel's Com. i. 205, et seq., Add. xi.; Brown on Sale, 432 to 537; More's Notes on Stair, lxxxix.; Brodie's Supp. 859; Bel's Princ. §§ 71, 1307; Illust. ib. Paton on Stoppage in Transitu. In the case of Morton v. Abercromby, Jan. 7, 1858, 20 D. 362, goods were shipped by the sellers for Australia by directions of the purchaser in Glasgow, and the bills of lading were taken in name of the purchaser. It was held, that when the goods were shipped the purchase was complete, and that the principle of stoppage in transitu was not applicable. See 2 Ross's L. C. C., p. 92 et seq. and p. 585 et seq.

Stouthrief; masterful theft or depredation. The term is usually applied in cases in which robbery is committed within a dwelling-house. Hume, i. 101; Alison's Princ. i. 227; Steele, 121, 134; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 64; Kames' Stat. Law, h. t. See Robbery.

Stowage. Under the contract of affranchement, the shipmaster, and the owners, as his constituents, are bound to make up the damage arising to goods from unseaworthy state age. In insurance, the damage occasioned by bad stowage does not fall on the underwriter. Ersk. B. iii. tit. i. § 28; Bell's Com. i. 548; Brodie's Sup. to Stair, 985. See Loading. Ship. Affreightment.

Straighting of Marches. This is a power given to sheriffs by the act 1669, c. 17. See Marches.

Stranding of Ships. Under the contract of insurance, questions have frequently arisen as to whether or not a ship has been stranded. A ship is stranded, in the sense of an insurance policy, when, by accident or unforeseen event, and not in ordinary circumstances to be expected from the nature of the voyage, the ship is rendered immovable on the strand. Several English cases, illustrative of this principle, will be found abridged in Bell's Illust. § 489. See also Shaw's Digest, 248. By statute, all sheriffs, justices, &c., on application from those in danger of being, or who have actually been, stranded or run on shore, are required to call together as many men as may be necessary, and demand aid from the Queen's ships, or those of her subjects in the neighbourhood, under a penalty of L.100 on the superior officer who refuses to obey the call. The master of the stranded ship is entitled to repel by force all who intrude without leave of the officer of customs, &c.; and provision is made for the orderly proceedings of salvors, and for the settling of the salvage; 12 Anne, stat. 2, c. 18; 1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. 75, § 37. Under these statutes it has been decided, that the officers of excise and customs have, for behoof of the owners, the right of custody of all vessels, goods, and merchandise on board of vessels stranded or cast on shore, without any person on board; but the Vice-Admiral (and the principle of the decision extends to the officers of excise and customs) has no power to interfere with the management of goods saved from stranded vessels, where the masters or owners have themselves given sufficient authority for taking charge of them, and damages were accordingly awarded in a case of such interference. *Ersk. Streets. The streets of burghs are held by the magistrates for the public behoof, and under burden of the public use. The magistrate who has more particular jurisdiction with regard to the streets is the Dean of Guild. The Dean of Guild Court has the regulation of all buildings within the royalty, and the power of preventing obstructions in the streets, and of removing old and ruinous tenements. See Dean of Guild. The streets of burghs cannot be encroached on by individuals, nor can they be appropriated by the magistrates either for public buildings or by feuing. Private property cannot be encroached on for the purpose of widening or otherwise improving the streets, without the authority of Parliament; and even when power is given under police acts to regulate the line of houses about to be rebuilt, full indemnification must be made for the damage thereby occasioned to individuals. The passage between the kennel of the street and the houses is part of the street or highway; and it was found that a house, the bounds of which were the highway, could not be built so as to encroach on this passage. Although the magistrates have no power to encroach on the street, yet in some cases they have been found entitled to exercise discretion in allowing one street to be shut up, on condition that another, equally or more commodious for the public, should be opened. Thus, on the petition of an individual in Dunbar, the magistrates of that town, by act of council, allowed the petitioner to shut up a narrow street or lane, on his becoming bound to open a new and more commodious street in another direction, and it was found that they had not exceeded their powers. So also the magistrates of a town, where the inhabitants are supplied with water by means of public wells in the streets, have a discretionary power to place these wells in such parts of the streets as are best suited for the accommodation of the public. *Bell's Princ. § 650; Illust. ib.; Brown's Synop. 2039, 2099. Subornation of Perjury; is the successful tampering with those who are to give their evidence on oath, in any way causing, or inducing, or directing them to perjure themselves. This crime is, by the act 1555, c. 47, punishable in the same way with perjury itself (especially with infamy), and may, in some cases, be summarily tried, in the course of proceedings, either on complaint or ex proprio motu of the Court. The attempt to suborn, and even all practices for the obtaining of false evidence and the preventing of a fair trial, are indictable. Hume, i. 375; Alison's Princ. 486; *Ersk. Subpœna; in English law, a writ by which common persons are called into Chancery, in cases where the common law has provided no ordinary remedy. Also, the writ for calling a witness to bear evidence, whether in the Court of Chancery or in any other court, called the Subpœna ad testificandum. And where the witness is required to bring with him books or writings, to be produced in modum probationis, it is called a subpœna duces tecum. The party, or witness, is called to appear sub pœna centum librorum (under penalty of L.100); hence the use of the word. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Subreption; the obtaining gifts of escheat, &c., by concealing the truth. Obreption, obtaining them by telling a falsehood. Bank. ii. 39.

Subscription of Deeds. The subscription of deeds consists not only in the subscription of the grantor, but in the subscriptions of two witnesses specially named and designed. The subscriptions of parties and witnesses are regulated by the acts 1540, c. 117; 1579, c. 80; 1593, c. 175, and 1681, c. 5. See *Obligation. Evidence. Testing Clause. Holograph Deeds. Mark. Deeds. Substitutes in an Entail; are those heirs who are called failing the institute, whether donee or grantee. All the substitutes, even the most remote, have an interest in supporting the entail, and will be allowed to apply for having it recorded, and to take other steps requisite to defend themselves against either the institute or third parties. Sandford on Entails. See Tailzie.

Substitution. A substitution is an enumeration of a series of heirs described in proper technical language. The substitution may be either simple, calling certain heirs in their order, which the person in possession may at any time put an end to, even by a gratuitous deed; or it may be a substitution with prohibitory clauses, which will have the effect of guarding the destination against the gratuitous deeds of the person in possession, but will not defend it against his onerous deeds; or, lastly, the substitution may be guarded by irritant and resolute clauses, whereby it becomes a statutory entail, which, being completed by sasine and by registration, secures the estate against even the onerous debts or deeds of the person in possession. Questions of great nicety have arisen as to whether or not the party called, or named in a destination, is to be considered as a substitute or as a conditional institute. See Tailzie. Destination. Institute. Conditional Institute.

There are substitutions also in moveables, as in bonds of provision, legacies, &c., and these substitutions receive effect in the general case only in so far as not defeated by the deeds of the person in possession; for he may, by discharging the debt, or assigning the claim, or receiving and disposing of the subject in whole or in part, to that extent exclude the substitution. A conveyance burdened with sums to others, in favour of an heir-at-law, and failing him to substitutes, will not be voided by his repudiating it and serving as heir-at-law, in so far as concerns those in whose favour the burdens existed. Heirs substitute in bonds cannot be liable for the grantor's debts ultra valorem. Where children are substituted to each other in a bond of provision by a father, the child deceasing cannot give away his right to the prejudice of the other children; and where a bond is taken to two brothers or sisters, excluding assignees, neither of them can defeat the succession of the other by a transference of the right. *Ersk. Substitution; in the Roman law, was of two kinds. The one, called vulgar substitution, was where the testator apprehended that his heir would not be able to enter, from death or other disqualification, and named another to enter in default of his heir. The other was properly a fideicommissum, by which the testator directed that the inheritance should be transferred from one to another in a certain order. See Fideicommissum. Pupillary substitution, which was allied to both of these kinds, was where the testator had a pupil son, and assigned another to succeed if the son should not be able or inclined to do so, or should die before he came of age to make a testament. The substitute had no right of succession if the child survived the age of puberty, even though he did not make a testament. Inst. of Just. B. ii. tit. 15 and 16; Heinec. Elem. § 550. The Roman law doctrine of substitution was taken notice of in the case of Morton, Feb. 11, 1813, F. C.

Subsumption of Libel; is a narrative of the alleged criminal act, which, to be good, must narrate facts amounting to the crime charged. Succession; is the term applied to the taking of property by one party in the place of another. Where this happens in consequence of a conveyance from the proprietor, the acquirer is said to be a singular successor, because he takes what he acquires in virtue of the single title by which he holds. But where a person dies intestate, his heir succeeds to the whole of his heritage by the universal title of heir. In this sense the two terms of singular successor and universal successor are opposed to each other. In the law of Scotland a proprietor is allowed to dispose both of his heritage and of his moveables by gratuitous deeds, under certain restrictions, resulting from the interests of his widow or children. See Deathbed. Jus Relicti. Terce. Legitim. But when the proprietor has neglected to use this privilege, the law supplies his omission, and disposes of his estate and effects in the way in which it is presumed that he would have himself disposed of them; and the rule being once established as law, the presumption is strengthened where a person has executed no settlement, since that is equivalent to a declaration that he means to allow the law to take effect. It becomes, therefore, important to know what those rules of law are, according to which the property of a person dying intestate will descend; and this leads to a necessary distinction in regard to succession in heritage and succession in moveables, neither of which, however, admits of the Roman succession in capita; Stair, B. iii. tit. 4, § 1, et seq.

1. Of the Succession in Heritage.—In heritable succession, the law of Scotland gives the preference to descendants, giving the succession to the eldest son, to the exclusion of all the other sons; and failing him or his issue, to the next eldest son; and so on in succession to the other sons, in the order of seniority. Failing the sons, the succession opens to daughters, all the daughters succeeding equally as heirs-portioners, the eldest only enjoying the advantage over her sisters of possessing the mansion-house, garden, orchard, and heirship moveables, as her præcipuum. See Præcipuum. Heirs-Portioners.

—2. Where there are no descendants, collaterals succeed: thus the brothers and sisters of the deceased succeed; the brothers succeeding each by himself, in a certain order, and the sisters, failing the brothers, succeed as heirs-portioners. The order in which brothers succeed, though corresponding in principle, does not correspond in appearance with that which is followed in the succession of sons; for among sons, the succession descends in the order of seniority; while among brothers, although, where the succession is that of an eldest brother, it follows the same order, yet, where the deceased leaves brothers both older and younger than himself, the succession goes to the next younger brother, and not to the eldest, according to the maxim, that heritage descends. If, again, the deceased happens to be the youngest brother, the succession goes to his immediately elder brother, that it may deviate as little as possible from the descending line.—3. There being neither descendants nor collaterals, the succession opens to ascendants; but in this succession, as in every other, the mother is excluded, so that the father alone succeeds as the nearest to the deceased in the ascending line; failing him, the uncles and aunts in their order (that is, the father's collateral line of succession) come in; and failing them, the paternal grandfather, and then his collateral line of succession succeed, and so on upwards as far as propinquity can be traced; and failing of any proof of propinquity, the Crown succeeds as ultimus hæres. These are the lines of succession in heritage; but they are modified by circumstances, to which it is necessary to advert more minutely. 1. In heritable succession there is a right of representation, by which the children of any deceased heir in the above lines of succession take, in their order, the share of their parents, to the exclusion of heirs in the line in which their parents stood, and therefore of all ulterior heirs also. This succession, so taken up, passes to the children of the deceased heir, under the same rules by which the original succession of descendants is regulated. 2. The mother, and of course all who can claim through her, are excluded by the law of Scotland, though her children succeed to her and through her. 3. Brothers and sisters consanguinean (that is, by the father only) succeed after brothers and sisters german, in the same order as above explained, and in preference to the full blood of a more remote line of succession. But brothers and sisters uterine (that is, children by the same mother, but not by the same father) do not succeed at all, there being no succession through the mother. See Half-Blood. 4. In collateral succession, a distinction also holds between the property which the deceased inherited, and that which he had acquired by conquest, i.e. by a singular title. As to all heritage which has descended to the deceased as heir, the above rules take place; but in conquest, a different rule is followed—which has place, however, only in the case where a middle brother deceasing had acquired an estate by conquest;—that is, by purchase or by donation, or even by exchambion. On his death, his estate by inheritance will descend to his next younger brother; but his estate by conquest, on the contrary, will ascend to his immediate elder brother, as heir of conquest. The distinction between heritage and conquest has no practical application when the property, the succession to which has opened, was vested in a youngest brother deceased; for then the immediate elder brother is both heir of conquest and heir of line; and the rule itself has no place in the succession of heirs-portioners. See Conquest. The heirs who succeed under these rules succeed only where there has been no valid conveyance by the proprietor; for his conveyance may alter the legal line of succession. They are termed heirs-at-law, or often heirs simply, because they are heirs who, by law, are called to the succession, in contradistinction to disponees. They are also termed heirs of line, because they succeed in certain known lines of propinquity; heirs-general, because they may enter by a general service, as nearest and lawful heirs to the deceased, whom they represent generally; and heirs whomsoever, in contradistinction to special heirs, called by particular destination. In connection with the subject of heritable succession, it may be remarked, that the heir in heritage, in certain circumstances, has right to heirship moveables. See Heirship Moveables. On the subject of heritable succession, see an able work by Mr Sandford (1830). Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8; Stair, B. iii. tit. 5, 6, 7; Bell's Com. i. 83.

2. Of the Succession in Moveables.—The order of succession in moveables is the same as in heritage; first, descendants; failing them, collaterals; and last of all, ascendants succeeding. But a very material distinction formerly existed between the succession in heritage and that in moveables. In moveable succession there was no preference of males to females, and an equal admission of all who stand in the same degree of kindred by full blood. Formerly, too, there was no representation in moveable succession. Thus, where there were a brother and a sister nearest heirs of the deceased, and the children of a brother or sister deceased, the surviving brother and sister succeeded to the moveables equally, to the exclusion of their nephews and nieces, the children of the deceased brother. See Executors. This, however, has been altered to a certain extent by the act 18 Vict. c. 23, 1835. See infra. This equal succession in moveables of all equally near in degree to the deceased takes place only where there is no heritage in addition; for where one of the nearest of kin takes the heritage as heir, he has no title to any share of the moveables unless he chooses to collate; that is, to mass his heritage with the moveable property, and allow an equal division of the whole to take place amongst all the nearest in kin. See Collation. On the subject of moveable succession, see a very valuable and useful treatise on the rules of the law of personal succession by Mr Robertson of the Middle Temple (1836). Stair, B. iii. tit. 8; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9; Bell's Com. i. 141.

By the act 18 Vict. c. 23, 1855, the issue of a predeceasing next of kin take the place of their parent in the succession to an intestate. This representation, however, in the case of collaterals, is limited to the descendants of the brothers and sisters of the intestate. The issue of a predeceasing heir in heritage of an intestate, may collate the heritage to the effect of claiming for himself if there is no other issue of the predeceasing, or for himself and the other issue if there be any, the share of the moveable estate of the intestate which the predeceasing might have claimed if he had survived the intestate. If, however, the heir of the predeceasing does not collate, and there are other issue of the predeceasing, his brothers and sisters, and their descendants in their places, are entitled to claim a share of the moveable estate equal in amount to the excess in value over the value of the heritage, of such share of the whole estate, heritable and moveable, as the predeceasing parent would have taken on collation, had he survived the intestate. The father of an intestate who leaves no issue is entitled to one-half; and in the event of his father having predeceased him, his mother is entitled to one-third of his moveable estate. Brothers and sisters uterine of an intestate, who is not survived by either father or mother, or brothers or sisters german, are entitled to one-half of his moveable estate. Where the wife predeceases her husband, her next of kin, excessum, or other representatives, whether testate or intestate, have no right to any share of the goods in communion. The dissolution of a marriage before the lapse of a year and day from its date by the death of one of the spouses, does not affect the rights of the survivor, or the representation of the predecessor. The provision in the act 1617, c. 14, allowing executors-nominate to retain to their own use one-third of the dead's part undisposed of, is now abolished.

It has been said generally, that a proprietor has the entire power of disposal of his property, both heritable and moveable; but, 1st, A proprietor cannot, while on deathbed, dispose of heritage to the prejudice of his heir. See Deathbed. 2d, He cannot, by any mortis causa deed, deprive his widow of her terce or of her jus relictæ, unless, in antenuptial contract of marriage, she has accepted conventional instead of her legal provisions. See Terce. Jus Relictæ. And, lastly, he cannot defeat the right of legitim competent to his children, unless, in the same manner as in regard to the jus relictæ, by substituting for it a provision which the children choose to accept, and to discharge their legitim. The extent of his obligations in favour of his widow and children respectively, depends on circumstances; and the following articles may be consulted:—Marriage. Husband and Wife. Contract of Marriage. Goods in Communion. Legitim. Forisfiliation. Jus Relictæ. Jus Mariti. Terce. Courtesy. Children. Divorce. Succession, Duties on. By the act 16 and 17 Vict. c. 51, 1853, certain duties are charged upon all property, heritable and moveable, passing by the death of persons dying after the 19th May 1853. The interest of a successor in heritable property is considered as an annuity on his life, and tables are annexed to the act for valuing the annuity. The duty chargeable on lineal issue or lineal ancestors of the predecessors is one per cent.; on brothers and sisters, and their descendants, three per cent.; on brothers and sisters of the father and mother of the predecessor, and their descendants, five per cent.; on brothers and sisters of a grandfather or grandmother of the predecessor, and their descendants, six per cent.; and on any other person, ten per cent. Persons who would not have been chargeable for legacy-duty on a legacy bequeathed by the predecessor, are exempt from the duties on succession imposed by the act. The husband or wife of the predecessor is thus exempted. If the husband or wife of the successor shall be of nearer consanguinity than the successor, the duty is charged according to the nearer relationship. Any succession of less value on the whole than L.20 is exempt. When the whole succession or successions derived from the same predecessor, and passing upon any death to any person or persons, shall not amount in money or principal value to L.100, no duty is chargeable. No duty also is chargeable upon any succession which, as estimated according to the provisions of the act, shall be of less value than L.20 in the whole, or upon any moneys applied to the payment of the duty on any succession, according to any trust for that purpose. No person, also, who is charged with legacy-duty in respect of any property subject to said duty, is also chargeable with the duty imposed by the act in respect of the acquisition of the same property. Leasehold property is no longer chargeable with legacy-duty as personal estate.

In the case of Lord Advocate v. Robert's Trustees, 26th Jan. 1858, 20 D. 449, a father, in the antenuptial contract of his daughter, had obliged himself to pay L.2000 to trustees, at the first term after his death. The interest of the sum was to be paid to the wife during her life, and to the husband on her death; and the fee was to be paid to the children of the marriage, payable on their majority. His executors paid L.1800 to the trustees, but retained L.200 to meet the succession-duty on L.2000, in case it should be found exigible. It was held by the Lord Ordinary in Exchequer that this was a succession within the meaning of the act, and that the succession-duty was chargeable upon it.

In the case of the Lord Advocate v. Lord Saltoun, Dec. 16, 1858, 21 D. 124, the question was raised, Whether the maker of an entail, or the last heir in possession, was the predecessor of the existing heir. The heir in possession happened to be more nearly related to the maker of the entail than to the last heir, and he contended that the maker of the entail must be considered his predecessor. The contrary was contended for on the part of the Crown; and the Court, by a majority, decided in favour of the Crown. This judgment was reversed, June 7, 1860.

Heritable bonds are now chargeable with probate and inventory duties. See Stamps; also the Act 23 Vict. c. 15, 1860.

Sucken. The sucken consists of the whole lands which are astricted to a mill. The possessors of these lands, quoad the mill, are termed the suckeners. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 20; Bank. i. 684; Bell's Princ. § 249; Ross's Lect. ii. 170. See Thirlage.

Suicide. Self-murder draws after it the falling of the single escheat, whereby the whole moveable estate of the deceased falls to the Crown; and a proof of the self-murder may be brought in an action before the Court of Session at the instance of the Queen's donatary against the executors of the deceased. Insanity, however, is, if proved as the cause of suicide, sufficient to prevent the escheat. In proving the cause of death, it is sometimes difficult to determine whether the deceased was killed by some one else, or laid violent hands upon himself. Several cases of this nature will be found cited by Mr Steele in his very useful manual, p. 94; but no general rules can be laid down upon the point. The wounds inflicted by a suicide upon himself are usually in the front, and in an oblique direction, from right to left. The wounds made by an assassin are generally in the back; but when in the front, from left to right. Hume, i. 295; Steele, 94; Ersk. B. iv. tit. iv. § 46, note by Ivory; Brown's Synop. p. 532.

Summary Actions; are those which are brought into court not by summons, advocacy, or suspension, but by petition or summary complaint. See Petition and Complaint. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 9; Stair, B. iv. tit. 3, § 25; Bell's Princ. § 2232, et seq.; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. h. t.; Brown's Synop. h. t.; Shaw's Digest, p. 414. See the respective articles. By Act of Sederunt, Nov. 1825, most summary causes are to be remitted to the junior Ordinary on the Bills, to be by him prepared. See Sheriff. Actions. Interdict. Reclaiming Petition.

Summing up the Evidence. Before the jury enters on the consideration of their verdict, the presiding judge sums up the evidence which has been adduced, accompanied with an exposition of the law where it appears necessary; an exposition intended not to control but to instruct the jury, and to correct the exaggerated representations of parties. 1587, c. 92; Steele, 13.

Summons. A summons in the Court of Session is a writ in the Sovereign's name, signed by a writer to the Signet, and passing the Signet, setting forth the grounds and conclusions of an action, and containing the royal warrant or mandate to messengers-at-arms to cite the defender to appear in Court to answer the demand; with certification, that if he fail to appear, the Court will pronounce decree in the terms concluded for in the summons. The statutory requisites of a summons are, that it shall set forth, in explicit terms, the nature, extent, and grounds of the complaint or cause of action, and the conclusions which, according to the form of the particular action, the pursuer is, by the law and practice of Scotland, entitled to deduce therefrom; 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 2. Summonses in the inferior courts are framed on the same model—with this difference, that in these courts the citation is given on the warrant of the inferior judge or magistrate, and not of the Sovereign; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825. In libelling summonses it is a rule that two or more persons, unconnected as partners, and not aggrieved by the same act or having a joint interest in the matter libelled, cannot conclude against the same or different persons for payment of sums due to the pursuers separately. Two or more parties so disconnected, wishing to avoid the expense of separate actions, must assign their claims to one of their number, or to a third party as trust-assignee, who may sue for their behoof. See Pursuer. As to defenders, again, where several are liable under the same ground of debt or of action, any number may be sued in one summons; but where the defenders and their interests are separate and unconnected, no more than six can be included in one summons; Articles of Regulation, A. S. 2d Nov. 1695, § 28. And the same regulation applies in inferior courts; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825. The style of the wills of summonses, both in the supreme and inferior courts, is prescribed by A. S. 8th July 1831, and against defenders forth of Scotland by A. S. 11th July 1828, § 22. A libelled and signeted summons, or a summons signed by a depute-clerk of Session, or by the clerk of Court (where that is competent), becomes the ground for letters of arrestment, provided no undue delay occurs in executing the summons, and following out the requisite steps for constituting the debt; 54 Geo. III. c. 137, § 2. But where arrestment is used on an unexecuted summons, the summons must be executed within forty days after the date of the arrestment, otherwise the arrestment falls; and it is competent to the defender to apply to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills for loosing the arrestment, which will be granted without caution—the Lord Ordinary having power to award expenses, and his interlocutor not being subject to review; A. S. 8th July 1831. The limits of this work preclude the possibility even of a summary of the many important points of practice connected with the form, libelling, and conclusions of summonses; but the whole subject will be found very ably digested in Shand's Practice. See also Jurid. Styles, iii. p. 1, et seq.; Stair, B. iv. tit. 3, § 7, et seq.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 4, et seq.; Bank ii. 599, et seq.; Macfarlane's Sheriff-Court Process, 84, et seq.; Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 24-7, 31; and the articles, Privileged Summonses, Wills of Signet Letters, Supplementary Summonses, Amendment of Libel, Arrestment, Citing of Summonses, Will of Summonses, Inducement.

Formerly the allegation of facts which formed the ground of action was incorporated in the summons, but by the act 15 and 16 Vict. c. 36, 1850, they are set forth in a articulate condescendence, which, with a note of the pleas in law, is annexed to the summons, and is held to constitute part of it. See Statute and Schedule.

Sumptuary Laws; are laws passed with a view to regulate the expenses of individuals and private families. Various laws were passed by the ancient Scotch Legislature for this purpose. Attempts were made to regulate the dress of the ladies, to save the purses of the "puir gentlemen," their fathers and husbands. Coming to kirk or market with the face muffled in a veil was strictly prohibited. Statutes were passed against superfluous banqueting, and the inordinate use of foreign spices "brocht from the parts beyond sea, and sauld at dear prices to monie folk that are very unabill to sustain that coaste." Such statutes, which betray an ignorance of the spirit of society, were but ill observed, and have long been in desuetude. For these laws, see Kames' Stat. Law, h. t.; Hutch. Justice, ii. 3.

Sunday. No arrestment, or poinding, or citation on adjudication, or execution of inhibition, or personal execution on a caption, and, generally speaking, no step of civil process, can proceed or be taken on Sunday; and those who have retired to the sanctuary of Holyrood House may leave the precincts on that day without being liable to arrest. But the sanctity of the day affords no protection against the execution of criminal or of medietatis fugæ warrants. Several statutes of the Scottish Parliaments enjoin the due observance of the Sabbath, and impose fines or corporal punishment on account of its profanation. The statutes are 1503, c. 83; 1579, c. 70; 1592, c. 124; 1593, c. 163; 1594, c. 201; 1661, c. 18; 1663, c. 19. And the execution of those laws is, by 1661, c. 38, particularly committed to the justices of the peace. But these offences are also cognisable at common law, as well as under later statutes, by all other judges, whether supreme or inferior. The pecuniary penalties go, one-half to the poor, the other to defray expenses, and to reward the informer. Any person may competently prosecute; and by 1693, c. 40, every presbytery is enjoined to name an informer and prosecutor for the district. The more recent statutes are 1672, c. 22; 1695, c. 13; 1696, c. 31; and 1701, c. 11. Prosecutions for mere profanation of the Sabbath are now very rarely resorted to. In one case, however, a person was prosecuted before the sheriff for sailing a steamboat with passengers on Sundays, and penalties and interdict were concluded for. The sheriff dismissed the petition on various grounds. Among others, he doubted of his jurisdiction, and intimated his opinion, that even if he had jurisdiction, he would decide in favour of the defender. A bill of advocation was found incompetent, the action being considered of a criminal nature; Jobson, Nov. 29, 1828, 7 S. & D. 83. In another case, it was held in the Court of Session, that exercising the trade of a barber, by shaving on Sunday morning, is not contrary to law; and that an apprentice, who, in his indentures to a barber, had bound himself not to absent himself from his work, holiday or week-day, was obliged to work on Sunday morning, between the hours of seven and ten; Phillips, May 19, 1835, 13 S. & D. 778; but this judgment was reversed on appeal, 20th Feb. 1837. See Hume, i. 563; Bell's Com. ii. 569; Stair, B. iii. tit. 1, § 37; tit. 3, § 11; B. iv. tit. 47, § 27; Bank. iii. 31; i. 360, 456; Bell's Princ. § 44; Illust. ib.; *Kames' Stat. Supercargo; that officer in a vessel whose duty it is to superintend the trade for which the voyage is undertaken. Constituents have been found liable to pay money borrowed by their supercargo, though his commission bore no express power to borrow money, and though the money was not applied to their behoof; Rogers, 25th July 1732, M. 3954.

Superinduction; of letters or words in substantialibus of deeds vitiates them. Stair, B. iv. tit. 42, § 19; More's Notes, ccccvii.; Bank. ii. 633. See Deed. Challenge. Evidence. Illegibility. Erasure. Fraud.

Superintendents of the Church; were persons chosen immediately after the Reformation to watch over the conduct of the parochial clergy, and to attend to the affairs of the Church; thus coming in place of the bishops, whose continuance was inconsistent with the forms of Presbyterian church government. Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 5.

Superior; is one who has made an original grant of heritable property, under the condition that the grantee shall annually pay to him a certain sum of money, or perform certain services. The grantee is termed the vassal. The interest of the granter is termed the dominium directum, that of the vassal the dominium utile. The superior has right to the feu-duties and other services stipulated in the grant, with the casualties which are by law given to a superior; while the vassal enjoys, in the absence of any limitation in the grant, every other right attaching to the subjects, such as fruits, woods, mines and minerals, and the rights of alteration and disposal at pleasure. *Ersk. Heritable Succession; Sandford on Entails; Ross's Lect. ii. 119, et seq. See Feudal System. Holding. Tenure. Dominium Directum.

Superiority. The superiority, or dominium directum, is the right which the Crown, as overlord of all Scotland, or subject superiors as intermediate overlords, enjoy in the land held by their vassals. It is not a right of use of the lands, but only a right to the civil rights of feu-duty, &c., and to the casualties. (See preceding article.) The right of superiority is held by the Crown, or by individuals as a consequence of their having been formerly vested, in their own person or that of their ancestors or authors, in the property of the lands; and they continue to hold a complete title, not only to the superiority, but to the lands themselves, this title being qualified in its effects by the feu-charter which the vassal holds, and in virtue of which he enjoys the dominium utile of the lands. When, therefore, a superior wishes to convey his right to another, the regular form is, not to dispoise the superiority only, but to dispoise the lands themselves, excepting from the grant the right of feu which the vassal possesses. The form of such a conveyance will be found in Jurid. Styles, i. 140, 141, and Bell's System of Deeds, i. 306, where it will be seen that the granter dispoises "all and whole the lands," but in the clause of warrandice excepts the feu-rights and titles granted to a third party, or previously disposed to the grantee. Though this is the only regular mode of conveying a superiority, it was at one time common to dispoise the superiority only, sometimes with the view of avoiding the irritancy under 20 Geo. II. c. 50, sometimes to serve electioneering purposes, by conferring on the dispoisee the elective franchise without any right of property in the land. This conveyance, which has been censured by Stair (B. ii. tit. 4, § 1), as proceeding from "the ignorance of writers," has received various effects, according to the rights claimed upon it. It has been found effectual to confer the freehold qualification, and a title to pursue a removing; Lagg, Nov. 19, 1624, M. 13,787; Hamilton, Feb. 23, 1819, F. C. But it does not give a sufficient title to pursue a declarator of non-entry; Park, May 16, 1816, F. C. Where, however, in addition to a conveyance of the superiority, there is also an assignation to an unexecuted precept for infeftment in the lands, or where there is a conveyance of the lands, "in so far as extends to the superiority," an unobjectionable title is established, and declarator of non-entry may be pursued upon it; Mackenzie, Dec. 14, 1822, 2 S. & D. 81; Hill, July 19, 1828, 6 S. & D. 433. A disposition of the feu-duties and casualties of superiority also affords a sufficient title to pursue a declarator of non-entry; Douglas, Jan. 30, 1671, M. 9306. Infeftment in the superiority or dominium directum of lands, being in truth infeftment in the lands themselves, forms a sufficient title for prescription, and, followed by forty years' possession, vests the superior in the property of the lands. From the terms in which one case is reported, it is left doubtful whether or not the conveyance to the superiority only, above described, forms a good title for prescription; Dunmore, Dec. 22, 1774, F. C.; 5 Br. Sup. 614. But it has been thought that in that case the infeftment must have been in the lands, and that, without such infeftment, there can be no prescription; Bell's Illust. ii. 17, note. There are certain inherent rights of superiority which law supports, and renders efficient against every man; such is the superior's title to the feu-duty and services specified in the grant. These do not require infeftment to secure them to the superior; he holds them as his inherent right, with which he has never parted, and of which he cannot be deprived either by any act of the vassal, or by the right of the vassal's heir or singular successor, or by prescription. So completely, indeed, are those rights inherent in the superior, that it has been made a question whether he can separate them from the superiority by renouncing them, so as to deprive a singular successor in the superiority of the power of demanding them from the vassal; and although the Court held that the rights of superiority might be renounced, yet they regarded the point as a difficult one. There are other rights, however, such as an obligation on the vassal not to sub-feu, or that he shall, before selling, give an offer to the superior at a certain price, called a clause of pre-emption. These will be effectual against purchasers of the property, and other third parties, only where they are engrossed in the infeftment, so as to enter the record. See Conditions. Burdens. Clause of Pre-emption. The vassal is liable for the feu-duty from the time of accepting the right; and he continues bound for it to the superior, even after he has sold the feu, until the purchaser shall have completed his title—i. e., shall have become the superior's vassal; but the superior is bound to receive all singular successors on payment of one year's rent. See Composition. Where the right of property has been separated from the superiority, the two rights can be consolidated by nothing but a resignation ad remanentiam; so that a superior acquiring the superiority must resign in his own hands, or else the property and superiority will remain separate, and may descend to different heirs. See Consolidation. A superior cannot interpose a superior between himself and his vassal; neither can a superiority be split to the effect of making the vassal hold of more than one superior, and thus become liable in more than one set of prestations. The superior's arrears and current feu-duties, and his casualties also, form both personal claims and debita fundi, preferable to all the vassal's other heritable debts, ranked first in judicial proceedings on bankruptcy, and to be made effectual by poinding of the ground and adjudication. Bell's Com. i. 22, et seq.; ii. 670, 683, 693, 716; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, et seq.; B. ii. tit. 6, § 63, et seq.; B. iii. tit. 8, § 81; Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 29, 41, 51; B. ii. tit. 4; B. ii. tit. 11, § 8, et seq.; B. iii. tit. 2; More's Notes, lx., clxxvi., cxcii., ccii.; Bank. B. ii. tit. 4, § 1, et seq.; B. ii. tit. 11, § 1, et seq.; B. iii. tit. 2, § 56; B. iii. tit. 5; Bell's Princ. § 676, et seq.; Illust. §§ 687, 855; Sandford on Heritable Succession, ii. 188, 197; Sandford on Entails, 232, 264; Bell on Purchaser's Title, 42, 115, 363; Ross's Lect. ii. 222, 292. Supersedeas; in English law, a writ to stay some ordinary proceedings at law, on good cause shown. Tomlins, h. t.

Supersedere; is either a private agreement amongst creditors, under a trust-deed and accession, that they will supersede or sist diligence for a certain period, or a judicial act, by which the Court, where they see cause, grant a debtor protection against diligence, without consent of the creditors. A creditor who commits a breach of supersedere is liable to the debtor in damages. Bell's Com. ii. 501, 574, 600-1; Bank. B. iv. tit. 38, § 23; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, § 24. See Sequestration. Trust-Disposition. Bankrupt. Protection.

Supplement. Formerly, where a party was to be sued before an inferior court ratione rei sitæ, and did not reside within its jurisdiction, letters of supplement required to be obtained on a warrant from the Court of Session, and in virtue of these he was cited to appear before the inferior judge. These letters run in the name of the Queen. They recite the ground of action, the reason why it should proceed before the inferior judge, and contain a warrant, addressed to messengers-at-arms, as sheriffs in that part, ordering them to cite the defender. They proceeded on a bill, and were signed by a writer to the Signet. They are also employed in the citation of persons out of the kingdom, where they are to be cited, not as principal defenders, but merely for their interest. Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 17; Bell's Com. ii. 66; Hutch. Justice, i. 103, 243; Jurid.

Styles, iii. 14, 274-80, 985; Ross's Lect. i. 282; ii. 531. See Bills of Signet Letters. By the Act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 119, § 24, a defender who is beyond the jurisdiction of a sheriff may now be cited on the sheriff's own warrant or precept, endorsed by the sheriff-clerk of the county in which he resides.

Supplement, Oath in. See Evidence.

Supplementary Summons. Where all the parties interested have not been called, or where the original summons requires amendment, and the defender has not appeared, a supplementary or auxiliary summons is necessary. But where the original action is null, such a summons is inadmissible. It may be used, however, to bring forward additional grounds of action, the conclusions of both summonses being the same. In those actions which must be raised within a certain limited time, defects in the original summons cannot be remedied by a supplementary summons, if the limited period for raising the original action has elapsed before the supplementary summons is raised. Shand's Prac. i. et seq., and authorities there cited; Maclaurin's Sheriff Prac. 271.

Supply, Commissioners of. See Commissioners of Supply.

Support; the urban servitude of support. The oneris ferendi and tigni immittendi of the Roman law entitles the owner of the dominant tenement to rest the whole or part of a building, or of a beam, on the house, wall, or property of the servient tenement. By the Roman law, in the particular servitude oneris ferendi, the proprietor of the servient tenement became bound to preserve it in a state to answer the purposes of the servitude, or to abandon the property entirely. But by the law of Scotland, where a servitude of support is constituted by writing, it would seem that the servient proprietor is not bound to keep the servient tenement in repair, unless there be a special stipulation to that effect in the deed constituting the burden; and where it is merely a prescriptive servitude of this kind, the dominant proprietor may repair the servient tenement for his own use if so inclined; but there is no obligation, in that case, on the servient proprietor to repair, unless he has contracted an express obligation, servitudes being strictissimi juris, and not to be extended by implication. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, §§ 7 and 8; Stair, B. ii. tit. 7, § 6; Bank. B. ii. tit. 7, § 6; Shaw's Digest, p. 565; Bell's Princ. § 1003; Illust. ib. Supportation; is any assistance rendered to enable one, otherwise incapable, to go to kirk or market, so as to validate a conveyance of heritage made within sixty days before death. See Deathbed.

Supremacy. See Oaths.

Surety. The security which any one having dread of harm from another may obtain, is treated of in the article Lawburrows. The other kinds of surety are, surety of the peace, and surety for good behaviour. 1. Surety of the peace is a security against injury threatened or dreaded, exigible by any single justice of peace, who may proceed to lay under caution any parties between whom he is credibly informed there is appearance of trouble, unless they declare upon their conscience, that neither of them bears any grudge to the other. He may also impose this caution upon those who have threatened personal injury or fire-raising, having first brought the offenders before him by warrant; or on any complainer swearing that he has just cause of fear from a particular party, the justice or other magistrate may bind over the latter to keep the peace. A wife may obtain this security against a husband, or vice versa. The amount of the penalty is discretionary. A party failing to find a sufficient cautioner for the amount ordained, may be imprisoned till the expiry of the term for which he was to have been bound. Forfeiture of the penalty in the bond is incurred by the party committing any breach of the peace, whether against the complainer or other persons. A party whose cautioner has proved insufficient, or who has been convicted of breaking a surety of the peace, may be laid under a fresh security. Surety for the good behaviour is more rigorous than surety of the peace, and includes it. It may be imposed by any single justice upon any suspect man, who, for the most part, sleeps all the day and walks in the night, or upon those who are described as "suspicious persons, who are night-walkers, and cannot give a good account of themselves;" or it may be taken, instead of surety of the peace, from those who have threatened personal injury or fire-raising. Sometimes parties convicted of certain offences are directed by statute to be laid under this surety; and sometimes, at common law, a party is ordered to find this surety, by a judgment against him for some gross breach of public decorum. Forfeiture is incurred by whatever would cause forfeiture of surety for the peace, or by seditious words, or by being guilty of any offence which this caution is meant to prevent. Hutch. Just. of Peace, i. 399; Tait's Just. 380-2; Blair's Manual, 375. See Lawburrows. Bail. Cautionary.

Surface-Damage; damage done to the surface of the ground, in consequence of mining operations, &c. The tenant of the ground, or the liferenter, is entitled to compensation for such damage where the mining is carried on by the landlord, or the far, or their respective leasees. See Lease. Life-rent.

Sur-Rejoinder; in English law, the plaintiff's answer to the defendant's rejoinder. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Surrender; in English law, the yielding up of an estate, for life or years, to him that has the immediate estate in reversion or remainder. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Remainder.

Surrender of Tithes; the submission of tithes made to the Crown. It got the name of surrender of tithes, because the submission contained in it a surrender of the tithes into the hands of the King. See Submission of Tithes and Teinds.

Surrogate; in English law, a substitute, a person appointed to act for another, as by a bishop, chancellor, judge, &c. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Surrogatum; that which comes in place of something else. The price is the surrogatum of an estate, and is so called because, while it is distinguishable from other funds, the burdens which fell upon the estate will in some cases be transferred to the price received for it. In the case of an entail valid in every respect except that the irritant and resolute clauses did not apply to the prohibition to sell, the Court of Session found that the heir in possession, though he could not be prevented from selling the estate, was bound to reinvest the price in the purchase of other lands, to be settled conformably to the provisions of the entail; Stewart of Aros, Feb. 23, 1827, 5 S. & D. 418. But this decision was reversed on appeal, on the ground that, as the entail wanted the statutory requisites to prevent a sale, there was no obligation, which could be enforced by law, to subject the price to the fetters of the entail; July 16, 1830, 4 W. & S. 196; Bell's Illust. ii. 353. See Stair, B. ii. tit. 2, § 14; Kames' Equity, 293; Brown's Synop. h. t. See Tailzie.

Survivorship, Presumption of. See Presumption of Survivorship.

Suspension; is the general name given to a process in the supreme civil or criminal court, whereby execution or diligence on a sentence or decree is stayed until the judgment of the Supreme Court is obtained on the point. This form of review, in criminal cases, has been explained, vide Bill of Suspension in Court of Justiciary; and the present article relates exclusively to the process of suspension in civil causes. The party complaining commences proceedings by presenting a note of suspension in the Chamber, setting forth that diligence has been used or threatened, in virtue of the decree or warrant to which he objects, and prays that the decree complained of be suspended. An articulate statement of the facts on which the prayer of suspension is founded, together with a note of pleas in law, is annexed to the note. See Act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 86, 1838. In the ordinary case, the complainer also offers caution to implement the decree of which he complains, and to pay the expenses of the process, if the Court shall so decide. This note is presented to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills; and if he think that the complainer has made out a sufficient prima facie case, he pronounces an interlocutor sisting execution in the meanwhile, and appointing the note of suspension to be answered. Thereafter the Lord Ordinary on the Bills resumes consideration of the note along with the answers, if lodged; and if that pleading does not satisfy him that the objection to the diligence or execution is groundless, he passes the note of suspension, whereby the cause is brought formally into the Court of Session in order to be discussed; and pending the discussion, the execution is stayed or suspended. If, on the other hand, the Lord Ordinary on the Bills be of opinion, either on considering the note itself, or on resuming consideration of it with answers, that there is no just ground of complaint, he refuses the note, upon which a certificate of refusal will be issued, and the diligence or execution complained of will proceed precisely as if no note of suspension had been presented. But the judgment of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, whether refusing or passing the note, is subject to the review of the Court of Session, in the manner explained voce Reclaiming Note; or if the judgment has been pronounced during vacation, a second note of suspension may be competently presented to the next succeeding Lord Ordinary on the Bills. The note, when passed, is enrolled in the weekly printed roll, and proceeded with, as was formerly the case, on expedite letters of suspension. See Shand's Practice, 440, 459, et seq.

Suspension and Interdict; a judicial remedy competent in the Bill-Chamber, where there has been no decree, nor any proceeding which can issue in a decree, but where the object is to stop or interdict some act, or to prevent some encroachment on property or possession, or in general to stay any unlawful proceeding. The remedy is applied for by a note of suspension and interdict, which, in an annexed articulate statement of facts, sets forth the circumstances under which the complaint is made, and prays for suspension and interdict either with or without caution, as the case may be. This note is presented in the Bill-Chamber; and if a prima facie case be made out, the Lord Ordinary on the Bills will immediately grant an interim interdict, and order the note to be answered. When the answers are lodged, the Lord Ordinary on the Bills resumes consideration of the case, and either passes the note and continues the interdict, or refuses it and recalls the interdict, as justice may require. As in ordinary suspensions, this interlocutor refusing or passing the note is reviewable by the Court; and if the note be eventually passed, the case proceeds in the manner already explained, voce Suspension; and in the same way, where the note is ultimately refused, the interdict is at an end. The remedy of summary interdict is also competent in inferior courts, where the subject-matter of complaint is cognisable in an inferior court; the form of complaint being by petition addressed to the inferior judge, praying for the interdict wanted. See Shand's Practice, 459, et seq.

Suspension and Liberation. Where a debtor has been incarcerated in consequence of diligence on a decree, or on any other warrant of incarceration, he may apply, in the Bill-Chamber, for redress by a note of suspension and liberation; and if he can satisfy the Lord Ordinary on the Bills that his imprisonment has been wrongful or illegal, the note of suspension and liberation, after it has been answered, will be passed. Here, also, the procedure is analogous to that in ordinary suspensions.

Suspensive Conditions; conditions precedent, or conditions without the purification of which the contract cannot be completed. Bell's Com. i. 237; Bell's Princ. § 109; Shaw's Digest, 313, 553; Brown on Sale, 32–42. See Conditional Obligation. Resolutive Conditions. Sale.

Swans. According to Stair, swans are inter regalia; but Erskine says, "Nothing appears, either in our statutes, law-books, or practice, in support of the opinion that swans were ever accounted inter regalia." See Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 60; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 15; Bank. i. 593; Bell's Princ. § 1290.

Swearing, False. See False Swearing. Perjury.

Swindling. Under the head of swindling are comprehended that numerous class of cases in which the offender, by the assumption of a false character, or a false representation of some sort, obtains the possession of money, or other property, which he appropriates to himself. Swindling differs from theft in this, that the thief takes the property, while the swindler obtains the owner's consent to his getting it. It differs from failure to pay for goods obtained on credit in this, that the swindler uses fraud to get the goods. It is thought that an attempt to defraud is not a relevant charge. The punishment of this offence varies from imprisonment for six weeks to transportation for fourteen years. Using false writings is regarded as an aggravation. Hume, i. 57, 172; Burnett, 166; Alison's Princ. 250, 368; Prac. 290; Steele, 114, 141; *Swint. Sylva Cædua; is a wood, which, on being cut, stoles out again for another cutting, so as, by proper management, to yield a yearly profit, which may be turned to account by a temporary usufructuary, as a liferenter or wadsetter on a good title, but not by a mere tenant, unless his lease expressly so provide. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 74, et seq.; Bank, i. 658; *Hunter's Landlord and Tenant. Symbols. Heritable property was formerly transferred by the delivery of symbols. Thus lands were resigned by a vassal to his superior by the symbol of staff and baton; and in giving sasine, the symbols were varied according to the nature of the subject. In giving sasine of lands, the symbols were earth and stone of the lands; of an annual rent out of lands, earth and stone, with a penny money; of fishings, net and cobble; of mills, clap and happer; of houses within burgh, hasp and staple; of patronage teinds, a sheaf of corn; of patronage, a psalm-book and the keys of the church; of jurisdictions, *the book of court. Synod. A provincial synod is one of the church courts, composed of the members of the several presbyteries within the bounds prescribed by the General Assembly. Synods whose boundaries are contiguous correspond with one another, by sending one minister and one elder, who are entitled to sit and vote with the other members of the synod to which they are sent. They must have a regular commission from their own synods to act as correspondent members, and on its being produced and read, their names are added to the roll. The time and place of the synod's meeting are fixed by the Assembly. There are sixteen synods, and most of them meet twice a year. The synod is opened by the moderator of the preceding synod. After the roll is made up, a new moderator, who must be a minister, is elected. The minutes of every synod must be signed both by the moderator and clerk; and synod-books, completely filled up, must be produced yearly to the General Assembly, in order to their being revised. The clerk and officers of the synod are of its own appointment. Meetings of synod pro re nata are very rare. See Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 24; Hill's Church Prae. 80; Church Law Society Styles, 246; Gillan's Acts of Assembly, 297, et seq.; *Cook's Church Court Styles. Tabling of a Summons. At the institution of the College of Justice (1537), there was appointed a table, in which was set down all summonses, to be called in their turns; those from each quarter into which Scotland was divided, having a particular quarter of the year allotted to them. Stair, B. iv. tit. 2, § 5; Bank, B. iv. tit. 23, § 27; *Kames' Stat. Tabulæ; the twelve tables upon which the laws of Rome were first inscribed for public inspection.

Tabulæ. Deeds contra fidem tabularum are all private covenants, whether before or after a contract of marriage, whereby the interests of the bride or bridegroom are injured, and which are held fraudulent and void on this account. Bank, B. i. tit. 5, § 21.

Tacit Relocation. See Relocation.

Taciturnity; a mode of extinguishing an obligation in a shorter period than by the forty years' prescription. This manner of extinguishing obligations is by the silence of the creditor, and arises from a presumption, that in the relative situations of himself and his debtor, he would not have been so long silent, if the debt had not been paid, or the obligation implemented. The only cases in which extinction by such taciturnity has been recognised were those of bills of exchange, prior to the introduction of the scotennial prescription. Thus, in several cases, notice was refused after a silence of twenty-three years, or upwards. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 29; Brown's Synop. p. 1694. *See Acquiescence. Presumption. Prescription. Tailzie, or Entail; in its largest acceptation, signifies any deed whereby the legal course of succession is cut off, and an arbitrary one substituted. But the term is usually applied to a deed framed in terms of the statute 1685, c. 22, and intended for the purpose of securing the descent of an heritable estate to the series of heirs or substitutes called to the succession by the maker of the tailzie.

Before advertng to the requisites of a statutory entail, it may be premised generally, that every proprietor legally invested with the right of property is entitled, whether the property has been acquired by his own exertions, or has descended to him by inheritance, to dispose of it at his pleasure. What is technically called a simple destination of the property does not preclude any substitute, after being invested, from exercising the powers of unlimited fiar, and thereby disappointing the posterior substitutes, by altering the investiture either onerously or gratuitously, and that even by a mortis causa deed. If, however, the destination has not been altered by any of the substitutes in possession, it will continue to regulate the course of succession. Hence, the effect of a simple destination is to confer on the substitutes a mere spes successionis, defeasible at the will of the heirs respectively, on their succession. As to the import of certain terms in destinations, see the article Destination. Formerly, a destination was rendered less liable to alteration by the addition of prohibitory clauses. Thus, if the destination was fenced by a clause prohibiting any of the heirs from doing any act or deed whereby the prescribed course of succession might be altered or affected, the substitutes succeeding were thereby laid under an obligation in favour of the posterior substitutes. The heir succeeding under a destination so fenced, took the property under the burden of the prohibitory clause. The obligation, however, not to defeat the destination, was merely a personal obligation against the heir in possession, and did not affect onerous disponees. Practically, therefore, the obligation imposed on the substitute in possession under such destinations, was not effectual to prevent the alienation of the property, since it might either be disposed for onerous considerations with perfect safety to the purchaser, or adjudged for payment of the heir's debts. It was at one time supposed, that, although the entail wanted the statutory requisites, and therefore did not prevent alienation, yet that the price received for the estate came in its place, and that the heir in possession was bound to invest it in accordance with the provisions of the entail; and so the Court of Session decided in the Ascog case; Stewart, Feb. 23, 1827, 5 S. & D. 418; but this decision was reversed on appeal, July 16, 1830, 4 W. & S. 196. See Surrogatum. If, however, the heir under such a destination attempted to alter it by a gratuitous conveyance, such conveyance was liable to reduction, as being granted in contravention of the prohibition under which the granter possessed the estate. Except under the statute 1685, c. 22, a tailzie was not made effectual against third parties, however effectual it might be in constituting rights or obligations inter hæredes.

This statute provides, "That it shall be lawful to his Majesty's subjects to tailzie their lands and estates, and to substitute heirs in their tailzies, with such provisions and conditions as they shall think fit, and to affect the said tailzies with irritant and resolute clauses, whereby it shall not be lawful to the heirs of tailzie to sell, analzie, or dispone the said lands, or any part thereof, or contract debts, or do any other deed whereby the same may be apprised, adjudged, or evicted from the other substitutes in the tailzie, or the succession frustrated or interrupted, declaring all such deeds to be in themselves null and void; and that the next heir of tailzie may, immediately upon contravention, pursue declarators thereof, and serve himself heir to him who died last invest in the fee, and did not contravene, without necessity any ways to represent the contravener." But the statute provides that effect shall not be given to tailzies except on compliance with the following requisites: 1st, That the restrictive clauses shall be inserted in all the title-deeds of the estate. 2d, That the entail shall be presented to the Court of Session, and have the judicial authority of that Court interponed to it. 3d, That it shall be recorded in the Register of Entails. 4th, That being so recorded, it shall be real and effectual against creditors and purchasers, whether by legal or conventional titles. 5th, That, where the conditions of the entail are not inserted in the titles of the estate, the omission shall infer a forfeiture against the heir to whom it is to be attributed, but shall not militate against his creditors or purchasers from him. And, lastly, It is declared that the statute shall not prejudice the rights of the king as to confiscations or fines, for crimes, or the rights of superiors, for their casualties of superiority. The usual form of executing the tailzie is for the maker of the deed to dispone to himself and such a series of heirs as he may think proper to name, the lands intended to be entailed, under certain conditions, limitations, and provisions. Sometimes, also, the entailer disposes to another in the first instance, reserving a liferent to himself. In all cases the first disponee, whether the entailer himself, or another, is called the institute, and the subsequent heirs the substitutes. The clauses essentially necessary to give effect to an entail are, 1st, Prohibitions against altering the order of succession, against alienating the land, and against contracting debts, whereby the lands may be burdened or affected by diligence. 2d, Irritant clauses, declaring that all deeds executed, whereby the course of succession may be altered, or the lands sold or conveyed away, and all debts contracted contrary to the above prohibitions, shall be void and null: And, 3d, Resolutive clauses, declaring that if any of the heirs of entail shall act contrary to all or any of the prohibitions, he shall forfeit his right to the lands entailed, sometimes for himself only, and in other cases for all the heirs who may take the succession as his descendants. The irritant and resolutive clauses may either apply generally to all the prohibited acts, or specially to each; but it is indispensable that every prohibited act be pointed at both by the irritant and resolutive clauses. These clauses must also be distinctly directed against the persons meant to be affected. Such are the essential clauses of an entail. But in the deed as now in use, a variety of other clauses are usually added. Thus, it is the general practice to insert a clause binding the several persons called to the succession, and the husbands of heirs-female, to assume and use the surname and arms of the maker of the tailzie. Provisions are also usually inserted as to the administration of the entailed estate, such as rules for the granting of feus, leases, or the like; and the heirs of entail are further required to satisfy all claims effectual by law against every entail, such as the entailor's debts, the feudal casualties, and the public or parish burdens. Certain powers are frequently reserved to the heir in the entail; such as a power to sell to pay the entailor's debts; a power to excamb or to sell and reinvest; a power to feu; a power to alter the order of succession, so as to avoid an idiot or a bankrupt, or the like. The heirs of entail in succession are also very frequently empowered to grant annuities to their widows or surviving husbands out of the rents of the entailed estates; and in like manner to make provision for their younger children. All the conditions and provisions of an entail are enforced against the heirs in succession, by the penalty of forfeiture of the right in case of contravention.

One limitation of the heir's right of fee is not to be inferred from the existence of another; but, on the other hand, the heir, formerly, was not entitled, fraudulently, to defeat one prohibition through the omission of another, as, for example, to alter the succession by raising a fictitious debt where the contraction of debt is not prohibited. The words of the statute do not authorise any restraint on the institute; but it has been decided, that he may be placed under the fetters of the entail. He must, however, be expressly comprehended in the prohibitory clauses; and the expression "heir or member" of tailzie does not include him. The entailor cannot gratuitously fetter himself to the prejudice of his creditors; but restraints may be imposed on him by an onerous or mutual entail. See Mutual Entail. The entailor's debts are a burden on the estate, which may be adjudged or sold to pay them.

The powers and restraints of heirs of entail have been the subject of various statutes since the passing of the Tailzie Act; but, at common law, the general rule is, that the provisions and conditions of the deed of entail, except in so far as modified or controlled by those statutes, form the legal measure of the heir's rights, and that, except in so far as he is limited, an heir of entail is held, in law, to be an absolute fiar. Before the passing of the act 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36, 1848, it was doubted whether an entail could be effectual which did not contain the whole of the three prohibitions;—against alienations; against the contraction of debt, so as to affect the estate; and against altering the succession; but it was decided, that a deed of entail containing any one of these prohibitions, properly fenced, was effectual so far as it went. The prohibition to alienate does not prevent a conveyance to the next substitute. The prohibition to alienate prevents the granting of feus, or of a locality to a widow beyond the amount of the terre; but this is the subject of statute. See Infra. It strikes against long leases, or leases with a grassum; but neither the power to grant long leases nor to take a grassum is limited, where there is no prohibition to alienate. See Grassum. And it may be stated generally, as the result of the numerous cases decided on the subject of leases, that an heir in possession, under an entail which prohibits alienation, is bound to administer the estate secundum bonum et equum, acting with good faith, and fairly towards those who are to come after him. In this view, it has been said, that every lease, whether long or short, may be regarded as an alienation, except in so far as it is necessary for realising the full profits of the estate, and is granted in the fair exercise of the heir's power of administration. As to the right of the heir of entail to cut growing trees, see the article Timber. The effect of the prohibition to contract debt is different, according as the entail is onerous or gratuitous. If the entail be not onerous, the estate is liable to attachment for all debts contracted prior to the completion of the entail. If it be onerous or mutual, the creditors and heirs of entail are regarded as competing creditors, and the completion of the entail, by infettment and recording, excludes the diligence of creditors not previously infest.

By 20 Geo. II. c. 50 and 51, heirs of entails are empowered to sell to each of their vassals, or to the Crown, the superiorities of the entailed lands held by them, the price being directed to be employed in the purchase of other lands to be entailed in the same manner as the superiorities sold. The following are the provisions of the act 10 Geo. III. c. 51 (commonly called the Montgomery Act), the object of which was the agricultural improvement of lands held under strict entail, and the remedy of the inconveniences attending entails, which unduly limited the heirs of entail as to their power of granting leases. Under this act, 1. Heirs of entail may grant leases not exceeding thirty-one years' endurance, or for fourteen years, and an existing life, or for two existing lives, provided, in the last case, the tenant be taken bound to enclose one-third of the lands in ten years, two-thirds in twenty years, and the whole in thirty years; and in the other cases, where the lease exceeds in duration nineteen years, that the tenant be taken bound to enclose one-third of the lands let before the expiration of one-third of the term, two-third parts before expiration of two-third parts of the term, and the whole before the expiration of the lease. See Improving Lease. 2. Such heirs may grant building leases for any term of years not exceeding ninety-nine, provided that no lease of more than five acres be granted to one person, and that the lease contain a clause, declaring that it shall become void, if a dwelling-house of the value of L.10 be not built upon each half-acre of the ground within ten years from the date of the lease, and if the houses built be not kept in tenantable repair. Such leases must not extend to the mansion-house, gardens, or adjacent enclosures, or to lands within 300 yards from the mansion-house. No lease can be granted till within a year of the expiration of the former lease. The rent must not be under what was formerly paid for the land, and no fine or grassum must be taken. 3. Every proprietor of an entailed estate who lays out money in enclosing, planting, draining, or building farm-houses and offices, becomes a creditor on the entailed estate for three-fourths of the money so laid out, until it amount to four years' free rent of the estate, as it may be ascertained at the first term of Whitsunday after the death of the heir who expended the money, with interest from the term when the next heir's right to the rents commenced, provided that at least three months' notice in writing be given to the next heir not descended of the body of the heir in possession, or in case of his absence from Britain or Ireland, then to his nearest male relation of lawful age by the father's side, and that a copy of such notice, together with the annual accounts and vouchers of the improvements, be lodged with the sheriff-clerk of the county within which the lands lie, within four months after each term of Martinmas. The executors or assigns of the heir who expended the money have action against the succeeding heirs; but each heir in succession is only obliged to apply one-third of the free rents towards extinction of the debt, to which extent the claim is preferable to the debts of the heir in possession. No adjudication can pass against the entailed estate for the claim arising from such improvements. Where the succeeding heir comes to have right to the claim for improvements, it is extinguished. Where an heir has completed the improvement of all or any part of the entailed estate, he may bring an action before the Court of Session or sheriff of the county where the estate lies, calling the heirs who may succeed next after the heirs of his own body, for ascertaining the amount of the charge. The decree pronounced in the action by the sheriff becomes final, unless suspended within six months; and any decree of the Court of Session is final, unless an appeal to the House of Lords is brought within twelve months. 4. Every heir of entail who lays out money in building or repairing a mansion-house or offices becomes a creditor on the estate for three-fourths of the money expended, until it amount to two years' free rents of the estate, with interest from the term at which the next heir's right to the rents commenced (the same requisites of notice and registration being necessary), and those in right of the claim are entitled to obtain payment from the heir after one year from the death of the heir who has laid out the money. 5. Heirs of entail may exchange with neighbouring proprietors lands to the extent of thirty acres of arable ground, or of 100 acres improper for culture by the plough, upon its being ascertained by the sheriff, after taking the necessary proofs that the exchange is just and equal, the exchange being completed by a contract of excambion; after which the lands given from the entailed estate are free from the entail, and the lands added to it by the excambion subjected to the conditions of that deed. The provisions of the recent statute, 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 42, which extends the power of making excambions, are given in the article Excambion. See also a Manual of procedure under that statute published by Mr Parker.

Heirs of entail in possession are also empowered by statute to redeem the land-tax payable out of the entailed lands. The procedure is regulated by the statute 42 Geo. III. c. 116, which authorises the heir of entail to redeem the land-tax, either by a sale of part of the entailed estate, or by borrowing money for the purpose on the security of the estate. If the heir of entail desires to sell a portion of the estate under this statute, he must apply by petition to the Court of Session, stating the amount of the land-tax, and the rent or annual value of the portion of the estate proposed to be sold for its redemption; and after the petition has been intimated on the walls of the Parliament House and in the Edinburgh Gazette (which is held equivalent to personal service on the substitutes), the Court may authorise a sale of such portion of the estate as they think ought to be sold, provided no sufficient objection be stated by any having interest. The heir proposing to sell must show, however, that the portion can be sold without material injury to the rest of the estate, otherwise the Court, ex proprio motu, may refuse the petition. When a warrant of sale is granted by the Court, the sale must proceed by auction at such time as the Court may direct, and under articles of roup, whereby the purchaser is taken bound to pay the price to a trustee named by the seller and approved of by the Court, and who must find caution for the due application of the price. The receipt of the cashier of the Bank of England (to whom the price must be paid to account of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt) is a sufficient discharge to the trustee and the purchaser; and the purchaser is then entitled to demand a disposition or other sufficient title to the land purchased. Such sales are declared by the statute to be as effectual as if the seller had been proprietor in fee-simple. The expense incurred in selling part of the estate for the redemption of the land-tax is paid out of the price received, on the amount of such expense being ascertained by decree of the Court of Session, obtained on a summary application. In case more land is sold than is sufficient, the surplus over redeeming the land-tax and paying the expenses of the sale must be disposed of under direction of the Court of Session, either in the payment of debts affecting the entailed estate, or in the purchase of other lands, to be taken under the limitations and conditions of the entail; the surplus, in the meanwhile, being vested in such security as the Court may deem proper, and the heir in possession being entitled to the interest. Where, however, the surplus is under £200, it is transferred to a trustee named by the seller, to be applied as above, without the necessity of the Court's approbation or direction. Where, instead of a sale, the redemption of the land-tax is to be accomplished by a loan on the security of the entailed estate, it is also necessary to apply for the authority of the Court of Session by petition, stating the amount of the land-tax and the sum proposed to be borrowed. Such petitions are intimated in the same manner with those in the case of a sale; and the Court authorises the petitioner to grant heritable security for the requisite sum over the whole or part of the estate, as the case may require, provided no sufficient objection is stated by any having interest. The expense of the loan is included in the heritable security, and the security is declared by the statute to be as valid and effectual as if the borrower had been proprietor in fee-simple, except only that it is not competent for the creditor to adjudge all or any part of the entailed estate for the interest or principal. See the statute 42 Geo. III. c. 116, §§ 61-65, 101, 102, 143, et seq.

The statute 59 Geo. III. c. 61, directing assessments to be levied for building county jails in Scotland, also contains certain provisions applicable to heirs of entail. Thus, the heir of entail in possession, who pays assessment under the statute, is declared to be a creditor to the succeeding heirs of entail for three-fourths of the money paid; the person in right of the claim for the three-fourths being entitled, after the expiration of one year from the death of the heir who paid, to require the succeeding heirs to repay the three-fourths, with interest from the date of the opening of the succession to the succeeding heir, and upon granting to such succeeding heir a proper assignation. And if the three-fourths be not repaid within three months after requisition, it may be recovered in the same way as money expended under the statute 10 Geo. III. c. 51; the same rules of relief amongst succeeding heirs and their successors, provided by that statute, taking place also in regard to moneys expended on jail assessments. See 59 Geo. III. c. 61, §§ 15-17.

The statute 5 Geo. IV. c. 87 (commonly called Lord Aberdeen's Act), on the preamble that sundry entails contain no power to grant provisions to wives, husbands, or children, of the heirs of entail, and that, in other entails, by reason of the change in the value of money, and other causes, the provisions authorised to be granted are inadequate, makes the following provisions: 1. Every heir of entail in possession under an entail already made, or hereafter to be made, may infect his wife in a life rent annuity out of the entailed estate, not exceeding one-third part of the free yearly rent or value, deducting public burdens, liferent provisions, the yearly interest of debts and provisions, including provisions to children, and the yearly amount of all other burdens affecting the estate or the rents, and diminishing the value thereof to the heir in possession. 2. Every heir-female may infeft her husband in a liferent annuity in the same manner to the extent of one-half of the free yearly rent or value, unless the lands be already burdened with a prior existing annuity granted to husband or wife under this statute, in which case the annuity to the husband must not exceed one-third part of the free yearly rent or value. 3. Where there are two subsisting liferents to wives or husbands, it is not competent to grant a third liferent to take effect until one of the former expire; but the power of granting may be exercised so as to increase a former liferent, or to grant a new one to the above extent, upon the expiration of a subsisting liferent, although the prospective or increased liferent may not take effect in the lifetime of the granter. 4. An heir of entail in possession may grant bonds of provision or obligations, binding the succeeding heirs of entail to pay, out of the rents or proceeds of the entailed estate, to the lawful child, or children of the granter not succeeding to the entailed estate, such sum or sums of money, with interest from the granter's death, as he or she may think fit. But the amount of such provision to children must in no case exceed the following proportions of the free yearly rent or value of the estate—viz., for one child, one year's free rent or value; for two children, two years'; and for three or more children, three years' free rent or value for the whole. Such provisions, except in the case of the settlement thereof by a marriage-contract, are valid and effectual only to such child or children as are alive or in utero at the death of the granter, the provision of a child succeeding to the entailed estate being by that event extinguished for ever. 5. If any child to whom such provision has been granted marry, and if such provision, or any part thereof, be, with the consent of the granter, settled in the contract of marriage of such child, in the event of the child so marrying predeceasing the granter, the provision, or any part thereof, so settled in consideration of the marriage, is effectual in the same manner as if the child had survived the granter. 6. Where the powers of granting provisions to children have been exercised by one or more heir or heirs in possession to the extent of three years' free rent or value, as above, it is not in the power of any heir in possession to grant any further provisions until some part of the former provisions have been paid or extinguished; but in that event, provisions to the extent of those paid or extinguished may be granted, to the effect of admitting the heir in possession to make provisions for children, so far as that power may remain open and unexercised by preceding heirs—so, however, that the provisions to be granted in no case exceed the above proportions of one year's free rent or value for one child, &c. Such provisions (except in the case of a settlement by a contract of marriage, as above) are available to such child or children only as are alive at the death of the granter, or in utero of his wife. 7. In every case in which the provisions granted to wives, husbands, or children, under this statute, exceed the before-mentioned proportions of the free rent or value, they are not deemed null and void, but may be set aside at the instance of any succeeding heir of entail to the extent of the excess, but no farther, the Court of Session being authorised to make the necessary order to that effect, on advising a petition from any of the succeeding heirs of entail. 8. No provisions to be granted under this statute can be made by any process of law whatsoever to affect the fee of the entailed estate; they only affect the yearly rents or proceeds. 9. After the expiration of a year from the death of the granter of the provisions to children, the person or persons having right to them may require the succeeding heir to make payment of them, with interest from the term at which the succeeding heir's right commenced. If the money be not paid within three months after requisition, the person or persons in right of such provision may institute an action in the Court of Session against the heir in possession for compelling payment; and decree being obtained, every kind of diligence or execution, authorised by the law of Scotland for recovering the payment of debts, may issue, except adjudication, against the entailed estate. 10. But any heir in possession sued for payment of provisions to children, granted under authority of this statute by any former heir or heirs, may be discharged from such suit upon assigning, or effectually conveying, to a trustee to be named by the Court of Session, one-third part of the clear rents or proceeds of the entailed estate, payable to such heir in possession during his or her life, or until the provisions to children have been paid off, the rent so assigned being applied in payment of the whole subsisting provisions. 11. No proprietor of an entailed estate is held to have committed any contravention, irritancy, or forfeiture, in consequence of granting the provisions authorised by this statute, notwithstanding any clause or provision in the entail to the contrary. 12. Nothing contained in this statute is to be held as diminishing or abridging the powers of the heir in possession in regard to the granting of provisions to his or her wife, husband, or children, where the entail authorises larger provisions to be granted. But it is not competent to grant the statutory provisions over and above those authorised by the entail, so as to exceed in the whole the above-mentioned proportions of the free yearly rent or value. 13. Nor can the powers conferred by this statute, and by the statute 10 Geo. III. c. 51, be exercised in any case to such an extent as to deprive the heir of entail in possession of more than two third parts of the free yearly rents or proceeds. And the Court of Session is expressly authorised to give all necessary orders for relieving the heir in possession from the payment of more than two-thirds, by authorising the heir to retain any excess beyond the proper amount from the securities or provisions on the entailed estate least entitled to legal preference. Independently of the regulations made for provisions to wives and children by the above-mentioned statute, where the entail does not exclude the terce, and where provision is not otherwise made for the widow, the terce forms a legal burden on the entailed lands; and, upon the same principle, the husband, in similar circumstances, may enjoy the right of courtesy. See supra.

In determining what deeds are necessary for renewing the right in the person of an heir of entail, it is proper to attend to the distinction between an institute and an heir. The person first called to the tailzied succession, i. e. the disponee of the maker of the entail (whether he disposes to himself or to another), is called the institute, and all who succeed to him are, properly speaking, heirs of entail. The institute requires no service, but completes his title by resignation or by confirmation, under the procuratory of resignation or precept of sasine in the tailzie, as the case may be, or as he may think best. But on the death of the institute, whether he has completed his title or not, all those substituted to him in the destination must make up their titles respectively by service as heirs of tailzie and provision. Where the title of the institute has been completed under the entail, the next heir enters by a special service as heir of tailzie. Where the institute has not completed his title (e. g. where the institute has predeceased the maker of the entail, who has reserved a liferent to himself), the next heir in the opening of the succession must expedite a general service as heir of entail. The retour of the special service must recite the whole conditions, together with the irritant and resolute clauses of the entail. But as the object of the general service, as heir of entail, on the other hand, is merely to vest the heir with a right to the unexecuted procuratory of resignation and precept of sasine in the original deed of entail, it is not necessary that the retour should specify the conditions and provisions of the tailzie. The act 1685, c. 22, requires upon this point that the provisions and irritant clauses shall be repeated in all the subsequent conveyances of the tailzied estate to any of the heirs of tailzie,—the omission importing a contravention against the party and his heirs, who makes the omission. It would far exceed the limits of this work to give a detail of the many important questions in regard to entail law, and the construction of provisions and conditions in entails, which have come under judicial consideration. By the act 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 42, 1836, heirs of entail are empowered to grant tacks of any part of the lands of an entailed estate, for any period not exceeding twenty-one years, and of any mines and minerals contained in the lands, for any period not exceeding thirty-one years; but all grassums are prohibited, and leases of the mansion-house, offices, garden, and policy, are limited to the lifetime of the heir granting the lease. The act also authorises the sale of entailed estates for payment of debts of the entailor affecting the estate. It also provides for the excambion of entailed estates. This act was amended by the act 4 and 5 Vict. c. 24, 1841.

Various amendments of the Law of Entail were introduced by the act 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36, 1848. By this act, an heir of entail in possession was empowered to disentail the estate in some cases without, and in other cases with, the consent of one or more of the substitute heirs. In the case of entails created on or after the first of August 1848, an heir born after the entail, being of full age, is entitled to execute a disentail under the authority of the Court, without any consents being required. Born before the entail, he may do so with the consent of the heir-apparent, which expression is defined by the act to mean "the heir who is next in succession to the heir in possession, and whose right of succession, if he survive, must take effect." The heir-apparent, however, must have been born after the date of the entail, and at the time of giving his consent must be twenty-five years of age, and not subject to any legal incapacity.

In the case of entails dated before the first of August 1848, an heir born after that date is entitled to disentail the estate under the authority of the Court, without any consents being required. Born before that date, he may do so with the consent of the heir-apparent, provided he was born after that date, and is twenty-five years of age, and not subject to any legal incapacity. In all cases, the heir in possession may disentail the estate, if he is the only heir of entail in existence for the time, and unmarried; otherwise, he must obtain the consents of the whole heirs of entail, if there be less than three in being at the date of obtaining the consents, and also at the date of applying to the Court. If there are three or more heirs of entail in existence, he must obtain the consents of the three nearest heirs who, at the said dates, are for the time entitled to succeed to the estate, in their order successively, immediately after the heir in possession; or he must obtain the consents of the heir-apparent under the entail, and of the heir or heirs, in number not less than two, including the heir-apparent, who, in order successively, would be heir-apparent. In all these cases, the nearest heir of entail for the time, entitled to succeed immediately after the heir in possession, must be of the age of twenty-five years complete, and not subject to any legal incapacity.

Heirs of entail are also authorized to sell, charge, lease, and feu the estate with the like consents as would enable them to disentail it. They may also exchang the estate, in whole or in part, held under an entail, dated before the 1st of August 1848, with consent of the whole heirs, if there are less than three, or with the consent of the three nearest heirs, or with the consent of the heir-apparent, and of the heir or heirs, in number not less than two, including the heir-apparent.

One restriction, however, is made to affect the exercise of the power to disentail. Where an heir in possession under an entail, dated prior to the first of August 1848, or the heir-apparent, shall, together or separately, have secured by obligation in any marriage-contract the descent of the estate upon the issue of the marriage, it is not competent for either of them to apply for or to consent to the disentail of the estate until there shall be born a child of the marriage, capable of taking the estate; and who, by himself or his guardian, shall consent to the disentail, or until the marriage shall be dissolved without such child being born, unless the trustees named in the contract, or the parties at whose right the provisions of the contract are directed to be carried into execution, shall concur in the application or consent.

An heir of entail entitled to succeed under an entail, dated before the 1st of August 1848, and who has contracted debt previous to the passing of the act, on the security or credit of his right of succession to, or interest in, the estate, is not entitled to give consent to a disentail, in opposition to the creditors in such debts. An heir-apparent under an entail dated before the said date, and who shall, after the passing of the act, have contracted debt on the security of his right of succession to, or interest in, the estate, is not entitled to consent to disentail, except under the like circumstances as would have enabled him to consent had the debt been contracted before the passing of the act. The creditors of an heir who is entitled to disentail without any consents, may affect the estate for payment of his debt.

An heir under an entail dated before the 1st of August 1848, who has obtained a decree for three-fourths of the expense of improvements, may grant a bond of annualrent, binding himself and the heirs of entail to make payment of an annualrent during his own life, and twenty-five years after, not to exceed the legal interest of the said three-fourths of the sum expended; and during the twenty-five years after his decease, not to exceed the sum of L.7, 2s. for every L.100 of such three-fourths. Where such heir shall execute such improvements subsequent to the passing of the act, and shall obtain decree for three-fourths of the expenditure, he is entitled to grant a bond of annualrent for payment of an annualrent during the period of twenty-five years from and after the date of the decree, or during such part of that period as may remain unexpired at the date of the bond, the annualrent not to exceed the sum of L.7, 2s. for every L.100 of the whole of the sums expended.

Where such heir of entail, whether before or after the passing of the act, has executed improvements of the nature contemplated by the Montgomery Act, and shall not have obtained decree, by reason of the provisions of that act not having been adopted, or not having been duly complied with, he is entitled, under the authority of the Court, to grant a bond of annualrent in the same manner as is provided in the case of improvements, for which decree in terms of that act has been obtained.

Where an heir of entail may be called upon to grant a bond of annualrent in terms of the act, he may also be called upon to charge the fee and rents of the estate, with two-thirds of the sum, on which the amount of the bond of annualrent would be calculated in terms of the act. In no case can a bond of annualrent be the ground of an adjudication, and each heir in possession is bound to keep down the annualrents accruing during his possession; and the creditor in a bond of annualrent cannot attach the rents for more than two years' arrears of annualrent, except against the heir in possession, who is bound to pay the annualrent, and his representatives.

Provisions to younger children may be charged upon an entailed estate under the authority of the Court, and the heir in possession is bound to keep down the interest of such provisions. Wherever an estate may be charged with debt, it may also be sold for payment of debt. Feus and long leases may be granted, with the approbation of the Court, of portions of the estate, not exceeding in all one-eighth in value for the time. Money arising from the sale of any portion of the estate on account of any permanent damage to it under an act of Parliament, and money invested in trust for the purpose of purchasing lands to be added to the entailed estate, may, with the approbation of the Court, be applied in payment of entailer's debt, or in payment of any money charged on the fee of the estate under an act of Parliament, or in redemption of the land tax affecting the estate, or in permanently improving it, or in repayment of money already expended in improvements. Money vested in trust for the purchase of land to be entailed, may be dealt with as if it were the entailed lands; and provisions to wives and children may be granted out of money so vested.

An entail defective in regard to any one of the prohibitions against alienation, contraction of debt, and alteration of the order of succession, in consequence of defects, either in the original deed of entail, or in the investiture following upon it, is declared to be an invalid entail. A warrant, however, to record an entail in the Register of Tailzies, is declared to be equivalent to the insertion of irritant and resolute clauses in the entail.

The act of 1848 provides, that private roads made through an entailed estate shall be deemed to be improvements falling under the Montgomery Act, in the same way as enclosing, planting, and drainage under that act. It farther declares, however, that the Montgomery and Aberdeen Acts shall not apply to entails dated after the 1st of August 1848. The effect of this, however, was to cause the insertion in subsequent entails of the whole provisions in the Montgomery and Aberdeen Acts. Accordingly, by the act 16 and 17 Vict. c. 94, 1853, it was enacted, that where any entail, dated after the 1st of August 1848, declared these acts, or either of them, should be applicable to the entails, the entail in these respects should be in the same position as if it had been dated prior to that date. It would have been better; perhaps, to have repealed altogether the provision on this subject in the act 1848.

In ascertaining a husband's or wife's provision under the Aberdeen Act, it is necessary to take into account the amount of the younger children's provisions, as forming a burden on the prior rental. In the same way, in ascertaining the amount of the younger children's provisions, it is necessary to take into account the provision in favour of the husband or wife. See the case of McDonald v. Lockhart, May 18, 1836, 14 S. 785. The following simple method of ascertaining provisions under the Aberdeen Act has been furnished to the present edition.

I. Where a husband has granted provisions, to the full extent allowed by the act, in favour of his widow and younger children:—

1. In the case of a widow and one child, the interest of the provision of that child will be $\frac{1}{3}$ ths of the whole free rental.

2. In the case of a widow and two children, the interest of the provision of such children will be $\frac{1}{3}$ ths of the whole free rental.

3. In the case of a widow and three or more children, the interest of the provision of such children will be $\frac{1}{3}$ ths of the free rental.

In all these cases, the amount of the children's provisions may be ascertained by multiplying the interest of them by 20; and the amount of the jointure may be ascertained by subtracting the interest of the children's provisions from the rental, and dividing the remainder by 3.

II. Where a wife has granted provisions, to the amount allowed by the act, in favour of her husband and younger children:—

1. In the case of a husband and one younger child, the interest of the provision of that child will be $\frac{1}{3}$ th of the whole free rental.

2. In the case of a husband and two children, the interest of the provision of such children will be $\frac{1}{3}$ th of the whole free rental.

3. In the case of a husband and three children, the interest of the provision of such children will be $\frac{1}{3}$ ths of the whole free rental.

In all the above cases, the amount of the children's provisions may be ascertained by multiplying the interest of them by 20; and the jointure may be ascertained by subtracting the interest of the children's provisions from the rental, and dividing the remainder by 2.

To show the practical application of the above rules, it may be supposed that each of the cases occur in regard to an entailed estate of L.2000 a year free rental; and it may be remarked, that when there is one child, the provision of that child added to the jointure, either of husband or wife, is exactly equal in amount to the whole free rental, and that one-half of the provision of two and one-third of the provision of three or more children added to the jointure will be equal to a year's free rental. This fact will be found of considerable use in checking any calculations made by means of the foregoing rules.

To prove the accuracy of the foregoing rules,—

Let a be the free rental;

x the jointure;

$20y =$ children's provisions.

$$(1.) \quad x = \left(\frac{a-y}{3} \right) \quad \dots (1.)$$

$$\therefore x = a - 20y \quad \dots (3.)$$

Equating values of x in (1.) and (3.):—

$$y = \frac{2}{59}a$$

$$(2.) \quad x = \frac{a-y}{3} \quad . \quad . \quad . \quad (1.)$$

$$20y = 2(a-x) \quad . \quad . \quad . \quad (2.)$$

$$\therefore x = a - 10y \quad . \quad . \quad . \quad (3.)$$

Equating values of x in (1.) and (3.):—

$$a - y = 3a - 30y$$

$$(3.) \quad x = \frac{a-y}{3} \quad . \quad . \quad . \quad (1.)$$

$$20y = 3(a-x) \quad . \quad . \quad . \quad (2.)$$

$$\therefore 3x = 3a - 20y \quad . \quad . \quad . \quad (3.)$$

Again from . . . (1.)

$$3x - a = y$$

Equating these values of $3x$:—

$$3a - 20y = a - y$$

II.

$$(1.) \quad x = \left(\frac{a-y}{2}\right) \quad . \quad . \quad . \quad (1.)$$

$$20y = (a-x) \quad . \quad . \quad . \quad (2.)$$

$$\therefore x = a - 20y \quad . \quad . \quad . \quad (3.)$$

$$\left(\frac{a-y}{2}\right) = a - 20y$$

$$\therefore a - y = 2a - 40y$$

$$\therefore y = \frac{1}{39}a$$

$$(2.) \quad x = \frac{a-y}{2} \quad . \quad . \quad . \quad (1.)$$

$$20y = 2(a-x) \quad . \quad . \quad . \quad (2.)$$

$$\therefore 2x = 2a - 20y \quad . \quad . \quad . \quad (3.)$$

Equating values of $2x$ in (1.) and (3.):—

$$a - y = 2a = 20y$$

$$\therefore y = \frac{1}{19}a$$

$$(3.) \quad x = \frac{a-y}{2} \quad . \quad . \quad . \quad (1.)$$

$$20y = 3(a-x) \quad . \quad . \quad . \quad (2.)$$

$$\therefore 6x = 6a - 40y \quad . \quad . \quad . \quad (3.)$$

Again, from (1.):—

$$6x = 3a - 3y \quad . \quad . \quad . \quad (4.)$$

Equating values of $6x$ in (3.) and (4.):—

$$3a - 40y = 3a - 3y$$

$$\therefore 37y = 3a$$

$$\therefore y = \frac{3}{37}a$$

By the Titles to Land Act, 1860, where an entailor's debts, or other debts, or sums of money, may be made chargeable by adjudication, or otherwise, upon the fee of an entailed estate, the heir of entail in possession may, with the authority of the Court of Session, grant bonds and dispositions in security for such debts and sums of money, in the same manner as he is empowered to do by 11 and 12 Vict., c. 36, and 16 and 17 Vict., c. 94, in the case of provisions to younger children; and such bonds and dispositions in security may be granted in favour of any parties in right of such debts, and sums of money, at the date when such deeds are executed.

Taxes; are supplies granted by the House of Commons, and confirmed by Acts of Parliament, constituting the extraordinary revenue of the Crown, and paid yearly towards the expenses of Government. It does not suit the plan of this work to give any view of the various statutes which have been passed connected with taxation. In so far as they may be considered as peculiarly connected with our law, all that seems necessary to be said will be found in the article Public Burdens. Taxes and the arrears of taxes are Crown debts. See Crown Debt. As to the supposed power of the magistrates of royal burghs to impose taxes with consent of the majority of burgesses, see *Ersk. Tiend Court; or Commissioners of Tiend. Several expedients to provide the reformed clergy with proper stipends having failed, a commission of Parliament was appointed by the act 1617, c. 3, to plant churches and modify stipends out of the tithes of every parish within the kingdom. Other commissions were afterwards granted, with power to unite or disjoin parishes, to value and sell tithes, &c. The last of these commissions was authorised by 1693, c. 23; and by 1701, c. 9, the powers of it and of all subsequent misions were transferred to the Judges of the Court of Session, who, since that time, have continued to exercise the powers thus conferred on them, as a parliamentary commission, under the name of the Teind Court, or "The Commission for Plantation of Kirks and Valuation of Teinds." This Court is distinct from the Court of Session, having a special jurisdiction, and a separate establishment of clerks and officers. The whole judges sit in one chamber, nine judges being a quorum; and the Court meets every second Wednesday during the sittings of the Court of Session, beginning with the second Wednesday after the meeting of the Court for the summer or winter sessions; 48 Geo. III. c. 138, § 15. The jurisdiction of the Court extends to all matters in which the former commission were authorised to judge; e.g., valuations and sales of teinds, augmentations of stipends, prorogations of tacks and of teinds, and (with consent of three-fourths of the heritors of the respective parishes) the disjunction or annexation of parishes, and the building of new churches, &c. An appeal lies from this Court to the House of Lords. See Appeal. The Teind Court has no power to put its decrees in force: this is done by the Court of Session on a bill presented at the Bill-Chamber, craving a warrant for letters of horning, which is granted, of course, and the letters pass the signet in the usual manner on inducta of ten days; 1633, c. 19. All summonses before this Court also pass under the signet of the Court of Session; but they, as well as the diligences on the decrees of the Teind Court, instead of being subscribed by a writer to the Signet, are subscribed by the clerk of the Teind Court.

By the Judicature Act, 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 54, a distinction was made between the judicial and ministerial duties of this Court. As to its judicial duties, it was provided, that from and after 11th November 1825, all actions or the valuation and sale of teinds, or of proving the tenor thereof, all actions of suspension or reduction of localities, and all actions of declarator or reduction connected with teinds, formerly competent before the Teind Court, should be brought before one or other of the Divisions of the Court of Session, which Division is to be held as a quorum of the Commissioners of Teinds. The procedure in such causes is to be assimilated to the procedure in ordinary cases in the Court of Session; the Lord Ordinary having the same power to determine and to report as in that Court, and his interlocutors being in like manner subject to review in the Division of the Court to which the cause belongs. By the same statute, it is enacted that all actions as to the localling of modified stipends, and other causes formerly remitted by the Teind Court to a Lord Ordinary, are to be conducted as nearly as may be like Court of Session causes. The ministerial duties of the Commissioners of Teinds remain as before, including the plantation of kirks and valuation of teinds, the modifying of stipends, the uniting and disjoining of parishes, and, in general, the entire ministerial or discretionary jurisdiction of the former Teind Court. In furtherance of these statutory changes, the Act of Sederunt 12th Nov. 1825 provides for the enrolment of teind causes by the teind clerk, both before the junior Lord Ordinary, and in the Teind Court, properly so called; as also for the publication of a minute-book of teind causes: 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 54; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825. Thus, the ministerial duties of the Teind Court remain; 1. In proper augmentations. 2. In regard to small stipends under the statutes 50 Geo. III. c. 84, and 5 Geo. IV. c. 72. See Small Stipends. 3. In augmentations in order to exhaust the teinds, &c., so as to enable the minister to claim aid in Exchequer as for a small stipend, &c.; and, 4. In processes of transportation, annexation, disjunction and erection. The judicial duties again, which are in effect transferred to the Court of Session, are exercised, 1. In localling a modified stipend. 2. In processes of reduction of decrees of valuation, and of locality. 3. In provings of the tenor, of decrees of reduction and sale, or the like. 4. In processes of prorogation of tacks of teinds. 5. In processes of approbation of valuations of the sub-commissioners. 6. In processes of valuation of teinds. 7. In processes of sale of teind. 8. In cases where the record of a decret is not extant in the Teind Court, under 1707, c. 9, praying for a new extract; and, 9. In the combined process of valuation and sale of teinds; and in other proceedings of a like character, connected with teinds. Teinds or Tithes. Teinds or tithes are, in their original signification, the tenth part of the annual produce of the land and industry of the laity, which the clergy began, in the earlier ages of the church, to claim and to receive as a fixed provision for the maintenance of religious instructors. Teinds are of two kinds, personal and predial. The former are unknown in Scotland. The latter, affecting the fruits of land, are either natural or industrial; of which the industrial correspond to the mixed tithes of some writers; Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, §§ 5-6; Decretal, L. 3, t. 30, c. 20; although others confine the term mixed to the tithes of cattle and their fruits; Bank, B. ii. tit. 8, § 136. In Scotland, until teinds came to be regulated by the valued rental, there was hardly any teinding of natural fruits; so that predial tithes of industrial fruits have all along, with a few local and consuetudinary exceptions, constituted the whole teinds leviable by the Church in Scotland. They consisted of the tenth of all profit produced by the application of industry to land; with the exception of certain lands, such as glebes, temple-lands, and those belonging to the Cistercian and other religious orders; and of lands, the proprietors of which have acquired their teinds from churchmen originally. They were leviable without any deduction, propter curam et culturam in favour of the possessor, and were of two kinds, Parsonage and Vicarage; of which parsonage, due exclusively to the parson, or others having right to the parochial benefice, and called Decimæ Rectoriæ, or Decimæ Garbales, were leviable from corn alone at the terms of Whitsunday and Michaelmas; 1672, c. 13. Vicarage teinds were paid to the vicar, if originally appointed by the patron; yet, where he was not, they also went to the beneficiary, who might make what agreement he pleased with assistants of his own appointment. Those teinds were drawn from all other and minor fruits, such as cattle, fowls, eggs, milk, hay, lint, fishings, &c., &c., not, as parsonage teinds, according to any general rule, but according to the usage of every individual benefice or parish. Hence, in parsonage teinds, although the negative prescription may destroy the right to those of each year, and although the positive prescription will operate in favour of one infest in his own parsonage teinds (Bank, B. ii. tit. 8, § 143), yet, because they are due by law, and form an inherent burden on the land, the right to levy them cannot be lost non utendo; whereas vicarage teinds are regulated, both in kind and in amount, by the use of payment; are established by use alone; and are lost by the negative prescription. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 10, et seq.; Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, § 5, et seq.; Bank, B. iii. tit. 8, §§ 134, et seq., 206, et seq.

Prior to the Reformation, the Church, enjoying tithes de jure communi, had, besides, accumulated a great deal of landed property. But, notwithstanding this, the tithes were gradually almost entirely carried away from their proper destination, and the acting parochial clergy thus left in a state of comparative indigence; 1st, By the consecration of tithes to other churches or churchmen not connected with the lands; 2d, By papal exemptions; 3d, By the infeudation of tithes to laymen. Religious houses were always, on account of their apparent sanctity and austerity, regarded by the laity with greater favour than that shown to the secular clergy. Donations and mortifications thus became frequent; and it often happened that, on the emerging of a vacancy in the parochial charge, patrons, considering themselves then absolute proprietors of the benefice which they had founded, appropriated great part of its tithes to some favourite monastery, and frequently, indeed, conveyed away to some religious institution the right of presentation also; thus making it, as it were, the perpetual beneficiary of the church annexed, with an unlimited power in restricting the clergyman's allowance,—a practice attempted to be checked by 1471, c. 43, but which continued to prevail till the Reformation. The Pope, too, was the presumed patron of all parochial charges to which no one else could show a valid right of presentation. Hence, in all these, his support of any religious order naturally took along with it a gradual diminution of the incumbent's provision, if not a complete transference of it; and where he was not the patron, the plenitude of his power enabled him, in any case, to exempt from all payment of tithe the lands (often very extensive) of churchmen and religious societies, and thus directly to rob the regular clergy. Moreover, grants of part of the tithes were often made by the patron, as opportunity offered, to needy lay friends. The religious houses, also, which had acquired rights to tithes, often profited, and, at any rate, saved themselves from odium and trouble, by the disposal of them to the Crown, or to lay subjects; and the practice became common, both of granting tacks of the tithes, and of feuing them out for payment of an annual feu-duty, with a grassum, notwithstanding various restraints upon the one, and prohibitions against the other; and also of feuing the landed property of the Church in the same way, cum decimis inclusis et nemus antea separatis; a provision which transferred to the lay possessor the same exemption, after seven years' possession, which had formerly been enjoyed by the Church. These feus were, by 1564, c. 88, rendered void, unless confirmed by the Crown, but continued in practice—the Crown's confirmation being generally admitted. In consequence of such a state of things, various measures were taken at different times, as by an Act of Privy Council, 15th February 1562, and by acts 1662, c. 10, and 1592, c. 161, to check this systematic spoliation of the parochial clergy; but no essively failed in remedying the evil, and were indeed rendered almost nugatory by 1606, c. 2. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, §§ 15, 16, 17; Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, §§ 10, 11, 17, 18, 19.

At the Reformation, the King, whether by resignation or by confiscation, became the proprietor of all Church lands, especially of those formerly belonging to religious houses, of whatever description, unconnected with parochial charges; and, on the death or dissolution of the abbots and priors, he first appointed lay commendators for life, and then created the monasteries and priories into temporal lordships, the grantees to which were styled Lords of Erection, or Titulars of the tithes; thus transferring the possessions of the Church permanently into the hands of laymen holding of the Crown; while, at the same time, the Crown, coming in place of the Pope, became patron of every regular parochial charge to the patronage of which no object could show a good title, and thus acquired a great accession to its influence. The property of the lands erected, and their exemption from tithe (where it existed), constituted the temporality, and the tithes themselves the spirituality of the benefices; and the Lords of Erection continued the exercise of the rights which their predecessors had exercised, in presenting such ministers, and assigning such stipends, as they chose; although a very limited independent provision was continued to the reformed clergy by 1572, c. 52.

These Lords of Erection themselves, however, soon became objects of jealousy, and their possessions objects of importance. It became, therefore, advisable to check the practice of erections; and, in consequence, by 1587, c. 29, all Church lands were inalienably annexed to the Crown, with the following exceptions: 1st, Of the temporal lordships erected by the Crown, prior to the date of the act. 2d, Of lands made over to hospitals, schools, and universities, and not diverted from their original uses. 3d, Of benefices which, before the Reformation, had either been retained by the original lay patrons, or had been feued out to laymen by the Church; the feu-duties, on the Reformation, vesting in the Crown with certain limitations. 4th, Of the manse and glebe of the Popish churchmen, which were not annexed, because regarded, like those teinds which were appropriated to parsonages and vicarages, as part of the spirituality of benefices, and were, like them, reserved either to the possessors at the time, or to the Protestant churchmen who were to come in their place. See 1593, c. 190. 5th, Of certain pensions granted by the Pope, or his successor the King, or by bishops, with consent of the incumbent, provided they were either authorised by the Lords of Council, or followed by possession. See 1606, c. 3. It remains a matter of doubt whether the act of 1587, c. 29, annexed to the Crown the teinds of benefices; Erskine, B. ii. tit. 10, § 22, maintaining that it did; while Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, § 9, and other writers, with more apparent correctness, maintain the reverse. Notwithstanding this act, further erections were made by the Crown, which gave rise to a second act, 1592, c. 121, voiding all erections subsequent to 1587, except those in favour of persons created, since that period, Lords of Parliament. On the restoration of bishops, the annexations of their benefices and those of their chapters were rescinded, respectively, by 1606, c. 2, and 1617, c. 2; but these measures were cancelled by the act 1690, c. 29, on the re-establishment of Presbytery; and the King has since applied the bishops' tithes to public uses and pensions. Thus, it appears that, after the Reformation, the whole teinds of the country belonged either to the Crown, to the Lords of Erection, called titulars, to the original founding patrons, or to the feuars from the Church,—the whole rights of the Church to teind being thus transferred to, and vested in, these parties. The teind was originally made effectual by drawing it; which was performed by the beneficiary carrying off from the ground every tenth sheaf, the remainder of the produce being termed the stock. This practice was attended with great inconvenience, and became a constant instrument of oppression, from the proprietor being obliged to allow his whole crop to stand on the ground, exposed to all the vicissitudes of the seasons, until the beneficiary should choose to draw away his teind. It became a frequent custom for the beneficiary to commute his tithes for either a certain yearly tack-duty, or a stated number of rental bolls; to which both parties were, under certain limitations, bound permanently to adhere. And it often happened that the beneficiary persevered in nimsiously delaying to draw his teind, for the purpose of thereby making better terms in any proposed arrangement with the proprietor. Various remedies provided for this evil by the acts 1606, c. 8, 1612, c. 5, and 1617, c. 9, were found to be in a great measure inoperative; so much so, that Charles I. was induced, soon after his accession, to execute a revocation of all grants of Church lands or of tithes made by James VI. to the Crown's prejudice; and, the year after, to bring a reduction of all erections, both those before and those after the Act of Annexation; of the former, on the ground that they proceeded on the resignations of the beneficiaries; and of the latter, on the ground that no annexation to the Crown could be dissolved but by Parliament; and contending, 1st, That the titulars should yield to the Crown the superiority of the Church lands, and that a certain yearly annuity should be paid out of the tithes to the Crown. 2d, That the titular (i.e., beneficiary) should sell the tithes to the proprietor at a fixed number of years' purchase; and that tithes set aside yearly for the support of the clergy, universities, schools and hospitals, should be valued at the suit of the proprietor, who, on payment either of the price, or of the valued yearly duty, should have the entire management of the crop, stock, and tithe.

All parties having interest entered, in 1628, into four submissions, referring to the King himself; the first and fourth signed by the Lords of Erection with their tackmen, and by the landlords,—the second by the bishops and clergy,—and the third by the commissioners of several royal burghs. On the 2d September 1629, the King pronounced separate decrees-arbitral. The first and fourth declare the King's right to the superiorities of erection, resigned to him by their submissions. They give 1000 merks Scots from him to the Lords of Erection, as the purchase-money of each yearly chaldor of feu-farm, or each 100 merks of yearly feu-duty or other constant rent of superiority, deducting an equivalent to the blench-duties,—the feu-duties to be retained until payment. All this is confirmed by 1632, c. 14; but the Crown's right of redemption was renounced, as unprofitable, by 1707, c. 11. See Ground-Annual. Still, however, there remained the other important provision—viz., the power given to the heritor to have his teinds valued, and his yearly charge thus permanently fixed, and also to bring an action of sale against the titular or his tackman. The rule fixed as to the first was, on the one hand, that where, by whatever arrangement the teind, being under the management and in the possession of the heritor along with his stock, was of necessity joined with that stock in one common valuation, then the yearly duty payable by the heritor to the titular or beneficiary should be one-fifth of that whole annual valuation of the rent of stock and tithe together, which fifth was deemed a reasonable surrogatum, in place of a tenth of the whole increase; and, on the other hand, that, where the tithe was drawn every harvest by the titular, and its value thus admitted yearly of a proof separate from that of the stock, the commissioners appointed for the valuation of teinds were to take proof of its amount, and take its value communibus annis; which value the proprietor was to pay annually to him who had right to the teind, under deduction of a fifth, called the King's Ease, because granted in his awards as an allowance or abatement to the proprietor. Where, however, the teinds, though drawn in gross, had been mixed with others, so as to prevent discrimination, or where the titular was a party, their value was to be taken one-fourth of the valued rent of the heritor's stock; Campbell, August 4, 1773; Ersk. B. tit. 10, §§ 24–33. And the rule as to the second was, that where the seller had a heritable and unburdened right to his tithe, e.g., that of the titular, he should be obliged to sell for nine years' purchase; and where the teinds were enjoyed by tackmen or where the purchaser himself was tackman, the commissioners should allow a deduction regulated by the endurance of the tax—a matter generally so arranged by them, that, while the titular or other seller received his purchase-money at the expiration of the tack, the tackman, whether the purchaser or a third party, retained in the one case, and drew in the other, the interest of the price during the currency. This is ratified by 1633, c. 17; but the limitation of the term of sale to two years after the valuation has been overlooked in practice; Irvine, May 16, 1794, Mor. p. 15,698. The grain, in view of teinds have been already valued, must be valued at the medium fiars for seven years preceding. The King's decrees on the other submissions were much to the same effect, except that the King's power of valuation extended to those only of the bishops' tithes which they did not actually possess by reason of bolls or drawn tithe, but which were in fact or other use of payment.

In 1627 commissioners had been appointed by the king to fix his annuity; but, in order that the decrees-arbitral, in the valuation of teinds, might be executed under authority of a proper court, a commission was appointed by 1633, c. 19, with power generally to value and sell tithes, and approve the valuations of these sub-commissioners. Valuations were under it, carried on for a long time, although part of the records were carried off by Cromwell, and others were destroyed by fire in the year 1700. By 1707, c. 9, the commission was renewed to the Judges of the Court of Session, who approved of the valuations of the sub-commissioners, which, however, may be derelinqished by the voluntary contribution of a different amount, not made of payment, to the minister or titular; although a decree of the High Commission cannot be so derelinqished. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, §§ 13, 21, 34, 36; Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, §§ 21, 22, 23, 35; Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, §§ 39, 99, 150, 154, 155, 200; Ivory's Form of Process, vol. 2, p. 44.

The teinds vested in the lay proprietor are in a different situation from those vested in the

titulars. When they lost the right of presentation by 1649, c. 39, they received, as an indemnification, all those tithes of the parish which had not previously been disposed of; and, when their right of presentation was restored by 1690, c. 23, their right also to these teinds was confirmed, "with the burden always of the minister's stipend, tacks, and prorogation already granted of said teinds, and of such augmentations of stipend, future prorogations, and erections of new kirks, as shall be found just and expedient, providing the said patrons, getting right to the teinds by virtue of this present act, and who had no right thereto before, shall be, likeas they are hereby obliged to sell to each heritor the teinds of his own lands at the rate of six years' purchase, as the same shall be valued by a commission for valuation of teinds." Thus, the heritor is entitled to have his teinds in all cases valued, and purchases them from the titular at nine years' purchase, and from the patron, where not titular also, at six years' purchase—this last privilege belonging to the heritor alone. But there are still certain teinds, which, though they may be valued, can never be bought by the heritor or fear of the lands titheable: 1st, Teinds, either allocated to or belonging to ministers; 1690, c. 30. 2^d, Teinds granted to colleges, schools, or hospitals. 3^d, Teinds formerly belonging to bishops, and thereafter to the Crown on the abolition of Episcopacy, so long as these teinds remain with the Crown. 4th, Teinds which the heritor is bound to pay to a former heritor, or to a titular, his superior, who having either bought his own teinds, or enjoying the teinds of his own lands, retained them, in subsequently feuing out the lands to him. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 8, § 37; Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, §§ 161–163.

The action for valuation of teinds proceeds now before the Court of Session, by 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 54, and may be raised at the instance of the heritor, or sometimes of the minister. In the one case, the titular or his tacksman, and generally the minister, or, if there be none, the moderator of presbytery; and, in the other, the titular or tacksman, and the heritor, are made parties. A proof, if allowed, must be directed chiefly to the following particulars: 1st, Where the lands are in the natural possession of the proprietor, the fair and just rent of the lands must be proved under a nineteen years' lease, if arable, eleven years if pasture, and nineteen if partly both, with the usual clauses; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825. 2^d, Where they are under lease, the full rents, whether in money or victual, and and in some cases kain, the amount of the grassum (if there be any), and the endurance of the lease, must be ascertained. 3^d, All deductions must be inquired into, such as the landlord's expense in supporting houses, a superabundance of buildings, the existence of orchards, woods, moss, mill-rent, machinery, manufactures, fishings, coal-pits, mines, minerals, extraordinary and not annual expense of culture, such as for embanking, draining, enclosing, and the improvement or creation of rent by uncommon exertion, as the banking off of the sea, the transference of any obligation by agreement from the tenant to the landlord, whereby the rent is raised, the letting of the lease in steelbow; all these create deductions from the titheable fund; and the tenant's obligation to relieve the landlord from the land-tax does not form part of the calculated rental; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825. As to grass, it is exempt from teind, where it is mere pasture, or where no industry has been exerted in its production, and where the cattle which it feeds are teinded; but where it forms part of a rotation of crops, and where it yields a return by being let for pasture, while the cattle which it produces are exempted, it is liable. No heritor can object to or reduce a valuation obtained by another; but a valuation reduced is null as to all parties. Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, § 31; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, §§ 32–43; Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, §§ 152–3.

Where the parsonage and vicarage teinds fall to be valued separately, as due to different titulars, 1633, c. 19, the yearly estimation of the vicarage, as one-tenth of the whole vicarage increase, is to be deducted from the fifth part of the joint stock and teind rental, and the remainder is the valued parsonage teind; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 33; Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, § 155. A titular cannot require a proprietor who has got his teinds valued, to infest him in the lands in security of the yearly duty; but a sale of teinds to the heritor is perfected by sasine, upon a conveyance which burdens him with all present and future impositions, absolute warrandice to the extent of the price being granted by the titular; 1633, c. 19. But, in many cases, as where tithes are due from office, or by statute, they vest ex lege. At any rate, they are always conveyed by titles distinct from those of the lands. See 1690, c. 23. The king's annuity has not been demanded out of tithes since 1674, by either our kings or their donataries; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, §§ 38, 39, 40; except in the case of sale on a decree, when the heritor is taken bound to relieve the titular or patron of it. Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, §§ 156–160.

Teinds are debita fructuum, not debita fundi. Their arrears, therefore, do not affect singular successors; and the right to them can be made effectual against the parties liable without any real security. The king's annuity, too, and the annual valuation or purchase-money of teinds, also continue of the same nature as that of which they are the surrogates, unless where the annual value is secured by sasine. Action, then, lies for arrears against none but such as have intromitted with them as teinds; whether the intromitter be the heritor or his tenant; and the titular's hypothec, which extended originally only over corns, is cut off by valuation. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, §§ 42-44; Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, §§ 1-33; Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, § 134.

The right, even to parsonage teinds, is cut off by the positive prescription. Prescription extends to all heritages; and, if tithes be contained in an infeftment, it must be a good title for prescription of them, when of forty years' standing; for although tithes may exist in a patron's person without infeftment, yet prescription cannot operate in favour of his disponee without infeftment; and the prescription, though established, cannot defend him from future proportions of localised stipend in his due order, still less from the existing payment of stipend; although, in a case of bona fide possession on a grant cum decimis inclusis merely, and from one who was not a churchman, and therefore could not exempt, he would be still freed from payment of by-gones, which, until decree of valuation, must be the actual teind of each year. A grant of one kind of tithe includes no other. Tacks of teinds admit both of tacit relocation, and of prorogation by the commissioners. Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, §§ 128-199; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 45; Connell, vol. ii. pp. 439-445.

As to the mode in which the clergy are provided for out of the tithes, it may be observed, that there were formerly two descriptions of clergymen, of whom the first, the clergy of the bishops' mensal churches, were, in the period between the Reformation and the abolition of Episcopacy, at the mercy sometimes of the bishops, sometimes of the Crown, but have now permanent stipends modified to them by the commissioners from the bishops' tithes, now the king's. The second, whose stipends had never, since their original appointment, been given out, remained proprietors of the full tithe, until it was given, by 1649, c. 39, to the patron as a solatium for his loss of presentation, while a stated provision for them was imposed as a burden on the patron on his retention of the tithes, after recovery of the right of presentation. So that now every parochial minister is, in fact, a stipendiary either from the Crown or the titular (perhaps merely nominal) or the patron qua titular.

Besides the other powers granted to the commission of tithes by 1633, c. 19, they were authorised to modify reasonable stipends out of the tithes to the parochial clergy. By a former commission (1617, c. 3), the lowest stipend modified was to be 500 merks Scots, or five chalders of victual, or the whole fruits of any benefice which might fall short of this, and the highest 1000 merks or ten chalders, the chalders of oatmeal being sixteen bolls, at eight stone to each boll. The act 1633 raised the minimum to eight chalders, or proportionally in money, amounting to L.44, 8s. 10³/₄d. sterling; but it did not limit the commissioners in their alteration of the old maximum of ten chalders. So that they exercised a discretion in giving a stipend often exceeding it, when there was enough of free tithe in the parish, if they saw cause for so doing. This practice was continued by the Lords of Session after the commission was vested in them by 1707, c. 9; the respective teinds being valued either by decrees of valuation, or in any other competent way. It was, however, long held to be ultra vires of the Court to grant a second augmentation; but that idea has never been acted upon since 1789, and repeated augmentations have been given to the same stipend. By 50 Geo. III. c. 54, L.150 sterling is made the minimum annual value of any stipend, any deficiency of teinds being made up by Government. As to the process of augmentation, see Augmentation.

When the increase of stipend is granted, each heritor is liable in payment to the whole extent of his teinds if valued, or their rent, if let to him, although with right of recourse against the rest; and all intromitters whatever are similarly liable. Hence the process of augmentation is combined with what is called a locality, whereby the proportion payable by each heritor is allocated on him, after which he is liable for his share, and for no more. See Locality. The modified stipend is a debitum fructuum simply, like the teinds from which it is taken, and is free of all tacks and burdens whatsoever—1593, c. 162; so that no minister can do anything as to it, any more than as to the glebe or manse, to prejudice his successor. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, §§ 46-50, 61; Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, §§ 7, 30; Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, § 164, et seq.; 48 Geo. III. c. 138, § 8.

It is a rule strictly adhered to, that the teinds of one parish cannot be taken to provide stipend to the minister of another; and where any portion of the teinds of a parish has been so appropriated in former times, it may be reclaimed by the parish minister whenever the other teinds of his parish are inadequate to afford him a competent stipend. The Court of Session, as the commission of teinds, are empowered to unite parishes, or to disjoin or divide such as are too large, and to modify stipends out of the teinds to the minister.

tional ministers thereby rendered necessary; but under this qualification, that parishes cannot be disjoined or divided, except with the consent of three-fourths of the heritors, reckoning not by the number of the heritors, but by the amount of their valued rent within the parish. The following is the order in which the teinds of a parish are liable for payment of existing stipends and augmentations: 1st, Teinds never erected—i. e., never granted by the Crown to any layman. 2d, Teinds which have been erected and are yet in the hands of the lay titular, including the tack-duties or rents drawn by the titular for teinds let in lease, and the feu-duties payable by parties having right to their own teinds, and holding them under the titular as superior. 3d, Teinds let in lease by the titular. 4th, Teinds heritably disposed by the titular, and the teinds of the titular's own lands. 5th, bishops' teinds; but teinds acquired by bishops after the Reformation are not held as such, but are localised on in the order in which they would have been liable, if still in the hands of those to whom they previously belonged. 6th, Teinds belonging to colleges or universities, or appropriated to other pious uses, including the teinds formerly belonging to the Chapel Royal. See Campbell, March 7, 1770; Skene, June 3, 1770, &c.; Portmoak, Dec. 9, 1795; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, §§ 51, 52; Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, §§ 168-170, et seq. An heritor may, after valuation, surrender his teinds, which surrender, however, will not diminish the amount of stipend localised; Connell, vol. ii. p. 295, et seq. Where, without any decree, heritors have been in the use of certain payments to the minister, no more can be demanded until an inhibition of tithes be raised at the instance of the patron or titular, or other person entitled to them; Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, § 179. In decrees of modification, an extra sum is generally allowed for communion elements; see 1572, c. 54, and 1593, c. 162; although no proper part of the stipend. See Sacraments. It cannot, however, be modified out of the stock, but must come from the teind; Wilkie, Feb. 13, 1793; Logie, June 17, 1772. Of course, this provision goes, not to the minister, but to the parish poor for all those years in which he does not administer the sacrament. It appears, from the third Report of the Church Commission, that the teinds at present in the hands of the Crown are—1st, Bishops' teinds; 2d, The teinds which formerly belonged to the Chapel Royal; and, 3d, The teinds which formerly belonged to the Abbey of Dunfermline. The greater part of the Crown teinds are held under leases, as to which a detailed account is given by the Solicitor of Teinds in the Appendix to the Report.

When teinds which at one time belonged to the Crown as bishops' teinds have been disposed to a subject, they lose the privilege of being postponed in the order of allocation of stipend; Common Agent in Prestonkirk Locality v. Fergusson, Nov. 14, 1846, 9 D. 61. Where an inhibition of teinds is not acted on, and the tack-duty is accepted after the inhibition has been used, the inhibition is held to be extinguished, and tacit relocation to have taken place; Solicitor of Tithes v. Earl of Fife, Dec. 4, 1799, F. C. See also the case of the Lord Advocate v. Skene, March 15, 1860, 22 D. 927. See generally, on the subject of teinds, Connell on Tithes; *Ersk. Teller. See the form of a bond with cautioners, by the cashier or teller of a bank, in Jurid. Styles, ii. 61.

Temple-Lands. Temple-lands were originally the property of the Knights-Templars, an order which existed from 1128 to 1312, when their lands were variously disposed of. The exemption from tithe which attached to those lands, while in possession of the knights, adhered to them long after. *Bank. Temporality. The temporality of benefices, consists in such lands or other property (except tithes, manses and glebes) as may have accrued to the Church by gifts to, or purchases by, its members as such, and not tantum quilibet. It is opposed to the spirituality, and has been annexed to the Crown. 1587, c. 29; *Ersk. Tenant. In Scotland, the term tenant is used only for the lessee or party to whom a lease is granted. But in England, a tenant is any one who holds or possesses lands or tenements, by any kind of title, either in fee, for life, for years, or at will. A tenant in dower is the possessor of lands in virtue of her dower; a tenant in mortgage is a possessor of lands by a mortgage, &c. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Tender. In an action of damages, a tender is a judicial offer made by the defender, of a specific sum in name of damages and of expenses down to the date of the tender. A tender is usually made in a separate minute or other writing, and need not be expressed according to any particular formula. All that is necessary is that it should contain a distinct offer of a specific sum in name of damages, along with the pursuer's expenses up to the date of the tender; with a proviso, that in the event of the tender being rejected, and the case going to trial, the pursuer is not to be entitled to read the tender to the jury, or to found on it as evidence at the trial. The effect of a tender in freeing a defender from liability for the subsequent expenses is stated in the article Expenses, p. 409. See also Macfarlane's Jury Prac. p. 289.

Tenendas; is that clause of a charter by which the particular tenure, e. g. feu-holding, is expressed; Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 16; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 24; Bank. i. 548, 688; Bell's Princ. § 761; Bell on Leases, i. 22; Bell on Purchaser's Title, 278; Brown's Synop. p. 2359; Ross's Lect. ii. 159, 290. Terce; is one of the two legal liferents known in the law of Scotland; being a real right constituted without either covenant or sasine, whereby a widow, who has not accepted of any special provision, is entitled to the liferent of one-third of the heritage in which her husband died infeft, provided the marriage has endured for year and day, or has produced a living child. By the act 1681, c. 10, it is declared, that wherever a particular provision is granted by a husband to his wife, either in an antenuptial or post-nuptial contract of marriage, or in any other deed, the wife shall be thereby excluded from her terce, unless the contrary be expressly provided in the contract of marriage, or other deed containing the provision. This liferent can be affected by such burdens only as affect the husband's sasine, and bears no more than its proportion of any burden affecting the estate. Custom has excluded from the terce the mansion-house, where only one exists, burdens by reservation, rights of reversion, superiority and patronage, leases, feu-duties and burgage tenements. Lesser terce is that which is due out of lands still burdened with terce to the widow of the former proprietor, and is therefore one-third of the remaining two-thirds, but extends to a complete third on the death of the former tercer. Where a husband has disposed property in which he stands infeft, but dies before the disponee has taken infeftment, the widow's terce will form a burden on the property so disposed, since the disposer was not feudally divested of it during his life; and this rule holds, even although, before the dissolution of the marriage, the disponee should have attained actual possession; M'Culloch, 10th July 1788, Mor. p. 15,866. And the same principle applies to the courtesy; Bell on Purchaser's Title, p. 353. Although the husband's infeftment of fee at the time of his death is said to be the measure of the widow's terce, yet, if the infeftment be reduced on account of informalities in making up the titles, the widow's claim to her terce will, notwithstanding, be good in questions with her husband's representatives. The terce is diminished by all real burdens completed by infeftment before the husband's death. And, in a case in which a husband, a short time before his death, feued out the greater part of his estate by a single transaction, at a feu-duty greatly beyond its agricultural rent, it was nevertheless held, that the widow's right of terce did not extend to the feu-duties, but only to the rent of the land unfeued; Nisbet, Feb. 24, 1835, 13 S. & D. 517. No widow is entitled to her terce until she is regularly kened to it. See Kenning to Terce. Term; in judicial procedure, is a certain time fixed by authority of a Court, within which a party is allowed to establish by evidence his averment. If he fails to do so, at its expiration the term may be circumvented against him at the desire of his opponent. But he will get a second term, or a prerogation of the first, on showing cause, and paying such previous expense as shall be modified at the time. Stair, B. iv. tit. 43, § 6, et seq.; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825. See Circumvention.

Terms Legal and Conventional. The term is the day at which rent or interest is payable. Terms are either legal or conventional. The legal terms are Whitsunday, the 15th of May, and Martinmas, the 11th of November. Conventional terms are any terms agreed upon between the contracting parties. When the conventional are later than the legal terms, the rent is called backhand rent; when they are earlier, it is called forehand rent. See Forehand Rent. The terms at which rent is payable determine the period at which they are in bonis of the landlord, and therefore are of importance in settling the interests of heirs and executors, of liferenters and fiars, and of purchasers. In questions between fiar and liferenter, the conventional terms are not taken into account. These terms depend upon the special agreement between the landlord and tenant, and have no reference to the continuance of the liferenter's right. Thus, it may be agreed between the liferenter and his tenants, that they shall pay for the crop of one year at a certain term in the preceding year. This agreement does not affect the fiar, who is entitled to the rent of the year during which he is proprietor of the subject. Such questions, therefore, are settled by reference to the crops sown or reaped during the respective possessions of the fiar and liferenter. The crop is understood to be fully sown at the term of Whitsunday, and to be reaped at the term of Martinmas. Supposing the year, therefore, to run from Martinmas to Martinmas, if the liferenter survive the intervening Whitsunday, he is entitled to half the rent payable for the crop of that year: if he survive the succeeding Martinmas, he is entitled to the whole of the rent; Kames' Elucid. pp. 60 and 61; Carnegie, July 24, 1668, M. 15,887. Questions between heir and executor are settled by reference to what has arisen, or what has yet to arise from the land; the executors taking all the former, the heir all the latter, as accessory to the land. Rent in arrear at the ancestor's death goes to augment the moveable estate; and in determining the time at which it falls in arrear, a distinction is taken. Where the conventional term is earlier than the legal term, the conventional term is taken as the criterion for determining when the rent is in bonis of the landlord; where it is later, the legal term is taken as the rule. Thus, if the tenant enter at Martinmas, or at the separation of the crop in the year 1859, and bind himself to pay the rent for the year 1859-60, half at Martinmas 1859, and half at Whitsunday 1860, and if the landlord survive Whitsunday 1860, the executors will be entitled to the whole rent for the year 1859-60; whereas, if the legal term were adopted, they would only be entitled to half the rent. This doctrine was established in the case of Marquis of Queensberry v. Montgomery, Feb. 18, 1814, F. C. On the other hand, the landlord transmits to his executors the rent legally due at Whitsunday, although not conventionally due till the Martinmas succeeding; Innes, Nov. 13, 1822, 2 S. & D. 3. In this way, the executors derive all the benefit of the anticipation, while they do not suffer by the postponement of the term. These rules are now too well established to be easily shaken. But it would appear more consonant to principle, that the conventional terms should either be invariably adopted, or not at all. The legal terms of payment in an ordinary lease have been extended to leases of grass farms, although in such leases Whitsunday, and not Martinmas, is the usual term of entry. Although, therefore, the tenant enter at Whitsunday 1859, and pay his rent by equal proportions at Martinmas 1859 and Whitsunday 1860, yet, should the landlord survive Martinmas 1859, it is held that his executors are entitled to the rent payable not only at that term, but also at the Whitsunday succeeding; Johnson, Feb. 1727, M. 15,913; Elliot, Nov. 28, 1792, M. 15,917; Swinton, June 20, 1809, F. C., and other cases cited in Bell's Illust. ii. 234. The analogy of grass farms, again, has been extended to dwelling-houses; and it was found that the rent payable at the term succeeding the landlord's death is in bonis of him at the time of his death; Binny, Jan. 28, 1820, F. C. It appears from a note of Professor Bell's (Illust. ii. 235), that in this case there were gardens attached to the houses, which suggested the analogy of grass farms; but in a subsequent case the same decision was pronounced, where the question turned purely upon the right to the rents of dwelling-houses; King, Jan. 24, 1828, 6 S. & D. 422. The interest of moveable bonds is held to fall due de die in diem. The interest of heritable bonds, on the other hand, on account of the analogy which it bears to the rents of heritages, falls due only at the terms at which it is payable. In settling the rights of heir and executor, the conventional terms are adopted as the rule; and the interest payable at the term preceding the ancestor's death is alone held to be in bonis of him; the interest payable at the succeeding term goes to his heir; Murray Kynynmond, Nov. 6, 1739, M. 5415; Lord Daer, Feb. 27, 1740, 5 Brown's Supp. 695; Elch. voce Herit. and Mov. 11. The legal terms for payment of stipend, which regulate the claims of the family of a minister, are Whitsunday and Michaelmas, not Martinmas; because the stipend is understood to come from the tithes, which ought to have been drawn at Michaelmas; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 54. See Minister. Ann. For the terms of removing, see Removing. Warning. And generally, on the subject of this article;

By the Apportionment Act, 4 and 5 Will. IV. c. 22, 1854, all rents, annuities, and other payments, made payable and coming due at fixed periods, under any instrument executed after the passing of the act, fall to be apportioned in such manner that, on the death of the party interested in the rents, &c., his executors or assignees are entitled to a proportion of them according to the time which may have elapsed from the commencement or last period of payment thereof, subject to all just allowances and deductions in respect of charges on the rents, &c. This statute was found applicable to Scotland; Bridges v. For-dyce, March 7, 1844, 6 D. 968; affirmed, Feb. 23, 1846, 6 Bell, 1.

In the application of this statute it has been held that the representatives of a landlord, who died after the term of Whitsunday, are entitled at common law to one half of the year's rent, and under the statute to the proportion accruing between the term of Whitsunday and the date of his death. See the case of Campbell v. Campbell's Assignees, July 18, 1849, 11 D. 1426; and also the case of Blaikie v. Farquharson, July 18, 1849, 11 D. 1456.

Terræ Dominicales; in old charters and infestments, "maines, or domaine lands, laboured and occupied by the proprietor." Skene, h. t.

Territorial Jurisdiction; was at one time universal, but, becoming formidable, was repeatedly discouraged by different acts, as 1455, c. 43 and 44, and 1 Geo. I. c. 50; and by 20 Geo. II. c. 43, all heritable jurisdictions, whether of barony, regality, sheriffship, stewardry, or any other, were abolished or annexed to the Crown, with the exception of those of admiralty, and an insignificant jurisdiction reserved to barons; so that almost all jurisdiction is now personal. Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 12. See Jurisdiction. Heritable Jurisdiction.

Territory of a Judge; is the district over which his jurisdiction extends in causes and in judicial acts proper to him, and beyond which he has no judicial authority; Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, §§ 3, 15, et seq.; Kames' Equity, 473. See Jurisdiction. Judges. Justices of the Peace.

Test Act. See Oath.

which the granter appoints an executor—that is, a person to administer his moveable estate after his death, for behoof of all who may be interested in it—and of which the other clauses, if any, relate exclusively to moveables, and do not operate till the death of the granter. A testament may thus consist merely of the nomination of an executor, or it may contain, along with such a nomination, clauses bequeathing, in the form of legacies, either the whole or part of the moveable estate. A deed, containing legacies without the nomination of an executor, is not strictly termed a testament, but a codicil. In its more common meaning, however, a testament is a declaration of what a person wills to be done with his moveable estate after his death. Any person has power to execute an effectual testament, who is of sound judgment at the time, although he be labouring under bodily sickness, or even be on deathbed. A wife has power to test without the consent of her husband; a minor without the consent of his curators; and a person interdicted without that of his interdictors. A pupil, however, has not the power to test, nor an idiot, nor a furious person in his furiosity. Neither, as the law formerly stood, had a bastard this power, except in favour of his lawful issue, unless he had obtained letters of legitimation; but by the act 6 Will. IV. c. 22, it is declared to be lawful "to bastards or natural children domiciled in Scotland, to dispose of their moveable estates by testament or last will, in like manner as other persons belonging to that country may do." See Bastard. A testament is effectual only with regard to the moveable estate of the testator. By such a deed, therefore, one cannot settle heritage, nor even such moveables as are rendered heritable by destination, and are carried by service, as bonds secluding executors, and the like. Even with regard to things strictly moveable, a person cannot effectually dispose by testament of more than that share of them which is termed the dead's part, as a testament which encroaches on the jus relictæ or legitimæ may be reduced at the instance of the widow or children of the testator in so far as they are concerned. See Legitim. Jus Relictæ. A testament, containing the nomination of an executor, or the bequest of a legacy of greater value than L.100 Scots, is not valid, unless it be executed in writing, however small may be the value of the estate to which it relates. See Nuncupative Testament. It must be properly tested and signed before witnesses; but if it be in the testator's own handwriting, witnesses are not required. If the testator cannot write, a single scribe may execute it for him in presence of only two witnesses; and in this case a scribe is authorised to act in place of a notary. In this, as in all other deeds, the intention of the granter must be clearly expressed; and if this be done, a testament will be effectual though not quite formal, especially if it be executed where men of skill in business cannot be had. See Testing Clause. As testaments do not operate till the death of the granter, they may validly be revoked at any time; and a clause declaring them irrevocable is ineffectual. The revocation of a testament may either be express, by the granter executing a writing for that special purpose, or implied by his making a new testament inconsistent with the former. As it is thus always the testament that may have been executed last which is effectual, deeds of this kind have obtained the name of last or latter wills. The effect of a testament is to authorise the Commissary Court to confirm, after the testator's death, the person who has been named executor, in preference to all others who may apply for the office; or, in other words, to empower that person to recover and administer the moveable property of the deceased, for behoof of all interested in it. With regard to the form of confirmation, and the duties and powers of executors, see Confirmation. Executor. Testaments are not of frequent occurrence in modern practice. The reason is, because they relate only to moveables. A person, in executing a will, generally wishes to settle his whole estate, whether heritable or moveable; and there are few cases—at least there are few in which a settlement can be necessary—in which the granter does not possess some heritable property, or may not come to be possessed of it before his death. The ordinary form, therefore, at present, in which settlements are prepared, is one which relates equally to heritage and moveables. *Stair, B. iii. tit. 4, 24, et seq.; tit. 8, § 20, et seq.; B. iv. tit. 3, § 21; More's Notes, p. cccxxviii.; Ersk. Testator; the granter of a testament, or more generally of a legacy.

Testificate; was a solemn written assertion, not on oath, used in judicial procedure, principally for instructing reasons of advocacy, or of suspension, where founded upon matter of fact; although it did not prove in the principal cause. The term is now obsolete. Stair, B. iv. tit. 40, § 3; tit. 42, § 15; tit. 43, § 5.

Testimonia Ponderanda non Numeranda sunt; is a rule applicable to evidence. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 26. See Evidence.

Testing Clause. The testing clause is the technical name given to the clause whereby a formal written deed or instrument is authenticated according to the forms of the law of Scotland. The following is the usual form of that clause: In witness whereof, these presents, consisting of this and the preceding pages, written by I. F. (designing him), on paper duly stamped, are subscribed by the said A. B. (the party), at the day of one thousand eight hundred and years, in presence of these witnesses, P. Q. and R. S. (designing them). A. B.

P. Q., witness.

R. S., witness.

Of the particulars mentioned in this form, some are statutory, and some merely consuetudinary requisites. Thus the name and designation, or addition, of the writer,—the mention of the number of pages of which the deed consists,—and the names and designations of the witnesses, are statutory requisites. On the other hand, the attestation that the deed has been subscribed, and the mention of the date and place of subscribing, are consuetudinary requisites, the want of which would not annul the deed. Where marginal notes or additions have been made, or where parts of the deed have been erased or deleted, the name of the writer of the marginal note, as well as the extent and number of the erasures, must also be mentioned in the testing clause; and although it is not necessary that the whole deed should have been written by the same person, yet, where more persons than one have been engaged in that operation, the full name and designation of each writer must be inserted in the testing clause, and the portion written by each distinctly specified; all those particulars partaking of the character of statutory requisites. It is a frequent although a dangerous practice, not to fill up the testing clause at the date of executing the deed. It is not, however, illegal to delay filling up the testing clause, as that may be done at any time before the deed is judicially founded upon, or put on record. With regard to the witnesses to the deed, they must be of the male sex, and above fourteen years of age; they ought to know the party, and to see him subscribe, or be present when he acknowledges his subscription; and, in the latter case, they ought, immediately after the acknowledgment, to add their subscriptions as witnesses. This is not necessary, however, where witnesses have seen the party subscribe; for in that case two witnesses may witness all the subscriptions, however numerous, and although adhibited on different days; and at last by subscribing once, respectively, as witnesses, they may attest the various subscriptions which they have witnessed. See Instrumentary Witnesses.

Subscription by initials is effectual, if it be admitted or proved to be the common method in which the party subscribes. But subscription by a cross or mark is altogether invalid; and, in general, it is the safer practice in deeds of importance, to avoid subscription by initials, and in that case, as well as where the party cannot write, to resort to notarial subscription. A witness who subscribes by initials seems to be wholly inadmissible, since whatever may be the case with regard to a party, there can be no occasion for choosing a witness who cannot subscribe his name in the usual manner.

Where notarial subscription is resorted to, the testing clause of the deed is written out as if the deed were to be subscribed by the party himself, and then the notaries add a doquet, certifying the directions received by them from the party, and the reason of his not subscribing himself. The doquet also states that the maker of the deed touched the pen, in token of the authority conferred on the notaries. Two notaries and four witnesses are required. The notaries sign in presence of each other as notaries and co-notaries; and a deed so executed is held in law to be as valid as if it were signed by the party himself.

In the case where the grantor of the deed is blind, the safest practice seems to be, to read over the deed to him, in presence of the notaries and witnesses; for, in such a case, it seems the better course to have the blind person's deed signed by notaries; although, in the recent case of Lord Fife, as decided in the House of Lords, 17th July 1823, where a deed by a blind person had not been so subscribed, it was held that the signature of the blind person does not require to be attested by notaries by the statute 1579, but that if it be attested, in the usual manner, by two witnesses, it is in law a probative deed, which lays upon the party challenging it the onus probandi that the witnesses did not know the party, or see him subscribe, or hear him acknowledge his subscription; and that the party did not know the contents of the deed when he subscribed it. It was farther held in that case, that it is not a solemnity required by law that the deed should be read over to the blind person at the time of the execution, or at any other time; and that, if such deed be duly executed and attested, the party's knowledge of the contents is presumed, until the contrary be proved. Where a party not totally blind had executed a deed by notaries, as if he had been blind, it was held in a reduction that the deed was valid, although, at its date, the party could subscribe his name, and was in the practice of subscribing writings requiring his signature; Raid, 19th Dec. 1837, 16 D. Testaments are so far favoured instruments, that if the testator cannot write, a single notary may execute the testament for him, in presence of only two witnesses; and, in that case, a clergyman is authorised to act in place of a notary; *Ersk. In the case of Thomson v. M'Crimmon's Trustees, Feb. 1, 1856, 18 D. 470, affirmed 24th March 1859, it was held that the direction in the act 1696, c. 15, that "in deeds written bookways every page be marked by the number, first, second, &c." is imperative, and a deed written on seven pages, and described in the testing clause to be written on "this and the six preceding pages," was held invalid, because the pages were not marked in terms of the statute. On appeal, this judgment was affirmed. By the act 19 and 20 Vict. c. 89, 1856, the above provision of the act 1696 is abolished.

Thanns; a name of dignity, supposed to be equal in rank to the son of an earl, because the cro or satisfaction was the same for the death of both. Thannagium regis, a part of the king's lands, governed by a person thence called Thane. Thane was likewise a servant; and "unter thane," an inferior servant or subject; Skene, h. 1.

Theft; is the intentional and clandestine taking away of the property of another, from its legitimate place of deposit, or other locus tenendi, with the knowledge that it is another's, and the belief that he would not consent to its abstraction, and with the intention of never restoring it to the owner. The distinction between the infang thief, or one taken while yet in sight, or with the manour, and the outfang thief, is now done away. But the present law makes a distinction between trifling theft, called pickery, which is punishable with corporal punishment, imprisonment in Bridewell, or fine, and theft properly so called. Simple theft has never been, by the law of Scotland, punishable capitally, unless aggravated. As, 1st, Theft by landed men, formerly punished as treason, but now not an aggravated theft. 2d, Theft under trust, if of a black description. 3d, Theft of the majora animalia, among which children are included. Sheep-stealing is made capital by statute; but capital punishment is not inflicted for the theft of one sheep only. The theft of a single horse or ox is punishable with death. 4th, Theft, to a great extent; although, in smaller cases, the value of the articles stolen merely regulates the degree of minor punishment. 5th, Theft, by one habit and repute a thief; a qualification to be established either by three registered convictions for theft, or by concurrent testimony, without exception, of those who have the best causa scientiæ, that the character and associates of the panel are thievish and disreputable. But if the principal charge is not proved, no conviction can follow on a proof of habit and repute; nor can it aid in the proof of the principal charge. 6th, Three acts of theft proved at once. 7th, Theft by breaking lockfast places. See Lockfast Places. 8th, Theft by housebreaking, which may be committed by unlawfully getting in by the usual place of entry in an unusual way (e.g. by force), or by simply going in or abstracting by an unusual access, or by effractio when already in the house. The crime is completed in all cases but the last, simply by removing from its place any article in the house. A house is understood to mean every tenement above a cart-shed, hen-house, or the like, if ever occupied. Housebreaking of itself is not indictable as such, but when coupled with intent to steal is subject to an arbitrary punishment. See Housebreaking. 9th, Theft to the amount of ten shillings from a bleaching green (18 Geo. II. c. 27), in punishing which, however, the judge has a discretionary power; and theft from the Post-Office, mail, or post-bags, also by statute, was formerly capital, but is now punishable with transportation for life. See Post-Office Offences. The High Court of Justiciary is alone competent to convict capitally for theft. Theft-Bote; is the crime of taking a reward from a thief to shelter him from justice, or of compounding with him, which was once punishable in private persons as theft, and in magistrates, &c., with death; 1515, c. 2; 1436, c. 137. Things; are objects of law, only in so far as rights in regard to them exist. They are, 1st, Things common, or the res communes of the Romans, which belong to all alike, as air, running water, wild animals, and unappropriated ground in countries where the sovereign is not held the proprietor. The sea, however, and its shores within water-mark, are common merely for the purposes of navigation, and in other respects belong to the community. 2d, Things public, res publicæ, which are common, not to the whole world, but to the estate or community, as navigable rivers, highways, harbours, bridges. With us, though their use is common, they are inter regalia, the sovereign being head of the State, and their use is often turned to profit. There are other things which fall to the Queen, not in her character of guardian of the State, but according to the maxim, Quæ nullius sunt, cedunt dominæ reginæ; such are game, royal fish, treasure trove, &c., many of which belong now to donataries. 3d, Things styled res universitatis, belonging to some lawful corporation or society, as a burgh, an hospital, &c., of which the use is with the individual members, and the property with the managers for the time; 1491, c. 36. 4th, Things sacred, called res nullius, because juris divini, of which there were a great variety under the Roman and Papal laws, but which have been unknown in Scotland since the Reformation, except in so far as they are extra commercium while sacredly employed, and as their price, when they are sold, is usually applied to some similar purpose. The heritors and inhabitants of a parish have a quasi right of property in them, e.g. in the seats, and area, and burying-ground of a church; and private burial-grounds are juris privati, and may be sold either separately or with the proprietor's other lands. See Burying-Place. Things are also moveable, such as pass constantly from hand to hand; or immovable, i. e. the soil or houses, or things not separable, or not separated from the soil. Things have also been divided into corporeal, i. e. the ipsa corpora, and incorporeal, i. e. rights; but if refinement is to be carried thus far, it will be found that the sole property in things consists in the right to receive or to use them. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 5, et seq.; Bank. B. i. tit. 3, § 1, et seq. See the different articles under Res.

Thirlds. At one period, before the annexation of the year 1587, the king, in order to prevent the entire abstraction of their provisions from the acting clergy, and after other measures had proved ineffectual, assumed into his own hands a third of the revenues of all ecclesiastical benefices, which he intrusted to the Commissioners of Plat (1567, c. 10), who assigned to the ministers respectively sufficient provisions, and reserved the remainder for the king. Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, § 164; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 17; Hutch. Just. ii. 427. See Teinds.

Thirlage; is that servitude by which the proprietors or other possessors of lands are bound to carry the grain produced on them to a particular mill to be ground, for payment of the duties specified in the conveyance or other writing whereby the servitude is constituted. The principal duty is multure, consisting of a proportion varying from about one-thirtieth to about one-twelfth of the grain carried, or of the flour made, deliverable to the miller or other possessor of the mill under the proprietor, or to the proprietor or superior himself. The smaller duties of knaveship, bannock, lock and gowpen, called sequels, fall to the servants of the mill, according to the particular usage of each mill. The astricted lands are called the thirl or sucken, their possessors suckeners, and the multures which they pay insucken multures, in contradistinction to those paid by voluntary employers not thirled, called outsucken multures, and in general not nearly so much above the real value of the labour of grinding as the insucken, being commonly every twenty-fourth peck only. Thirlage is constituted by writing, directly or indirectly: Directly, 1st, By the proprietor thirling his tenants to his mill, which, however, requires the written or the tacit consent of these tenants. 2^d, By his expressly reserving the thirlage of lands conveyed by him, even where the purchaser is to hold of his author's superior; for a proprietor need not be superior of all lands thirled. 3^d, By the proprietor of a mill conveying it with the multures of formerly astricted lands, by implication and per expressum along with the multures of his own lands; which multures, however, can apply neither to lands in his own cultivation, nor to tithes, if not his own as purchaser or titular, even though acquired by himself posterior to the conveyance. Indirectly, By the lands in question being part of a barony; with these exceptions, that though the mill of the barony be made over as such, yet the expression, with multures used and wont, conveys merely the former thirlage; and that, if the baron, before his conveying the mill cum astrictis multuris, had feued part of the barony to another for a reddendo, pro omni alio onere, and with a clause of multures, though only in the tenendas, the feuar will be exempt from astriction. This is a doctrine which holds a fortiori where there is no erection into a barony. Thirlage, constituted by writing, may either express or not the nature and quantity of grain astricted. In the first case, it is either, 1st, Of omnis grana crescentia (comprehending even barley), with the exception of corn expended in sowing and cultivation, and of grain-rent payable unground, or of victual due to the titular, provided it is not consumed within the thirl, and of feu-duty. 2^d, Of grindable corns, which is interpreted to mean, those corns alone which are ground for use within the thirl (and which the mill is fitted to grind), whether grown or bought with the price of grains grown on the lands, provided the surplus is not ground elsewhere. This second description of thirlage will not prevent a tenant from laying down his lands in grass, provided he do so in bona fide. 3^d, Of invecta et illata, meaning all grain brought within the thirl that tholes fire or water therein, an expression which does not mean baking and brewing. This thirlage is imposed generally on burghs and villages. Thirlage may thus become twice exigible on the same corn; but where the two mills belong to one and the same proprietor, he cannot demand the multure twice over. In indefinite thirlage, the easiest is presumed where usage has not otherwise fixed it. Thirlage cannot be acquired by the long prescription alone (as other servitudes are) without some title, however irregular, except in mills belonging to the queen in property, jure coronæ, or to churchmen (A. S. Dec. 16, 1812), in whose favour thirty years' possession operates; and in dry multures, i. e. a yearly payment fixed in money or grain, whether the tenant grind his grain at the mill or not. But the kind and quantum, both of multures and sequels, and of services, may be fixed by prescription alone. Interruption for less than a year will not stop this prescription. Thirlage is extinguished for the time by the ruin of the mill, and permanently by discharge, or sixty years' exemption, and could not be constituted by a voluntary grinding of corn at the mill, although immemorably practised. Two distinct actions are competent to one having a right of thirlage—viz., a declarator of astriction, and an action of abstracted multures. The former is resorted to where the right of thirlage is denied, and the action must be raised in the Court of Session; the latter where, without disputing the right, the mulcture is illegally abstracted. This last action may be raised before the Judge Ordinary. (See Abstracted Multures.) The act 39 Geo. III. c. 55, enables the proprietor of astricted lands, or of the mill, to petition the Judge Ordinary for commutation of the thirlage. In the consequent action, all concerned must be called; and the parties having stated, on the one hand the nature and extent of, and on the other the claims of deduction from, the servitude, the Judge Ordinary, subject to the review of the Court of Session, pronounces on the relevancy, and then pronounces an interlocutor, calling a jury to whom to refer the matter. Twenty-one heritors to the extent of L.30 Scots of valued rent, or tenants paying L.30 sterling yearly of rent, both within the county, must be called as jurymen to a certain day and place; and the proprietor of the mill commencing, each party strikes off one alternately until nine are left. This jury, after considering the evidence (taken in writing), the application, pleadings and decree on the relevancy, fix the annual payment and the kinds of grain which they deem a compensation for every restriction or prestation of the thirlage. An abbreviate of their verdict must, within sixty days, be recorded in the General or Particular Register of Sasines; and after three years from this recording, the verdict is safe from all review. Threatening Letters. By the law of England, as fixed by various statutes, the offence of knowingly sending any letter without a name, or with a fictitious name, demanding money or any other valuable commodity, or threatening (without any demand) to kill or murder, or to set fire to the house, or the like, is felony without benefit of clergy. Those statutes do not extend to Scotland; but by our common law, such offences are punishable arbitrarily, and have been punished by pillory and transportation for life. Hume, i. 434, et seq.; Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Shaw's Digest, p. 149.

Timber, Growing. Questions regarding the right to use growing timber may occur between the fiar and the liferenter, the landlord and tenant, and between the heir in possession under an entail and the next substitute. A liferenter may take any timber which is necessary to maintain the houses and other erections on the estate in proper repair; but he must give notice to the fiar before cutting it. Beyond this, the liferenter has no right to cut timber, unless it be such as grows again after being cut, or unless it be laid out in lots for annual cutting, when it is regarded as part of the crop. See Liferent. Sylva Cadua. Woods are reserved to the landlord ex lege. And even a lease of lands with "woods" gives only the power of cutting wood for repairing or building houses upon the ground, but not of selling or otherwise disposing of the wood. The tenant in such a lease may cut willows when young, as a crop, but he is not entitled to cut willow trees of a large size. A tenant selling or destroying the timber on his farm, renders himself liable to a claim of damages, or to certain statutory forfeitures. See Planting and Inclosing. An heir in possession under an entail is entitled to cut the timber as long as his possession lasts. In one case, in which an heiress of entail, who was eighty years of age, quarrelled with the next heir, and advertised a sale of all the planted timber on the estate, the Court refused to grant an interdict, although the heir offered the value of the whole if preserved; Hamilton v. Viscountess of Oxford, Feb. 16, 1757, M. 15,408. The Court have, in a few instances, granted interdict against the sale of unripe timber, or ornamental timber, necessary to the amenity of the mansion-house; but it has been remarked that it requires a strong case to authorise judicial interference. An heir of entail in possession cannot give a right to cut timber to last beyond his own life. The destruction or injuring of growing timber has been prohibited by different acts, as 1535, c. 11; 1698, c. 16; 1 Geo. I. c. 48; 6 Geo. III. c. 48; under various penalties, as fine, imprisonment, and by the first, even death; and in particular the act 1698, c. 16, ordains tenants and cottars to preserve the growing wood on their farms, imposes fines on them for injuries to it, and makes them liable for the acts of their household. Timbria; or timmer of skins; an old Scotch mercantile term, signifying so much money as is "included within twa broddes of timmer," which was commonly forty skins; for in this way merchants used to bring home "martrik, sable, and other costly skins and furrings." Skene, h. t.

Tinsel of the Feu; is an irritancy incident to every feu-right, by the failure to pay the feu-duty for two years whole and together. It was established by the act 1597, c. 246. This is a penal irritancy, and therefore requires to be declared by an action; and if the vassal appear at any time before decree be pronounced, and pay the arrears, the irritancy will be discharged. There is sometimes an irritancy stipulated in the charter; and where such a clause is inserted, it was formerly the practice to allow the irritancy to take place, without the necessity of a declarator. But by the present practice, even where the statutory irritancy is fortified by a conventional irritancy, a decree of declarator of the irritancy is required, and the irritancy may be purged in the course of the action by payment of the arrear. Tinsel of Superiority; is a remedy introduced by statute for unentered vassals, whose superiors are themselves uninfest, and therefore cannot effectually enter them; 1474, c. 58. In such a case, the vassal must charge the superior to obtain himself infest in the superiority, within forty days, under certification that, if he fail, he shall "lose the tenant for his lifetime," i. e. lose the casualties that may fall to him through the act or delinquency of the vassal, besides making up the damage sustained through his failure. Mackenzie (in Observ. on 1474, c. 58) mentions an Act of Sederunt interpreting "for his lifetime" to mean the superior's lifetime. But no such Act of Sederunt now exists, and it has been assumed that the forfeiture is for the vassal's life; Dickson, 1st July 1802, M. 15,024. See the forms of a summons of declarator of tinsel of superiority, and of a horning on it, in Jurid. Styles, iii. 182, 758. Title to Exclude. In an action of reduction, a title to exclude is a title in the defender preferable to that on which the pursuer founds. A title to exclude must be pleaded before taking a day to satisfy the production. A title to exclude may be sufficient, though it be part of the titles called for to be reduced; and if sufficient, it must be reduced before the pursuer can insist for a further production. If it be insufficient, the defender cannot produce a farther title to exclude. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 23; Shand's Prac. See Reduction.

Title to Pursue. There must be, at the raising of every summons, an active title in the pursuer, and a passive title in the defender, either express or implied. An active title, which may be either original or by process, ought to be produced along with the summons; but accessory titles may be made up cum processu. The passive title means a capability to be decerned to pay, perform, suffer, permit, or not repugn. Stair, B. iv. tit. 38, § 18, et seq.; B. iv. tit. 39, §§ 17, 18; Bank. B. iv. tit. 23, § 20; Bell's Com. i. 742; ii. 258, 359, 583 et seq., 685; Bell's Princ. § 1268; Illust. ib.; *Kames' Stat. Titles to Land. Titles to land are the deeds and instruments by which lands are held, whether in fee, in liferent, or in security. Lands may be held either of the granter of the conveyance or of his superior. If they are conveyed to be held of the granter, a new or original right is created. The granter remains the vassal of his superior, and becomes the superior of the grantee. If the lands are conveyed to be held of the granter's superior, the feudal relation of superior and vassal between the granter and superior ceases on the grantee being entered with the superior. No new right is created, but the right formerly held by the granter is transmitted to the grantee to be held by him under a new investiture in his favour. Conveyances of lands, however, are most usually granted with a double manner of holding. The infeftment following upon such a conveyance imports a holding of the granter until it has been confirmed by the superior. After confirmation, the character of a new or original right flies off, or is absorbed in the higher right holding of the over-superior. The right constituted by such conveyance is the same as if it had been granted under a conveyance with an a me holding merely. A charter confirming an a me holding, or a charter of resignation, by which lands which have been resigned by the proprietor to the superior in favour of any one are again given out by him to such person, are termed charters by progress, in contradistinction to original charters, where the feudal relation is constituted for the first time. Similar in their nature to charters by progress, in some respects, are precepts granted by a superior in favour of the heir of the last vassal. They are renewals of the last investiture in favour of the heir of the investiture. There is, however, this material distinction between charters by progress and precepts in favour of an heir, that in the case of charters by progress a new investiture is granted, while in the case of a precept to an heir no new investiture is granted, but only the former investiture renewed in the person of the heir entitled to succeed under it.

Recent legislation has very much simplified titles to land. In 1833 a commission was appointed to inquire into various legal matters, including the completion and transference of heritable rights. Their third report, which relates exclusively to this subject, was made in 1838. The first change following upon this report was made in 1845. Two acts were passed in that year, the Heritable Securities Act and the Infeftment Act.

Heritable Securities Act of 1845.—By the first of these acts, 8 and 9 Vict. c. 35, where an heritable security had been constituted by infeftment, the right of the creditor might be transferred, in whole or in part, by a short form of assignation; and the assignation, being duly recorded in the Register of Sasines, was declared equivalent to a disposition of the security, followed by an instrument of sasine duly recorded, according to the previous law and practice. The title of an heir to an heritable security was allowed to be completed by a writ of acknowledgment recorded in the Register of Sasines, and granted in his favour by the person duly infeft, of whom the security was held. Adjudgers of heritable securities were allowed to complete their title by recording in the same register the abbreviate of adjudication; and heirs duly served, and general disponees, were allowed to complete their titles by notarial instruments, duly recorded in the same register. The security might be renounced or discharged by a short form of discharge duly registered.

The Infeftment Act.—By the second of these acts, 8 and 9 Vict. c. 35, the ceremony of giving sasine on lands not held in burgage tenure was declared unnecessary, and a recorded instrument of sasine was made to have the same effect as if sasine had been taken and the instrument of sasine had been duly recorded, according to the previous law and practice.

In 1847, four acts were passed by which various other changes were effected.

Transference of Land Act.—By the act 10 and 11 Vict. cc. 48 and 49, the transference of land was much simplified. The first of these acts applied to lands not held in burgage tenure, and the second to lands that were so held. Many of the clauses used in the conveyances of lands were greatly shortened, and conditions of entail were allowed to be referred to, if already appearing in the Register of Entails or in the Register of Sasines. In the same manner real burdens were also allowed to be referred to, if already appearing in the latter of these registers. Superiors were obliged to grant entries by confirmation as well as by resignation, and charters of confirmation were made to imply a general confirmation of all title-deeds of the lands. Precepts of clare constat were declared not to fall by the death of the granter. Various provisions were also introduced for enabling a vassal, by judicial process, to obtain an entry where the superior's title was incomplete, and superiors might judicially relinquish their rights of superiority. General and special and general special charges were abolished, and actions of constitution were made equivalent to general charges; and actions of adjudication, following upon decrees of constitution, in the case of an ancestor's debts, or against an heir for his own debt, were made equivalent to special or general special charges, as the circumstances of the case required. Decrees of adjudication and of sale were allowed to contain a warrant for infeftment, with a double manner of holding.

Burgage Tenure Act.—Similar provisions, in so far as applicable, were introduced by the act 10 and 11 Vict. c. 49, in regard to land held in burgage tenure, and the ceremony of taking infeftments in burgage subjects was dispensed with.

Heritable Securities Act of 1847.—The previous act of 8 and 9 Vict. c. 31, 1845, related only to the transmission of heritable securities already constituted by infeftment. The act 10 and 11 Vict. c. 50, 1847, related to the constitution as well as to the transmission of heritable securities, and a short form for such securities was given in the schedule to the act. An important distinction, however, was still continued between the constitution of securities over and the constitution of rights of property in land. Although the ceremony of infeftment was dispensed with by the act 8 and 9 Vict. c. 35, an instrument of sasine was still necessary to be expedite, and recorded in the Register of Sasines. An instrument of sasine, however, was dispensed with in the case of the deed of constitution of securities, and the registration of the security itself was made sufficient, in the same way as the registration of an assignation of an heritable security was made sufficient by the act 8 and 9 Vict. c. 31. A sale of the lands over which the security was constituted, by a creditor having the power of sale in his bond and disposition, was declared to be as valid and effectual to the purchaser as if made by the granter of the security himself, although it should have been made after his death. No confirmation of the sale was required, either from him or his heir; and the same was declared to be good, although the debtor in the security, and in right of the land at the time of the sale, should be a pupil or minor, or subject to any legal incapacity. On the creditor who sold the lands consigning in bank the surplus of the price, his disposition to the purchaser was declared to have the effect of completely disencumbering the lands of all securities or diligence posterior to the creditor's bond in security, as well as his own security and diligence.

The benefit of the two Heritable Securities Acts was restricted by their terms to bonds and dispositions in security; but by the act 17 and 18 Vict. c. 12, 1854, it was extended to the constitution, transmission, and extinction of all heritable securities, as well as bonds and dispositions in security.

Crown Charters Act.—By the act 10 and 11 Vict. c. 51, 1847, signatures and precepts from Chancery were abolished, and draft charters and precepts were directed to be lodged with the Presenter of Signatures, and, when revised by him, engrossed in Chancery. The ceremony of resignation in Crown lands was also abolished, and charters of confirmation were allowed to be granted in combination with precepts for infefting heirs. Conditions of entail and real burdens were also allowed to be referred to in charters, in the same manner as had been provided in regard to the transference of land by the act 10 and 11 Vict. c. 48.

Service of Heirs Act.—By the act 10 and 11 Vict. c. 47, the practice of issuing brieves from Chancery for services of heirs was abolished, and services were directed to proceed by petition to the sheriff of the county in certain cases, and in other cases to the Sheriff of Chancery. Where a general service only is intended to be carried through, the petition may be presented to the sheriff of the county within which the deceased had, at the time of his death, his ordinary or principal domicile, or, in the option of the petitioner, to the Sheriff of Chancery; but if the deceased had no domicile within Scotland at the time of his death, the petition must be presented to the Sheriff of Chancery. Where, again, a special service is intended to be carried through, the petition may be presented to the sheriff within whose jurisdiction the lands embraced by the service are situated, or, in the option of the petitioner, to the Sheriff of Chancery; but if the lands are situated in different counties, then the petition must be presented to the Sheriff of Chancery only.

The extract decree of service is declared to have the full legal effect of a service duly returned to Chancery, and to be equivalent to the retour of a service under a brieve of inquest according to the former law and practice.

A decree of special service, besides operating as a retour, has also the operation and effect of a disposition from the party served to the heir served; and the decree is directed to contain a precept of sasine for infeftment of the party served; and infeftment following on the precept is declared to form, along with the decree, as effectual an investiture of the lands holding base from the party served to, until confirmed by the superior, as if such investiture had been created by a disposition from the party served to, with an infeftment following upon it. A decree of special service, however, is declared not to be transmissible for the purpose of infefting the heir or assignee of the person served.

No person is entitled to oppose a service under the act who could not competently appear to oppose a service under a brieve of inquest. Competing petitions may be presented, and in that case the proceedings may be advocated to the Court of Session, for the purpose of having the competition tried by a jury.

A special service is declared not to be equivalent to a general service in the same character except as to the particular lands embraced by it, and not to infer a general representation either active or passive, but to infer only a limited passive representation, the person served being liable for the debts and deeds of the deceased only to the extent of the value of the land embraced by the service. In any petition for special service as heir-of-line or heir-male, the petitioner may also pray for a general service in the same character. A general service may be applied for, and obtained to a limited effect, by annexing to the petition a specification of the lands to which the service is to be limited, and such service infers only a limited passive representation, the person served being liable for the debts and deeds of the deceased only to the value of the land contained in the specification.

Titles to Land Act, 1858.—No farther step was taken for simplifying titles to land till 1858, when the Titles to Land Act was passed. This act applied to absolute titles the principle which had already been applied to security titles. By the act of 1845 heritable securities might be transmitted without infeftment, and by the act of 1847 they might be constituted without infeftment. This principle is extended to all titles to land, by the act of 1858. Instruments of sasine are declared to be no longer necessary, and conveyances themselves are authorised to be recorded in the Register of Sasines, and the recording of a conveyance is made equivalent to a recorded instrument of sasine. Where it is not wished to record the whole of the conveyance, a notarial instrument is allowed to be expedé, setting forth those portions of the deed by which the lands were conveyed, in which a real right is desired to be completed. Instruments of resignation ad remanentiam are also dispensed with, and the recording of the procuratory held to be sufficient. In order to shorten the descriptions of lands in conveyances, it is made competent to refer to descriptions contained in previously recorded writs, and also to comprehend under one general name separate lands conveyed by the same deed, and to refer in future deeds to the general name, as including the several lands comprehended under it. The simplification of titles is also extended to charters. Instead of long charters of confirmation and resignation, containing descriptions of the lands, with all the burdens imposed upon them by the deed of conveyance, as well as containing the tenendas and reddendo of the original charter, short writs of confirmation and resignation, written upon the conveyances themselves, are authorised. Where, however, charters separate from the conveyance are required, it is made competent, instead of inserting the tenendas and reddendo at length, to refer to them as set forth in any recorded charter or writ. The writs of clare constat introduced by this act do not direct infeftment to be given to the heir, but merely declare him to be the heir entitled to succeed to the land, to be holden by him in the manner specified in the charter or writ referred to.

The intervention of the Court, in the case of general disponees, is also dispensed with. Instead of bringing an adjudication against the heir of the grantor of the general disposition, and thereafter completing a title by charter of adjudication and sasine, a general disponee is allowed to expedé a notarial instrument, in which the lands belonging to the grantor, and conveyed by the general disposition, but not specially expressed in it, are set forth, and the recording of the instrument in the Register of Sasines completes the title of the general disponee.

In the case of entails, destinations may be referred to in subsequent titles to the entailed estate, instead of being repeated at length; and the clause authorising the recording of an entail in the Register of Tailzies is made to import a prohibition against alienation, contracting debt, and altering the order of succession, in the same manner as by the Entail Act of 1848 it had been made equivalent to the insertion of clauses irritant and resolute.

Judicial factors are authorised to complete their title to the estate placed under their management, by recording in the Register of Sasines the warrant granted by the Court for making up a title—the lands being specified in the judicial warrant. Trustees in a sequestration are allowed to complete their title to the bankrupt's estate by expeding and recording a notarial instrument, setting forth the warrant of confirmation and the lands belonging to the bankrupt.

Simpler modes of extinguishing mid-superiorities are also introduced. The interposition of the Court is no longer necessary to effect this object. A simple relinquishment of the superiority by the superior, followed by an acceptance by the vassal, written on the same deed, and by a short writ of investiture by the over-superior, also written on the same deed, effects the extinction of a mid-superiority.

The period before the lapse of which diligence could not proceed against apparent heirs is altered from a year to six months; and in actions of constitution and adjudication against an apparent heir, on account of his ancestor's debts, for the purpose of attaching his heritable estate, it is declared unnecesary to raise separate summonses of constitution and of adjudication, and the combination of both actions is made competent in one summons, whether he renounced the succession or not.

It is farther declared by the act, that all deeds, writs, and instruments whatever, may be partly written and partly printed or engraved.

Titles to Land Act, 1860.—By the act 23 and 24 Vict. c. 143, the provisions of the Titles to Land Act, 1858, are extended to lands held by burgage tenure, in so far as they were applicable to that mode of tenure. Instruments of sasine, or of resignation and sasine, on any conveyance of land held burgage, are no longer necessary, and the conveyance itself may be recorded instead. An heir in burgage subjects may complete his title by obtaining a writ of clare constat from the magistrates of the burgh, or a decree of special service before the Sheriff of Chancery or before the sheriff of the county within which the burgh is situated, in the same manner as if the land were not held burgage. Such writ of clare constat or decree of special service may be recorded in the appropriate Register of Sasines; and, when so recorded, it has the same effect as if cognition and entry of the heir had taken place, and an instrument of cognition and sasine in his favour had been expedite and recorded according to the former practice.

As some doubt existed in regard to the true meaning and effect of the words "to be holden in the same manner in which the granter of the conveyance held or might have held the same," which words frequently occur in the previous act of 1858, it is declared that these words are to be held to mean that the lands are to be held a me vel de me when the investiture of the lands contains no prohibition against subinfeudation, or against an alternate holding, and a me only when the investiture contains such prohibition. It is provided, however, that where the investiture contains such prohibition, a conveyance of the lands held under such investiture, on which an entry with the superior shall be expedite within twelve months from its date, shall have the same preference in all respects from the date of recording the conveyance in the appropriate Register of Sasines as if it had contained an a me vel de me holding, and as if the investiture had contained no prohibition against subinfeudation or against an alternate holding. At common law, all conveyances requiring to be confirmed by the superior can only rank as real rights from the date of the confirmation. This proviso, therefore, alters the common law principle; and enacts that where the investiture prohibits subinfeudation or an alternative holding, an a me conveyance last recorded but first confirmed shall not have the common law preference over a similar conveyance first recorded but last confirmed, if the confirmation shall have taken place within twelve months from the date of the conveyance.

Farther Simplification of Titles to Land.—Titles to land might still farther be simplified with advantage to the vassal, and without prejudice to the superior. The necessity of recurring to the superior on the vassal's death, and also on every transmission of the land by the vassal, ought to be dispensed with. Such recurrence to the superior ought not to be required, unless it is essential for the protection of the superior's rights. The rights of the superior, however, might be sufficiently protected if the conveyance by the vassal were granted under burden of the whole clauses of the original charter by which the feu was first constituted, or of any subsequent charter by progress, by which it was renewed. For this purpose the charter, as recorded in any public register, or the infestment following upon it, where that was competent, as recorded in the Register of Sasines, ought to be specially referred to in the vassal's conveyance. The party appearing in the Register of Sasines as proprietor should always be held to be the vassal in the lands; and on the death of the last vassal who had paid for an entry, such party should be liable to the superior in payment of a composition, or other casualty, exigible on that event. In this way, if the party appearing on the register was a singular successor in the land, a composition would be due to the superior, and he would not be prevented from demanding it by the heir of the former vassal offering to enter, and so saving the singular successor payment of the composition. An advantage would thus be obtained by the superior. Crown vassals should be authorized to purchase the whole duties payable by them; and on that being done, the recurrence to the Crown on any conveyance by the vassal ought to be dispensed with. A statute authorizing these changes, would complete the simplification of the law of real property in Scotland.

Tradition; is necessary to every conveyance of property where the acquirer has not already the custody or possession. Tradition is either actual, or, where actual is impracticable, symbolical; *Ersk. Traistia; in old law language, a roll or catalogue, containing the particular dittay taken up upon malefactors, which, with the "portuous," was delivered by the Justice-Clerk to the "Crownor," that the persons enumerated in the portuous might be attached, conform to the dittay contained in the traistia, so called because committed to the "traist," faith, and credit of the clerks and crownor. Skene, h. t.

Transaction; is any agreement between two parties tending to the settlement of doubtful and controverted claims. It does not apply, in strictness, to mere contingencies. The sentence of a court, if subject to review, does not exclude it. It may be entered into by any one who can lawfully administer his own affairs, or those of others. It has been observed, that of all agreements, the transaction or arrangement of doubtful rights is the most difficult to set aside; Campbell Stewart, Nov. 22, 1836, 15 D. B. M. 112. Transaction with regard to moveables cannot be proved by witnesses; but acquiescence in an alleged transaction may be inferred from the subsequent conduct of the party, and the facts and circumstances establishing it may be proved by witnesses. Stair, B. i. tit. 17, § 2; Bank. B. i. tit. 23, § 1; Kames' Equity, 181, 365; Tait on Evidence, 303; Tait's Justitia, h. t.; Blair's Justitia, h. t.

Transference; is that step whereby a depending action is transferred from a person deceased to his representative. An action of transference active is rendered unnecessary by 1693, c. 15, the pursuer's representative producing merely his title, viz. retour, confirmed testament, or special assignation. Where the pursuer's representative, however, declines insisting, the defender has a remedy by action precisely similar, with conversion of terms, to the action of transference passive, which remains just as before 1693, and the statutes against the representative of a deceased defender, declining to sist himself. Where the heir is representative, a transference cannot, unless he has intromitted, proceed against him within the tempus deliberandi; but after that the pursuer may then transfer the action passive against him, whether he be seised heir or not, by summons of transference, libelling simply the active and passive title, and the conclusions of the original summons, and proceeding on one diet of six days. It is called and enrolled as an ordinary summons. When an interlocutor of transference in quo has been pronounced, the process is borrowed up and lodged in the principal process, which then proceeds. When defences against the transference are lodged, and a long litigation appears to be likely, it is usual to remit the process of contingentia to the Ordinary in the principal cause. The representative of a defender is entitled to sist himself in the principal cause, though the pursuer oppose his so doing, and be unwilling to proceed with his action. But where the pursuer dies, and his heir does not insist, an action of transference must be raised against him. Where it is doubtful whether the party is the representative of the deceased, a decree of transference is pronounced, naming defences against his liability, and these are discussed in the principal cause. Transferences are competent to inferior judicatory when the representatives reside within their jurisdiction, and the principal cause is in dependence before them. Where the representatives reside in a different jurisdiction, or are furth of the kingdom, the transference must be raised before the Court of Session, and the principal cause advocated at contingentia. The Court of Session cannot grant letters of supplement, so as to give an inferior judge jurisdiction in such circumstances. Where the representatives of a party are furth of Scotland, and have neither heritable nor moveable property in Scotland, no action of transference can be raised against them. In a recent case, in which the opinion of the whole Court was taken, an action had been brought against a foreigner, and jurisdiction founded by arrestment. After the summons was executed, but before it was called in Court, the defender died; and his representative, also a foreigner, not having confirmed the subject previously arrested, and a new arrestment jurisdictionis fundanda having been used, it was held that, although the action was capable of being transferred as a depending action, yet that, in the above circumstances, a transference against the defender's representative was incompetent from want of jurisdiction; Cameron v. Chapman, 9th March 1888. Stair, B. iv. tit. 34; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, §§ 60-1; Ivory's Form of Process, vol. ii. p. 26; *Bank. B. iii. tit. 24, § 64; 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 53; Kames' Stat. Translation of Ministers. The translation of a minister is his removal from one parish to another. When the presentee to a vacant parish is already the minister of another vacant parish, his qualification to Government, and letter of acceptance, must be laid on the presbytery table along with the presentation. If he is already a member of the presbytery, he is afterwards directed to intimate from his pulpit that there is a call to him from another parish, and that it is intended to transport him thither. He is likewise directed to summon such of his parishioners as wish to defend their right to their minister to attend the presbytery when the case is to be heard. He is himself summoned apud acta, or by letter, if he does not happen to be present. If the parish attends, and urges its right to retain its minister, the presbytery judges between it and the competing parish. If no appearance is made on the part of the parish, and if the presbytery be satisfied with the reasons for the transportation, sentence is pronounced, dissolving the relation between the minister and his parish, declaring that parish vacant, and translating him to the other, fixing the day of his admission, and appointing his edict to be served. It is always provided that he continues minister of the one parish until he is admitted minister of the other. If he belong to a different presbytery, the presbytery which has received the presentation and call commissions some of its members to repair to that presbytery, to lay before it the call, and an account of their proceedings, and to request that the presbytery under whose jurisdiction he is will take the necessary steps for effecting his removal. See Hill's Church Prac. 67; Church Law Styles, 91, et seq.; Gillan's Acts of Assembly, 307. According to Bankton, the city of Edinburgh has the privilege of calling what ministers it pleases from all other parishes; Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, § 32. See Minister. Admission. Induction.

Transmission of Penal Action. A penal action transmits against the heir only in quantum lucratus, and that not unless there has been, in the common case, litiscontestation, and, in public crimes, sentence. The heir is liable in restitution or damages for all delinquencies proved during the deceased's life, and in penalties incurred by the deceased's breach of contract, even without any previous action for them. Bank. B. iv. tit. 45, § 70, et seq. See Penal Action.

Transmission of Rights. Some rights are transmissible, such as those of parent and child; others transmissible, but only with the consent of him on whom lies the corresponding obligation; while, in other cases, either the law or the individual possessor may transmit, either directly without consent, or indirectly without requiring consent. Where transmission is practicable, it is that either of a moveable or an heritable right. If of a moveable right, it is either voluntary, as by assignation, or involuntary (i.e. by legal diligence), as by arrestment or poiniding. If of an heritable right, it is also either voluntary, as by disposition, or involuntary, as by adjudication. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 7. See Feudal System. Disposition. Assignation. Adjudication. Poiniding. Charter. Heritable and Moveable. Superior. Confirmation. Resignation. Titles to Land.

Transportation of Churches. To transport a church means to authorise the erection of the parish church in a different part of the parish from that in which it has formerly stood. The act 1707, c. 9, gives the power of determining, as to the transportation of churches, to the Court of Session, as the Commission of Teinds. The consent of three-fourths of the heritors, in point of valuation, is necessary to the removal. But any party having interest is entitled to oppose it. In sanctioning the transportation, the Court is in use to give decree against the heritors for the erection of the new church, and to order the materials of the old building to be sold, and the price applied in defraying the expense of the new. The form of applying for transportation is by a summons raised before the Teind Court, concluding for authority to transport, and to have the new church declared the regular parish church, &c. The heritors who are not parties to this summons as pursuers should be cited as defenders, as also the minister and presbytery, who have an interest to appear and object if they see cause. See Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 21; Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, § 49; Dunlop's Parochial Law, 26. See Church. Teind Court.

By the act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, 1844, the consent of the heritors of a major part of the valuation of a parish is declared to be sufficient in all cases in which the consent of the heritors of three parts of four of the valuation of the parish was required by the act 1707, c. 9. Heritors who do not judicially state their dissents are to be reckoned as consenting heritors. The act contains various other provisions in reference to the building and endowment of churches.

Transportation of Felons; is the banishing or sending away of convicts out of Great Britain as a punishment. The statute 25 Geo. III. c. 46 provides for the more effectual transportation of criminals from Scotland, and the removal of prisoners from gaols in Scotland to the gaols or hulks in Great Britain. Criminals condemned to transportation, according to the former practice, were sent to New South Wales; and 56 Geo. III. c. 27 gives the Sovereign power, with advice of the Privy Council, to appoint the place beyond seas to which convicts may be sent. The annual mutiny act, and most of the revenue statutes, make returning from transportation, following on a sentence pronounced for offences under these acts, a capital felony. The statute 35 Geo. III. c. 67 extends that penalty to persons transported for bigamy; and, indeed, capital punishment is the general certification against the unlawful return from transportation. And by 5 Geo. IV. c. 84, the being at large within the kingdom, after sentence of transportation, is declared a capital offence, whether the panel was actually sent to New South Wales, or to the hulks, or to the Penitentiary, or was never removed from a jail in Scotland. But the punishment of returning from transportation has hitherto been confined to transportation; and by 4 and 5 Will. IV. c. 67 it is declared to be no longer a capital offence. The act 1 Vict. c. 90, passed to amend the law relative to offences punishable by transportation for life, substitutes for that punishment, in certain cases, transportation for any term not exceeding fifteen years, nor less than ten years, or imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years. Alison's Princ. 559, Prac. 20; Steele, 173; Bank. i. 492; Swint. Abridg. h. t.; Watson's Stat. Law, h. t.; Hutch. Justice, i. 190, ii. 82.

By 20 and 21 Vict. c. 3, 1857, sentences of transportation are abolished, and sentences of penal servitude substituted. The provisions of previous statutes applicable to persons under sentence of transportation extend to persons under sentence of penal servitude; and the provisions of the act 5 Geo. IV. c. 84, authorising the appointment by the Crown, with the advice of the Privy Council, of any place or places beyond the seas to which felons and other offenders under sentence or order of transportation shall be conveyed, are declared to extend to the appointment of any place beyond the seas to which offenders under sentence of penal servitude may be conveyed. All enactments in force, which refer to crimes punishable with transportation, are declared to refer to crimes punishable with penal servitude.

Transumps. An action of transumpt is an action competent to any one having a partial interest in a writing, or immediate use for it, to support his titles or defences, in other actions; directed against the custodier of the writing, calling upon him to exhibit it, in order that a transumpt thereof may be judicially made and delivered to the pursuer. This action may be competently pursued before the judge ordinary. Although, in the ordinary case, the title of the pursuer of an action of transumpt consists of an obligation by the defender to grant transumps, it is, nevertheless, a sufficient title to insist if the pursuer can show that he has an interest in the writings; but, in that case, he must be at the expense of the transumpt. After the writings to be transumed are judicially exhibited, duplicates are made out, collated, and signed by one of the clerks of Court. Such duplicates are called transumps, and have a decree of the judge interponed, declaring that they are to bear as full faith or credit as an extract from the record of that Court. Hence, a decree of transumpt cannot be challenged except by an action of imprecation; and in that case, the user of the transumpt sought to be reduced must support it by the production of the principal writing, for the recovery of which a diligence will be granted to him against havers; and if it be not produced, certification will be granted against it. The parties chiefly interested in the deeds to be transumed, both granters and grantees, or their representatives, must either be made parties to the action, or consent expressly to the transuming of the deeds. All others pretending interest may be cited edictally. Stair, B. iv. tit. 31; More's Notes, cccxxxiii; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 53; Bank. B. ii. p. 622; *Jurid. Traveller. The powers of a mercantile traveller, or rider, are regulated by the terms of his commission; but he has also, by custom, an implied power to receive payment for his principal, and to take orders for him, which the principal is bound to perform. Bell's Princ. § 231, and authorities there cited.

Treason. By the older law of Scotland, treason was either proper or statutory—the first comprehending all facts which were, by common law or by statute, held to be high treason itself, committed against the state or its head (see 1424, c. 3, 4; 1449, c. 25; 1455, c. 54; 1584, c. 129; 1661, c. 5; 1662, c. 2; 1689, c. 1, 2; 1703, c. 1, 3); the second comprehending all facts which, though in themselves bearing none of the characters of treason, were from their mischief and enormity punished as such (see 1587, c. 50, 51; 1592, c. 146; 1528, c. 8; and 1681, c. 15); the punishment of both being death, forfeiture of real and personal estate, and loss of honour and privilege. But by 7 Anne, c. 21, §§ 1, 23, the law of England as to treason was adopted as the law of Scotland. The great basis of the English treason law is 26 Edw. III. stat. 5, c. 2, which declares, that it is treason—1. To compass or imagine the death of the King, meaning also the Queen Regnant (though not her husband), the Queen, or their eldest son; which includes the mere designing even of such a deed, if evinced by overt act, affording evidence of means, even remotely employed to accomplish it. Such overt acts are—lying in wait in order to attempt the life of the King; providing arms; preparing poison; sending letters; assembling and consulting; presence at consultation, with subsequent concealment of the scheme, and previous knowledge of the purpose of assembling; offering money, whether accepted or not; or in any other way instigating or abetting to kill the King. As also, every act of which danger to the King is the natural consequence: as marching in array against him; fortifying in resistance to his authority; enlisting men to depose him; taking measures, by subscribing bonds, associating, writing letters or otherwise, to imprison, or get forcible or fraudulent possession of his person; conspiring, or taking measures to levy war, or raise insurrection against his person or government, or constrain any of his sovereign acts; soliciting or concerting measures with a foreign power to invade the country, or going, or even displaying a purpose of going, abroad with that view. The same observations hold, though not so rigorously, as to the Queen-consort and the eldest son, in so far as their different status allow the application; Forster, p. 195, et seq.; Black. vol. iv. p. 79, et seq.; Hume, i. 506, et seq. The act 36 Geo. III. c. 7 makes it treason to compass, devise or intend, the death, or bodily harm tending to the death, maiming, wounding, or restraint of the King; or the depriving the King of his style and honour; or levying war against him within the realm, to make him change his measures, or to intimidate or constrain either House of Parliament; or moving any foreign power to invade the realm—provided that such compassing, &c., be published by writing, printing, or other overt act. No writing unpublished, and purely speculative (as without a definitive reference to purpose), is treasonable. But all writings, even unpublished, which refer to any treasonable scheme set on foot, or to be set on foot, and all words and opinions written and published expressing a general hostility to the King's life, are treasonable. Words merely spoken do not amount to treason, except as expounding acts into treason, e.g. in consultations or advices to kill, &c. The King means also the Prince Regent—67 Geo. III. c. 6; and generally that person who is, as head of the State, in possession of the Crown, whether rightfully or not, as none can be punished for obeying the powers that be at the time; 11 Henry VII. c. 1; except perhaps, in the case of voluntarily and ultroneously acting against a rightful King dispossessed by a usurper, which is certainly treason. 2. It is treason to violate, whether with or without consent, the Queen, regnant or not, or the wife of the eldest son (while in these characters), or the King's eldest daughter, while unmarried. 3. To levy war against the King within his realm. This includes every act deliberately and directly defying, and forcibly opposing or instantly threatening, or beginning so to oppose, the authority of the State, as a whole, and as represented by the King as its head, whether that defiance is intended as the means or as the end of action, or whether the King himself or the organs of Government are so opposed. The narrow seas are held within the realm; so that to assail King's ships on them is treason. 4. Adhering to, or assisting or corresponding with, the King's enemies, anywhere, whether rebels or foreign foes, without the excuse of compulsion, i.e. reasonable fear for life or person. Where rebels are assisted, it becomes a levying of war. Enemies need not be acting under authority of their respective governments, or of any government; and the King's allies or stipendiaries are identified with himself. 5. To counterfeit the King's Great or Privy Seal; and (by 7 Anne, c. 21) to counterfeit the seals used in Scotland. 6. To counterfeit the King's money, or bring false money into the realm to be passed as true. No issuing is necessary. But issuing is not treason of itself. Gold and silver alone are the King's money; though counterfeiting copper is made felony by 2 Geo. III. c. 40. 7. To kill the Chancellor, Treasurer, or any of the King's Justices, or (by 7 Anne) the Supreme Judges in Scotland, provided they be in their places, and in the execution of their official duty. By the act 1 Anne, stat. 2, c. 17, an endeavour, by any direct and overt act, to hinder the succession to the Crown of the person nearest, according to the limitations of the Act of Settlement, is treason; and by 6 Anne, c. 7, it is treason to maintain and affirm, advisedly and directly, by writing or printing, that any person has right to the Crown of these realms, otherwise than by the Act of Settlement, or that the King and Parliament cannot make laws to bind the Crown and descent thereof. But to do the same by teaching, preaching, or advised speaking, does not amount to treason. By 13 and 14 Will. III. c. 3, it is treason to hold correspondence any how with, or knowingly to remit money or aid to, or for the use of, the Pretender, or any employed by him. By 17 Geo. III. c. 39, the like is declared in regard to his sons; and he, or his sons, or his emissaries, landing, or attempting to land, or being found within Great Britain, are held guilty of treason. 9. There are four offences which, as regarding the Popish faith, are treason—viz. any Popish priest, born in the dominions of England, and coming here from beyond seas, or remaining here three days, without conforming, is guilty of treason by 27 Eliz. c. 2. Any person twice convicted of advisedly maintaining or defending the Pope's jurisdiction here, is also guilty by 5 Eliz. c. 1. The using any bull, or instrument of absolution or reconciliation, obtained from the see of Rome, is treason by 13 Eliz. c. 2, Parl. 2 and 3; and by 3 James I. c. 4, any born subject either withdrawn from his allegiance, and reconciled to the see of Rome, and promising obedience thereto, or to any other prince or state, or endeavouring to persuade to such apostasy, is guilty of treason. But these acts are obsolete. 10. By 1 Mary, stat. 2, c. 6, it is treason to counterfeit foreign coin of gold or silver current (by consent of the Crown) within the realm, or to forge the sign-manual, privy signet, or privy seal. By 1 and 2 William and Mary, c. 11, it is treason to bring in any such counterfeit foreign money, with intent to utter. By 5 Eliz. c. 11, whoever shall wash, clip, round, or file—and by 18 Eliz. c. 1, whoever shall impair, diminish, falsify, scale or lighten the proper or the permitted coin of this realm—is guilty of treason. By 8 and 9 Will. III. c. 28, made perpetual by 7 Anne, c. 25, it is treason knowingly to make, mend, buy, sell or have, or take out of the King's mint, any instrument proper for coining alone, or to mark on the edges, colour, gild or case over any coin, or even round blanks of base metal, to resemble current coin. By 15 and 16 Geo. II. c. 28, it is treason to alter or colour silver current coin to look like gold, or copper to look like silver. Formerly none of these offences could be tried but as treason. For the more recent law, see Coining.

All accessories, whether before or after the fact, are principals in treason. Treason may be committed by all who owe allegiance. Allegiance is either natural, viz. that of a born subject, which he cannot by his own act shake off during life; or local, which is as binding, while it lasts, as the natural, and is owed by every foreigner while he resides in Britain, even though his Government should, during that period, go to war with Britain; and even though, on such a war occurring, he quits Britain himself, but leaves his family and effects here voluntarily. Foreign ambassadors are guilty of treason when they attempt the King's life. In other cases of

Trial in Scotland for treason is competent to the Court of Justiciary, and to any commission of Oyer and Terminer appointed by the Crown, and containing at least three Lords of Justiciary (see 7 Anne), of whom one to be of the quorum. At the desire of the Lord Advocate, any trial for treason pending before the commission may, by a certiorari under the Great Seal, be transferred to the Justiciary Court; but a prosecution takes place now, not at the discretion of the Lord Advocate, but on a bill found by a grand jury, as in England. The petty jury consists, not of fifteen, but of twelve men taken from the county within which the treason is alleged to have taken place, or within which the Court sits, if on the trial of treason committed abroad; which jury must be unanimous or agreed in their verdict. See Jury. Trial in absence for treason, and trial after death, which last was allowed by Parliament, Dec. 10, 1540, are abolished by 7 Anne. Two concurring witnesses to each overt act libelled, or one witness to each of two or more overt acts of the same species of treason, are required; 1 Edw. VI. c. 12; 5 and 6 Edw. VI. c. 11; 1 and 2 Philip and Mary, c. 10, and 7 Will. III. c. 3; but one witness will suffice to establish any other and extrinsic circumstance, such as a former confession. Judicial confession at the bar convicts. The grand jury's bill must (except in trial for an attempt at assassinating the King) be found within three years from the date of the offence. The panel may see his indictment and lists of witnesses and jurors ten free days before trial (7 Anne, 21), and may challenge thirty-five jurors. He may compel the appearance of his witnesses, and employ counsel in his defence; Foster, ii. 230.

The punishment of high treason is now, by 54 Geo. III. c. 146, that the offender shall be drawn on a hurdle to the place of execution, and there be hanged by the neck until he be dead, and that afterwards his head shall be severed from his body, and his body divided into four quarters, and disposed of as the King shall think fit; with power to the King to direct that the offender shall not be drawn to the place of execution, and that he may not be hanged but beheaded, and also to direct as to the disposal of the body, &c. From the date of the treason the traitor's moveables are confiscated, and his heritage and honours are forfeited for ever by himself and his heirs, though, on the failure of heirs, an entailed estate returns to the next substitute. Debts heritably secured are not forfeited; but personal debts are at common law, although, on the Rebellions 1715 and 1745, personal debts were, by statute, allowed to be claimed. Forfeiture extends to the estate even of an apparent heir. By corruption of blood in consequence of sentence for treason (a stain which nothing short of an Act of Parliament, not even a pardon, can remove), neither the offender, nor any one who traces connection through him, can succeed. Hume, i. 506, et seq.; *Ersk. Trespass. It follows, from the exclusive right of property, that a proprietor is entitled to prohibit all trespass within his grounds, and to bring an action of damages against the trespasser. Such prosecutions may be brought before justices of the peace. Trespass, by travelling through wheat, is, by statute, made liable to the penalties of L.10 Scots for the first offence, L.20 Scots for the second, and forfeiture of moveables—which Mr Blair says may practically be interpreted as an arbitrary fine—for any subsequent offence, and the penalties go to the public. For trespasses in pursuit of game, and in relation to planting and inclosing, see the articles, Game Laws. Planting and Inclosing. Action of trespass prescribes in three years, if understood to be included in the expression, "and others of that sort," occurring in 1579, c. 81, which so limits actions of spuilzie and ejection. Other remedy is competent after expiration of three years; but, after the lapse of that period, the pursuer loses his right to prove his damage by his own oath in litem. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 16; Bank. B. ii. tit. 12, § 11.

Trout-Fishing. The right of trout-fishing is conveyed, along with lands, as part and pertinent. The right, however, may be reserved or transferred to a stranger. No one standing on a highway, or on public ground contiguous to a stream, has right to angle in the stream, a stream being the property of the parties through whose ground it flows. Accordingly, in the case of Ferguson v. Shireff, July 18, 1844, 6 D. 1363, the defender, who, as one of the public, had a right of way along the bank of a stream, was interdicted from fishing in the stream where it adjoined the road. In the case of Lord Somerville v. Smith, Dec. 22, 1859, 22 D. 279, a proprietor of lands which lay along the bank of a river, and who had the exclusive right of salmon-fishing within certain limits, was held not to be entitled to an interdict against a person fishing for trout from the opposite bank, within the limits of his right of salmon fishing and ex adverso of his lands, it not being alleged that he was fishing in an illegal manner, or making a practice of fishing for trout for the purpose of disturbing the salmon, and so injuring the proprietor's rights. Where one person has right to the salmon-fishing, and another to the trout-fishing, the right of fishing trout must be exercised in such a way as not to prejudice the salmon-fishing; Carmichael, Nov. 20, 1787, M. 9645. The doctrine that trout-fishing is an accessory of the adjacent land, was confirmed in Mackenzie, May 26, 1830, 8 S. & D., affirmed May 14, 1832; and in Macdonald, Dec. 4, 1836, 15 D. B. M. 259. In this last case the rule was established, that the proprietor of the adjacent lands does not lose his right to the trout-fishing by mere abstinence, but by exclusion on the part of another claiming the right. Trover; in English law, a form of action which lies against a person for the conversion or appropriation to his own use of any personal property in which the plaintiff has a general property as owner, or special property as carrier, depository, &c. The action is brought to recover the specific chattels themselves, or damages for their conversion. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Detinue.

Trust. A subject is conveyed in trust when the person to whom it is conveyed, and who is called the trustee, does not acquire an unlimited right of property, but holds the subject for the purpose of applying it to certain uses, expressed or implied. Trust is either voluntary, constituted by a disposition of the trustor, or judicial. A conveyance in trust is completed by delivery of the moveables and by sasine in the heritage. The completion of the conveyance denudes the trustor, and prevents his creditors, or others coming in his place, from attaching anything but the reversionary interest after the purposes of the trust are fulfilled. The conveyance may be either absolute, with a back-bond or other acknowledgment granted by the trustee that he holds the subject for the purposes of the trust; or it may be ex facie a trust-conveyance. In our earlier law, it was customary to grant absolute dispositions without receiving any back-bond; and presumptions and parole evidence were admitted to establish the trust against the trustee or his representatives, although not against his singular successor. But it was afterwards enacted, that no action for declaring a trust shall be sustained, unless the trust be proved by oath of party, or by a written acknowledgment of trust from the trustee; 1696, c. 25. A formal back-bond of trust, however, is not indispensable; it is competent to prove the trust by writings under the hand of the trustee importing an acknowledgment or admission of trust; Macfarlane, May 23, 1837, 15 S. & D. 978. It has been decided that circumstances may be admitted to prove trust. And where the acknowledgment of trust is destroyed by accident or fraud, the trust may be proved by parole evidence. It is competent to prove the existence of a trust as between two third parties, prout de jure; and the act 1696, c. 25, only applies to the case of proper declarators of trust by the trustor, or those in his right, against the trustee; Lord Elibank, Nov. 16, 1827, 6 S. & D. 69. An acknowledgment of trust by the representatives of the trustee, combined with other circumstances, was found sufficient to establish trust. The persons having the beneficial interest under a trust are properly creditors having a preference over the private creditors of the trustee. Persons not yet born may be the creditors under a trust. The beneficial interest is heritable or moveable according to the nature of the prestations directed to be made. See Jus Crediti.

A voluntary trust-disposition is often had recourse to for securing property, which might otherwise be exposed to the acts and deeds of the person in possession; as in marriage-contracts, in family settlements, and in the constitution of liferents, where it is proper that the fee should not be in pendentie. It is also employed by debtors, whether companies or individuals, who may desire extrajudicially to wind up their affairs, and to settle with their creditors. And where the conveyance is not struck at by the act 1696, c. 5, or 1621, c. 18, a voluntary trust may be granted for the purposes of sale and distribution. Those creditors who accede to the trust will be bound by the sale, distribution, and other transactions, in terms of the trust, and by the deeds of the trustee, in the exercise of discretionary powers committed to him. But no voluntary trust-deed, however unexceptionable, can stop the diligence of creditors who have not acceded to it; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 45. Hence, those creditors who do not assent may proceed with diligence against the estate, directed either against the grantor or his heirs, or against the trustee. But adjudication, or other real diligence thus used, will not divest the trustee, or create a preference over the trust creditors, if the trust conveyances have been completed before the commencement, or the using, of the real diligence. The expense of the diligence, however, is legally chargeable against the trust estate.

Where the conveyance to the trustee is completed according to the nature of the subjects or rights conveyed, as by delivery of moveables, or sasine in heritage, whether it be a conveyance in gratuito conditional, or absolute with a separate declaration of trust, the estate is fully vested in the trustee for the purposes of the trust; although the deed should contain no list either of the creditors for whose behoof it is granted, or of the trustor's debtors. According to Professor Bell, those creditors who are enumerated in the trust-deed as recorded have a real security; but "whether a trust-deed will give preference to creditors whose names are not enumerated, and the amount of their debts recorded, is a question not yet settled;" Bell's Princ. § 1996. The competition between the acceding creditors or the trustee, and those creditors who pursue separate measures, is regulated by the completion of their respective rights, with due regard to pari passu preferences, and to the regulations of the Bankrupt Statutes. See Conjunct and Confident. Bankrupt. But any creditor appearing under the trust, before actual division of the funds has commenced, will not be excluded by a condition in the trust-deed tending to limit the benefit of it to those who appear within any fixed time. The estate is vested in a voluntary trustee, even without his acceptance. And if he is unwilling to act, he has merely to execute a conveyance to whomsoever the debtor or creditors may recommend as his substitute. Great delay in accepting will be held as a renunciation. See Darling, Jan. 14, 1824, 2 S. & D. 607. Where the trustee, acquiring a trust without mention of heirs and assignees, dies, the right will notwithstanding subsist in the persons of his representatives for the benefit of all having interest; and in such a case, as the trustor is already divested, the correct procedure is by action of adjudication and declaration at the instance either of the creditors nominatim, or of a trustee to whom they have for this purpose conveyed their debts, calling the debtor or his representatives, the representatives of the former trustee, and all concerned; and the conclusions of which will be for declarator of the trust, and for adjudication in favour of the original trust creditors. A similar procedure is resorted to where it becomes necessary to remove the trustee, unless the trustee has already bound himself to denude when required. A trust-deed is not superseded by a subsequent disposition omnium bonorum in a cassio; Leith, June 22, 1821, 1 S. & D. 79. But, if the trustor be a person against whom sequestration may be awarded, the private trust may be superseded by a sequestration proceeding on the application of any non-acceding creditor to the requisite value, or on the application of the trustor himself, if he deem it advisable; in which case the private trustee is bound instantly to denude in favour of the trustee under the sequestration. See Trustee. Sequestration. Accession on the part of creditors, although not indispensable to a voluntary trust, makes it more complete and effective. A trust-deed for creditors not acceded to, was held not sufficient to divest the grantor, so as to invalidate a subsequent conveyance, with which the trustees did not compete; Barbour, Jan. 25, 1831, 9 S. & D. 334. Where the accession is expressed by a deed of accession, the signature of each creditor, or of his mandatar, attested by witnesses, if the signatures are separatim affixed, binds him. But an inhibiting creditor is not understood, in acceding, to depart from his inhibition, unless by a special agreement to renounce his preference. The terms of a deed of accession vary according to the nature of the arrangement with the creditors; but, in the ordinary case, it contains a power of arbitration, accompanied with a submission and clause of registration,—a power of management, sale, and distribution,—a settlement of the periods for dividends,—a consent to a supersederes of diligence,—and frequently an agreement to discharge, on a certain composition being paid by the bankrupt. Where there is no deed of accession, accession to the effect of checking an attempt at an individual preference is very liberally inferred, both from direct acts and from circumstances calculated, in common construction, to mislead other creditors into the belief of acquiescence. But, in the case of Mackie, 6th June 1822, 1 S. & D. 465, acquiescence in a trust as debtor was found not to imply acquiescence as creditor.

And in the case of the Earl of Breadalbane, Jan. 16, 1824, 2 S. & D. 621, virtual accession to a trust was held not to bar adjudication against the trustee, to enforce an obligation. Accession, however, to the effect of binding the creditor to any important act, will hardly be inferred but from evidence equivalent to express written accession. An implied accession to a trust-deed was not sustained where all the creditors had not acceded, and where a subsequent sequestration had been awarded; Lyell, March 11, 1823, 2 S. & D. 288. It was held not to be accession to a trust, that a party having a claim against the trustor, and over the lands in possession of the trustees, demanded payment from them, obtained a decree against them, and charged them thereon; Campbell, July 3, 1829, 7 S. & D. 826.

The import of the trust-deed is interpreted according to the plain meaning of the terms used; and whatever is necessary to the rational interpretation, and for carrying into effect the purposes of the trust, is implied. Power is sometimes reserved to declare the purposes of the trust; and when this is done they may be declared at any time, in a testament or deed, unless such declaratory deed fall under the law of deathbed. See Deathbed. Where the granter had claims for ameliorations on a farm, which he could not prosecute till the end of the lease, a general conveyance in trust, was held to carry these claims, although the granter died before the end of the lease; Munro, Dec. 17, 1825, 4 S. & D. 328. A testator appointed trustees to purchase lands with his money, and to settle them in strict entail, "according to the law and practice of Scotland," on his eldest son, "and the heirs of his body lawfully begotten," &c. It was held that the trustees were bound to execute the entail so as to exclude heirs-portioners; Sprot, May 22, 1828, 6 S. & D. 833. A trust-disposition of an estate for behoof of creditors, with powers of sale, subject to an obligation on the trustee to reconvey the remainder, although followed by infetment, does not divest the trustor of his radical right to the lands; and therefore, although a reconveyance by the trustee be informal, the trustor can, in virtue of his radical right, execute an effectual entail by procuratory of resignation; M'Millan, March 4, 1831, 9 S. & D. 551; affirmed, June 28, 1832. Upon the principle that the reversion remains radically in the person of the granter, it has been decided that it may be adjudged by his creditors; Campbell, Jan. 14, 1801, M. App. Adjud. No. 11. A formal trust-disposition of heritage may be revoked by an English will, not probative according to the law of Scotland. After the purposes of the trust are fulfilled, the trustees must pay over the residue to the heir-at-law, or to the executors, according to the nature of the subjects of which it consists; and if the subjects be heritable, the heir-at-law will be entitled to them, although the trustees may have had a power of sale, which they have not found it necessary to exercise; Cathcart, May 26, 1830, 8 S. & D. 803. See also Burwell, Dec. 14, 1825, 4 S. & D. 314; and Angus v. Angus, Dec. 6, 1815; 1 Ross's L. C. 524. A trust-deed having provided that certain special legacies should be "set apart," after which the residue of the estate was to be divided into four portions, to be also "set apart for particular legatees;" it was held, that any loss which might arise upon the trust-estate, by the mode of investment adopted by the trustees, prior to all the shares being separately invested, must be charged upon the portions of the residuary legatees; Gray, June 4, 1835, 18 S. & D. 866. The Court allowed a party to receive the rents of a trust property, the destination to which carried it to him, failing issue of his own body, there being no issue at present in existence, on caution to repeat in the event of issue; Blackwood, June 11, 1833, 11 S. & D. 699.

A formal trust-disposition of heritage may be revoked by a deed valid either by the law of the place where it is executed, or by the law of the maker's domicile at the time of execution, although not valid by the law of Scotland. See the case of Leith's Trustees v. Leith, June 6, 1848. Also 1 Ross's L. C. 667, et seq. See also Wills.

Many questions have arisen as to the competency of defraying out of the trust-funds the expense of litigations as to the trust. In several cases the expense of the discussion of the validity of the trust-deed has been allowed out of the trust-estate; Stinton, Jan. 17, 1828, 6 S. & D. 363; Morrison, June 30, 1829, 7 S. & D. 1810; Earl of Strathmore, Feb. 16, 1880; 8 S. & D. 530; aff. March 23, 1831, 5 W. S. 170. And the expenses of a discussion arising from the ambiguity of a trust-deed have been laid on the trust-funds; Grieve's Trustees, June 9, 1830, 8 S. & D. 96; Bryden, Feb. 17, 1831, 9 S. & D. 457; aff. April 22, 1833. Where it was for the benefit of the trust that a question regarding trustees' powers should be judicially settled, the expenses of all parties were allowed out of the trust-estate; Robertson, March 7, 1832, 10 S. & D. 438. But the expenses of a competition were refused to be allowed out of the trust-funds which were the subject of it; Sommervail, Jan. 22, 1830, 8 S. & D. 370. Trustee. A trustee is a person appointed to act in the administration, disposal, or sale and distribution, of an estate, in the room of the proprietor, and in the manner pointed out by the conveyance, voluntary or judicial, which vests it in him. The purposes of a trust-conveyance may be indefinitely varied. But a trustee may be considered as having right either to a solvent or to an insolvent estate; and when having right to an insolvent estate, as having it either by voluntary conveyance from the bankrupt simply, or by conveyance from him with accession of creditors, or by involuntary or judicial conveyance under mercantile sequestration.

1. Extrajudicial Trustees.—When the trustees appointed in a trust-deed, inter vivos, are named jointly, the nomination falls by the failure of any one of them; and it would appear, that, where not otherwise expressed in the deed, the nomination is presumed to be joint. When the nomination is to the acceptors or survivors, the trust subsists if any of them accept and survive. But when a quorum is named, it is necessary that the number of which the quorum consists should accept, survive, and act. See Quorum. A trustee named a sine quo non must concur in all acts, and on his death the nomination falls. See Sine Quo Non. A majority of trustees, under an indefinite nomination, is entitled to act in the necessary absence of the others; Campbell and Macintyre, June 12, 1824, 3 S. & D. 126. But where a trust is vested in a certain number of trustees, and no quorum mentioned, any act of extraordinary administration requires the concurrence of the whole trustees; Frem, June 28, 1852, 10 S. & D. 727. A majority of the trustees under a marriage-contract being declared a quorum, it was held, in an action in which two of the trustees entered appearance as defenders, that a majority of the remainder, although not a majority of all the trustees, were entitled to pursue; Shanks, March 4, 1830, 8 S. & D. 530. A trust-deed, mortis causa, does not fall by the death or non-acceptance of some of the trustees named. No person named trustee can be compelled to act, unless he accept.

But if infestment should be taken in his name without his knowledge, he may be compelled either to act or denude. Trustees who have once accepted are not entitled to throw up the office before they have executed the purposes of the trust. "Trustees must not imagine, that, whenever they are tired of their office, they can slip their necks out of the collar, and leave the matter to be extricated by the Court."—Per Lord President, in Carstairs, Jan. 20, 1776, 2 Hales, 678. A trustee whose concurrence is necessary, may be compelled to concur in a reasonable act of management, and if he refuse, he will be liable for the damage thereby incurred by the trust-estate; Lord Lynedoch, Feb. 15, 1827, 5 S. & D. 358; aff. July 7, 1830. 1 W. S. 149; also Nov. 20, 1832, 11 S. & D. 80. A trustee is understood to act gratuitously, unless the trust-deed provides a remuneration for him.

A trustee who acts as agent for the trustor, or who employs the firm of which he is a partner to do so, is not entitled to remuneration; Lord Gray and Others, June 21, 1856, 19 D. 1. See also Wellwood's Trustees v. Bonwell, Dec. 19, 1856, 19 D. 187. Where, however, a trustor empowers his trustees to appoint agents and factors, either of their own number or other fit persons, this is held to imply an intention on the part of the trustor, that the person appointed should receive remuneration; Goodair v. Carruthers, June 19, 1858, 20 D. 1141. The powers of the trustees are usually fixed in the deed by which they are nominated; but where not so fixed, they are understood to be such as are calculated to enable them to carry into effect the purposes of the trust. Under a power to trustees to sell property and name commissioners for managing the trust, it was found competent for the trustees to empower the commissioners to sell the property; Innes, June 22, 1822, 1 S. & D. 518. It has also been found that a trustee with powers of sale, with an unexecuted precept in the trust-deed, may sell and assign the unexecuted precept to the purchaser, to the effect of entitling him, in virtue of such precept, to take infestment in fee-simple; Cockburn v. Cameron, 4th June 1836, 14 D. B. M. 889. Where trustees were named to purchase lands, authority was granted them to purchase superiorities, such an acquisition being beneficial to the estate; Sharpe, Feb. 11, 1823, 2 S. & D. 203. Trustees named to pay debts, and entail a certain part of the estate, were authorised to sell the part specified, the rest being found inadequate to the discharge of the debts; Erskine, May 13, 1829, 7 S. & D. 594. But where the trustor had conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, with the evident intention that they should realise the proceeds of a certain portion of his heritage, and purchase lands to be entailed on a series of heirs, other than his heirs-at-law, but where he had omitted to confer an express power of sale on the trustees, it was held in the House of Lords (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session), that although the trustor's heritage was vested in the trustees, yet, as they had not power to dispose of it so as to apply its proceeds to the purposes of the trust, the heirs-at-law were not effectually displaced; and hence, that they were, by necessary implication, entitled to require the trustees to denude in their favour; Robertson's Trustees v. Allan, 7th March 1832, 10 S. & D. 438; House of Lords, 31st August 1835, 2 Shaw and Maclean, 333. Trustees are liable for obligations incurred qua trustees, to the extent of the trust-estate. Trustees for creditors taking possession of a farm held by the bankrupt are liable for the rents during their possession, but they are entitled to credit for the value of the effects sequestered by the landlord; Fairlie, Dec. 18, 1821, 1 S. & D. 222; Fairlie, Feb. 12, 1823, 2 S. & D. 214. The trustees for the creditors of an insolvent debtor were held liable for the expenses of an accountant's report, in a submission to which the insolvent was the ostensible party, but in which the trustees had the real interest, and in which they had taken an active part; Welsh, June 15, 1826, 4 S. & D. 710. Trustees may become personally liable beyond the amount of the trust-estate. Trustees become personally liable where they exceed their powers. They are answerable for their intromissions, and are personally liable in so far as they cannot account for them according to the principles of a trustee's accounting; as, e.g., where they have paid to one not entitled to receive payment. They are jointly liable for their intromissions, unless the trustor limit each trustee's responsibility to his own intromissions. Trustees who resist the execution of their duty become personally liable for the consequences. Trustees who brought an action to ascertain the extent of their powers, were found not personally liable in expenses of process; Cundell, Dec. 14, 1822, 2 S. & D. 89. Trustees who become parties to an action, or sist themselves in an action already in Court, are personally liable for the expenses of their antagonist, if he be successful, and it is not relevant for them to object that the trust-funds are exhausted; Robertson, Dec. 4, 1823, 2 S. & D. 553; Scott, Dec. 21, 1826, 5 S. & D. 172; Rasburn, June 14, 1831, 9 S. & D. 728. This rule is, however, subject to modification; and a distinction has been taken between trustees in a sequestration, whose commission gives them an interest to litigate, and gratuitous trustees. Trustees under a private deed of settlement were held not personally liable for the expenses of a litigation bona fide carried on by them as defenders, to satisfy which the trust-funds were inadequate; Dickson, Nov. 20, 1829, 8 S. & D. 99. And even where a trustee in a sequestration sists himself in a litigation in which expenses are ultimately awarded, those incurred before he becomes a party can only be ranked for on the estate; Kidd, May 17, 1828, 6 S. & D. 825. The trustee for a bankrupt litigant is not entitled, in sisting himself as party to the process, to insert a qualification that he shall not be liable for the expenses; Buchanan, June 15, 1827, 5 S. & D. 805. Gratuitous family trustees were found personally liable in payment of a bill, granted by them to a third party, for a debt due by the truster; the ratio decidendi being, that when they grant such a liquid obligation, they give assurance of funds, and pledge themselves to retain sufficient to answer the debt; Thomson, June 24, 1829, 7 S. & D. 777. Testamentary trustees, who were appointed to invest the residue of the funds in heritable property, or bank security, and who, acting under the advice of counsel, declined, on the requisition of all concerned, to invest the residue in Government stock, and brought a process of multiplepoinding and exoneration, in which the fund was paid to those having right, were found liable in the loss sustained; Morison, Feb. 9, 1827, 5 S. & D. 322. A party who accepts the office of trustee, and allows his name to be used as such, cannot deny liability for the intromissions of his co-trustees, on the ground that he never personally intromitted; Maclymont, Feb. 14, 1827, 5 S. & D. 346. See also Kennedy, June 28, 1827, 5 S. & D. 852. Many cases have occurred, in which trustees have been found personally liable on account of their neglecting their duties, or exceeding their powers, &c. The following cases may be consulted: Sim, May 13, 1830, 8 S. & D. 741; Chalmers' Trustees, June 23, 1830, 8 S. & D. 961; Hepburn, Dec. 15, 1830, 9 S. & D. 188; Graham, March 4, 1831, 9 S. & D. 543; Jaffray, Feb. 10, 1831, 9 S. & D. 416; Wellwood, June 23, 1831, 9 S. & D. 790; Anderson, Feb. 12, 1833, 11 S. & D. 382; Donaldson, June 18, 1833, 11 S. & D. 740; Blain, Jan. 28, 1836, 14 D. B. M. 361. See also the case of Home v. Menzies, July 10, 1845, 7 D. 1010. Trustees must keep exact accounts; they must take credit only for actual payments, and communicate for the benefit of the trust, whatever eases they may have had in paying. They must give up to those interested all acquisitions made by them in the course of their administration. They must not avail themselves of any rights purchased by them, although these rights may be such as might otherwise have come into competition with those concerned in the trust.

Some trust-deeds empower the trustees to assume others into the trust, or to convey the trust to others; and this power may be exercised on deathbed. Where no such power is conferred on the trustees, and where the trust fails before its purposes have been completed, by the death of the trustees, the Court appoints a curator bonis, or judicial factor, in like manner as when the nomination has never had effect, or the party beneficially interested may proceed by declaratory adjudication, under which the trust will be declared at an end, and the superior ordained to grant him a charter. This is also the correct method of proceeding where the trust is conceived in favour of the heirs and assignees of the last survivor, and where the son of the last survivor refuses to make up titles; Dalzell, March 11, 1756, M. 16204. See Declaratory Adjudication. In a case in which the trustees died without assigning the beneficial interest, a creditor of the person holding the beneficial interest was found entitled to adjudge; and, in virtue of that adjudication, to pursue an action, the title to pursue which was one of the rights conveyed in the trust-deed; Gemm v. Kirkpatrick, May 30, 1826, 4 S. & D. 629; affirmed in 1830, 4 W. S. 48. A trustee who becomes bankrupt will be ordered by the Court to denude, and a curator bonis or judicial factor will be appointed to act in his room, and to call him to account. Where a trust-settlement was conceived in favour of the trustees, and one of two surviving trustees became insane, the Court granted authority to the other trustee to wind up the trust, with the full powers conferred on the trustees or survivor, but only on condition of his finding caution; Fraser, March 1, 1837, 15 D. B. M. 692. See, for cases in which the Court has supplied the failure, bankruptcy or denuding of trustees, 1 Shaw's Digest, p. 627.

A trustee appointed for behoof of the creditors of an insolvent person not sequestrated, is generally intrusted with full powers to judge of claims and preferences in the ranking, or to refer such matters to arbitration. He is, in the ordinary case, bound to lodge the sums received by him in a bank, in the character of trustee; and if this provision is either not made or not observed, and the trustee fails after a dividend has been advertised and partially paid, the loss falls not on the estate, but on the creditors failing duly to apply. The general rules as to trusteeship apply to the case of a voluntary trust by a bankrupt; and every such trustee who illegally refuses to denude, may be compelled to denude in favour of a new trustee, or of a purchaser, by a declarator of trust. On the subject of extrajudicial trustees generally, consult the following authorities: Bell's Com. i. 32; Add. No. IV.; More's Notes on Stair, lv., lxxvi.; Bell's Princ. § 1993, et seq.; Kames' Equity, 334; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Bell on Completing Titles, 91.

2. The trustee under a sequestration is elected by the creditors; and his election thereafter is approved of by the Court of Session. His duty is to carry into effect the diligence which brings the property of parties subject to mercantile sequestration under judicial administration for behoof of their creditors. The duties of the trustee are defined by statute, and have regard to the interests of all the creditors under the sequestration; and the proceedings of the trustee, in the exercise of his statutory powers, are all subject to the review of the Court of Session on summary complaint. See Bankrupt. Sequestration.

Tuernay; an old word of doubtful signification. Skene thinks that in one passage, "implacitis burgorum utilitur Tuernay," it means the title to sue or "do richt." He seems afterwards to think it synonymous with twenty-ray, a word by using which an accused person approved his judge, so that he could not afterwards decline his jurisdiction. Skene, h. t.

Turpis Causa. An obligation to pay money, ob turpem causam, cannot found an action in law. Where a gift proceeds ex turpi causa, if the unlawfulness lie with the giver, restoration can in no case be competently required; if it lie with the receiver, it is otherwise; if it lie with both parties, then, in pari casu, potior est conditio possidentis. *Bank. Tutor; is the legal representative and guardian of the person, and the administrator of the estate, of a pupil, failing the father, who during his life as administrator-in-law, is legally vested with the powers both of a tutor and of a curator for his children during their minority. The tutor is either a tutor-nominate, or a tutor-at-law, or a tutor-dative—a division borrowed from the Roman law.

A tutor-nominate or testamentary is he whom the father, who alone has the power of naming a tutor, has nominated, either in a testament or in some other writing, sufficiently indicative of his intention. A tutor so appointed has the precedence of every other tutor. A father may nominate any number of tutors; and if some of those named refuse, or are unable to act, they are merely held pro non adjectis; and the nomination holds good as to the rest, unless one of them who cannot, or will not act, is named sine quo non; in which case, failing the sine quo non, the nomination falls. A tutor-nominate must be major before he can act; but he is exempted from the oath de fidei administratione; and although in peculiar cases, as of one who is vergens ad inopiam, or of dubious character, the Court may, ex nobili officio, ordain him to find security, he is not, generally speaking, bound in security rem pupilli salvam fore. The devising of an estate to the pupil, with provision of an individual to manage it during the donee's pupilarity, does not supersede the nomination of a tutor by the father; for such a manager, although he will have the management of the special estate so devised, has no control over the person of the pupil, and is in no sense of the term a tutor, although sometimes erroneously so called. Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 2, et seq. See Curatory.

A tutor-at-law, or tutor-legitim, has place only where there is no tutor-nominate, or where the tutor-nominate is dead or cannot act, or where he has not accepted. A tutor-at-law acquires his right by the mere disposition of law, and cannot be supplanted by a tutor-nominate who has once distinctly renounced, whether when called at the instance of the tutor-at-law or otherwise. No cognate (i. e. no relation by the mother's side) can be a tutor-at-law; and no agnate (i. e. no person related through the father) can be so either, unless a male. The nearest male agnate, of common understanding and prudence, and twenty-five years of age (1474, c. 52), who can give security rem pupilli salvam fore, is the tutor-at-law. Where more than one are alike near, it is he who would be the pupil's heir-at-law in a general service; omitting those not of the proper age. The tutor-at-law desiring the office obtains a brieve from Chancery directed to any judge having jurisdiction, requiring him to call a jury to ascertain, 1. Who is the nearest male agnate, heir-general, and twenty-five years of age? 2. Is he attentive to his own affairs? 3. Can he give security? 4. Who is the nearest cognate entitled to be custodian of the person of the pupil? Of these, the first alone is really examined into,—the second is presumed,—the third the clerk looks to,—and the last is left to the courts of law; and arises from this, that where there is a tutor-legitim, the custody of the person is taken from him, as being the successor of the pupil, and given to the mother till the pupil be seven years of age; at which time, or on her second marriage, if she marry again before that time, it is transferred from her to the tutor, if he be not of law; and if he be, then to the next nearest cognate not at the time (if female) vestita viro; to whom also, if capable, the custody goes from the first, if the mother be then either dead, or married, or incapable. The tutor-at-law, however, retains every right but that over the pupil's person. The tutor's caution is recorded in the judge's books, and he takes the oath de fidei. See Brieve. A tutor-dative is named by the Sovereign as pater patriæ, on the failure both of tutors-nominate and of tutors-at-law, but never till a year after the tutor of law might have served; and great allowance, in point of form, would be made to a tutor-at-law desiring to precede a tutor-dative. A tutor-dative is appointed on his presenting a signature in Exchequer, with the consent of the next of kin on both father's and mother's side, or at least after those parties have been regularly cited. See 1672, c. 2. The signature examined, and charged with a small composition to the Crown, is passed and stamped with the quarter seal. Where a pupil has no tutor at all, the Court of Session will, at the suit of any kinsman of the pupil, and after due intimation to the nearest of kin, appoint a factor loco tutoris, whose office expires with the pupilarity, and who must conform to the Act of Sederunt, Feb. 13, 1730. The powers of a factor loco tutoris are similar to those of a tutor; but the factor may be superseded quandocunque by the service of a tutor-at-law.

As no one can be a tutor who is not in the uncontrolled management of his or her own affairs, a female is excluded, even when tutor-nominate, from the office, while she is vestita viro. Professed Papists, and all suspected of Popery, were, by 1661, c. 8, and 1700, c. 3, excluded from this office. But that disability was removed by the statute 33 Geo. III. c. 44. See Papists. A tutor is vested with the management of both the person and the estate of his pupil, while a curator's sole concern is with the estate. Hence the maxim, Tutor datur personæ, curator rei. The tutor acts alone, the pupil having no person in law; while the minor, on the other hand, acts, but with the advice and consent of his curator. A deed signed by a pupil is null, ope exceptionis. A tutor is allowed no remuneration for his trouble; and when the father, in his nomination, has provided a remuneration for him, it is understood to cover all incidental outlays which otherwise he might have charged. The concurrence of a fixed quorum, or of a sine quo non, where one is named, is indispensable, as is that also of every one of a number of joint nominees. See Quorum. Sine quo non. A tutor can sue for, receive and discharge all debts due to the pupil, rents, interests, or even principal sums when required, and must use regular diligence. He may remove tenants and may grant leases to endure for the period of his office; but he cannot sell or feu the heritage without the authority of the Court of Session obtained in an action, and on showing that a sale is necessary by the exhibition of a state of the pupil's affairs; although the tutor may implement any commenced transaction, and must go on with any procedure of the law in regard to his pupil's heritage. See Cognition and Sale. He may, if necessary, appoint factors under him, with reasonable salaries, and giving security. He may sell the moveables of his pupil, and may validly submit to arbitration all doubtful claims as to them. He may do any thing whereby the better to secure debts to the pupil; but any change in the nature of the debt (as from heritable to moveable), produced in doing so, is not good unless afterwards approved by the pupil when major; and, generally speaking, the tutor cannot, without very weighty considerations, change the nature of any part of the pupil's property so as to invert the course of the pupil's succession. Neither can a tutor be creditor in rem suam; he cannot buy from (unless at public sale) or lend to his pupil; he ought not to assign any debt due to the pupil, except in the case of a cautioner paying to him the debt of another; and he must communicate the advantage of any bargain which he may have got in buying a debt affecting the pupil's property. Erst. B. i. tit. 7, §§ 16-20. A tutor may accept or decline his office; and acceptance is not to be inferred by implication. It is fixed on tutors-nominate by writing to that effect, or by acts of administration as tutors; and on tutors of law and dative by their applying for the office, ordering any thing which a tutor alone has right to do, and clearly evincing their intention to accept, even although they have omitted to give security. By 1672, c. 2, a tutor on entering to his office is bound to make up a tutorial inventory. See Inventory. Curatory. And failing his doing so, he is not entitled to any disbursements made by him for the pupil's litigation or diligence; he is accountable for omissions, and may be removed even without cause assigned, at least ex culpa levisima: 1672, c. 2; Act of Sederunt, 25th Feb. 1693.

A tutor should, in his care of the pupil's person and education, allow him yearly a decent aliment, not, however, exceeding the annual income of his estate. He should pay off the debts, and discharge all other obligations, quamprius; and must do everything to continue the estate, at least, as it was. He must raise due diligence against the pupil's debtors. Sums due at the tutor's entry, and not bearing interest, must be recovered and put out at interest. Rents must be lent out, if payable in grain, a year, and if in money, six months after they fall due. The accruing interest of bonds must be accumulated at the expiration of the office, and in particular cases before that time. Land may be bought with the pupil's accruing funds, if due caution be used. Ersk. ib. §§ 24, 25. Tutors are accountable from the time of their acceptance, whether intromitting or not. As to the required degree of diligence, fathers and honorary tutors are liable merely for intromissions; and testamentary tutors are liable in the diligence which a prudent man would give to his own affairs; while tutors of law and dative, and protutors (i.e. persons who, without legal authority, act as tutors), are all liable in exact diligence. Tutors are liable singuli in solidum, except, 1st, Where a father has divided the management into parts. 2d, Where the father has, in liege pousitie, and in regard to that estate alone which comes from himself, expressly exempted the tutors-nominate from omissions, and liability in solidum; 1696, c. 8. Tutory expires by the death of either tutor or pupil—by the death of a sine quo non, or the deficiency of a quorum, where a quorum is fixed in the nomination—by the pupil's attaining to puberty—by the marriage of a female tutor (though it may revive on her widowhood)—by supervening incapacity, natural or legal—or by gross misconduct in the tutor, cognisable by the Court of Session alone. The tutory may also expire by the tutor's renunciation made on reasonable cause, and admitted by the judge; for although one cannot be compelled to accept the office, yet, having once accepted, he cannot renounce at his pleasure, since id quod prius fuit voluntatis postea fit necessitatis; 1555, c. 35; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 29. On the expiration of the office, mutual actions (the directa et contraria tutelæ) are competent for the adjustment of the claims of each—the tutor accounting for the rents and for the other profits of the heritage, and for such debts as he has or ought to have known of, and to have recovered; and claiming, though no remuneration, yet relief from all rational engagements, and payment of all reasonable expenses or purchases on the pupil's behalf, of which, however, evidence must be brought, in order to elide a contrary presumption. The latter action is of course uncalled for where the former has been instituted. All claims against a tutor by a minor prescribe in ten years. Ersk. B. i. tit. 17, § 1, et seq.; *Bank. U

Udal Right; is that right in land, which, though dependent on the Crown as superior, for payment of a tribute called Skat, is completed without charter or sasine, by undisturbed possession, proveable by witnesses before an inquest, and founding petitory actions and rights of prescription just as infeftment does. This right is said to have prevailed in Britain before the introduction of the strictly feudal system, and is still to be met with in Orkney and Shetland. See 1669, c. 13. Udal lands are not exempted from land-tax; and are now very commonly converted into fens, by the giving out of Crown charters, a practice introduced into Orkney and Shetland by the annexation of the church-lands. *Bank. Unfeudalised Heritage. Rights which are heritable, but not feudal, may be attached by adjudication duly recorded, without sasine or charge. Bell's Com. i. 755–58; ii. 511. See Adjudication. Bankruptcy. Personal Rights.

Unfunded Debt; is that part of Government stock for the payment of the interest on which no certain funds are set apart. The chief documents of this debt are Exchequer and navy bills, which bear interest from their dates, or from six months after they are issued. These funds are held in law to be moveable, and the right passes with the possession of the document. Bell's Com. i. 106; Bell's Princ. § 1343. See Exchequer Bills.

Unilateral Obligations; are those obligations in which one party alone is bound. Unilateral trusts are those which a debtor voluntarily and extrajudicially executes, for the better and more equal settlement of the claims against him, in favour of a trustee for behoof of all his creditors. Bell's Com. i. 334; ii. 486. See Trust-Disposition. Trustees. Bankrupt.

Union. The acts of the Scotch Parliament, 1707, c. 7 and c. 8, contain the articles of union between the kingdoms of Scotland and England, including an exemplification, under the Great Seal of England, of the corresponding act of the English Parliament. By the Union, the two kingdoms of Scotland and England were, from and after the 1st May 1707, united, under the title Great Britain, with one King, Court, and Parliament, and one Privy Council. For the Parliamentary representation of Scotland, see Election Laws and Reform Act. The Scotch courts of justice remain unaltered, except by the abolition of the Privy Council. The English law of treason has been substituted for the Scotch, and the revenue laws are also assimilated; but, with those exceptions, all our other laws, so far as consistent with the object of the Union, remain unaltered. *Bank. Union, Charter of. Formerly, where lands lay discontinuous, although all the separate tenements or parcels might be of the same kind, and held by the same tenure, under the same superior, and derived from the same author, a special infeftment was required to be given in each tenement, unless the Sovereign, by a Crown charter, had united them into one tenantry. That is, failing such union, there was a separate act of symbolical delivery in each of the discontinuous tenements; and the instrument of sasine accordingly bore that infeftment was so given in each parcel or tenement. The object of a charter, or clause of union, was to dispense with the necessity of taking separate infeftments, and to declare that one sasine should be sufficient to carry the whole discontinuous subjects. If the clause of union mentioned the particular place at which the sasine was to be taken, it required to be taken at that place, otherwise it reached only to the tenement in which it was taken. But if no place was fixed, sasine taken on any part of the united lands served for the whole. It is to be observed, however, that the only effect of a clause of union was to unite lands locally discontinuous; for where lands were derived from different authors, or held of different superiors, or of the same superior, but by different tenures, they could not legally be the subjects of union. Where a part of the united lands was disposed, and thus separated from the rest, some lawyers have held that the union was thereby dissolved; but the more correct opinion appears to be, that a grant of part of the united lands did not dissolve the union as to the part which remained. The erection of lands into a barony confers a higher right on the grantee than that resulting from a mere clause of union; for such an erection has the effect not only of uniting land naturally discontinuous, but it makes one sasine serve for all, although the subjects erected should be perfectly distinct, as lands, patronages, mills, &c. *Ersk. Upset Price. The remedy provided by 1690, c. 24, for the case of the upset price in a judicial sale being fixed too high, not having been found beneficial, the Court of Session has introduced the practice of lowering the price on cause shown, care being taken duly to advertise the adjournment and reduction. In a voluntary sale of a bankrupt estate, consented to by a majority of the creditors in value, the upset price is fixed, and may, if advisable, be lowered by the trustee and a majority of the commissioners. *Bell's Com. ii. 272, 417. Usury, or Oker; is the taking, or agreeing to take, in return for the loan of money, more than the legal interest in the place where the loan is contracted. Before the Reformation, while taking of interest was prohibited, wadsets and rights of annual rent were usual and very injurious covers for loans, and were justly superseded by rendering a stipulation for interest legal. The statute of 12 Anne, sess. 2, c. 16, which in a great measure supercedes the statutes 1594, c. 222; 1597, c. 251; and 1621, c. 28, made five per cent. the legal

By the Act 17 and 18 Vict. c. 90, 1854, the whole acts against usury were repealed. See Interest.

Uterine Brother; a brother by the same mother, but by a different father. By the former law he was not entitled to succeed to his half-brother or half-sister, as there was no succession through the mother. Stair, B. iii. tit. 8, § 43; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 8; Bank. ii. 296; Bell's Princ. §§ 1652, 1665; *Ersk. Uti Possidetis; an interdict of the Roman law as to heritage, ultimately assimilated to the interdict utrubi, as to moveables, whereby the colourable possession of a bona fide possessor is continued until the final settlement of a contested right. Stair, B. iv. tit. 26, § 1; Bank. B. iv. tit. 24, § 53. Utlagium; or utlagatium, "outlawry, rebellion, disobedience to the laws, banishment, or forfaultor." Skene, h. t.

Uttering. In reference to forgery and counterfeit coining, the word uttering signifies the putting to use the false deed, or the passing as true the base coin. The crime of forgery is not completed without the uttering; but if it has been proved that some one has uttered the false writing, this is presumed to have been done with the fabricator's concurrence; and if he denies it, the onus lies upon him to show how the writing passed from his possession, without his connivance. The vending or delivering of forged notes to an associate, at less than their nominal value, and for the purpose of being passed as genuine, does not amount to uttering; but it constitutes a relevant charge. Hume, i. 146; Alison's Princ. 371; Steele, 145. Vacant Stipends. The stipend due during a vacancy was formerly at the disposal of the patron for pious uses. But it has been given, by statute, to the Widows' Fund. It was first provided, by 50 Geo. III. c. 84, § 17, that when the pastoral charge in any of the churches or parishes, the stipends of which are augmented, as mentioned in the act, become vacant, the several sums directed to be appropriated for augmenting such stipends respectively, shall not, during any such vacancy (excepting only with regard to the half-yearly moiety in name of Ann), be applicable to the purposes to which vacant stipendes in Scotland are at present by law applicable, nor shall they be subject to those having a right to the disposal of vacant stipends, but shall be paid into the Ministers' Widows' Fund. And by 54 Geo. III. c. 169, § 9, et seq., when any parish in the Church of Scotland becomes vacant by the death, translation, resignation, or deprivation of an incumbent holding the pastoral cure and benefice, and vacant stipend arises in consequence, such vacant stipend, in so far as it has heretofore been applicable by the patron to pious purposes, is levied and paid to the general collector of the Ministers' Widows' Fund, who is directed to apply the produce for behoof of the fund. And as, by an act of William and Mary, the vacant stipends had been withdrawn from the patrons of the several parishes, and made payable to the Synod of Argyle, or their factors, it is provided, that all such vacant stipend be applied, as in the other parishes in Scotland, but without prejudice to any claim of the Synod of Argyle to dispose of the rent of mansees and glebes, or of the sums paid in lieu of mansees, termed Manse-money, within the shire of Argyle. The right of the widow and nearest of kin to a half-year's stipend, in name of Ann, is also reserved. So often as any portion of vacant stipend occurs, in any parish within the bounds of any presbytery of the Church of Scotland, the moderator is required, within three months, or, if the parish be situated within the Western or Northern Isles, within six months after the terms of Whitsunday or Michaelmas, at which such vacant stipend becomes due, to make intimation thereof, by writing under his hand, to the general collector of the Widows' Fund, at his office at Edinburgh. The writing must contain an attested list of the several heritors or others by whom the vacant stipend is payable, and of the proportion payable by each of them, so far as the moderator can obtain information. He is also required, within three months after the vacant stipends become due, to give notice in writing to the several heritors and others liable, that they are required, under authority of this act, to make payment of the vacant stipend to the collector, his deputies or factor demanding it, on or before the 1st of May immediately following the terms of Whitsunday or Michaelmas, at which it becomes due. And, if the moderator neglect to make these intimations, he and his presbytery are liable to pay the whole vacant stipend to the general collector, at their own expense. But, in such event, they are entitled to levy, uplift and receive such vacant stipend from the persons liable, and to grant receipts, and have the same remedies for recovering it as the general collector would have had. On the subject of vacant stipends, see Ersk. B. i. tit. 5. § 13; Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, § 77; Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, § 35; Bell's Princ. § 836; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. h. t.; Hutch. Just. of Peace, ii. 509; Connell on Parishes, 169, 334, 546.

In the case of Kinnoull v. Gordon, 5 D. 12, it was held that the patron was entitled to the vacant stipend, where the vacancy of the benefice was caused by reason of the Church Courts refusing to put the presentee of the patron upon his trial; but the judgment was reversed in the House of Lords, who decided that such vacant stipend belonged to the Widows' Fund, under the provisions of the act 54 Geo. III. c. 169; Gordon v. Earl of Kinnoull, April 19, 1845; 4 Bell, 126.

Vadiare Duellum; a phrase peculiar to the trial by single combat. The pursuer and defender were said vadiare duellum, when they give pledges to fight, the one to prove what he asserted, the other to disprove what he denied. Stene, h. t. See Single Combat.

Vadium; a wad, wedde or pledge. Stene, h. t. See Wadset.

Vagabond, or Vagrant. Vagrants and sturdy beggars were at one period classed as necessary, i.e. involuntary servants, such as indigent children, colliers, salters, and workmen, who refused to serve at the legal rates; see 1663, c. 16. Various severe enactments were passed against them under the descriptions of beggars, fortune-tellers, jugglers, minstrels, &c., providing sometimes even capital punishments; 1424, c. 42; 1535, c. 22; 1579, c. 74; 1597, c. 272; 1617, c. 10; 1663, c. 16; 4 Geo. I. c. 11; and 9 Geo. II. c. 5. The act 1698, c. 21, ratified all but the two last. Yet now vagrants are seldom taken up or punished, unless where police regulations are enforced; or where they are entering a parish in the face of an advertised prohibition; or where they are committing, or in the notorious habit of committing, petty delinquencies. *Ersk. Valuation of Lands. By the act 17 and 18 Vict. c. 91, 1854, commissioners of supply of every county, and the magistrates of every burgh, are directed to cause a valation-roll to be made up annually, showing the yearly rent or value of the whole lands and heritages within each county or burgh respectively, and for that purpose assessors are directed to be appointed for estimating the yearly value of lands and heritages. The same is taken to be the rent at which, one year with another, they might be reasonably expected to let from year to year; and where the lands are bona fide let for a yearly rent conditioned as the fair annual value thereof, without grassum or consideration other than the rent, the rent is taken to be the yearly rent, except where the lands are let on a lease of a longer duration than twenty-one years, or in the case of minerals under a lease of a longer duration than thirty years. Where the lands consist of woods, copse, or underwood, the yearly value of the same is taken to be the rent at which such lands might, in their natural state, be reasonably expected to let from year to year as pasture or grazing lands. See also the Act 20 and 21 Vict. c. 58, 1857.

Valuation of Teinds. See Teinds.

Value, or Avail of Marriage. See Avail of Marriage.

Valued Policy. In marine insurance, a valued policy is a policy in which a specified value is put on the ship, goods or effects insured. This value is held to be of the nature of liquidated damages, to save the necessity of proof in the event of a total loss; and the value is, or ought to be, the value of the ship, or the prime cost of the goods at the date of effecting the policy. Such policies are said to have originated in the difficulty occasionally found, of proving the exact amount of the value of the interest insured; and if the insured be able to prove some interest, he need not prove interest to the full amount of value specified. But if such a policy could be proved to have been a mere cover for gambling, it would be void as a wager policy. Marshall, 110, 199. Vendition of a Ship; is the deed or instrument whereby a ship is conveyed either absolutely or in security. This conveyance must be in writing; but the complicated forms which were at one time required, are now considerably simplified. The sale or transfer may be either of the whole ship, or of one or more shares, and transfers and mortgages of ships and shares, as now regulated by the merchant shipping Act, 1854, 17 and 18 Vict., c. 101. Bell's Princ. p. 370; *Jurid. Vendor and Vendee. Vendor is the person who sells anything; and vendee is he to whom the sale is made. See Sale. Delivery.

Venysoun; a word anciently used in infestments, and in the English laws, signifying a license and power to hunt, take and slay of the King's venison within his parks and forests. Skene, h. t.

Verbal Obligations; are such as have no proper appellation; as, 1st, Promises on one part alone; therefore gratuitous. 2d, Verbal and mutual agreements. But verbal agreements regarding heritage are invalid (except where they regard a lease, which can be thus constituted for one year); and are not proveable by reference to oath of party. In obligations, in the constitution of which writing is usually employed, a verbal obligation even as to moveables is invalid; but a verbal obligation founded on or referable to any known contract, and in all cases where the value of the subject of the obligation is under L.100 Scots, may be proved by witnesses. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2 § 1, et seq.; Bell's Com. i. 330; Kames' Equity, 143. See Evidence. Pacta Liberatoria.

Verborum Obligatio; in the Roman law, was completed by certain verba solennia unknown in Scotland.

Verd, vert; according to Skene, from the Latin viride; a word anciently used in charters and infestments, and also in the English laws, where it is called "granehue," signifying power to cut green trees or wood. Also a power and license of pasturage within the King's forest. Skene, h. t.

Verdict; the judgment or deliverance of a jury. In criminal trials, the verdict is according to the votes of the majority of the jury. All verdicts returned before the adjournment of the Court must be viva voce; and if the jury are not unanimous, this circumstance must be stated by the chancellor in announcing the verdict. On the jury being asked what is their verdict, their chancellor proclaims it aloud; and if it is special or detailed, the clerk takes it down in the words of the chancellor on a slip of paper. It is then transferred to the record and read aloud to the jury, who are asked, "Is this your verdict?" After this, the verdict acquires the nature of a written verdict, and cannot be explained or modified by the declarations of the jury. Written verdicts are only competent where the Court adjourns before the verdict is returned. The names of the persons of assize are set down, and if a name is omitted, or a wrong one introduced in the sederunt, the error may be afterwards corrected, if the jury unanimously testify to the Court that the proper persons, and no other, were present on the occasion. The names of the chancellor and clerk are then mentioned, and after some further preamble, the judgment or finding is inserted. It is then signed by the chancellor and clerk, folded and sealed up in presence of the jurors while still enclosed. On returning to Court, the names of the assize are called over; they are asked who is their chancellor, and he delivers the verdict to the presiding judge, who, having unsealed and perused it, delivers it to the Clerk of Court, to be by him transferred into the record, after which it is read aloud, all the assize being still present to hear and acknowledge their verdict. The finding may be either, generally, guilty, not guilty, or not proven, or it may find certain things proven, from which the Court are left to draw the inference; 6 Geo. IV. c. 22; 9 Geo. IV. c. 29; Hume, ii. 426, et seq.; Alison's Prac. 631; Steele, 207.

In civil causes, a jury formerly required to be unanimous in their verdict. If they could not agree on their verdict within twelve hours, they were discharged, and the trial went for nothing; but if they unanimously applied to the Court for further time to consider their verdict, they were allowed such further time as they desired. By the act 22 and 23 Vict. c. 7, 1859, if after three hours deliberation nine of the jury agree, a verdict may be returned. See *Jury. Inquest. Chancellor. General Verdict. Special Verdict. Vergelt; a compensation for a wrong. Skene, h. t.

Vergens ad inopiam. When a man is clearly vergens ad inopiam, his creditors may legally resort to various measures calculated to secure their claims, which would be otherwise regarded as inadmissible or nimious. See Bell's Com. i. 223; ii. 68, 144; Bell's Princ. § 46; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 42; B. iii. tit. 3, § 65; tit. 6, § 10; Kames' Equity, 284.

Veritas Convicti, an Excuset? The general rule, both in the practice of England and Scotland, is, that in the criminal action for libel, veritas convicti is not admitted as a defence, and that when the circumstances of the case warrant the indulgence, it is allowed to be pleaded, only in mitigation of punishment. In civil cases, proof of the veritas is not admissible without an issue or issues in justification, setting forth the facts, the truth of which the defender undertakes to prove. See Brodie, 20th Jan. 1836, 14 S. & D. 267. Where a defender pleads veritas, the pursuer may meet him by counter evidence. It is not competent for a defender to justify his libel, by pleading that the pursuer has been similarly libelled by others; Goddard, Nov. 4, 1816, 1 Mur. 159; Edwards v. Macintosh, Dec. 23, 1823, 3 Mur. 369; Gilchrist v. Dempster, Sept. 10, 1823, 3 Mur. 363. See, generally, on this subject, Borthwick on Libel; *Ersk. Vicar, Vicarage. See Tiends.

Vice, Succeeding in the. Succeeding in the vice, is an intrusion whereby one enters into possession, in the place of a tenant bound to remove; such entry being made collusively with the outgoing tenant, and without the landlord's consent. In this case, both the tenant and he who thus collusively takes his place, are liable as violent possessors; because it was legally incumbent on the tenant to have left the possession void for the landlord's entry. The person succeeding in the vice, therefore, will be subjected as an intruder, unless he have a colourable title of possession to protect him. *Bank. View, Proof on; an extraordinary mode of proof by inspection judicially authorised. Bank. B. iv. tit. 26, § 4. See Evidence. Jury Trial.

Viewers. In jury causes, it is sometimes thought expedient that the jurors, or some of them, should have an opportunity of inspecting premises in dispute previously to the trial. When this is proposed, the course is, for the party wishing the view to apply to the Court for a view, giving notice to the agent of the opposite party. The application must be made at least six days previous to the day of trial; and where it is granted, six jurors are selected for the purpose, called viewers, who must be summoned by the sheriff to attend at the place in question, some convenient time before the trial, where the premises are pointed out to them by two persons, named by the Court, usually on the joint suggestion of the parties, and technically called shewers. The expense of such views is borne, in the first instance, by the parties equally, and no evidence can be adduced at the time of taking the view. The object of the view is, to render the ground of dispute more intelligible to the jury; but it will only be granted where the necessity of it is made very apparent. The attendance of agents at the view is disapproved of, and all discussion on that occasion is inadmissible. The shewers are the only parties properly entitled to interfere or communicate with the viewers. Where the subject of the view lies in the counties of Sutherland, or Caithness, or Orkney, which are not required to send jurors to Inverness, the sheriffs of these counties are required, by a special enactment, to return three persons of the county in which the action arises, to be viewers, who are also bound to attend the trial, and to be first called to serve on the jury. If, from any cause, it is expedient that these viewers should be sent from a neighbouring county, the Court may issue an order for a certain number of jurors from the nearest county, from which it is expedient to take them, who shall be bound to attend as viewers, and who shall be first called to serve on the jury. 55 *Geo. Violent Profits. "Violent profits are so called because they became due on the tenant's forcible or unwarrantable detaining the possession after he ought to have removed;" Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 54. In an action of removing, the defender must, in most cases, find caution for the violent profits; 1555, c. 39. He must be prepared with a cautioner for violent profits, at giving in his defences, unless he instantly verify a defence excluding the action; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825, Sheriff-court, c. vii. § 6. In rural tenements, the violent profits are held to be the full profits which the landlord could have made either by possessing the lands himself, or by letting them to others. In urban tenements, the violent profits are generally estimated at double the stipulated rent. See Watt v. Bell and Balfour, 10th July 1822, 1 S. & D. 556. If the tenant, in resisting the removing, have a probabilis causa litigandi, the rent decreed for will be limited to the rent stipulated in the lease; Ersk. ib. As to the effect of the tenant's bona fides where his lease is under reduction, and as to the period at which, in the course of such an action of reduction, his bona fides will be held to cease, to the effect of entitling the landlord to claim violent profits, see the *Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry v. Vis et Metus; form a good ground of reduction, if they be such as cadunt in constantem virum, not if they be trifling, or not present, or merely reverential, or proceeding from the just execution of legal diligence, and used for procuring a deed relating to a debt contained in the diligence. A third party interposing his credit, or advancing money in behalf of a person illegally threatened or forced, has, in a reduction, the same plea as he who was so relieved; and has, if unable to recover from the person menacing or forcing, right of recourse against the party relieved. Vitiation. Vitiation or alteration in a material part of any deed, e.g., the date of a bill, without consent of parties, is fatal to the document; independently of the objection on the stamp laws, unless the alteration be made evidently to correct a mistake, and in furtherance of the original intention. Vote, Casting. The privilege of giving a casting vote is sometimes conferred on the preses or chairman, or on some particular member of a meeting, or nomination of persons entitled to vote; that is, the person having this privilege is entitled not only to his deliberative vote as a member of the meeting, but also to a second vote in cases of equality. This right does not exist at common law; and must therefore be vested in the party exercising it, either by statute, or by special deed or agreement, binding on all the voters. See Election Law. Preses.

Voyage; the master and owners of a vessel are liable for the consequences of all misconduct on the voyage, such as sailing too late (unless the delay be involuntary, as from adverse or boisterous winds)—sailing without convoy in time of war—going unnecessarily out of the usual course, under the limitations of 26 Geo. III.—navigating carelessly—failing to deliver the cargo to the proper persons in safety, according to the local customs, &c., &c. Shipowners are liable under the edict Nautæ, &c., except that they are answerable only up to the value of the ship, at the time of the loss, and of the whole freight, and are not answerable for the act of God, or of the Queen's enemies, or for accidental fire; 26 Geo. Wadset; is the conveyance of land in pledge for, or in satisfaction of a debt or obligation, with a reserved power to the debtor to recover his lands, on payment or performance. The lender is called the wadsetter, and the borrower the reverser. Formerly the reverser never parted with more than the bare possession of his lands, regularly pledged, until payment; but afterwards a wadset assumed the form of an absolute conveyance, and the debtor got separate letters of reversion from the creditor, which, as conveying a right merely personal at common law, were, by 1469, c. 27, made effectual against the singular successors of the wadsetter. Such a right of reversion, when duly registered, never prescribes. See Redeemable Rights. Rights of Reversion. Redemption. Wadset is now little used; but, when it is, it is generally effected by a mutual contract. Wadset is proper or improper. Under a proper wadset, the wadsetter enjoys the yearly profits of the wadset lands, in satisfaction of his interest, during the non-redemption; while, by the improper wadset, which is in fact nothing more than a pignus or right in security, the wadsetter is accountable to the reverser for the excess of the rents over the interest, and can claim from him the deficit from the interest of his money; thus undertaking no part of the hazard of the rents, and being obliged to account for any excess of rent, as payment pro tanto of the capital. Hence, a clause adjoined to a proper wadset to the effect of defending the wadsetter against all risk is, by 1661, c. 62, declared usurious; and a proper wadsetter forcibly turned out of possession, has a personal claim for his rents against the reverser. The provision of a determinate rent in corn, or of redemption on payment of the principal and interest, makes a wadset improper; but a proper wadset may contain an obligation of relief from public burdens in the wadsetter's favour. Even a proper wadsetter may grant a back tack to the reverser for payment of a certain tack-duty, in lieu of interest; thus rendering his wadset improper; and the payment of the tack-duties may, by special provision, be made a real burden on the redemption (though not a debitum fundi until redemption), if the back-tack be either engrossed in the wadset, or registered in the register of reversions; 1617, c. 16. A conventional irritancy on failure to pay the tack-duty is more liberally interpreted than a similar provision in a sale under reversion; and, on declarator of the irritancy, the wadset, if formerly proper, resumes its character. By 1661, c. 62, all proper wadsetters must, during non-requisition of the sum lent, quit possession on offer of security for payment of the interest by the reverser, or any in his right; or else impute the excess of rent over the interest in payment of the capital sum; the wadset being then held improper. As an eik to the reversion of a wadset which had been previously burdened with a back-tack to the reverser, is not real against the reverser's singular successor, a wadsetter, whose right is to be declared extinguished by possession, cannot ascribe his intromissions to the sums contained in the eik. *Ersk. Wager. Wagers and gaming debts are regarded in the law of Scotland as pacta illicita, as not partaking of the nature of serious business, but as mere pastime and amusement. Hence, no action is competent for the recovery of any sum gained by betting or wagering in any form. The view taken in Scotland is, that courts are instituted to enforce the rights of parties arising from serious transactions, and can pay no regard to sponsiones ludicrae. For the same reason, if the money lost has been actually paid, the loser cannot recover it in an action; for, in such a case, the maxim melior est conditio possidentis applies; Wordsworth, 15th May 1799, Mor. p. 9524. In England the law was formerly different; but some very eminent judges in that country expressed regret that it was so. By the English statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, § 18, all contracts by way of gaming or wagering are declared null and void. See Bell's Com. i. 300, et seq. and notes. By the act 1621, c. 14, it is enacted that if any man wins more than 100 merks (L.5, 11s. 1¹/₂d.) at cards or dice, within twenty-four hours, or by wagers upon horse races, the surplus shall, within twenty-four hours thereafter, be consigned in the hands of the kirk-treasurer, if in Edinburgh, and, if in a country parish, of the kirk-session, for the use of the poor of the parish. Power is given to magistrates, sheriffs, and justices of the peace to pursue, and, failing their doing so, a common informer may sue for double the sum—one half of which goes to the poor, and the other to the informer. This act was found not to be in desuetude in 1774; Maxwell, 14th July 1774, Mor. p. 9522. And, by 9 Anne, c. 13, any person who, by any fraud in playing at cards, dice, &c., or in betting, wins any money, or at one sitting wins above L.10, shall forfeit five times the value of the money, or other thing won, to any person who shall sue for it; and, besides, shall be deemed infamous, and punished as in cases of perjury. By the same statute, all bonds or other securities given for money won at play, or lent at the time to play with, are declared utterly void; and all mortgages or encumbrances of land made on the same considerations are ordered to be made over for the use of the mortgagor; Bell's Com. i. 300. See also *Hutch. Wager Policy; has been defined, a pretended insurance founded on an ideal risk, where the insured has no interest in the thing insured, and can therefore sustain no loss by the happening of any of the misfortunes insured against. Such insurances are usually expressed by the words, "interest or no interest,"—or "without farther proof of the interest than the policy,"—or "without benefit of salvage to the insurer." Notwithstanding the general principle that insurance is a contract of indemnity, such policies came in England, after some fluctuation in judicial opinions, to be held as legal contracts at common law; and the gambling thus legalised became so prevalent and injurious, that wager policies, as above defined, were prohibited by the statute 19 Geo. II. c. 37. Valued policies have sometimes been made the cover for wager policies; as to which the general rule seems to be, that where, in a valued policy, the interest is so small as to be a mere cover for a wager, the contract will be void; but, on the other hand, when it appears that the contract is fairly meant as an indemnity, a valued policy is not held to fall under the statutory prohibition; nor will courts of law inquire minutely whether the valuation specified in the policy is or is not very near the true interest of the insured. Marshall, 199 and 95, 112. Arnould on Marine Insurance, 329. Wages. A workman or servant hired to a precise day or term, is entitled to his whole wages, although prevented from making out his engagement by sickness or other necessary cause, as the master's death, or his own dismissal without good reason; but, if the servant die, wages are due only to the day of his death. A master, in like manner, is entitled to the whole apprentice-fee of an apprentice who has died, or deserted his service; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 16. Servants' wages are privileged debts for the current term, both on the death and on the bankruptcy of the master, provided they be strictly servants' wages; Bell's Com. ii. 157; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 43. See Privileged Debts. Executor. Claims for servants' wages fall under the triennial prescription of 1579, c. 83; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 17; Bell's Com. i. 332. Servants' wages are alimentary, and cannot be arrested, in so far as they exceed what is required for subsistence: arrears of them, however, may be arrested. By the Small Debt Act, 1 Vict. c. 41, § 7, wages of labourers and manufacturers, so far as necessary for their subsistence, are deemed alimentary, and, in like manner as servants' fees and other alimentary funds, not liable to arrestment. Every agreement as to seamen's wages must be in writing, signed by each mariner within three days after entry; but need not be stamped as to coasting vessels. The pay stipulated in the colonies must not exceed double the British pay, and must be paid within thirty days after arrival, or at discharge. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 6, § 7; Bell's Com. i. 75. With regard to seamen's wages, the claim for which is regulated in a great measure by statute, see Seamen. Waife Beast; "an animal which wanders and wanders without any known master, which, when any one finds it within his own bounds, he ought to cause to be proclaimed diverse and sundry times upon market days, at the parish kirk, and within the sheriffdom; otherwise, if he detain the same, he may be accused for theft therefor." It is "leasum to the owner of the beast to repeat and challenge the same within year and day." Stace, h. t. See Estray.

Waith or Waif Cattle. Waif cattle belong to the Queen (i.e. to her donatary the sheriff), where advertised and not claimed within a year, unless the proprietor on whose lands they were found have a grant of waifs. Inanimate property lost is not supposed to go to the Queen. Ersk. B. i. tit. 1, § 12; Stair, B. ii. tit. 1, § 5; B. i. tit. 7, § 3; Bank. i. 221, 208-9; Bell's Princ. § 1294; *Kames' Stat. Wakening. Where a summons is not called within year and day after its execution, the instance falls, and a new action must be raised. But where, at any time after calling, no judicial proceeding takes place in the action for a year and day, the depending process merely falls asleep, and may then be awakened at any time within the period of the long prescription, either by written consent of parties through their counsel, or by an action of wakening (which, on the death of a party, was formerly often conjoined with an action of transference). This action might be raised at the instance of either party, grounded upon the last step of procedure, and insisting against every defender of a number, in the conclusion proper to him. The inducies of a summons of wakening were six days. The summons was then called like an ordinary action; but it was not necessary to enrol it in the printed rolls of the Outer House. It might be put at once to the hand-roll of the Lord Ordinary in the principal cause. By the Act 13 and 14 Vict. c. 36, § 30, 1850, actions may now be wakened without a summons, but by an order of the Lord Ordinary in the cause, after ten days' intimation of a motion by either of the parties to that effect. By the same act an action of transference is made to include a wakening. Actions on the proper Inner House roll, and those in which decree has been pronounced, never sleep. *Ersk. Ware of the Sea; (alga maris). According to Skene, he who was infest with ware, might stop and make impediment to all other persons, both within and without flood-mark, to gather ware, for "mucking and guding of their lands;" or to gather "wilkes, cockles, lempers, mussels, sandeiles, small fish, or baite, upon the sand or craiges foreanent his lands." But if any person were not infest with this privilege, he could not prevent the king, or any of his lieges from doing so, or from "winning stanes, or exercising onie uther industrie, to their profit, within floud-marke." Skene, h. t. See Sea. Seashore.

Warehousing. The warehousing system is that by which merchants are enabled to deposit goods imported from abroad, in warehouses belonging to the Crown, without paying the duty for importation. The goods are kept in bond, as it is called, until the merchant pays the duty and removes them from the warehouse. The warehousing system has been the subject of various legislative enactments, the subsisting act being 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 57, and 16 and 17 Vict. c. 107. On the construction of the warehousing acts, the following authorities may be consulted:—*Bell's Com. i. 186; Bell's Princ. § 1368; Ersk. Warning of Servants. Unless the master or the servant give warning to the other, at least forty days before the term, they are held to continue their contract till another term. The terms are usually Whitsunday or Martinmas, unless where the agreement of parties, the custom of the service, or local usage has fixed other term days. Such agreement or usage may also alter the length of notice required, or overcome the presumption for tacit relocation. Warning may be given indirectly, by any steps being taken which cannot fail to make the parties aware of each other's intention; but what circumstances shall be held equivalent to warning, is a question of evidence which necessarily depends on the specialties of individual cases. It has been decided, that certain circumstances indicating an intention of the master to let the garden which the servant was hired to manage, and on the servant's part, a knowledge of this, and application for service elsewhere, were not sufficient to supply the want of warning; Maclean, Feb. 4, 1813, F. C. See *Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 16, notes by Ivory; Bell's Princ. § 173-4; Illust. ib.; Hutch. Warrantice; is the obligation whereby a party conveying a subject or right, is bound to indemnify the grantee, disponee or receiver of the right, in case of eviction, or of real claims or burdens being made effectual against the subject arising out of obligations or transactions antecedent to the date of the conveyance. Warrantice is either personal or real. Personal warrantice, by which the granter and his heirs are bound personally, is general or special, of which the former is interpreted by the rules of implied warrantice, while the latter is either, 1st, Simple, viz. that the granter shall do nothing inconsistent with the grant, which is that implied in donations; 2d, From fact and deed, i.e. that he neither has done, nor shall do, any contrary deed, which is that implied in transactions; or, 3d, Absolute, contra omnes mortales, against all deadly, whereby the granter is liable for every defect in the right which he has granted. This liability is sometimes expressly limited to the extent of the price or equivalent received; but where it is not, it extends to the full value of the subject at the date of eviction, and to all damage whatever consequent upon eviction. See Eviction. As to implied warrantice, it does not, in assignments, reach to the solvency of the debtor; and even absolute warrandice in such a case, however anxiously expressed, imports merely, that the bond or other voucher is a valid deed. In donations, warrandice against the voluntary deeds of the donor is implied, and in all onerous deeds, absolute warrandice (restricted, however, to the mere value in redeemable and personal rights) is implied; but no warrandice is implied against a bare consentor to a conveyance. Express warrandice supersedes implied; and parties may provide, or tacitly consent to any kind of warrandice, or even that there shall be none at all. A grantor expressly exempted from warrandice is not, however, secured, if he grant a subsequent inconsistent deed. The Sovereign, though liable in no warrandice when granting rights jure coronæ, is liable, as a subject, when acting tanquam quilibet, and thus burdens himself and the heirs to his private patrimony. Churchmen, having feued or leased lands annexed to the Crown by 1587, c. 29, were obliged in warrandice from fact and deed merely, however their former express warrandice ran. Real warrandice is that whereby certain lands, called warrandice lands, are made over eventually in security of the lands conveyed. In excambion, real warrandice is implied. See Excambion. Warrandice, moreover, though from fact and deed merely, may be incurred simply from the nature of the obligation; as where a liferent out of lands to a widow is warranted to a certain amount, in which case the grantor is liable for every accident by which the lands may be prevented from yielding so much. No contravention, however, of warrandice is inferred from events not anterior to the conveyance, or from the operation of a supervenient public law, or arising from the legal effects of ownership, unless the grantee has obtained special warrandice against such grounds of eviction. Warrandice, it ought to be borne in mind, is not an obligation to defend the right warranted, but to indemnify in case of eviction. Hence, warrandice is not incurred until judicial eviction, unless it can be shown that the ground of eviction is undeniable, and that it proceeds from the fault of the seller, in which case the purchaser may sue at once, and before eviction, to have the ground of eviction purged, or for indemnification. Where the eviction is partial, a corresponding indemnification is due under the warrandice. A real burden must be discharged, if covered by the warrandice; although warrandice being stricti juris, small matters, or trifling servitudes will not infer warrandice. Neither will the purchaser have any claim under the warrandice, if the purpose of his purchase is defeated as a nuisance. Where eviction has taken place, the claim of indemnification extends to the value of the subject as at the date of eviction, and not merely to the price paid. But the person bound in warrandice is entitled to have notice of the claim, or attempt to evict; and although the purchaser is not bound to defend the right, yet, if he undertake the defence without notice, and omit a good plea, the seller will be free. On the other hand, the seller is not bound to defend against the claim, and if the purchaser do so while the seller declines, and if such defence fails, the purchaser will not be entitled to the expense of the litigation. A conveyance in real warrandice does not fall under the act 1696, c. 5, as a security for future debt; Bell's Com. ii. 280; but it must be completed by sasine duly recorded, although lands disposed in this way may be effectually bound after forty years in case of eviction. B.* ii. tit. 3, § 25, et seq.; Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 27; B. iv. tit. 35, § 24; B. ii. tit. 3, § 46, et seq.; B. iv. tit. 20, § 29; Bell's Com. i. 644; Bell's Princ. p. 245, and authorities there cited; Illust. § 894; More's Notes on Stair, p. xci.; Brodie's Supp. 909; Bank. i. 576, et seq.; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825), 116, 185, 190; *Kames' Stat. By the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, 1856, a seller is not held to warrant the quality or sufficiency of the goods sold unless he shall have given an express warranty, or unless the goods have been sold for a specified and particular purpose.

Waygoing Crop. The usual terms of removal, under an agricultural lease, are Whitsunday, as to the houses and grass, and Martinmas, or the separation of that year's crop, as to the arable land; and the crop sown by the tenant, in the spring of the year of removal, is called his away-going, or way- going crop. The general rule is, that the tenant is entitled to reap the crop which has been sown before the term of removal; as having had the right of exclusive possession during seed-time. But there have been conflicting decisions upon the point, and cases where, from special circumstances, the tenant's right to the waygoing crop would have given him one year's rent more than he had paid rent for, and where therefore it was disallowed. In absence of express provision, it has been held that the outgoing tenant has no right to keep possession of the barns and similar offices, for thrashing out and disposing of the last crop, longer than the Martinmas succeeding the Whitsunday of his removal. But local usage sometimes establishes a different rule. Bell on Leases, i. 330; ii. 97; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Bell's Princ. § 1269; Illust. ib. See Grass. Straw. Fallow.

Weights and Measures. Weights and measures have been the subject of many statutory enactments; see 1491, c. 33; 1540, c. 114; 1607, c. 2; 1621, c. 17. After many ineffectual attempts to equalise the weights and measures throughout the kingdom, that object was effected by the act 5 Geo. IV. c. 74, amended by 6 Geo. IV. c. 12, and 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 63, which last act repealed 4 and 5 Will. IV. c. 49. The following are the principal provisions of these statutes: The straight line between the gold studs in the brass rod in the custody of the clerk of the House of Commons, on which "standard yard, 1760," is engraved, is denominated the "imperial standard yard," and is declared to be the unit or only standard measure of extension, from which all other measures, lineal, superficial, or solid, are to be ascertained. Thus, $\frac{3}{4}$ of this standard yard is a standard foot; $\frac{1}{12}$ of a foot is an inch; $5\frac{1}{2}$ yards are a pole or perch; 220 yards a furlong, and 1760 yards a mile; 5 Geo. IV. c. 74, § 1. A rood of land contains 1210 square standard yards, and an acre 4840 square yards, or 160 square perches, poles or rods; § 2. Directions are given for the restoration of the standard yard, if it should be lost or destroyed, it having been discovered, that when compared with a pendulum vibrating seconds of mean time in the latitude of London, in a vacuum at the level of the sea, the imperial standard yard is in the proportion of 36 inches to $39\frac{139}{10000}$ inches; § 3. The standard brass weight of one pound troy weight, made in 1758, in the custody of the clerk of the House of Commons, is denominated the imperial standard troy pound, and is declared to be the unit or only standard measure of weight, from which others are to be ascertained. Thus, $\frac{1}{16}$ of the troy pound is an ounce; $\frac{1}{20}$ of an ounce a pennyweight; and $\frac{1}{48}$ of a pennyweight a grain; so that 5760 such grains are a troy pound. A pound avoirdupois is equal to 7000 such grains; $\frac{1}{16}$ of a pound avoirdupois is an ounce avoirdupois, and $\frac{1}{16}$ of such ounce is a dram; § 4. Directions are given for the restoration of the standard pound, it having been ascertained that a cubic inch of distilled water, weighed in air by brass weights, at the temperature of 62° Fahrenheit, barometer thirty inches, is equal in weight to $252\frac{4688}{10000}$ grains; § 5. The standard measure for capacity, for liquids and dry goods not measured by heaped measure, is the gallon, containing ten pounds avoirdupois of distilled water, weighed in air, the thermometer and barometer standing as above. A measure was directed to be made forthwith of such contents, and was declared to be the imperial standard gallon, and the unit and only standard measure of capacity. A quart is $\frac{1}{4}$ of the standard gallon; a pint $\frac{1}{2}$ of a gallon; the peck two gallons; the bushel eight gallons; and eight bushels a quarter of corn, or other dry goods, not measured by heaped measure; § 6. It was directed that the standard measure of capacity for goods commonly sold by heaped measure, should be the aforesaid bushel, containing eighty pounds avoirdupois of water, being made round with a plain and even bottom, and being 19 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches from outside to outside. Directions were likewise given for the manner in which the bushel should be heaped; §§ 7 and 8. But by 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 63, § 7, heaped measure is abolished, bargains by heaped measure are declared null and void, and every person selling articles by heaped measure forfeits 40s. toties quoties. Yet, as some articles heretofore sold by heaped measure are, from their size and shape, incapable of being stricken, and, from their nature and quality, may not be conveniently sold by weight, it is provided by § 8, that such articles may be sold by a bushel measure, corresponding in shape with the bushel above described, or by any multiple or aliquot part of such bushel, filled in all parts as nearly to the level of the brim as the size and shape of the articles will admit. This provision is declared not to prevent the sale by weight of any article heretofore sold by heaped measure. It is provided that all coals, slack, culm, and cannel, of every description, must be sold by weight, and not by measure, and whoever sells such articles by measure, forfeits forty shillings for every offence; 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 63, § 9. Things not formerly allowed to be sold by heaped measure, and agreed to be sold by weight or measure, must be sold by the standard of weight, or by the standard gallon, or some multiple or aliquot part thereof; and the measures must be stricken with a round stick, straight, and of the same diameter from end to end; 5 Geo. IV. c. 74, § 9. The same act requires that all weights and measures should be models and copies in shape of the standards deposited in Exchequer, and provision is made for obtaining such copies; §§ 11, 12, 13. But, by the last act, this provision is repealed; 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 63, § 3. And it is provided, that weights and measures verified at Exchequer shall be taken as legal, although not similar in shape to those required by 5 Geo. IV., and the superintending officer is empowered to verify and stamp weights and measures, although not of the required shape; § 4. Copies of the standard weights and measures which have been worn and mended, may be sent to Exchequer to be re-verified; § 5; The use of customary weights and measures allowed by 5 Geo. IV., is abolished by 5 and 6 Will. IV.; and it is provided, that any one selling, by any denomination of measure, other than one of the imperial measures, or some multiple or aliquot part, is liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for every such sale. But this provision is declared not to prevent the sale of any articles in any vessel, where the vessel is not represented as containing any amount of imperial measure, or of any fixed, local, or customary measure heretofore in use; § 6. All articles sold by weight must be sold by avoirdupois weight, except gold, silver, platina, diamonds, or other precious stones, which may be sold by troy weight, and drugs, which, when sold by retail, may be sold by apothecaries' weight; § 10. The weight denominated a stone, must, in all cases, consist of fourteen standard lbs. avoirdupois; a cwt. of eight such stones; and a ton of twenty such cwt.; § 11. All weights made after the passing of the act, of the weight one lb. avoirdupois, or more, must have the number of lbs. contained in them, stamped or cast on the top or side, in legible figures or letters; and all measures of capacity must have their contents marked on the outside, in legible figures or letters; § 12. No weight made of lead or pewter, or of any mixture thereof, can be stamped or used; but these metals may be used in the manufacture of weights, if they be wholly and substantially cased with brass, copper, or iron, and legibly marked "cased," and a plug of lead or pewter may be inserted into weights, if bona fide necessary for the purpose of adjusting them, and affixing thereon the after-mentioned stamp; § 13. Provision was made for ascertaining and providing for the fulfilment of all contracts existing at the passing of the act, and fixing the payments to be made of all stipends, feu-duties, rents, tolls, customs, casualties, and other demands payable in Scotland, by directing that the sheriff of each county should, soon, after the passing of the act, summon a jury to ascertain the several amounts; § 15. The fiars prices of all grain in every county, must be struck by the imperial quarter, and all other returns of the prices of grain must be set forth by the same, without reference to any other measure. And any sheriff-clerk, clerk of a market, or other person, offending against this provision, forfeits a sum not exceeding L.5; § 16. In Scotland, the justices of peace at the general or quarter sessions, or a meeting called by the sheriff or magistrates, are directed to determine the number of copies of the imperial standard weights and measures requisite for the comparison of the weights and measures within their respective jurisdictions, to direct the procuring of them, and to fix the places at which they shall be deposited. They are also directed to provide inspectors, &c.; § 17. The justices and magistrates must provide for the use of the inspectors good and sufficient stamps for stamping weights and measures used in each county, &c., and all weights and measures, except as after excepted, used for buying or selling, or for the collecting of tolls or duties, or for making charges on the conveyance of goods, must be examined and compared with one or more of the above-mentioned copies. The inspectors must stamp, in such manner as best to prevent fraud, the weights and measures, when examined and compared, if found to correspond with the said copies. The inspector's fees are specified in a schedule annexed to the act. Every person using a weight or measure other than those authorised by the act, or some aliquot part thereof, or which has not been stamped, except as after excepted, or which has been found light or otherwise unjust, is liable to a penalty not exceeding L.5: the bargain is null; and the weight or measure is forfeited. As 56 lbs. is the greatest imperial standard weight deposited in Exchequer, no single weight above 56 lbs. requires to be stamped. Any wooden or wicker measure used in the sale of lime, or such like articles, or glass or earthenware jug or drinking cup, though represented as containing the amount of any imperial measure, or of any multiple thereof, does not require to be stamped; but any person buying by any such vessel is authorised to require the contents to be ascertained by comparison with a stamped measure, to be provided by the seller; and if the seller refuse such comparison, he makes himself liable to the penalties for using light weights; § 21. Provision is made for defraying the expenses of providing copies of standard weights, and of the remuneration to inspectors; § 22. No maker or seller of weights can be appointed inspector. Various provisions are made respecting the appointment, duties, and liabilities of inspectors; §§ 23, 24, 25. Weights and measures when once stamped, are legal throughout the kingdom, and need not be re-stamped on being used in a different place than that in which they were stamped; § 27. Power is given to sheriffs, justices, and magistrates, at all reasonable times, to enter any shop, store, warehouse, &c. within their jurisdiction, in which goods are sold or are weighed, and there to examine the weights, steelyards, &c., and compare them with the standard copies; and if the weights and measures prove light or unjust, they are forfeited, and the person in whose possession they are found forfeits a sum not exceeding L.5. And any person having an unjust steelyard or other weighing machine, or who refuses to produce weights, measures, &c., when required, is liable to a like penalty; § 28. An inspector, for every instance of misconduct or neglect of duty, forfeits a sum not exceeding L.5. Forging, or assisting in forging, the stamps or marks, subjects to a penalty from L.10 to L.50; selling, uttering, or exposing to sale, weights or measures with such forged stamps, subjects to a penalty of from 40s. to L.10. All such weights and measures are directed to be broken up; § 31. The printer who prints, or the clerk of market who makes any return, price-list, &c., denoting greater or less weight or measure than the same denomination of imperial weight or measure, forfeits for each offence a sum not exceeding 10s.; § 31. Provision is made for the recovery of penalties before sheriffs, magistrates, or two or more justices, at the instance of the procurator-fiscal, or any person who may prosecute for them; § 37. An appeal is provided to the circuit court, in which, instead of finding caution in terms of 20 Geo. II. c. 43, the appellant is bound to find caution to pay the penalties and expenses in the event of the appeal being dismissed. No other appeal is competent; § 38. Weregild; or Cro; was the assythment due by an offender to the friends of one killed

Whales. By the leges forestarum, § 17, all whales thrown ashore, of above six power draught, belong to the Queen; but in practice they require to be of much greater size before they become her Majesty's property, or that of the admiral, her donatary. With regard to the smaller whales cast on shore, it has been a question whether they belong to the landlord or the tenant. The rule seems to be that they belong to the catcher, without regard to the rights of landlord and tenant. But in the Shetland islands, by usage, such whales belong half to the proprietor on whose lands they are driven, and half to those concerned in catching them; *Stove v. Wharfage Dues; are a burden, operating lien, not on the goods, but on the ship. Bell's Com. ii. 101.

Wharfinger. Delivery of goods sold, while in wharf, is completed by transfer in the wharfinger's books from the seller's name to the buyer's, the wharfinger then becoming custodian for the buyer; or simply by notice to the wharfinger, or other custodian, which may be proved by the transfer itself, by postmark or acceptance of written order, or by evidence of party or other witnesses. Wharfingers are liable for goods lodged with them, and for the negligence of those whom they may employ to unload vessels. They have a lien on the goods for their balance, by usage, which usage forms matter of evidence. Bell's Com. i. 183, 200, 558; ii. 107; Bell's Princ. §§ 236, 1434; Brodie's Sup. 872, 881, 920. Whitebonnet. A whitebonnet or puffer, is a person who, in collusion with the exposor, or other party interested in a sale by auction, attends the sale, to raise the price by making offers, so as to lead on to other offerers; while the whitebonnet himself holds either an express or an implied obligation, from the party for whom he interferes, to relieve him of the consequences of his offer, in case the subject should fall into his hands. The intervention of a whitebonnet is held in law to be a fraud upon the other bidders, and either the next highest offerer will be preferred to the purchase, or the sale effected by such means may be entirely set aside; Gray, 7th July 1753, Mor. 9560; *Anderson, 16th Dec. 1814, Fac. Whitsundayes Styles; according to Skene, were certain constitutions and statutes which freeholders, both spiritual and temporal, especially convents of abbeys, and religious places, made betwixt them and their tenants before Whitsunday, for service to be done to them, and better labouring of their lands, and payment of their duty. Skene, h. t.

Whitsunday; was formerly a moveable term, often reaching far into summer; but the legal term of removing, both in burgh and in rural tenements, was fixed, by 1690, c. 39, to be the 15th May, a provision extended, by 1693, c. 24, to every other civil question. *Ersk. Widows' Funds. The funds provided for the widows of members of various societies have been the subject of statutory enactments. Thus, the Advocates' Widows' Fund is regulated by 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. cxli., and that of the Society of Writers to the Signet by several statutes. But the most important widows' fund, and that which has come most frequently under judicial consideration, is the Ministers' Widows' Fund.—This fund has been the subject of several statutes, the one now in force being 19 Geo. III. c. 20, as amended by 54 Geo. III. c. clxix. This statute bears to have been passed for the purpose of raising and securing a fund for a provision for the widows and children of the ministers of the Church of Scotland, and of the heads, principals, and masters in the Universities of St Andrews, Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Aberdeen. The statutes 17 and 22 Geo. II. are repealed. All who are admitted to any of the offices above mentioned are liable in the payment of certain annual rates, varying, by the older act, from L.2, 12s. 6d. to L.6, 11s. 3d. But by the later act (54 Geo. III. c. clxix.), on the preamble, that the annuities were found insufficient for their purpose, the rates were increased, and are now L.3, 3s., L.4, 14s. 6d., L.6, 6s., and L.7, 17s. 6d. When the benefice or office is of a temporary or precarious nature, the holder is not liable, nor entitled to claim the benefit of the fund. Assistants and successors are not held as admitted to a benefice or office until they come to have full right to the benefice or salary. Ministers of the parliamentary churches, established by 5 Geo. IV. c. 90., were held entitled and compellable to become contributors to the Ministers' Widows' Fund; Gordon, 18th Feb. 1836, 14 D. B. M. 509. And in a question between the same parties, it was afterwards decided, that a minister who, in ignorance of his right to become a contributor to the ministers' widows' fund, had allowed several years to elapse without claiming such right, was liable as a contributor from the date of his induction, at the rate fixed by the statute for those who have not duly declared their selection of one of the several rates; and that he was chargeable with interest on the arrears of such rate; Gordon, 15th Nov. 1836, 15 D. B. M. 15. In a more recent case, however, it was held by a majority of the whole Judges (overruling the decision in the above case of Gordon), that a clergyman appointed under the statutes for erecting additional churches in the Highlands is not entitled to become a contributor to the ministers' widows' fund; Pearson, 24th May 1838. A third charge, revived and instituted in a parish where there were only two, was held to be permanently endowed, and to be a benefice in the sense of the act, and the vacant stipend was found to be due to the fund; Magistrates of Stirling, 24th Feb. 1837, 15 D. B. M. 657. The ministers and professors must make their choice of the rates which they intend to pay, within certain specified periods, varying according to the situation of the benefice; and every minister, &c., neglecting to give notice, is held to have made his election of the annual rate of L.3, 18s. 9d. (now L.4, 14s. 6d.), for which he is liable during life. At the first Candlemas after making his election, the minister or professor must make payment of the rate for the period during which he has already enjoyed his benefice or office, and a year's rate at each succeeding Candlemas. If at his death he be entitled to only one-half of his salary or stipend for the year, half of the rate only is payable at the succeeding Candlemas. On marriage, he pays double rate a year after his marriage; and, in like manner, a married man pays double rate the first year after his admission into a benefice, or other office. He is not liable to this additional tax if the person whom he marries is an annuitant under the act. Persons of forty years of age, at their admission having a child or children, are liable to a payment of two and a-half years' rate, to be made at the term of Candlemas first after they have, or ought to have, made their election. But if they be bachelors, or widowers without children, they are not liable to this tax, unless they marry afterwards, in which case it must be paid at the first Candlemas after the marriage. Besides the sums payable on account of marriage, or entering after being forty years of age, the later act directs that an addition thereto, at the rate of 20 per cent., shall be paid. Persons holding two offices are not subject to an additional rate. Rate is payable for the first half-year succeeding the death of the person liable, out of the ann.; and where no ann. is competent, by his heirs and executors. A rate of L.3. 2s. is, by the older act, payable during every half-year of a vacancy. By the later act, 20 per cent. additional is laid upon all the rates payable; and it is provided that the whole of the vacant stipend shall be paid into the fund. See Vacant Stipends. Intimation must be made to the persons liable, by the moderators of presbyteries, and the principals of universities, or their clerks, within three months after the rate falls due, under pain of their becoming liable for the full expenses and damages sustained by the fund through such default. The rates begin to bear interest eleven days after the respective terms. In default of intimation being made as above required, the principals and moderators, or their clerks, are liable for the interest, instead of the minister or other payer of rate. The rates and other sums payable, together with the interest, are privileged debts, and preferable to all other debts of the persons liable, not only on their benefices and salaries, but also upon their whole other personal estate. The full expenses incurred in recovering the sums due to this fund may also be recovered out of their respective estates, without abatement. In virtue of this section of the act, the collector of the fund has been found preferable to all other creditors on the personal estate for all sums due to the fund; to the funeral expenses; and to a right of retention pleaded by an heir, in whose hands the collector had arrested the stipend due to the minister; Bell's Com. ii. 159. The money is directed to be applied for payment of the charges of management; for raising the capital; and for paying the annuities to widows. By the older act, if the husband was liable to the annual rate of L.2, 12s. 6d., the widow got an annuity of L.10; if to L.3, 18s. 9d., the widow got L.15; if to L.5, 5s., the widow got L.20; if to L.6, 11s. 3d., the widow got L.25. But in consequence of the additional rates made payable by the later act, additions were made to the annuities. The trustees were directed, at their meeting on the third Tuesday of February 1822, to calculate the average amount of the annual produce of this excess, which average should be fixed upon as the sum to be divided among the number of widows and children then upon the fund, and the proportion of such average which should fall to each widow or family of children, was directed to be fixed upon as the sum to be thenceforth paid annually to each widow or family of children. Provision is made for new accumulations and new additions; and the additions are directed to be paid as the former annuities were payable. From an excellent report prepared by the late Mr Cleghorn in the year 1831, it appears that from 1827, down to the date of the report, the widows had drawn annuities of L.22, L.30, L.38, and L.46 respectively; and the children L.8, L.10, L.11, and L.13. Upon the death or marriage of any widow, her annuity determines as upon the 26th of May or 22d of November immediately preceding. If she die or marry before the lapse of ten years from the commencement of her annuity, and her former husband shall have left a child or children under sixteen years of age, at her death or marriage, such child or children are entitled to a sum of money equal to ten years of the said widow's annuity, under deduction of what she has received, to be equally divided among the children. A widow marrying a person liable in payment of rate continues an annuitant; and if she survive her second husband, she is entitled to an annuity corresponding to the rate paid by him. But if her former husband have left a child or children under the age of sixteen years at the date of her second marriage, and she have not drawn ten years' annuity, her annuity determines as in the usual case, and such child or children are entitled to the reversion of her ten years' annuity, in the same manner as if she had married a person not subject to the payment of rate. The child or children of a widower are entitled to a sum equal to ten years of the annuity that would have been payable to their father's widow, to be equally divided among them. When the rate paid has not amounted to three years of its corresponding annuity, the trustees may stop the half of the annuity, until either the widow pay into the fund, or the stoppages shall amount to what, together with the rate paid, is equal to three years' annuity. So with the annuities to children. Loans to ministers are required to be discontinued, and directions are given for raising the capital. Provision is made for the election of trustees, who are authorised to levy the rates and other sums payable, and to issue the same for the purposes of the act, but who cannot lend out, re-employ, or uplift any part of the capital without the advice and consent of the Lord President and the two senior Judges of the Court of Session, the Lord Chief Baron and the senior Baron of the Court of Exchequer (there is now only one Baron of Exchequer, and the Lord Justice-General and Lord Justice-Clerk for the time being, or any three of them. Provision is made for the election of clerks and of the collector of the fund, and powers are given to the collector to take steps for carrying the purposes of the act into execution. He is directed to keep a public office in Edinburgh. He must deduct from the annuities of widows and children the sums due by their deceased husbands and fathers. Letters of horning are directed to be issued, at the instance of the general collector, against the contributors and others, in the same manner as hornings at the instance of the Scotch clergy for payment of their stipends. The form of letters of horning, at the instance of the collector of the ministers' widows' fund, is given in Jurid. Styles, iii. 730. Provision is made for the filling up of vacancies. Directions are given for the making up of lists of the persons liable in payment of rates, and of the widows and children entitled to annuities, to whom certificates are directed to be given. In processes of modification and augmentation of stipends, the annual rates payable by the ministers of the Church of Scotland, by virtue of this act, are deemed and computed as part of their stipends. Both the older act and the amending act are declared public acts. The annuities due to ministers' widows and children are alimentary, and cannot be arrested. The benefit of the act 33 Geo. III. c. 54, permitting the formation of friendly societies, is extended by a later statute to institutions for the purpose of relieving the widows, orphans, and families of the clergy and others in distressed circumstances; 35 Geo. III. c. 3. See Friendly Societies. See for interesting information on the state of the ministers' widows' fund, the Report by the late Mr Cleghorn to the General Assembly in 1831. See also *Ersk. Will. This term is not one which is used technically in our law, at least by itself, although it is sometimes so used in combination, as in the expression, last or latter will, which is synonymous with testament. In popular language, however, it is employed to signify any declaration of what a person wills with regard to the disposal of his property, heritable or moveable, after his death, and thus includes not only testaments, but all the complicated forms of deeds granted intuitu mortis.

For the rules of law, as applicable to this important subject, see the articles, Disposition and Settlement—Testament—Legacies, and Conjunct Rights. The object in the present article rather is to give such general directions for making wills, as may enable persons not educated to the law to perform this office to themselves; recommending, however, to testators, in every case where they can obtain it, to call in professional assistance; because so important a matter as the validity of a will ought never to be left in doubt.

A will by which moveable property only is to be disposed of, and which contains no registration clause, may be written on unstamped paper; but where heritage is to be destined, it is necessary, according to the practice in Scotland, to use what are commonly called deed stamps. These are stamps of the value of thirty-five shillings and twenty-five shillings; the former being used for the first sheet, and the latter for every other. It is proper to attend to the rule, that if more than 2159 words be written on the first sheet, or more than 3239 on the two first sheets, or more than 4319 on the three first, and so forth, increasing by 1080 each time, the deed will be null under the stamp laws.

Three forms of wills are subjoined to this article. The first is for disposing of the testator's moveable estate only; the second, of his heritable and moveable estates together; and the last, which embraces both descriptions of property, is for placing the whole under the charge of trustees.

The style which may be adopted in any case must, of course, be altered to suit the precise circumstances of that case. It is proper, however, to state, that none of the clauses ought to be omitted altogether, without due deliberation. In the disposition and settlement, in either of its forms, the clause reserving the grantor's liferent and power to alter, and dispensing with the delivery, must, in every case, be retained. So also must the clauses in the trust-deed, for the safety of creditors and purchasers, and of the trustees themselves.

When it is intended to give the residuary legatee the absolute right to the property conveyed, it will be found more expedient to adopt one of the first two styles subjoined; and the third, or trust-deed, ought to be used only when the residuary legatee ought not to be intrusted with the management of his affairs, or when it is not intended to give him a vested right to the estate, immediately on the testator's death, but at some subsequent period; as at his majority, or when he is to have a mere temporary interest in the property, as, for instance, a liferent of it. Even when the residuary legatee is a minor, a conveyance to him directly is, in general, preferable to one in favour of trustees for his behoof; because it is attended with less difficulty and expense, and his tutors or curators supersede the necessity of trustees.

It is necessary to state, that under the forms subjoined the heritable property cannot be at once feudally vested in the disponees; for these forms contain no special description of particular subjects, and no warrants for infestment. These clauses have been omitted, because they can be safely prepared only by an educated conveyancer, who understands their precise form and effect, and the proper mode of adapting them to the state of the testator's titles. But notwithstanding this circumstance, wills duly executed in the styles exemplified, are quite effectual; because, if the heir-at-law be unwilling to ratify them by making a corresponding conveyance, the Court of Session will adjudge the property in implement to the disponees, and ordain the superior to give them infestment.

But under the Titles to Land Act 1858, § 12, general disponees may complete a title to lands by expeding a notarial instrument in the form annexed to the statute.

As legacies are expressed in the same terms, whether inserted in a testament, a disposition and settlement, or a trust-deed, the forms of them are exemplified separately at the end of this article; and such of these forms as may be suited to the circumstances of the case, may be inserted in the proper place, in any of the styles given of the will. And any of the forms of legacies may, by obvious variations, be converted into the clause of the trust-deed, by which the residue is disposed of.

It is quite impossible to give examples of all the forms in which it may be necessary to express legacies; but no technical words of style are required, and it is only requisite to express them in plain and unambiguous language. Some general rules, however, on this subject, and generally on the form of preparing a will, may be useful. (1.) The legatees should always be fully named, and properly designed. Thus, for instance, in the case of an illegitimate child, he should be described not as "son to A. B.," (the word "son" meaning, in general, a lawful child,) but as "the reputed son" of A. B. (2.) The distinction between special and general legacies should be kept distinctly in view. Thus, if A. were to bequeath to B. "his gold watch," or "the L.1000 three per cent. consols standing in his name," B., the legatee, would, in either of these cases, take the specific subject bequeathed to him, though the estate were inadequate to the payment of the general legacies. If, however, the bequests were expressed in these terms: "To B. the sum of L.30 to purchase a gold watch," or "to B. such a sum as will purchase L.1000 three per cent. consols," then, if there should be a deficiency of the estate, B. would suffer a proportional abatement with the other legatees. But if the testator, intending to give a legacy which should be liable for no share of the eventual deficiency of his funds, should express the clause in the form of a specific bequest, and if he should afterwards inadvertently dispose of the subject bequeathed without altering his will, the legatee would thereby be deprived of the benefit intended for him, because the subject bequeathed was no longer the testator's to dispose of. (3.) It is a saving to the estate generally, to give the legacies free of duty; because, by the legacy-duty acts, money left, in addition to a legacy, for the purpose of paying duty thereon, is not itself liable for duty. In consequence of this rule, it is better to give a stranger, who is liable for duty at the rate of ten per cent., a legacy of L.900, free of duty, than L.1000 not free of it; because, in the one case, the estate pays only L.900, with L.90 of duty, or, in all, L.990; whereas, in the other case, it would be liable for L.1000, thus saving L.10; and, in either case, the legatee receives the same sum, namely, L.900, free of duty in the one case, and L.1000, under deduction of L.100 of duty on the other. (4.) Annuities, especially those to persons having no other funds, ought, in general to be given free of duty. The reason is, that the legacy-duty falls heavier on the annuitants than on other legatees, at least during the first years of the annuity. By the legacy-duty acts, the annuity is valued as at the date of the testator's death; the percentage of duty is then calculated on this value, and the amount of that duty is deducted in four instalments out of the first four years' annuities. Thus, an annuity of L.26, or ten shillings per week, to a person aged fifty, who is not a relation of the testator, being worth L.292, 17s. 3d., would be liable for L.29, 5s. 8d. of duty; and, consequently, if the bequest be not given free of duty, the annuitant, instead of getting ten shillings a-week for the first four years, would have no more than seven shillings, the remainder being kept back to pay the duty. (5.) It sometimes happens that a friend or relative is owing a debt to the maker of a will, which he, the testator, wishes to discharge. It is a matter of prudence, however, not to include the discharge in the will, as is often done, because such a discharge is construed into a legacy of an amount equivalent to the debt, and is therefore liable for the legacy-duty. In such a case the testator ought to cancel the grounds of debt, and take no notice of the matter in the will. (6.) No alterations should be made in a will by marginal notes, or interlineations, or erasures, or deleting words, for such operations, if they do not vitate the will altogether, are not likely to be considered probative. Alterations, therefore, should be made by way of additions at the end of the will, expressed in clear language; and they must be tested and signed before witnesses with the same care and solemnity as the original will. A form is subjoined. (7.) It is proper, in order to prevent ambiguities in a will, to write every word at full length, without contractions, and to insert no sums or dates in figures, but entirely in words. And the whole of the deed should be written continuously, without breaks or new lines, otherwise room would be left for interpolations. See Stair, B. iv. tit. 42, § 21; More's Notes, p. cccxxviii., and p. x.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 5, et seq.; and the authorities cited in the articles Testament and Legacy.

It has been ruled in England, that the validity of a will depends on the law of the domicile of the testator at the time of his death, and not on the law of the place where the will was executed. The principle of this rule is understood to be, that a man has no natural right to regulate the disposal of his property after his death, and that in the exercise of that power he must conform to the law of the country in which he is domiciled at the time of his death; because a will being ambulatory till death, expresses the last wishes of the testator at that time. The legal consequence of such a rule is, that a testator is required to execute a new will on every change of domicile; if the law of the new domicile differs from that of the previous one. So inconvenient a consequence would seem to require the interposition of the Legislature. In Scotland, it has always been understood that a will was valid if executed according to the law of the place of execution, although not according to the law of the testator's domicile at the time of his death; and farther, that a will was valid if executed according to the law of his domicile at the time of its execution, although not executed according to the law of the place of its execution. The convenience of this rule is important in a double point of view. It enables a testator to execute a valid will in a foreign country, where it may be impossible for him to obtain any legal assistance to enable him to execute it according to the law of his own country, in which he may still retain his domicile. Farther, by not allowing a change of domicile to operate as a revocation of a former will, it obviates the necessity of a testator executing a new will in every place in which he may acquire a domicile. An important case on this subject in the law of England is that of Orokar v. Marquis of Hertford's Executors, decided by the Privy Council, 21st February 1844, and reported, 4 Moore's Privy Council Cases, p. 339. No case till recently has occurred in Scotland in which the point has been raised although in many cases effect may have been given to wills not valid according to the law of the domicile of the testator, although valid according to the law of the place of its execution. A case, however—Purves' Trustees v. Purves' Executors—has recently occurred, which is not yet reported. The Lord Ordinary found in favour of the validity of the will, although not executed according to the law of the testator's domicile. His judgment having been reclaimed against, the case was heard before the whole Court, and the validity of the will was sustained.

Will of a Summons, or other Signet Letter. The will is that part of the writ beginning, "Our will is," &c., and containing the will or command of the Sovereign, or of the judge in whose name the writ issues, to the messenger-at-arms or other officer of the law, requiring him to cite the party to answer in court, at the suit of his opponent. The will charges the officer to cite the party, on the inducia appropriate to the particular action, to appear to answer at the instance of the other party in the matter libelled. In the Act of Sederunt 11th July 1828, § 22, the form of the will of a summons against a defender furth of Scotland will be found; and the same form, mutatis mutandis, is to be adopted in all other letters passing the signet, bearing a citation, charge, publication, or service, against persons furth of Scotland. And the Act of Sederunt 8th July 1831 contains forms of the wills of summonses, of suspensions, and of advocations, together also with the form of the will of a sheriff-court summons; and as these forms differ, in some respects, from those given in the ordinary books of style, it is proper for practitioners to keep this in view. The officer serves a copy of the summons on the party, along with a citation to appear in court, pursuant to the injunction in the will, but these service copies, or doubles as they are called, in the ordinary case, do not contain a copy of the will; hence, the technical expression in the officer's execution is, that he served the party with a full double "to the will," i. e., as far as the will. The same course is followed in executing diligence; for, generally speaking, all writs used in the practice of Scotland, either for bringing parties into court, or for obtaining legal execution or diligence, are closed with a will. Stair, B. iv. tit. 5, § 2; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 7; Darling's Prac. i. 140; Maclaurin's Sheriff-Court Prac. 84; Ross's Lect. i. 290; *A. Winter Herding. Prior to the passing of the Act 1686, c. 11, no one was bound to herd his cattle so as to prevent their trespassing, except during what was called "bain-ing time," that is, while the corn was on the ground. Hence, although a man might drive his neighbour's cattle off his ground, he could not poind or detain them bravi manu, until the above statute, on the preamble that much damage to plantings and inclosures was sustained through the not herding of cattle and sheep during the winter, enacted that all heritors, liferenters, tenants, cottars, and other possessors of lands or houses, should herd their horses, milt, sheep, swine, and goats, during the entire year, winter as well as summer; and in the night-time should keep them in houses, folds, or inclosures; certifying the contravenors that they should pay half a merk (about 1s. 3½d. sterling) for every animal found on their neighbour's ground, over and above making reparation for the damage done to the "grass or planting." It is also made lawful, by this statute, for the heritor or possessor of the ground to detain animals found trespassing until the half-merk is paid, together with the expense of keeping the animal. Actions under this statute may be brought before the sheriff; and it seems to have been decided (although the cases are exceedingly ill reported)—1. That so far as regards the damage done, the statute applies to damage done to corn as well as to grass or planting, although, where a herd had been kept, the statutory penalties were held not to be exigible; Govan, 18th Feb. 1794, Mor. 10499. 2. That where there was not only a march-fence, but also herd kept, the owner of the trespassing cattle was liable both for damages and also for the statutory penalties; Loch, 3d July 1799, Mor. 10501. In the former of these cases, the cattle had not been poinded bravi manu, and it was argued (although unsuccessfully), that in such circumstances the statute did not apply. In Loch's case, the cattle were poinded or detained, and then returned to the owner, and the action thereafter raised. See Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 67; Balk. B. iv. tit. 41, § 16; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 6, § 28. See Planting and Inclosing, Poinding of Stray Cattle.

Witchcraft; was formerly held to be an offence punishable with death, and cognizable even by the sheriff; 1563, c. 73. But all prosecution for this imaginary crime was prohibited by Geo. II. c. 6, except that persons proved to have pretended to witchcraft, occult skill, fortune-telling, or any such art, calculated to impose on the ignorant, are to be imprisoned for a year, to stand once every three months during that period on the pillory, and to find security for their good behaviour. Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 4; B. iv. tit. 4, § 18; Hume, ii. 578, et seq.

Witness. See Evidence. Testing Clause. Execution. For the qualifications, &c., of witnesses to deeds, see Instrumentary Witnesses. See also Partial Counsel. Interest. Relationship. Infamy. Citation, &c.

Women; are excluded from a variety of offices peculiar to men, such as that of tutor-at-law. All objections to their admissibility as witnesses, however, is now done away, except in so far as their more pliant natures may strengthen the presumption of force or bribery, and that they cannot be instrumentary witnesses; Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 4; B. iv. tit. 2, § 22. See Evidence. Testing Clause. A woman may be made bankrupt, except where married; and even in that case, if her husband have abandoned Scotland, and if she trades for herself, she may be rendered bankrupt. See 1696, c. 5, corrected by 23 Geo. III. c. 18, § 1; by 33 Geo. III. c. 74, § 2, as explained by A. S. 14th Dec. 1805, and by 54 Geo. III. c. 137, § 1, providing for rendering those persons bankrupt who are not liable to imprisonment, either by reason of their absence from the country, or (as women) by their personal privilege and protection exempted from horning and caption. Bell's Com. ii. 166-7-9. See Bankrupt. Sequestration.

Woods. Proper forests are not conveyed without a special clause; but common woods go as part and pertinent of the lands. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 14; Bell's Com. i. 52, et seq. 176; ii. 28, 191. The woods and forests belonging to the Crown are managed by commissioners appointed for the purpose. By 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 1, the office of the surveyor-general of works and buildings is united with that of the commissioners of the woods, forests, and land revenues; and by 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 69, the powers of the commissioners of woods and forests are extended in relation to the management of the land revenue in Scotland. See *Timber. Sylva Cædua. Planting. Tailzie. Liferent. Working Days. It is generally stipulated in charter-parties, that the master of the ship shall remain at the port of delivery to unload or procure cargo, or sail with convoy, for a certain number of working or lay-days, with allowance of a further time, called days of demurrage, during which he may remain on payment of a daily hire; and, on occasion of improper detention, demurrage is given to the shipowners in name of damage also, as well as under contract. Bell's Com. i. 577. Brodie's Supp. to Stair, 988. See Demurrage. Lay-Days.

Workman. A workman holds goods for the seller, if employed by him, and for the buyer, if either employed by him or receiving notice of transfer and order for delivery; Bell's Com. i. 182. See Delivery. On his employer's bankruptcy, then, if the work be completed, he claims as a personal creditor, with lien, if before delivery. If it be not completed, he may either be forced by the creditors, if they choose to pay him, to fulfil his contract, or have his claim for payment of part work, and for damages; and, if the work be not commenced, he may claim as damage the penalties incurred to persons who have been employed under him, and the profit he would have gained. On his own bankruptcy, his creditors may, with his assistance, complete the contract, unless peculiar circumstances render its proper completion impracticable, in which case the employer may insist for what damage he can instruct. Loss arising from inevitable accident falls on the employer; but fault and negligence make the workman liable, and even imperitia culpæ annumeratur. Bell's Com. i. 457.

The settling of disputes between master and workman, and the providing means for having their contracts implemented, have been the subject of several statutes. The acts 20 Geo. II. c. 19, and 6 Geo. III. c. 25, make regulations respecting certain servants and apprentices. The powers of these acts are extended by 4 Geo. IV. c. 34, of which the following are the principal provisions: Any master or mistress, or his or her steward, manager, or agent, may make complaint upon oath against any apprentice within the meaning of the above acts, to a justice of the county or place in which the apprentice is employed, for any misdemeanour or misconduct. Or if the apprentice have absconded, any justice of the place in which he is found, or where he has been employed, may, upon complaint upon oath by the master, mistress, &c., issue his warrant for apprehending every such apprentice. The justice may hear and determine the complaint, and punish the offender, by abating the whole or any part of his or her wages, or otherwise by commitment to the house of correction, to be held to hard labour for a reasonable time, not exceeding three months; § 1. All complaints and disputes arising between masters and their apprentices within the meaning of the above acts, respecting wages due to the apprentices, may be determined by one or more justices of the place where the apprentice is employed. The justice is empowered to examine, upon oath the master, apprentice, or witnesses, and to summon the master to appear before him at a reasonable time, to be named in the summons, and to order payment within such time as he thinks proper, of so much wages as appear to him to be due. In case of refusal or non-payment, the justice may issue his warrant to levy the amount (not above L.10), by distress and sale of the goods of the master or mistress, rendering the overplus to the owners, after payment of the charges; § 2. If any servant in husbandry, or any artificer, calico-printer, handicraftsman, miner, collier, keelman, pitman, glassman, potter, labourer, or other person, contract with any person to serve him, and do not enter into or commence his or her service, according to contract (such contract being in writing, and signed by the parties); or having entered into such service, absent himself before the term of the contract (whether in writing or not) is completed, or neglect to fulfil the contract, or be guilty of any other misconduct or misdemeanour in the execution of it, or otherwise respecting it; any justice of the county or place where the servant, &c., has contracted, or is employed, or is found, may, upon complaint upon oath by the other contracting party, or his steward, manager, or agent, issue his warrant for apprehending the servant in husbandry, artificer, &c., and examine into the nature of the complaint. And if it appear that the servant, &c., has not fulfilled the contract, or has been guilty of any other misconduct or misdemeanour as aforesaid, the justice may commit him to the house of correction, to be held to labour for a reasonable time, not exceeding three months, and abate a proportional part of his or her wages for the time of confinement; or in lieu thereof, punish the offender by abating the whole or any part of his or her wages, or discharge him or her from the contract or service; and this discharge is given under the hand and seal of the justice gratis; § 3. Where the employer resides at a considerable distance from his place, or is occasionally absent for long periods of time, and intrusts his business to the management of stewards, agents, foremen, or managers, any justice of the place where a servant in husbandry, artificer, &c., is employed, may, upon the complaint of such servant, &c., touching the non-payment of wages, summon the steward or other manager, and determine the complaint in like manner as complaints of the like nature against a master are directed to be determined, and make order for the payment by such steward, &c., to the servant, &c., of such wages as appear to be due, provided the amount do not exceed L.10. And in case of refusal of payment by the steward, &c., for twenty-one days from the date of the order, the justice may issue his warrant to levy the amount by distress and sale of the goods of the employer, rendering the overplus to the owner, or to the steward, &c., for the use of the employer, after payment of the charges of distress and sale; § 4. Every order or determination of a jus-

Statutory provisions are also made for the settling of disputes between master and workman by arbitration. The following are the principal provisions of the act 5 Geo. IV. c. 96, which consolidated and amended the laws relative to the arbitration of disputes between masters and workmen. The following disputes may be settled in the manner provided by the act: 1. Disagreements as to the price to be paid for work done, or in the course of being done, whether the disputes respect the payment of wages as agreed upon or the hours of work as agreed upon, or any damage done to the work, or any delay in finishing the work, or the not finishing the work in a good and workmanlike manner, or according to any contract, or as to bad materials. 2. Cases where the workmen are to be employed to work any new pattern, requiring them to purchase new implements, or to alter the old implements, and the masters and workmen cannot agree as to the compensation to be made to the workmen. 3. Disputes respecting the length, breadth, or quality, of pieces of goods, or, in the case of cotton manufacture, the yarn thereof, or the quantity and quality of the wool thereof. 4. Disputes respecting the wages or compensation to be paid for pieces of goods that are made of any great or extraordinary length. 5. Disputes in the cotton manufacture respecting the manufacture of cravats, shawls, polikat, nomal, and other handkerchiefs, and the number to be contained in one piece of such handkerchiefs. 6. Disputes respecting the particular trade or manufacture, or contracts relative thereto, which cannot be otherwise mutually adjusted. 7. Disputes between masters and persons engaged in sizing or ornamenting goods. It is declared that nothing contained in the act shall authorize justices to establish a rate of wages at which workmen shall in future be paid, unless with the mutual consent of both master and workmen. All complaints by a workman as to bad materials must be made within three weeks of his receiving the same; and all complaints from any other cause within six days after such cause arises. This period has been extended by a recent act to fourteen days after the cause of complaint arises; 1 Vict. c. 67, § 1. Whenever any of the above subjects of dispute arises, the master and workman, or either of them, may demand and have an arbitration or reference. Where the complainant and party complained of come before, or agree, by any writing under their hands, to abide by the determination of a justice of peace, or magistrate of a county, burgh, &c.,

within which the parties reside (by 1 Vict. c. 67, § 2, however, on account of the difficulty where both parties do not reside in the same jurisdiction, the clause "within which the parties reside," has been changed to "where the party complained against resides"), such justice of peace or magistrate may hear and finally determine, in a summary manner, the matter in dispute. But if they do not so come or agree, then any such justice or magistrate must, on complaint made before him, and proof, by the examination of the complainer, that application has been made to the party complained of to settle the dispute, and that it has not been settled, or where the dispute relates to a bad warp, that the cause of complaint has not been done away with, within forty-eight hours after such application, summon before him the party complained of, on some day, not exceeding three days, exclusive of Sunday, after the complaint is made, giving notice to the complainer of the time and place appointed. And if the person summoned do not appear, or send some one to settle the dispute on his behalf, or appearing, do not do away the cause of complaint, the justice must, at the request of either of the parties, nominate arbitrators or referees for settling the matters in dispute. He must then and there propose not less than four, nor more than six persons, one-half of them master manufacturers, or agents or foremen of some manufacturer, and the other half of them workmen in such manufacture, all residing in or near the place where the disputes arise. The master engaged in the dispute, or his agent, chooses one out of the master manufacturers, &c., and the workman, or his agent, chooses another out of the workmen proposed; and these two have full power to hear and finally determine the dispute; § 3. In case any of the persons proposed refuse or delay to accept the arbitration, or accepting, do not act within two days after the nomination, the justice must proceed to name another, or other persons, of the above description in his or their room. And in every case of a second nomination, the arbitrators must meet within twenty-four hours after the application. The expense of every application for a second appointment must be borne by the party through whose default, or the default of whose referee, the application is rendered necessary. The justice making the second appointment must certify the same, according to a form given in the act. Whenever a second arbitrator is appointed, and does not attend at the time and place appointed for settling the dispute, the other arbitrator, at such time and place, may proceed by himself to determine the dispute; and in such case the award of the sole arbitrator is final; § 4. On the nomination of the arbitrators, the justice must appoint a place and day of meeting, notice of which must be given by the justice to the persons nominated, and to any party who did not attend the meeting. The persons appointed must hear and examine the parties and their witnesses, and determine the dispute within two days after their nomination, exclusive of Sundays. Their award is final; § 5. In all cases where complaints are made respecting bad warps or utensils by workmen, the place of meeting must be at or as near as may be to the place where the work is carrying on, and, in all other cases, at or as near as may be to the place where the work has been given out; § 6. If any complainer do not personally, or by deputy, attend the meeting for the nomination of arbitrators, he is not entitled to the benefit of the act; and if any person complained of do not attend that meeting, the justice names an arbitrator for him; § 7.

Provision is made for the arrest and commitment of refractory witnesses; § 9. Arbitrators who cannot agree, or who do not sign their award within three days, must go before the justice who appointed them, or in case of his absence or indisposition, to any other justice of the county or place, who must himself settle the dispute within two days, and his award is final; § 10. If either arbitrator do not go before the justice, the justice may, after summoning the arbitrators, determine the dispute upon the representation of either of them who comes before him; § 11. No manufacturer can act as a justice under this act; § 12. Disputes may be adjusted by any other mode of arbitration on which the parties may agree, and the same proceedings may be had for enforcing the award as are provided for enforcing an award under this act; § 13. Agents and servants who deliver work, or partners, may be treated as principals; § 14. Any master or workman, by writing under his hand, may authorise any person to act for him in submitting to arbitration, and attending arbitrators or justices touching the matter of any arbitration; § 15. Where a master becomes bankrupt after proceedings have been commenced against him, the trustee or factor on his estate comes in his place, in the proceedings under this act; but all sums of money to be paid in pursuance of awards, are recoverable only out of the trust-estate; § 16. Where a married woman is the complainer, her husband may proceed in her name. And where a minor is the complainer, his father, or if dead, his mother, or if both parents be dead, any relation, or the surety in his indenture, or any person nominated by the minor, may proceed in his name;

§ 17. Tickets of particulars must be given out with work, of which the master keeps duplicates, which are good as evidence, if the workman do not produce the tickets themselves; §§ 18 and 19. Masters who do not by themselves, or their clerks or foremen, object to an article within twenty-four hours, cannot afterwards complain; § 20. The parties may by agreement extend the time for making award; § 21. The form of the award is given in a schedule annexed to the act; § 22. When the award is fulfilled, the fulfilment must be acknowledged in a specified form; § 23. Performance of the award may be enforced by distress, and failing that, the party refusing is imprisoned; § 24. Where distress appears ruinous to the defaulter and his family, warrant is withheld, and the defaulter is committed to prison; § 25. On payment to the governor of the prison of the sum awarded with costs, the party is discharged; § 26. No proceedings under the act are invalid for want of form; § 29. No appeal is competent; § 28. Provision is made for fees to clerks and constables, and the settlement of costs; §§ 30, 31. Proceedings under the act are exempt from stamp-duty; § 32. By 1 Vict. c. 67, § 3, it is enacted, that wherever the expression "Justice of the Peace" occurs in the above act, it shall be construed to mean "Magistrate."

The statute 1 and 2 Will. IV., c. 37, was passed to prevent the payment in certain trades of wages in goods, or otherwise than in the current coin of the realm. It is generally known as the "Truck Act."

Wrecks; formerly fell to the king or his donatary, the admiral or the heritor, if no living thing escaped; statute Alex. II. c. 25, § 1. But foreigners can always, on application, have access to their wrecks on our coasts—1429, c. 124; and the wrecks of natives belong to the owners, if they apply within a year, or even at a more remote period, if reasonable in the circumstances. Wreck of the Sea; "a word specified in the laws and sundry infestments, signifying power, liberty and prerogative, competent to the king, or to any person to whom the same is granted by him, by infestment or any other disposition, to intromit and uptake such goods and gear as are ship-broken, or fall to him by escheat of the sea. This liberty was as competent and profitable to him who was infest with wreck as it might be to the king" himself. Skene, h. t. See Wrecks.

Wrongous Imprisonment; is described by the act 1701, c. 6, called the Scotch Habeas Corpus. Under that statute, wrongous imprisonment is committed by a judge or magistrate, granting warrant for commitment, in order to trial, without cause expressed, and on information not subscribed by the informer; by officers of the law receiving or detaining prisoners on such warrants—refusing to the prisoner a copy of the warrant of commitment—detaining him in close confinement above eight days after such commitment—not duly releasing him on bail, where he is committed in order to trial for a bailable offence—or transporting persons beyond seas without their own consent, or a lawful sentence. Other species of wrongous imprisonment, not falling under the statute, are punished arbitrarily at common law. The statutory punishment is a pecuniary fine, and payment of a sum of money per diem to the prisoner, both proportioned to his rank; and, moreover, incapacity for public trust. This act has been extended to private offenders also; and the penalties (which cannot be modified) may be sued for before the Court of Session, who have the sole cognisance of the crime; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 31; Hume, ii. 94, et seq. The right to prosecute under the statute prescribes in three years. But this prescription does not extend to actions founded on imprisonment for civil debt; M'Christie, Jan. 21, 1831, 9 S. & D. 312. Wrongous imprisonment founds also a civil action at common law for damages, at the instance of the injured party, against the magistrate or officer of the law, or other person who has done the wrong. And in actions of damages for wrongous imprisonment, a verdict awarding nominal damages carries costs; Cowan, Dec. 17, 1833, 12 S. & D. 221. In an action for wrongous imprisonment, it is competent to prove, in aggravation of damages, that one of the pursuer's family was sick; Beveridge, July 13, 1822, 3 Mur. 108. A summons founded exclusively on the act 1701 cannot support a conclusion for damages at common law, independently of the penalties imposed by the act; Millar, May 21, 1831, 9 S. & D. 625. In this case an amendment of the libel was allowed. Yburpananseca. This word is by Skene supposed to mean the law of birdingsek or burdenseck, which was, "De furta vituli, vel arietis, vel quantum cibi quis portare potest super dorsum suum, curia non est tenenda." Skene, h. t. See Burdenseck.

Year and Day. The lapse of a year has several important effects in the law of Scotland, the day being added in majorem evidentiam. Thus, formerly the heir had a year and a day to deliberate as to whether or not he will take up his ancestor's succession, after the lapse of which he has not the privilege of serving heir cum beneficio inventarii. But by the Titles to Land Act, 21 and 22 Vict. c. 76, 1858, diligence may proceed against an apparent heir at any time after the lapse of six months from the date of his becoming apparent heir. See Annus Deliberandi. Beneficium Inventarii. So also formerly, if a marriage did not subsist for a year and day, or until the birth of a living child, matters, quoad the spouses, were restored to the state in which they were before the marriage; unless otherwise provided in the contract of marriage. See Marriage.

Terce. But by the Intestacy Act, 18 Vict. c. 22, 1855, it is enacted that the dissolution of a marriage by the death of one of the parties before the lapse of a year from its date shall not affect the rights of the survivor or those of the representatives of the predeceased. All adjudications led within year and day of the first effectual adjudication rank pari passu on the debtor's estate. See Adjudication. Effectual Adjudication. Letters of horning must be denounced within year and day of the charge, in order to warrant the issuing of a caption. See Denuciation. A summons must be called within year and day after its execution, otherwise it falls. See Summons. A depending process must be moved in by having an interlocutor pronounced within year and day after the immediately preceding interlocutor, otherwise it falls asleep. See Wakening. Under the Small Debt Act, a new charge of payment must be given to the debtor if the decree is not enforced within a year from its date, or from the charge for payment. See Adjudication. Sequestration. Bankrupt. Annus Deliberandi. Computation of Time. Dies inceptus pro completo habetur.
